MISS MARGUERITE HALL, contralto. April 23, 1904. Penelope's Recitative and Prayer from Bruch's "Odysseus," Op. 36; Bach's (?) "If thou thy Heart bestowest"; Franz's "In Autumn"; Mendelssohn's "Spring Song"	1350
MME. HELEN HOPEKIRK, pianist. April 16, 1904. Hopekirk's Concert Piece in D minor; Scherzo from Saint-Saëns's Concerto No. 2, in G minor. (Sketch)	1303
MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY, pianist. March 26, 1904. Liszt's Concerto No. 2, in A major. (Sketch)	1108
MR. RUDOLF KRASSELT,† 'cellist. Nov. 21, 1903. Saint-Saëns's Concerto No. 1, in A minor, Op. 33. (Sketch)	256
MISS MAUD MACCARTHY, violinist. Dec. 19, 1903. Brahms's Concerto in D major, Op. 77. (Sketch)	432
MISS OLIVE MEAD, violinist. Feb. 6, 1904. Beethoven's Concerto in D major, Op. 61	812
MME. MELBA, soprano. Dec. 26, 1903. Handel's "Sweet Bird" and Ophelia's Mad Scene from "Hamlet." (Sketch), 367, 490
MR. GEORGE PROCTOR, pianist. Jan. 30, 1904. Liszt's Concerto No. 1, in E-flat major	746
MR. ÉMILE SAURET, violinist. April 9, 1904. Saint-Saëns's Concerto No. 3, in B minor, Op. 61. (Sketch)	1232
MME. ERNESTINE SCHUMANN-HEINK, contralto. Feb. 27, 1904.* Andromache's Lament, from Bruch's "Achilles"; Brahms's "Longing at Rest"* and "Cradle Song of the Virgin,"* Op. 91. (Sketch)	932

***

Sopranos: Mme. Blauvelt, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Melba	3
Contraltos: Miss Foster,* Miss Hall, Mme. Schumann-Heink	3
Baritone: Mr. Gilbert	1
Pianists: Miss Aus der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk; Messrs. Bauer, Busoni, Joseffy, Proctor	6
Violinists: Miss MacCarthy, Miss Mead; Messrs. T. Adamowski,† Arbos,† Birnbaum,† Sauret	6
'Cellist: Mr. Krasselt†	1
Total	20

***

Accompanists: Miss Kate Eadie for Miss Foster; Mr. Zach† for Mme. Blauvelt, Mme. Gadski, Miss Hall, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilbert.

Incidental Solos: Mr. E. Ferir,**† viola: Berlioz's "Harold" Symphony and Brahms's Songs, Op. 91 (Mme. Schumann-Heink).
Mr. Zach,† viola: Strauss's "Don Quixote," Dohnányi's Symphony.

***

Organists: Mr. Wallace Goodrich. Mr. H. G. Tucker (April 23, 1904.

ENTR'ACTES.

	PAGE
BLACKBURN, VERNON: "Berlioz"	1249
"Butterfly Music"	1243
"Dandyism and Music"	1124
"Liszt and Wagner"	328
"Religion and Music"	1363
INGMAN, A., and HALE, PHILIP: "Music in Finland"	1066

INDEX TO SUNDRY REFERENCES AND FOOTNOTES.

BIOGRAPHICAL: Balakireff, 1288; Belaieff, 98; Böttger, 984; Mme. Branchu, 874; de Bréville, 146; Bronsart, 1110; Bruneau, 32, 96; Cecchi, 367; Clement, 815; Cruvelli, 630; Drouet, 248; Duvinage, 808; Eloy, 874; Gardel, 874; Gaveaux, 312; Genast, 185; Giorgi-Righetti, 612; Girard, 386; Hähnel, 1165; Hartvigson, 1007; Hollmann, 260; Imbert, 797; Jennens, 496; A. Joachim, 936; Joachim's children, 945; Joseph II., 923; W. Kalliwoda, 185; Kastropp, 545; Lydia Kelly, 143; Koessler, 338; Kotek, 1129; Lays, 874; Libussa, 200; Ed. Liszt, 751; A. Ludwig, 1310; Lutz, 552; von Meck, 1129; Mehlig-Falk, 1110; Mercy-Argenteau, 1292; Mickiewicz, 374; Monasterio, 72; Napoleon I., 861; Arthur Napoleon, 1254; J. P. Salomon, 427; Schröder-Devrient, 451; Scio, 312; Seidler, 140; Stamaty, 994; Titchatschek, 450; Tolbecque, 258; Topp, 748; Tscheck, 764; Urhan, 386; Volkmann described by Beatty-Kingston, 687; J. Wagner, 452; J. Walther, 188; Wranitzky, 65; Anna Wülken, 1368; de Zarembski, 1008.

DANCES: Chaconne, 824; Farandole, 608; Furiant, 763; Gavotte, 694; Passacaglia, 824; Siciliana, 1234; Tango, 84; Tchaikowsky on Ballet Music, 1138.

INSTRUMENTS: Celesta, 378; Kantele, 1069; Triangle, 752.

MUSICAL FORMS: Aubade, 676; Cassazione, 678; Parthien, 678; Serenade, 676.

SONGS: "Auld Robin Morris," 324; "Gaudeamus igitur," 367; "Irish Christening at Tipperary" (Maguinnis), 24; "Landesvater," 365; "Scots wha hae," 324; "Vision of Connaught" (Mangan), 204; "Was kommt dort," 367; "Wir hatten gebauet," 365; "Young Tamlan," 148.

THEATRE: Byron's "Manfred," 1415; Byron's "Marino Faliero," 396; Donizetti's "La Favorite," 1257; Giordano's "Mala Vita," 766; Hugo's "Angelo," 545; Orange Amphitheatre, 605; Tasca's "A Santa Lucia," 766.

LEGENDS: City of Iram, 208; Euterpe (T. Heywood), 1345; Frithjof Saga, 799; Harald (Uhland's), 148; Lemnian Women, 488; Medea (T. Heywood), 487; Melusina, 1172; Tannhäuser (G. Paris); Wild Hunter, 616.

CRITICAL: Barry on the symphonic poem, 1258; Baudelaire on "Tannhäuser," 446; Borodin on Rimsky-Korsakoff, 91; Bruneau on Chabrier, 954; von Bülow on Tchaikowsky, 20; Ehlert on Volkmann, 1378; Kautz on Schumann, 986; Fitzmaurice-Kelly on Don Quixote and Hamlet, 879; Marnold on Rimsky-Korsakoff, 1294; Pudor on Rimsky-Korsakoff, 1294; Runciman on Mozart, 926; G. B. Shaw on "Siegfried," 76; Tchaikowsky on Rimsky-Korsakoff, 1296.

LOCAL: Performances of Rubinstein's works in Boston, 736.

MISCELLANEOUS: Athenæus' definition of music, 682; bibliography of Czech music, 769; carnival (etymology, etc.), 690; color of tonalities, 821; female orchestras, 678; Gilles (type), 575; Luther as choral writer, 188; musical portraits, 503; prose librettos, 30; the "Red Cock," 804; Russian Symphony Concerts, 94; Hugo Wolf, on Applause, 1064.

223
J. M. 1904
EVER since the time when Mrs. Jack Gardner came to Boston a bride, back in the 60's, and astonished the conservative old families with her piquancy and daring, she has been the acknowledged leader of Boston society. Not only that, but she has also, by her marked radicalism, forced provincial Boston of the early days into a new regime. At first "society" tried to be malicious because of her open friendship with notabilities. Then when finally, by the law of contraries, Mrs. Jack, a plain, little red-haired woman without a single brilliant talent and only the supreme gift of tact to commend her, became the leader of the smart set whose every social edict she defied, the aristocracy recognized the fact that the time was to arrive when their innocent daughters would be compelled to enter the same drawing rooms where "actor folk and public mountebanks" were received.

Mrs. Jack has always taken up the various Symphony leaders. She was especially devoted to Gericke, while Arthur Nikisch, that pale little man of nerves, was also her friend. Zach, Strube and others who have wielded the baton from time to time have been patronized by her. When it has so pleased her, she has, in regal fashion, summoned the entire orchestra to play before her and her friends in her superbly appointed music room. The expense was the least consideration, and it was fabulous at that. To hear it, there met in her house the Brimmer set, representing the old Puritan aristocracy of Boston, and the Apthorp set, the new Bohemian set, on common ground. The Kneisel Quartet has also played at her bidding. Mrs. Gardner has not failed to break down social barriers of long standing in the evidence of her belief of society as a vehicle for the cultivation of art, music and intellectuality, and to create such a social renaissance as that of Mme. de Stael's famous salon. But with all that she manages in her subtle way not to mix Bohemian with her social life; she does the two acts in an entirely different key.

While Mrs. Gardner's proteges have, as a rule, been young men, she by no means confines her help to that sex, for many a talented Boston girl owes her success and recognition to Mrs. Gardner's financial and moral support and encouragement. To one she gave a grand piano, to another two years' study abroad.

No one knows just when Mrs. Gardner began to give aid and to smile upon budding genius, but every Bostonian knows that for years there have been favorite opes in her train who have danced attendance upon her at Symphony, at Pop concerts, at horse shows and operas. It is a long list, and included in it are Clayton Johns, Charlie Sampson, young Gebhard, Mr. Blaess, Ambrose Webber, and lastly, George Proctor.

At all the performances given by the School of Opera of the New England Conservatory of Music, Mrs. Gardner has been in one of the boxes, the first to arrive and the last to depart. Last year she not only went behind the scenes to congratulate some of the young artists personally, but she leaned far over her box and with unerring aim threw her immense corsage bouquet of violets at Signor Bimboni, the conductor, at the conclusion of a scene from an opera of his own composition, which was given in America for the first time.

More than once, she has stood at the door and distributed programs at the musicales of some of her proteges, notably at Clayton Johns' recital, some years ago. Once she fractured her leg, but that did not keep her from attending some of the concerts to which she had been looking forward. Oh, no! She went to the hall on one occasion in a wheel chair, and seemed to forget all her pain in her enjoyment of the music. And while confined to her boudoir, she invited several proteges to come and play for her.

In 1896 Mrs. Gardner brought to Boston a new protege who was very much the rage. In fact, at that time he was considered to be the greatest lion whom she had yet introduced to Boston's smart set. In his native city, Venice, where he calmly pursued the even tenor of his way as head of the conservatory there, he was discovered by Mrs. Gardner, who was enchanted with his violin playing. Having heard him on his native heath, in that enchanted gondolier land, she would not be content until she had transplanted him to American soil. To wish is to act with Mrs. Gardner, and in a short time, Tirindelli came and was introduced to sweldom through the medium of a musicale given by her at Pride's Crossing. In the autumn he was her devoted cavalier at the Symphony and other concerts. He was a good looking, dapper little Italian, and a more appreciative music lover than he would have been hard to find. One of her friends said at the time: "I love to watch them at the Symphony. Every beautiful passage, every dramatic ending is rewarded with an absorbed bow or nod from Tirindelli, who exchanged sympathetic glances with Mrs. Gardner, freighted with "Very good. Very good, indeed!" But when things didn't go just right, when the hundred souls of the orchestra didn't jibe with "but a single thought," Tirindelli's eyebrows were drawn together in deep lines and his expression was most pained.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel and their daughter, Helen Henschel, who made her debut here a season or two ago as a singer, have been friends of Mrs. Gardner for years, and during Mr. Henschel's stay here last season she saw much of him. Miss Henschel was the delighted recipient of superb flowers from the Gardner conservatories more than once while here. Mrs. Gardner deeply deplored Mrs. Henschel's death and sent a cable of sympathy immediately to Mr. Henschel upon hearing of it.

It was she who made Grossmith the fashion in Boston. When the jolly English monologue artist first appeared in Boston it was Mrs. Gardner who first sought him out and prevailed upon him to give a recital at her home, and since then she has always been a delighted listener at his recitals here.

"Baller" Quinn, the newsboy, claims to be a protege of hers. And it is true that he captivated her at a concert given by the newsboys in a Hanover street hall and that she sat through the entire performance.

Mrs. Gardner, who is an accomplished linguist and speaks Italian as fluently as she does English, is a great friend of Duse, the Italian tragedienne. She is probably the only Boston woman who enjoys the acquaintance of the eccentric Italian actress, with whom her native tongue is a great passport. When Duse has visited Boston Mrs. Gardner has always entertained her at one of her homes and has kept her supplied with exquisite floral offerings from her greenhouses.

George Proctor, the pianist, who was first recognized by Mrs. Gardner, is her devoted cavalier on almost every occasion of her appearance in public. Mr. Proctor was brought out and launched successfully upon the musical profession at a musicale several years ago in Chicago, which Mrs. Gardner went on to attend. He is now a teacher of the pianoforte in the New England Conservatory of Music, and as Mrs. Gardner is a patroness of the institution and the giver of a scholarship there, they have much in common. He is a frequent and welcome visitor at the Back Bay palace. Indeed, it is said that last year, with his mother, he spent the greater part of the winter there as Mrs. Gardner's guest.

Mohini Mohan Chatterji, the founder of the esoteric move in London, came over here in 1883, introduced by Mrs. Clement Waters, and was at once captured by Mrs. Gardner.

For the nonce, she became a disciple of occultism. Chatterji was not only learned, but very handsome, with the face of a Messiah and long, black curls. He made a picturesque figure in her drawing room and it soon became the fashion for everyone who was anybody to talk theosophy. Women gathered in her drawing room to sit at his feet, and even the Harvard boys aspired to become adepts. A wave of mysticism swept over the Hub, where there was just enough remaining of the Salem witchcraft atmosphere to make theosophy interesting, and even now, though Mrs. Gardner has turned to later fads, there is still a nucleus of theosophy remaining.

Herald May 4, 1904.

GOOD OLD POPS ARE ALWAYS NEW

Admixture of Productions That Made the Masters and Milwaukee
Famous Once More Fascinates
Society and the Rabble.

Pop! Pop! Pop!

The Pop concerts began their eight weeks of miniature explosions at Symphony Hall last evening, and while there was much of bubbling and fizzing, the evening was everything but a fizzle.

In fact, the opening evening was a huge, effervescent, musical, social success. For a first evening glass out of the large eight weeks' bottle the Pop last evening was a real good sample. Every one knows what a Pop concert is, and many of those in the know were present last evening to see that everything was started right.

The entire floor, where the tables are spread, was occupied, and the balconies were filled by people who either like to hear their music rather than drink it in, or else they were too late in applying for tables. There didn't seem to be any one wearing a worried look, no matter where he was located in the hall, and during the intermezzo—this is a musical affair—the entire assemblage mingled in the corridors and told, each one to the other, the season's latest tales.

Oh! Boston is surely a gay and festive place, and when Bostonians get together in force, as they did last evening, and inhale their Wagner and Gounod with the stuff that made Milwaukee famous and a certain Dublin family stout, they are a very merry throng.

All decorous and proper, mind you! This is a Boston Pop concert, and not a Chicago roof garden. Symphony Hall was the place, and not Luna Park; and Adamowski was leading the orchestra.

A social success? Well! If the continuing approval of those whose names are symbolical of Boston's social life is the criterion, then the pops will be essentially correct this year as formerly.

The smart set was present last evening and gave their languid approval of the opening Pop. They followed no set rule as to whether pretzels, lobster salads or ice cream should come with the orders. It was simply a social O. K. and now that there is no further doubt in the minds of those who look up while hoping for a chance to look in, it is a safe guess that the seven weeks and five days remaining will be much to the poppy at Symphony Hall.

Although the thirst of the crowd for liquid refreshments was manifested by a hurrying stream of waiters, the musical thirst was more in evidence, so much so, in fact, that during some of the numbers there was almost an appearance of a waiters' strike. Wine is only incidental to Boston's musical public. It wants its music first, and its German vintage afterward. They can get both at a Pop concert and they were out for both last evening.

Among those who held tables were seen: Mr. and Mrs. Eben D. Jordan and party, Mrs. J. De Forest Danielson, Mr. David Kimball, Miss Estelle Kimball and party, Mr. and Mrs. Joshua B. Holden, the Misses Holden, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Burnham, Mr. and Mrs. James Putnam, Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Miss Higginson, Dr. W. S. Bigelow and party, Mr. Curtis G. Metzler, Mr. and Mrs. James Forsythe, Mrs. C. H. Washburn, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Richmond, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mr. and Mrs. Timothee Adamowski, Mr. Otto Roth, Mr. and Mrs. A. S. Bigelow, Mr. and Mrs. Josef Adamowski, Mr. Schuyler Bartlett and party, Mr. and Mrs. Thorndyke spaulding and Miss Sara Daggett.

PROGRAMME NOT HEAVY.

Adamowski Leads with Spirit and Marked Authority, While Applause Is Hearty.

The first concert of the 19th season of the "Pops," under the management of Messrs. C. A. Ellis and F. R. Comee, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Timothee Adamowski was the conductor. The programme was as follows:

March, "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
Waltz, "In lauschiger Nacht".....Ziehrer
Fantasia on "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
(First time).

Prelude to act III, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Hymn to St. Cecilia.....Gounod
Violin solo by Mr. A. Birnbaum.
Country dance.....Nevin
Overture, "Orpheus".....Offenbach
Selection, "Prince of Pilsen".....Luders
Waltz, "Blue Danube".....J. Strauss
March, "El Capitan".....Sousa

Mr. Adamowski led with much spirit, with musical appreciation, and with marked authority, and there was frequent and hearty applause. There were encores, and Mr. Birnbaum was obliged to bow in response to an enthusiastic demand for a repetition of Gounod's hymn of sugary sentiment. There was a large audience, which was at first as staid as though it were seated in family pews.

There was a little more animation discernible later, but the attitude of well-bred composure was not thrown off, even after the internal application of modest quenchers. The season is in its infancy, and no true Bostonian is suddenly gay.

It is a pleasure to see that the programmes, as announced, are of a reasonably light nature, and Mr. Adamowski is to be congratulated on his selections. The music played at "Pop" concerts should be either decorative or a stimulus to good nature and enjoyment. The ancients were of this opinion, and we are no better than our fathers. Athenaeus tells us the reason for the introduction of music at the feast, and his words might well serve as a motto for the programmes at Symphony Hall:

"In the first place, in order that every one who might be too eager for drunkenness or gluttony might have music as a sort of physician and healer of his insolence and indecorum; and also because music softens moroseness of temper, for it dissipates sadness and produces affability and a sort of gentleman-like joy."

And listen unto the wisdom of Jesus, the son of Sirach: "A concert of music in a banquet of wine is as a signet of carbuncle set in gold. As a signet of an emerald set in a work of gold, so is the melody of music with pleasant wine."

There has been table music in all ages from the famous banquet of Tamerlane the Great to the infamous cuppers of Louis XV.; from the feast where Cortez envied Montezuma to the Pompeian junketings of Prince Napoleon at the beginning of the Second Empire. It was the fashion at London in the 18th century to sup in the open air not far from a band. Horace Walpole flirted with Mme. de Bouffiers as they ate to the sound of horn and hautboy. Ange Goudar ate chicken only during an andante, for he feared lest indigestion would follow keeping pace with the heels of a jig.

On the other hand, Dr. Veron swore that he could not digest without music. And some are of such will power that, unlike Thomas Hardy's Michael Mall, they will not follow the time. "I was sitting eating fried liver and lights," said Mr. Mall. "I well can mind—ah, I was! and to save my life I couldn't help chawing to the tune. Band played six-eight times; six-eight chaws I, willy-nilly. Band plays common; common time went my teeth among the fried liver and lights as true as a hair. Beautiful 'twere! Ah, I shall never forget that there band!"

We believe in gregarious enjoyment at "Pop" concerts, and we therefore look skew-eyed at the railed pen and all formal restrictions. There should be no deliberate dressing for the occasion. If a man be more comfortable in the full rigor of evening dress, he should be welcomed; but the uneasy consciousness of such dress often dampens the natural high spirits of the wearer after the first moment of exultation in showing to the assemblage that he possesses the garments. There are Bostonians who take their pleasures in the manner of Froissart's Englishmen. There are Bostonians who make a brave endeavor to be gay—Bohemian," they call it—but the true Bohemian is born, not made. Some are disconcerted because they do not see "people they know." But how delightful it is to see persons one does not know, and how pleasant it may be to talk with them without the prelude of an introduction—that dismal prelude when the introduced survey each other as strange dogs!

There should be day schools in May and June for night enjoyment. There should be classes in facial expression, ease in sitting, general and desultory conversation. There are many topics for lecturers in these schools: "How to Be Agreeable to Unknown Companions," "How to Entertain a Strange and Attractive Woman Without Thought of Mrs. Grundy—and Without Fear of Injuring One's Own 'Social Standing,'" "How to Be Jolly When One Occupies a Position of Trust and responsibility," etc., etc.

Music, if it be shrewdly chosen and played with spirit or with the proper sentiment, should put these listeners at ease. The music should never have an "educational" tendency. What is known as "good music" is often bad, yes, immoral at a "Pop." Excerpts from symphonies, symphonic poems, serious overtures, pot-pourris on themes from tragic operas are here as trespassers with the malicious intent to injure if not kill enjoyment.

Let the masters of light and comic opera be heard; let there be dance tunes galore; let there be stirring marches, even though some one may furnish a heel accompaniment or even sing the air in the ecstasy of his delight. The music should never be of a character to remind one of a formal concert hall. Auber and Offenbach are now in season, not Brahms and his austere companions. Johann Strauss is now a more desirable acquaintance than Richard. Tschaikowsky is now only a man that wrote ballet music. Let Sousa be heard, for his music permits even loud conversation.

And, above all, the idea should never prevail that the crowd is gathered for the sole purpose of hearing music. Music should not be the controlling, dominating feature; it should not be like unto a thunder storm during which babblers cease their chatter and birds peep not, nor do they chirp.

Ajib, the third Kalander, told his tale before the three ladies of Baghdad and their guests. He told a wondrous tale of forty damsels, sumptuously dressed and ornamented, and one and all as bright as moons, who welcomed him in the palace, plated with red gold and studded with costly gems, the palace of the forty chambers, one of which was not to be entered.

Trays were laid at nightfall, and spread with flowers and fragrant herbs and fruits and confections. At last, they brought out wine. "We sat down to drink," said Ajib, "and some sang songs and others played the lute and psaltery and recorders and other instruments, and the bowl went merrily round. Hereupon such gladness possessed me that I forgot the sorrows of the world one and all and said: 'This is, indeed, life. O sad that 'tis fleeting!'"

But neither Ajib, son of Khazib, a king and the son of a king, nor any one of the forty damsels suffered from self-consciousness; nor had they been taught to believe that the chief purpose of the musical art was to instruct, to educate.

"POP" CONCERTS OPEN FOR SEASON

Society Crowds Symphony Hall
Which Blooms Like a Huge Flower Garden.

ADAMOWSKI THE LEADER

Balcony Filled and Much Bowing

and Waving of Programs Among Old Patrons.

Journal — May 4, 1904.

The nineteenth season of the promenade concerts, more jovially known as the "Pops," was opened in Symphony Hall, which bloomed like a huge flower garden, last evening. The orchestra, composed as usual of Symphony men, was led by Mr. T. Adamowski, and this was the musical menu he offered the audience:

March, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
Waltz, "In lauschiger Nacht".....Ziehrer
Fantasia on "I Pagliacci" (first time),
Leoncavallo

Prelude to Act III, "Lohengrin,"
Wagner

Hymn to St. Cecilia, violin solo by
Mr. A. Birnbaum.....Gounod

Country Dance.....Nevin
Overture, "Orpheus".....Offenbach
Selection, "Prince of Pilsen".....Luders
Waltz, "Blue Danube".....J. Strauss
March, "El Capitan".....Sousa

In Symphony Hall transformed, in the presence of the familiar tables built for four, of vernal toilets, of chatter and laughter of nicotinic incense and the odor of the nectar of Gambrinus, one may well cry "The king of winter is dead; long live the king of spring!"

Abandon Added.

The "Pops" are the residuary legatees of the Symphonies, with an added feeling of gaiety and abandon. We see the same men on the platform, but they seem to be a more genial lot, with less of the burdens of the musical world on their shoulders. From the thunderous tonalities of Richard Strauss they have moved over very gracefully to the sensuous swing of Johann, the greatest waltz maker of them all. And we who listen do not have to scratch our heads to find the meaning of this or that musical problem. We know what the "Pops" mean, and we are perfectly ready to Give a rouse, then, in the May-time

For a heart without a fear.

With a stein on the table,
And a good song ringing clear.

Mr. Adamowski, who was warmly greeted and who conducted with his customary care, had arranged a very excellent program. There was plenty of the sort of music that naturally fits a concert of this kind, which demands force and fire and foot-compelling rhythm, rather than delicacy and striking beauty.

Wagner Is Better.

Wagner is better than Gounod—with all due respect to the "Hymn to St. Cecilia," the solo violin part of which was well played by Mr. Birnbaum—and Offenbach's delirious can-can arouses more enthusiasm than the pretty tinkle of Nevin. There is a time for weeping and there is a time for laughter in music; the "Pops" season is an audible smile.

It is almost an impertinence to say that the orchestra played exceedingly well, for it could scarcely do otherwise. Part of the pleasure to the people consists in hearing some familiar thing like "The Prince of Pilsen" sounded forth by fifty men and with a beauty of tone that one can get nowhere else in America. Whether or not one always agrees with Mr. Adamowski's view of various compositions is immaterial. The music is superb, and its performance as fine as can reasonably be expected.

And now for a successful carrying out of the season, which has been launched with all the accessories that Bostonians love.

In the balcony there was a double-all-round and in some places triple rows of people, who alternated their attention between the orchestra and the table set, leveling opera glasses and lorgnettes at each in turn, and exchanging hand moves and nods of approval with acquaintances all over the house.

During the intermissions the cliff dwellers and the "tablers" met in the foyer and enjoyed the promenade. It was all so delightfully Bohemian.

Some of those noted were Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, who had a table in the center of the hall. Mrs. Higginson was in dove-gray silk crepe, and wore a close bonnet of straw. Miss Juliet Higginson was in cafe au lait batiste. Mr. Eben Jordan had a party of young people at his table. Miss Dorothy Jordan wore the lightest gray chiffon gown and a flat hat of white leghorn wreathed in pink rosebuds.

Miss Katherine Fay, whose table was nearby, was in light gray crepe and a blue hat. Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich held quite a reception at their table. Mrs. Goodrich wore a gown of tobacco brown voile with a veil-draped hat of the same shade. Miss Eleanore Sears was in black and white.

Tables Were Gay.

One of the tables was occupied by Dr. Robert Beattie of London and his fiancée, Miss Sara Daggett, whose engagement was announced last week.

Mrs. W. D. Quint wore blue louisine done in cream lace and a hat of blue and green. Miss Estelle Kimball was in cafe au lait crepe. Miss Deven's gown was of pale gray. Mrs. Blake wore a handsome jetted gown of black.

Mrs. Adamowski was in light tan voile. Miss Ulay Kenney's gown of all white was completed by a white hat and boa. Mrs. Frank Watson was in black and white. Others there were Mr. and Mrs. James Putnam, Percy Atherton, Ray Atherton, Dr. Ralph Thompson, Dr. George C. Hall, Joshua Holden, Harry Mason, Herbert Copeland, Walter Badger, Thomas Tracy Bouve, Mr. and Mrs. Dennee, Dr. and Mrs. Blake.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

W. S. Twiss, Mar. 20, 1904

Last Concert of the Season Given in Carnegie Hall.

Rafael Joseffy Appears Instead of Miss
Foster, Playing Liszt's A Major Concerto—Mr. Strube's Overture.

There was a surprise in store for the audience of the last Boston Symphony concert when it gathered in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. A change in the programme was made necessary by the serious indisposition of Miss Muriel Foster, the English contralto singer, who was to make her first New York appearance at this concert, and little printed slips at the door told that Mr. Rafael Joseffy would be the soloist in her place. Miss Foster being an unknown quantity, though one of whom much has been expected, this sudden dispensation of fate that brought Mr. Joseffy back to the New York concert platform after many years of persistent absence—and it needs some such sudden wrenching of the established order of things to effect it—was as delightful as it was unexpected. He played Liszt's A major piano concerto, (not the one in E flat, as was read on the printed announcement of the change,) and the programme was also curtailed by the omission of Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture.

The New York public has long been waiting to give Mr. Joseffy the greeting that was extended to him in a manner to indicate unmistakably the admiration and the warm place he holds in its heart. His playing of the concerto was an epitome of all the delightful qualities that belong to his art. It was not the heaven-storming, aggressively brilliant performance that was doubtless intended for it by the composer, accentuating all that bravura skill can accomplish with the resounding sonorities of the modern piano-forte. It was conceived on a smaller, subtler scale than that, in a poetic vein, so far as a poetic vein can be uncovered in a work so largely consisting of superficial brilliancy and lush sentimentality. He sobered and restrained this sentimentality, tempered the hard glitter of the work, and refined its aggressiveness with the gracious spirit that informed it all. His playing was crystal clear, delicately articulated, full of cool half tints and subtle shadings. There were passages where the more forcible enunciation of a phrase was missed as an indispensable expression of the musical idea. There were finish and fleetness of technique, but of technical display there was nothing. It was in its way a beautifully artistic performance. Doubt may still remain whether it is the most appropriate expression of Liszt's purposes, but it was joyfully received yesterday, and Mr. Joseffy was recalled many times.

The programme contained a Fantastic Overture by Mr. Gustav Strube, an accomplished member of the orchestra, and conducted by him, that was heard for the first time in New York. The work shows a command of the modern technique of orchestration. Mr. Strube is clearly beset with an ambition to emulate some of the most extreme instrumental effects that are at present being authoritatively set before this public by the chief master of them. The fantasticality of his overture finds expression through some strange and, as it seems, needlessly exaggerated harshness. An inveterate tendency to linger in the highest registers attainable by all the instruments is one manifestation of this. On a first hearing the musical ideas contained in the work do not impress themselves either as of unusual value or as developed into a whole of great beauty or of great significance. But it is far from commonplace in both its invention and its execution, and its structure betrays unmistakably an uncommon skill in the treatment. Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline," which closed the concert, is a picturesque, highly colored piece, suggesting war and the dash of armed men, and containing much that is stirring, something also that is commonplace, notably the cantabile melody that enters in the middle section. The concert was begun with Mozart's E flat major symphony, whose giant beauty and smiling serenity remain unharmed and unstrained through all the stress and strain of music of the present day. Gericke and his men played it beautifully with finish, with proportion, and with the animation and finely poised spirit that belong to it.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

N. Y. Times Mar. 18, 1904
Its Last Evening Concert in Carnegie Hall.

A FAMILIAR PROGRAMME

A New Set of Orchestral Variations by Edward Elgar—Miss Aus der Ohe the Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is on its last visit to New York this season, and began its proceedings here last evening with its concert in Carnegie Hall. The programme was made up of music long familiar to New York audiences, with the exception of one number. There were Schumann's first symphony in B flat, Tchaikowsky's B flat minor piano concerto, played by Miss Aus der Ohe, and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." The exception was Edward Elgar's "Variations on an Original Theme," Op. 36, which was given for the first time in New York.

Schumann's symphony was played with freshness, vigor, and delicacy. Mr. Gericke did not make the mistake of seeking to give it a ruggedness of accent and a depth of significance that do not belong to it, but let it deliver its own poetical message. This, while it has something of "the fire of Spring" in it, has a blossoming beauty, an untroubled radiance and charm that were a refreshment and a relaxation after the world-storming and problem-posing music of to-day.

Miss Aus der Ohe played Tchaikowsky's

imposing concerto with an abundance of nervous energy, incisiveness, and driving power, yet missed something of the majesty of the opening section, the sensuousness of what follows, the melting richness of color, the languor of the andante. It was vigorously masculine playing, free from affectation, erring on the side of literalism.

Dr. Elgar's variations were awaited with much curiosity, after acquaintance with the two great choral works in which his genius seems to have found its most characteristic expression. His "Cockaigne" overture was the most important of his orchestral pieces previously made known here. This and the orchestral writing in "The Dream of Gerontius" and "The Apostles" have testified to his mastery of instrumentation, to the idiomatic and at the same time individual manner in which he writes for the orchestra.

These things are fully in evidence in the variations, which are extremely ingenious and resourceful in their workmanship. They are full of subtle touches of orchestral color and effect. They are programme music of the kind that the modern analysts must call "psychological"; yet the composer presents no key to the hidden significances that he has put into them, and wishes them to be heard as "a piece of music."

They are fourteen sketches of the idiosyncracies of fourteen of his friends, whom he has indicated by initials or symbolical names, and of whom the public can know nothing. Still more cryptic is the theme, which is "an enigma," "a dark saying." Most of all is the "other and larger theme" that goes through and over the whole set, but is not played, a sort of "spirit ditty of no tone," presumably; but how and to what purpose these things are no hint is given.

None, indeed, is needed. The piece stands by itself as music, and if the composer's suggestions stimulate the fancy of any, they are so much the better off. The variations suffer to a certain degree from monotony, especially the first six or eight. The last half-dozen have more variety and a more pregnant characteristic. The composer often misses, with all his ingenuity and skill, a really warm, heartfelt, melodic subject; while he rarely fails to interest, he does not always fire the imagination or grip the feelings in these variations.

It is music more for the head than the heart, but it is clearly the work of a strong and vigorous intelligence. There are reminders of the composer of "The Dream of Gerontius" and "The Apostles" in it, in some of the thematic outlines and the treatment, and, however it may be considered, it is clearly a highly individual expression. Mr. Gericke read it with much variety and subtlety of detail, and secured a brilliant performance from the orchestra.

Hall.

901-02

NY ORCHESTRA.

CKE, Conductor.

CERT.

ER 2, AT 8, P. M.

gramme.

E, BACCHANALE, AND SCENE
nnhäuser and Venus, from Act I. ion.)

R'S PREISLIED.

ION.

S PARTING FROM BRUNNHILDE.

S DEATH.

MARCH.

CENE.

S:

Miss MILKA TERNINA.

Mr. ELLISON VAN HOOSE.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

270

Symphony Hall.

---

SEASON 1901-02.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

---

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, AT 8, P. M

---

Programme.

MOZART,

SYMPHONY in C major, "Jupiter."

---

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE.

---

MENDELSSOHN,

SYMPHONY No. 3, "Scotch."

---

Soloist:

Mr. JOSEF SLIVINSKI.

VOLUME 24

1904-1905

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY OF THE CITY OF BOSTON.
THE ALLEN A. BROWN COLLECTION.

★★M 125.5.24

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON

✻ 1904 — 1905 ✻

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS
COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

1582
L. S. Ipsen, inc.

7m. 125.5 vol. 24

Albion/Donner

Oct. 14. 1905

Index

Composer	Name of Work	Concert	Date of Performance
d'Albent, E.	Piano Concerto No 2 in E maj: op 12 Eugene d'Albent	XIV	Febry 4. 05
Bach J. S.	Three Marts orch. by W. Gencke Concerto No 2 in E maj. V th strings & organ E. Ysaye	III VII	Oct 29. 04 Dec 3. 04
	Prelude, Adagio & Gavotte Arr: for Orch. by S. Bachrich	XVII	Mar 4. 05
Beethoven	Symphony No 8 E flat op 55 " " 4 " 60 " " 5 " 67 Ouv. to Leonora No 3. op 72 " " " "	XXI II X XVIII XXI	Apr 8. 05 Oct 22. 04 Dec 31. 04 Mar 11. 05 Apr 8. 05
Berlioz	Fantastic Symphony No 1. op 16 A Ouv. to "King Lear" op 4	XIII VII	Jan 28. 05 Dec 3. 04
Brahms J.	Symphony No 1. c min: op 68 " " 3 F maj: " 90 Piano Concerto No 2 B flat op 83 Rafael Joseffy Violin Concerto D min op 77 Fritz Kreisler Tragic Overture op 51 Variation for Orch. on a Theme by Haydn op 56 a	XVI V X XVIII XX XXII	Feb 25. 05 Nov 19. 04 Dec 31. " Mar 11. 05 Apr 1. 05 Apr 15. 05
Bruch, Max	Concerto Violin & Orch in G min: Willy Hess Concerto Violin & orch No 2. op 44 E. Ysaye Terenade in G min op 75 V th & orch: Miss Marie Nichols Penelope's Lament from 'Odysseus' Miss Muriel Foster	IV VII XV XI	Nov 12. 04 Dec 3. 04 Feb 11. 05 Jan 7. 05

Caetani R.	Symphonique Prelude Op 11 No 5	XIII	Jan 28.05
Chopin	Concerto Piano + Orch No 2. Op 21	III	Oct 29.04
	" " " "	XXIII	Apr 22.05
	1 st "Vladimir de Pachmann
	2 nd Ignace Paderewski
	Three Piano Pieces	Pers. Conc.	Nov 27.04
	19. Paderewski
Converse E.S.	Two Poems: Night Day Op 11 For Orch. + Piano Heinrich Gebhard	XII	Jan 21.05
Cornelius P.	Ouv. to the "Barber of Bagdad"	XII	Jan 28.05
Debussy	"The afternoon of a Faun"	X	Dec 31.04
Dukas, Paul	Scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"	II	Oct 22.04
Dvorak A.	Symphony No 5: "From the New World"	I	Oct 18.04
	Selections from the "Stabat Mater"	"	" " "
	Mad. Louise Homer, Mrs G.B. Williams	"	" " "
	Theo. Van Yonck, W.B. Merrill	"	" " "
	Ouv. to "Othello" Op 93	"	" " "
	"Carnaval" " 92	XI	Jan 7.05
Erhanger, d.	"Morte" song with Piano M <sup>r</sup> . Chas. G. Gilbert	IX	Dec 22.04
Elgar E.	"Sea Pictures" Op 37 Alto + Orch Miss Muriel Foster	XI	Jan 7.05
Fauré G.	Suite "Pelleas & Melisande" for orch. Op 80	VIII	Dec 17.04
Frank C.	Symphony in D minor	XV	Feb 11.05
	" " "	XXIII	Apr 22.05
Gluck	Rec. & Aria "Iphigenia in Tauris" M <sup>r</sup> . G. Campanari	XVII	Mar 4.05

Goldmark	Ouv: "Sappho" Op 44 " "In Italy" Op 49	VI XIV	Nov 26.04 Feb 4.05
Grieg E.	Concerto Piano + Orch. Op 16 2 min Cornelius Ribner	XIX	Mar 25.05
Handel	Concerto Grosso No. 12 13 min:	XXI	Apr 8.05
Hadley H.	Symphony No 2. Op 30. "The Four Seasons"	XXII	Apr 15.05
Haydn	Symphony in E flat B + H. No 1. "4 maj: Oxford"	IV XII	Nov 12.04 Jan 21.05
	Aria from the "Seasons" with Orch. Chas. Gilbert	IX	Dec 22.04
Henselt A.	Concerto in 7 min: Op 16 Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler	VI	Nov 26.04
Huber, Hans	Symphony No 2 9 min: Op 115	XX	Apr 1.05
Humperdinck	Selections from "Hansel u. Gretel" for Voices + Orch:	Pers. Conc.	Nov 27.04
d'Indy, Vin:	Symphony No 2 Op 57 in B flat	XI	Jan 7.05
Joachim J.	Hungarian Concerto Op 11 Willy Hess	II	Oct 22.04
Lalo	"Aubade" from "Le Roi d'Ys" Chas. Gilbert	IX	Dec 22.04
Leszt, F.	Symph. Poem No 4 "The Battle of the Hun"	VI	Nov 26.04
	" " " " "Fast Klänge"	XXII	Apr 15.05
	Piano Concerto in E flat Vladimir de Pachmann	Pers. Conc.	Nov 27.04
	"Legend" Sermon at St Francis to the Birds trans. by F. Motte	VII	Dec 3.04

7

Massenet	'Hungarian Scenes' 2 <sup>me</sup> Suite Air from 'Griselda' for Ten & orch M <sup>r</sup> Ellison v <sup>rs</sup> H. Loose	Pers. Conc. XXII	Nov 27.04 Apr 15.05
Mendelssohn	Ouv. 'Camacho's Wedding' op 10 " 'Calm Sea & Prosperous Voyage' op 27	IX XXIII	Dec 22.04 Apr 22.05
Meyerbeer	Ouv. 'The Star of the North'	Pers. Conc.	Nov 27.04
Mozart	Symphony in C maj: Köchel 338 " " D maj: " 504 Ouv. 'Marriage of Figaro' Rec. & arr. from 'Marriage of Figaro' " Med: Johanna Gadski Arias from 'Così fan Tutte' M <sup>r</sup> . G. Campanari	VIII XIX XV V XVII	Dec 17.04 Mch 25.05 Feb 11.05 Nov 19.04 Mch 4.05
Rachmaninoff	Concerto Piano & Orch. No. 1. op 1. Carlo Buonamizi	VIII	Dec 17.04
Rimsky-Korsakoff	Symph. Suite 'Scheherazade' op 35 " 'Tadko' op 5	XIV XXX	Feb 4.05 Mch 25.05
Sapart, Guy	Fantasia for Orch. in D maj.	XXIV	Apr 29.05
Schubert F.	Symphony in C no. 9 Funeral March	XXVII XI	Mch 4.05 Jan 7.05
Schumann R.	Symphony No 2 C maj. op 61 " " 3 E flat " 97 Ouv. to 'Genoveva' op 81 Piano Concerto in 4 min. op 54 Ernest Schelling	XXIV VII X XXV	Apr 29.05 Dec 3.04 Dec 31.04 Feb 25.05
Sinding	Suite in 7 op 35 'Episodes Chevaleresques'	XVI	Feb 25.05
Saint-Saens C.	Symphony No 1, op 2 B flat maj. Symph. Poem op 50 'The Youth of Hercules'	VI XXI	Nov 26.04 Apr 8.05

Composer	Work	Program	Date
Gambati	'Te Deum' for Strings + organ	Pers. Conc.	Nov 27. 04
Strauss R.	Tone Poem 'Don Juan'	XXV	July 11. 05
	Intro. 1 st Act 'Gunterani'	XXIV	Apr 29. 05
	" 2 nd " "	IV	Nov 12. 04
	" 3 rd " "	XXIX	March 25. 05
Strube, Gust:	Symph. Poem. 'Longing' Viola + orch	XXIII	Apr 22. 05
Tut, Josef	Symphony op 14 in B maj	III	Oct 29. 05
Tchaikovsky	Symphony No 6 op 74 "Pathétique"	IX	Dec 22. 04
	" Manfred Symphony op 58	XVIII	March 11. 05
	" Capriccio Italian op 45	IV	Nov 12. 04
	" " "	Pers. Conc.	" 27 "
	Concerto Violin + Orch D maj op 35 Mr Karl Barleben	XX	Apr 1. 05
Vander Stucken	Pastorale "Triumphans" Symp. Fest Prolog	IX	Dec 22. 04
Wagner R.	Ouv. to 'Tannhauser'	II	Oct 22. 04
	" " 'The Flying Dutchman'	VIII	Dec 17. 04
	" 'A Faust Overture'	XVII	March 4. 05
	'Prelude to the 'Meistersingers'	XXIV	Apr 29. 05
	Centennial March	XXII	Jan 21. 05
	Final to the 'Dusk of the Gods'	V	Nov 19. 04
	Intro: Act I "Lohengrin"	Pers. Conc.	March 5. 05
	First Part of Act III " "	"	" "
	'Electrons from Act III 'Meistersingers'	"	" "
	Second Part Act I: 'Die Walküre'	"	" "
	Intro + Love Death Tristan + Isolde	"	" "
	'Max. Galski + Theo. van Goye'	"	" "
	Lohengrin Narrative for Ten. + Orch.	XXII	Apr 15. 05
	" " 'Ellisen van Horre'
Weber C. M. v.	Ouv. to 'Oberon'	III	Oct 29. 04
	'Invitation to the Dance'	XXIV	July 4. 05

Wolf, Hugo

Symphonic Poem 'Pantherien'
'Italian Serenade' for orch.V
XXNov 19.04
Apr 1.05SoloistsPianod'Albat, Eugene
Bloomfield-Zeile, Annie
Buonamici, Carlo
Joseffy, Rafael
Pachmann, Vladimir de
Paderewski, Ignace
Rachner, Cornelius
Schelling, ErnestFeb 4.05
Nov 26.04
Dec 17.04
Dec 31.04
Oct 29.04
Apr 22.05
Mch 25.05
Feb 25.05Violoncello

Krawelt, Rudolf

May 28.05

ViolinsAdamowski, J.
Barleben, Karl Hess, Willy
" "
Kreisler, Fritz
Nichols, Miss Marie
Ysaye, EugeneJan 21.05
Apr 1.05
Oct 12.04
Nov 12.04
Mch 11.05
Feb 11.05
Dec 3.04VocalistsCampanari, G.
Forster, Miss Marie
Graske, Mad. Johanna
Gilbert, Charles
Homer, Mrs Louise
Merrill, W. B.
Van Hoor, Ernst
Van York, Theo.
Williams, Mrs Grace B.Mch 4.05
Jan 7. "
Nov 19.04
Dec 23. "
Oct 15. "
" " "
Apr 15.05
Oct 15.04
" " "Organist

Wallace Goodrich, Mr.

Conductor

Mr Wilhelm Gericke

assisted by Mr Willy Hess

Dec. 31
10

Dec. 24
9

Dec. 17
8

Dec. 3
7

Nov. 26
6

Nov. 19
5

Nov. 12
4

Oct. 29
3

Oct. 22
2

Oct. 15
1

RIGHT

A

6

Oct. 15
1

Oct. 22
2

Oct. 29
3

Nov. 12
4

Nov. 19
5

Nov. 26
6

Dec. 3
7

Dec. 17
8

Dec. 24
9

Dec. 31
10

SYMPHONY HALL
BOSTON
HUNTINGTON &
MASSACHUSETTS AVE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. WILHELM GERICKE
• CONDUCTOR •

CONCERTS:

SATURDAY EVENINGS AT 8 O'CLOCK

TWENTY-FOURTH SEASON, 1904-1905

Feb. 4
14

Jan. 28
13

Jan. 21
12

Jan. 14
11

Feb. 11
15

Feb. 25
16

Mar. 4
17

Mar. 11
18

Mar. 25
19

Apr. 1
20

Apr. 8
21

Apr. 15
22

Apr. 22
23

Apr. 29
24

SYMPHONY HALL,
Corner Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The owner of this ticket will please write name and address on the lines below as an aid to its recovery in case of loss.

NAME

Allen C. Brown

ADDRESS

P.O. Box 1802 - Boston

This ticket must be presented to the door-keeper at every performance. Persons neglecting to bring tickets will be admitted to the hall only by purchasing an evening ticket.

SYMPHONY HALL

HUNTINGTON AND MASSACHUSETTS AVENUES

TWENTY-FOURTH SEASON, 1904-1905

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

94 Performers. Mr. WILHELM GERICHE, Conductor

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive SATURDAY EVENINGS from October 15, 1904, to April 29, 1905, omitting November 5, December 10, 1904, January 14, February 18, and March 18, 1905, and

Twenty-four Public Rehearsals

On consecutive FRIDAY AFTERNOONS from October 14, 1904, to April 28, 1905, omitting November 4, December 9, 1904, January 13, February 17, and March 17, 1905.

SOLOISTS

Miss Muriel Foster, Mme. Johanna Gadski, Mme. Louise Homer, Miss Edith Walker, Mrs. Grace B. Williams, Mr. L. B. Merrill, Mr. Theodore Van Yox, Mr. Eugen D'Albert, Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, Mr. C. Buonamici, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. Vladimir De Pachmann, Mr. C. Rubner, Mr. Ernest Schelling, Mr. Fritz Kreisler, Miss Marie Nichols, Mr. Eugene Ysaye, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. C. Barleben, Mr. Willy Hess, Mr. H. Schmedes, Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, and Mr. Paderewski.

TICKETS for the series of CONCERTS and for the series of REHEARSALS, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, MONDAY, October 3, at 10 a.m.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, TUESDAY, October 4, at 10 a.m.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall on THURSDAY, October 6, at 10 a.m.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, October 7, at 10 a.m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

TICKETS WILL BE DELIVERED IN THE HALL, AND MUST BE PAID FOR AS SOON AS BOUGHT, OR THEY WILL BE IMMEDIATELY RESOLD

PROGRAMMES.

FIRST CONCERT, OCTOBER 14 and 15.

IN MEMORY OF ANTON DVORAK.

Dvorak	Overture to "Othello"
	Aria from "Stabat Mater"
	Mme. LOUISE HOMER
	Suite in D major, Op. 39
	Quartette from "Stabat Mater"
	Mrs. GRACE B. WILLIAMS
	Mme. LOUISE HOMER
	Mr. THEODORE VAN YORX
	Mr. L. B. MERRILL
	Symphony No. 5, "From the New World"

SECOND CONCERT, OCTOBER 21 and 22.

Beethoven	Symphony in B-flat major, No. 4
Joachim	Hungarian Concerto for Violin
	Mr. WILLY HESS
	(First appearance in America.)
Paul Dukas	Scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier"
	(First time.)
Wagner	Overture, "Tannhäuser"

THIRD CONCERT, OCTOBER 28 and 29.

Weber	Overture, "Oberon"
Bach	Three Movements, orchestrated by W. GERICKE
Chopin	Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, No. 1
	Mr. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN
Joseph Suk	Symphony in E major, Op. 14
	(First time.)

It is the intention to present the following novelties during the season:—

Hugo Wolf	Symphonic Poem, "Penthesilea"
Saint-Saëns	Symphony No. 1
Liszt	"Vogelpredigt des heiligen Franz von Assisi"
J. Fauré	"Pellias and Mellisande"
Van Der Stucken	"Pax Triumphans"
Debussy	Prelude, "L'Après-midi d'une Faune"

Converse	Two Pieces for Piano and Orchestra
R. Caetani	Prélude Symphonique, Op. 11
C. Goldmark	Overture
Sinding	Suite, Op. 35
Rimsky-Korsakoff	"Sadkow"
Hadley	Symphony
Gluck (Mottl)	Ballet Music from Suite II.
Guy Ropartz	Fantasie in D major
Schillings	"Der Vespertag"

Twenty-Fourth Season of the Celebrated Boston Orchestra—Character of Programmes as Indicated by Those of Other Years; Annual Musical Festival at Worcester; the Gloucester Festival—Old and New Operas—Personals.

Revised List 25. 1904

THE 24th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 94 performers, Mr. Wilhelm Gedicke conductor, will open with the public rehearsal of Oct. 14 and the concert of Oct. 15.

Mr. Willy Hess and Mr. Grises will be associated with the orchestra for the first time. Mr. Hess, the new concert master, was born at Mannheim on July 14, 1859. He studied the violin with his father and with Joachim. At the age of 19 he was concert master at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, and he kept this position until 1886, when he was called as concert master to Rotterdam. In 1888 a like position was offered him in England. In 1895 he went to Cologne, where he was concert master of the Guerzenich concerts, first violin and leader of the Guerzenich quartet and violin teacher at the Cologne Conservatory. About a year ago Mr. Hess accepted an invitation to settle in London as a teacher. He has a widespread European reputation as a virtuoso. He will, naturally, be the first violin of a string quartet in Boston. Mr. Georges Grises of Paris will be the first clarinet.

In other respects the orchestra will be the same—that is to say, a band of players that is unsurpassed in the musical world, and we doubt whether it is equalled. There are few orchestras that are established on such a sure foundation; there are few orchestras, if there is any one, in which so many virtuoso players of the first rank are so well disciplined for the purposes of perfect ensemble. It should also be remembered that Mr. Gericke, who has been the one chief trainer of the orchestra, who has given it the distinguishing and pre-eminent qualities of sonority, balance, proportion, finesse in detail, is the conductor of 12 of the 24 seasons.

Programmes of the Season.

It has not been the custom of the management to announce before the beginning of a season the chief works to be performed. The programmes of the last seasons may in this instance give an idea of the character of those of the 24th. As in the past, the classic, the modern and the ultra-modern composers will be represented.

The maker of programmes has a most difficult task, and in whatever city he may live, in Berlin, London, Paris, Chicago, St. Petersburg, there is always complaint. Some in the audience would not listen to any music save that by the long approved masters. To them even Schumann is an experimenter, not always to be applauded. The younger are as unreasonably impatient; they would hear only the latest works of the most adventurous. Then there are some who would have an American represented at each concert, simply because he is an American, and without regard to the quality of his music.

They that protest against novelties allege that many new pieces introduced during the last three years were of a disappointing character. "Why should we not always listen to music that we know is good?" They forget that many contemporaries of the composers of this "good" music protested at the time against the "eccentrics" and the "revo-

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

TICKETS WILL BE DELIVERED IN THE HALL, AND MUST BE PAID FOR AS SOON AS BOUGHT, OR THEY WILL BE IMMEDIATELY RESOLD

PROGRAMMES.

FIRST CONCERT, OCTOBER 14 and 15.

IN MEMORY OF ANTON DVORAK.

Dvorak	Overture to "Othello"
	Aria from "Stabat Mater"
	Mme. LOUISE HOMER
	Suite in D major, Op. 39
	Quartette from "Stabat Mater"
	Mrs. GRACE B. WILLIAMS
	Mme. LOUISE HOMER
	Mr. THEODORE VAN YORX
	Mr. L. B. MERRILL
	Symphony No. 5, "From the New World"

SECOND CONCERT, OCTOBER 21 and 22.

Beethoven	Symphony in B-flat major, No. 4
Joachim	Hungarian Concerto for Violin
	Mr. WILLY HESS
	(First appearance in America.)
Paul Dukas	Scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier"
	(First time.)
Wagner	Overture, "Tannhäuser"

THIRD CONCERT, OCTOBER 28 and 29.

Weber	Overture, "Oberon"
Bach	Three Movements, orchestrated by W. GERICKE
Chopin	Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, No. 1
	Mr. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN
Joseph Suk	Symphony in E major, Op. 14
	(First time.)

It is the intention to present the following novelties during the season:—

Hugo Wolf	Symphonic Poem, "Penthesilea"
Saint-Saëns	Symphony No. 1
Liszt	"Vogelpredigt des heiligen Franz von Assisi"
J. Fauré	"Pellias and Mellisande"
Van Der Stucken	"Pax Triumphans"
Debussy	Prelude, "L'Après-midi d'une Faune"

Converse	Two Pieces for Piano and Orchestra
R. Caetani	Prélude Symphonique, Op. 11
C. Goldmark	Overture
Sinding	Suite, Op. 35
Rimsky-Korsakoff	"Sadkow"
Hadley	Symphony
Gluck (Mottl)	Ballet Music from Suite II.
Guy Ropartz	Fantasie in D major
Schillings	"Der Vespertag"

Twenty-Fourth Season of the Celebrated Boston Orchestra—Character of Programmes as Indicated by Those of Other Years; Annual Musical Festival at Worcester; the Gloucester Festival—Old and New Operas—Personals.

THE 24th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 94 performers, Mr. Wilhelm Gedicke conductor, will open with the public rehearsal of Oct. 14 and the concert of Oct. 15.

Mr. Willy Hess and Mr. Grises will be associated with the orchestra for the first time. Mr. Hess, the new concert master, was born at Mannheim on July 14, 1859. He studied the violin with his father and with Joachim. At the age of 19 he was concert master at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, and he kept this position until 1886, when he was called as concert master to Rotterdam. In 1888 a like position was offered him in England. In 1895 he went to Cologne, where he was concert master of the Guerzenich concerts, first violin and leader of the Guerzenich quartet and violin teacher at the Cologne Conservatory. About a year ago Mr. Hess accepted an invitation to settle in London as a teacher. He has a widespread European reputation as a virtuoso. He will, naturally, be the first violin of a string quartet in Boston. Mr. Georges Grises of Paris will be the first clarinet.

In other respects the orchestra will be the same—that is to say, a band of players that is unsurpassed in the musical world, and we doubt whether it is equalled. There are few orchestras that are established on such a sure foundation; there are few orchestras, if there is any one, in which so many virtuoso players of the first rank are so well disciplined for the purposes of perfect ensemble. It should also be remembered that Mr. Gericke, who has been the one chief trainer of the orchestra, who has given it the distinguishing and pre-eminent qualities of sonority, balance, proportion, finesse in detail, is the conductor of 12 of the 24 seasons.

Programmes of the Season.

It has not been the custom of the management to announce before the beginning of a season the chief works to be performed. The programmes of the last seasons may in this instance give an idea of the character of those of the 24th. As in the past, the classic, the modern and the ultra-modern composers will be represented.

The maker of programmes has a most difficult task, and in whatever city he may live, in Berlin, London, Paris, Chicago, St. Petersburg, there is always complaint. Some in the audience would not listen to any music save that by the long approved masters. To them even Schumann is an experimenter, not always to be applauded. The younger are as unreasonably impatient; they would hear only the latest works of the most adventurous. Then there are some who would have an American represented at each concert, simply because he is an American, and without regard to the quality of his music.

They that protest against novelties allege that many new pieces introduced during the last three years were of a disappointing character. "Why should we not always listen to music that we know is good?" They forget that many contemporaries of the composers of this "good" music protested at the time against the "eccentrics" and the "revotionaries" who now are ranked as conservatives. The music lovers of this city have a right to know what is now doing. Richard Strauss, Mahler, Debussy, d'Indy, Dukas and other men now living should be something more than names in a city that prides itself on its musical interest. Saint-Saens wrote an opera, "The Barbarians." It is doubtful whether the opera will ever be performed in this country. Mr. Gerike introduced the overture. It gave little pleasure; it will never be ranked among the composer's best works. But should not the musicians and the music-lovers of Boston have had the opportunity of judging for themselves concerning the merits of this overture? Concerts devoted exclusively for a season to the acknowledged masterpieces of classic composers would be intolerable. Even the greatest works lose through undue familiarity. The moderns have their rights. The most outrageously modern may yet turn out to be a sane and conservative classic. Honor should be paid to all that have a reasonable claim on the attention. If a new symphonic poem excites fierce discussion, if it is to some the abomination of desolation and to others a thing of wondrous beauty, so much the better for conductor, orchestra and audience. Smug and constant approval is a symptom of stagnation in art.

Coming Soloists.

Some of the soloists announced for the coming season will no doubt be also heard in recital, but a great soloist needs a great orchestra and the excitement and the brilliance of a great audience to call forth the full display of his powers. The concert stage is then his field of triumph; concerto is his battle horse on which he rides to glory.

The singers will be Mme. Johanna Gadske, Mrs. Louise Homer, Miss Muriel Foster, probably Miss Edith Walker, Mrs. Grace B. Williams, Mr. Theodore Van York, Mrs. S. B. Merrill, Mme. Gadske will not sing in opera in America this season, but she will make a concert tour throughout the country. She sang with pronounced success in operas by Mozart and Wagner at the Munich Festival this last summer. Mrs. Homer is well known and warmly appreciated in Boston. She is the chief singer at the Worcester festival this week. Miss Foster, who is highly esteemed in England—she has also sung in Germany—was heard here toward the end of last season. Her second appearance will be awaited with interest. Miss Edith Walker, a noble and commanding singer in opera, will make her first appearance in this city in concert. Her artistry in Mr. Corried's company was one of the features of last season. The local singers will be used ensemble.

The pianists will be Messrs. d'Albert, Buonomici, Joseffy, De Pachmann, Ruebner, Schelling, D'Albert, who first visited Boston in company with Sarasate, and afterward gave some memorable performances, has of late years been busied chiefly with composition, yet he has played from time to time in European cities and the reports of his performance are such as to revive the interest which he awakened here during his preceding visits. Mr. Buonomici is a pianist who should be heard more frequently. He has abundant technique, dash, enthusiasm. The name of Joseffy is always a lodestone, and it is a pleasure to note that he has determined to enter again the lists in which he has so often triumphed.

Vladimir de Pachmann.

And what shall be said at this late day of Vladimir de Pachmann, the supreme interpreter of Chopin, the composer of all composers for the piano? Let us listen for a moment to the eulogy pronounced not long ago by Mr. Arthur Symonds:

"When Pachmann plays Chopin the music sings itself, as if without the intervention of an executant, of one who stands between the music and our hearing. The music has to intoxicate him before he can play with it; then he becomes its comrade, in a kind of very serious game; himself, in short, that is to say, inhuman. * * * Pachmann gives you pure music, not states of soul or of temperament, not interpretations, but echoes. He gives you the notes in their own atmosphere, where they live for him in an individual life, which has nothing to do with emotions or ideas. Thus he does not need to translate out of two languages: first, from sound to emotion, temperament, what you will; then from that back again to sound. The notes exist; it is enough that they exist. They mean for him just the sound, and nothing else. You see his fingers feeling after it, his face calling to it, his whole body imploring it. Sometimes it comes upon him in such a burst of light that he has to cry aloud, in order that he may endure the ecstasy. You see him speaking to the music; he lifts his finger, that you, too, may listen for it not less attentively. But it is always the thing itself that he evokes for you, as it rises flower-like out of silence and comes to exist in the world. Every note lives, with the whole vitality of its existence. * * * Chopin had no intentions. He was a man, and he suffered; and he was a musician, and he wrote music; and very likely George Sand and Majorca, and his disease, and Scotland, and the woman who sang to him when he died, are all in the music; but that is not the question. The notes sob and shiver, stab you like a knife, caress you like the fur of a cat; and are beautiful sound, the most beautiful sound that has been called out of the piano. Pachmann calls it out for you, disinterestedly, easily, with ecstasy, inevitably; you do not realize that he has had difficulties to conquer, that music is a thing for acrobats and athletes. He smiles to you, that you may realize how beautiful the notes are, when they trickle out of his fingers like singing water; he adores them and his own playing, as you do, and as if he had nothing to do with them but to pour them out of his hands."

Truly a poetic praise.

Mr. Ruebner and Others.

Mr. Cornelius Ruebner, the successor of Mr. MacDowell at Columbia University, was born at Copenhagen in 1853. He studied with Reinecke and Gade at Leipzig, practised his profession for a time at Baden-Baden, and in 1892 settled at Karlsruhe, where he conducted the Philharmonic Society. He has composed a symphonic poem, "Friede, Kampf und Sieg," a festival overture, a piano trio, songs and piano pieces.

The Herald spoke of Mr. Schelling last Sunday. A pupil of Paderewski, he has been highly praised for his piano playing in London and in continental cities.

The violinists will be Miss Marie Nichols and Messrs. Ysaye, Kreisler, Hess, Adamowski, Schmedes and Barleben. Miss Nichols is a Bostonian by adoption and she was taught in this city by Mr. Emil Mollenhauer. She studied also for a time in Berlin with Hallé and in Paris with Debroux. She was already an accomplished violinist when she went to Europe, and she had played with orchestras in several American cities. Her performances in Berlin, Paris and London excited the lively admiration of the critics. She is one of the soloists at the Worcester Festival this week. Mr. Ysaye and Mr. Kreisler will be most heartily welcomed. Each in his own way is a great artist. Messrs. Barleben and Schmedes will play for the first time at these concerts, and Mr. Hess will make his first appearance in this country. Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, the first cellist, is also one of the soloists.

The Circuit Concerts.

This orchestra, founded and maintained by Maj. Henry L. Higginson with a disinterested and a noble purpose, is something more than an honor to the city that is its abiding place. Its fame is national, one might well say international, although the orchestra has not yet crossed the Atlantic. Other cities than Boston eagerly await its concerts. There will be 10—five matinees and five evenings—in New York, 10 in Philadelphia, five in Brooklyn and five in Baltimore, three in Hartford and three in Providence and one concert in Worcester, New Haven, Springfield, Poughkeepsie, Albany, Troy, Portland, Northampton—44 concerts in all outside of Boston; nor should the concerts in Cambridge be overlooked.

That these concerts are an educational force is a fact recognized by some of the leading educational institutions. The Cambridge concerts are under the auspices of Harvard University; the concert in New Haven is given in Woolsey Hall, Yale University; President Faunce of Brown is interested in the success of the concerts in Providence, President Seelye of Smith College is likewise interested in Northampton, and Vassar College is most liberally represented at the concert given in Poughkeepsie.

Nor is it merely the soloist, however distinguished he or she may be, that crowds the halls in the cities of the circuit. The appearance of an Ysaye or a de Pachmann is indeed a musical event, but the great virtuoso, the one long anticipated and gratefully remembered, is the orchestra itself.

The auction sales for the 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be held at Symphony Hall on Monday and Tuesday, Oct. 3 and 4, and for the 24 Saturday evening concerts on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 6 and 7, each sale commencing at 10 A. M. and continuing through the day. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

SYMPHONY HALL

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

94 PERFORMERS

MR. WILHELM GERIKE, Conductor.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On SATURDAY EVENINGS from Oct. 15, 1904, to April 29, 1905.

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On FRIDAY AFTERNOONS from Oct. 14, 1904, to April 28, 1905.

SOLOISTS:

Miss Muriel Foster, Mme. Johanna Gadske, Mme. Louise Homer, Miss Edith Walker, Mrs. Grace B. Williams, Mr. L. B. Merrill, Mr. Theodore van York, Mr. Eugen D'Albert, Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, Mr. C. Buonomici, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, Mr. C. Rubner, Mr. Ernest Schelling, Mr. Fritz Kreisler, Miss Marie Nichols, Mr. Eugene Ysaye, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. C. Barleben, Mr. Willy Hess, Mr. H. Schmedes, Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, and Mr. Paderewski.

TICKETS for the series of CONCERTS, and for the series of REHEARSALS, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, MONDAY, Oct. 3, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, TUESDAY, Oct. 4, at 10 A. M.

The $12 seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, on THURSDAY, Oct. 6, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Oct. 7, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

SYMPHONY

40 STATE STREET. ROOM 53.

SEATS FOR SALE in all parts of hall,

s 29

Journal Oct. 1, 1904.
After the preliminary announcement of the dates, soloists and other details of the coming season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which have recently been made public, symphony patrons naturally await with interest the announcement of the first three concert programs, which are given below. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who will again direct the orchestra for the seventh season of his present regime, has given much time and study in the preparation of these programs. It is a most interesting and significant statistic that with the five years of his first term—from 1884 to 1889—Mr. Gericke at the close of the coming season will have held the position of conductor for twelve years, exactly one-half the twenty-four years' existence of the organization.

It is the intention of Conductor Gericke to present some most attractive novelties throughout the season, chosen from the following list:

Hugo Wolf, symphonic poem, "Penthesilea;" Saint-Saens, Symphony No. 1; Liszt, "Vogelpredigt des heiligen Franz von Assisi;" J. Faure, "Pellias and Melisande;" Van Der Stucken, "Pax Triumphantis;" Debussy, prelude, "L'Après-midi d'une Faune;" Converse, two pieces for piano and orchestra; R. Caetani, Prelude Symphonique, op. II.; C. Goldmark, overture; Sinding, suite, op. 35; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Sadkow;" Hadley, symphony; Gluck (Mottl), ballet music from Suite II.; Guy Ropartz, Fantasia in D major, and Shillings, "Der Vesperstag."

The programs for the first three concerts are as follows: First concert (in memory of Dvorak, and consisting of works by him): Overture to "Othello," aria from "Stabat Mater," Mme. Louise Homer; Suite in D major, op. 39; quartet from "Stabat Mater," Mrs. Grace B. Williams, Mme. Louise Homer, Mr. Theodore Van Yox, Mr. L. B. Merrill; Symphony No. 5, "From the New World." Second concert: Beethoven, Symphony in B flat major, No. 4; Joachim, Hungarian Concerto for violin, Mr. Willy Hess; Paul Dukas, Scherzo l'Apprenti Sorcier (first time); Wagner, overture, "Tannhauser." Third concert: Weber, overture, "Oberon;" Bach, three movements orchestrated by W. Gericke; Chopin, concerto for pianoforte in F minor, Mr. Vladimir de Pachman; Joseph Suk, Symphony in E major, op. 14 (first time).

The auction sales of season tickets begin next Monday morning, Oct. 3, in Symphony Hall at 10 o'clock. The $12 seats for the twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold on Monday; the $7.50 seats for the same series on Tuesday; there will be no sale on Wednesday; the $12 seats for the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, and the $7.50 seats for the same series, which will be offered on Friday, will end the sale.

SYMPHONY HALL

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

94 PERFORMERS

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On SATURDAY EVENINGS from Oct. 15, 1904, to April 29, 1905.

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On FRIDAY AFTERNOONS from Oct. 14, 1904, to April 28, 1905.

SOLOISTS:

Miss Muriel Foster, Mme. Johanna Gadske, Mme. Louise Homer, Miss Edith Walker, Mrs. Grace B. Williams, Mr. L. B. Merrill, Mr. Theodore van Yox, Mr. Eugen D'Albert, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, Mr. C. Rubner, Mr. Ernest Schelling, Mr. Fritz Kreisler, Miss Marie Nichols, Mr. Eugene Ysaye, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. C. Barleben, Mr. Willy Hess, Mr. H. Schmedes, Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, and Mr. Paderewski.

TICKETS for the series of CONCERTS, and for the series of REHEARSALS, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, MONDAY, Oct. 3, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, TUESDAY, Oct. 4, at 10 A. M.

The $12 seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, on THURSDAY, Oct. 6, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Oct. 7, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

4t(A)

s 26

Symphony Tickets

ORDERS FOR SEASON TICKETS PLACED WITH ME WILL BE EXECUTED WITH CARE AND FOR A SMALL COMMISSION.

Plan of hall and all information sent on request, gratis.

CONNELLY'S Theatre Ticket Office
Adams House
Phone OX. 942

7t(A)

s 24

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Season of 1904-1905—Willy Hess, the New

Concertmaster. Sept. 24, 1904

The twenty-fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins with the 2186th performance and the 1142d in Boston on Friday afternoon, Oct. 14. Such striking totals indicate most clearly and conclusively that this organization is making the musical history of America and in a most satisfactory and complete manner. A second generation of patrons can attest with their elders to the high standard of performance, for, with a slight variation of the old proverb, the proof of the performance is in the playing. And twenty-three years of hearing good music played in the best way has resulted in a most exacting clientele, who demand and always get the very highest achievements of which the orchestra is capable. A personnel practically unchanged for more years than most other American orchestras have existed is a potent factor in the splendid ensemble, and it is a pleasure to announce that a new concert master and first violin, Mr. Willy Hess, and a new first clarinet, Mr. Georges Grisez, are the only changes of sufficient importance to deserve mention.

There will be the usual twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concert beginning on Oct. 14 and 15. The orchestra will make the customary five trips to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore, necessitating the omission of the performances which would otherwise be given on Nov. 4 and 5, Dec. 9 and 10, Jan. 13 and 14, Feb. 17 and 18 and March 17 and 18. There will be the usual Harvard University concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. Three concerts guaranteed by thirty ladies and gentlemen, headed by President Faunce of Brown University, will be given in Providence, R. I., and three concerts also guaranteed by a public-spirited citizen are booked for Hartford, Conn. Yale University duplicates her courtesy of last year and allows the use of her beautiful new Woolsey Hall for a concert in March. Smith College, with a most commendable enterprise and the ambition to feature her department of music, repeats her guarantee of last season. Two concerts, one each in Troy and Albany, are undertaken by a prominent musician to whom the concert goers of these two cities have been indebted for similar events for several years.

The list of soloists as usual is as attractive as can be secured, including many of the greatest artists in the world. It will come as a very pleasant and possibly startling surprise that Mr. Ignace Paderewski will be the soloist toward the close of the season and some time during the month of April in the Boston series. Of the lady singers Mme. Gadske and Mme. Louise Homer are too well known to Symphony patrons to require further exploiting here; Miss Muriel Foster, the beautiful English contralto, will undoubtedly duplicate the charming impression made last season, and Miss Edith Walker of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York adds much strength to the list. Of the pianists there are Mr. D'Albert, who comes to this country after several years' absence; Mr. De Pachmann, possibly the greatest Chopin player living, Mr. Joseffy and Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler, who are always favorites, Mr. Buonamicci who received such a flattering reception at his previous appearance with the orchestra; Mr. Ernest Schelling, a pupil of Paderewski, and Mr. Rubner, who comes from Europe to take the position as the head of the department of music at Columbia College vacated by Mr. E. A. MacDowell; for violinists there are Mr. Ysaye, whose last appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was ten years ago; Mr. Fritz Kreisler, whose remarkable triumph two years ago will be readily recalled; Miss Marie Nichols, a Boston artist who has already gained distinction; Mr. Willy Hess, the new concert master of the orchestra, and Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. C. Barleben and Mr. H. Schmedes, also from the ranks of the orchestra. It is also sure to be a welcome announcement that Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, the first violoncellist of the orchestra, will again appear as soloist during the season.

The sale of season tickets for the twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be held at Symphony Hall on Monday and Tuesday, Oct. 3 and 4, and for the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 6 and 7; each sale beginning at 10 A. M. and continuing throughout the day.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

Mr. Willy Hess, who will soon take up his residence in Boston, to assume the position of concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, comes from London, where he is well known through his connection with the Halle Orchestra and the Royal Academy of Music, where he has just resigned his position as professor.

Born in Mannheim in 1859, his family left for America in 1865, and resided here for seven years, during which time young Hess pursued his studies. In 1872 his father left America for Holland, where his young son began his public appearances. On one occasion, the boy, then thirteen, distinguished himself by leading the celebrated "Harten Quartet." The proverb, "A rolling stone gathers no moss," does not appear to apply to Mr. Hess, who has certainly had experience of many lands, but has not suffered thereby. On the contrary, he seems to have gained a knowledge of men and music which stands him in good stead today.

At the end of twelve months another move was made, this time to Germany, where Heidelberg was chosen as a place of residence. The young violinist toured extensively through Germany, Holland, Belgium and France. In Paris he was fortunate enough to attract the notice of Vieuxtemps, who not only interested himself in the lad, but conducted the orchestra for him at his first Philharmonic concert there.

In 1876 it was decided that he should go to Berlin for two years to profit by instruction from Joachim, and at the end of this time he received the valuable appointment of leader of the Opera and Museum's orchestra at Frankfurt-am-Maine. Eight happy years, of work and interest, were passed in this city where, in addition to his orchestral duties and teaching, Mr. Hess also found time to found a quartet and a trio with Kwast and Hugo Becker.

In 1886 he accepted a post at the conservatory in Rotterdam as professor and leader of the orchestra, and also succeeded to the well-known string quartet formerly led by Professor Wirth. After two years Sir Charles Halle secured his services for the Halle Orchestra in Manchester in the place of Ludwig Straus, an appointment which kept him in England for seven years. In addition to his work in Manchester he also led for the Philharmonic Society in Liverpool, and travelled a great deal, playing at various concerts.

In 1895 Mr. Hess again returned to the fatherland, this time to the conservatory at Cologne, where he stayed till his recent appointment to the Royal Academy of Music. Not the least interesting part of his work in Cologne was the leadership of the famous Gurzenich Quartet and concerts.

Certainly want of interest and variety has no part in the life of this artist. His rooms are crowded with autographed photographs, his friends seem to be legion, and his reminiscences are highly entertaining. Life in Frankfurt, from a musical point of view—in constant companionship with Rubinstein, Brahms, Clara Schumann, and the many artists attracted to the town—offered great enjoyment to a young musician, and left memories not easily forgotten.

In England, Mr. Hess's musicianly qualities were much appreciated by the royal family. He played many times at Clarence House for the late Duke of Edinburgh, and has special remembrance of one evening spent there with Paderewski and Hollman. After playing one night at a Royal Amateur Orchestral Society's concert, the present king (then Prince of Wales) personally congratulated him, and himself decorated the artist with the honorary badge of membership. On one memorable occasion he was summoned to Osborne by the late Queen while leading at the Chester Festival.

Mr. Hess was impressed with Queen Victoria's kindness and love of music, and he mentions the fact that her majesty not only addressed him in faultless German, but carried on a conversation with the other artists in French and Italian equally well.

The Grand Duke of Luxembourg conferred on Mr. Hess the Order of the Ritterkranz von Adolph, and from the German emperor he received the title of Konigliche Preussische Professor on the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Cologne Conservatory, where on the death of Dr. Wullner, he filled the place of director till the appointment of Fritz Steinbach.

Many interesting tours were made with the Max Pauer and the Grunfeld trio, in which Mr. Hess replaced the well-known virtuoso, Florian Zajic. The violinist and Max Pauer also utilized one summer holiday in organizing a concert tour in Norway, during which they travelled as far north as Tromsø, and in company with the artist of the Illustrated London News, visited Nansen's yacht, the Fram.

As a conductor, Mr. Hess shows marked ability, having acted in that capacity as deputy for Halle, for Gernsheim, in Holland, and for three summers wielding the baton for the Gurzenich Orchestra. The artist is the fortunate possessor of a magnificent Guadagnini violin, which he acquired some years ago, and the instrument is highly treasured by its owner.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

After the preliminary announcement of the dates, soloists and other details of the coming season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which have recently been made public, symphony patrons naturally await with interest the announcement of the first three concert programmes which are given below.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who will again direct the orchestra for the seventh season of his present régime, has given much time and study to the preparation of these programmes. It is a most interesting and significant statistic that with the five years of his first term, from 1884 to 1889, Mr. Gericke at the close of the coming season will have held the position of conductor for twelve years, exactly one-half the twenty-four years' existence of the organization. When one recalls his invaluable services in the early years in building and shaping the orchestra into the almost flawless technical condition which it has steadily maintained ever since, and again when the remarkable total of over eleven hundred concerts will have been conducted by Mr. Gericke at the close of the coming season, it is only simple justice to acknowledge his tremendous influence and endeavor toward the best in music. Always mindful of the magnificent material at his disposal, thanks to the lavish generosity of a public-spirited founder and patron, Mr. Gericke deserves the admiration and gratitude of thousands of concert-goers throughout the United States for his unswerving loyalty and devotion to the highest ideals. It is the intention of Conductor Gericke to present some most attractive novelties throughout the season chosen from the following list:

Hugo Wolf: Symphonic Poem, "Penthesilea."
Saint-Saëns: Symphony No. 1.

List: "Vogelpredigt des heiligen Franz von Assisi."
J. Fauré: "Pellias and Melisande."
Van Der Stucken: "Pax Triumphant."
Debussy: Prelude, "L'Après-midi d'une Faune."
Converse: Two pieces for Piano and Orchestra.
R. Cætanl: Prelude Symphonique, Op. II.
C. Goldmark: Overture.
Sinding: Suite, Op. 35.
Rimsky-Korsakoff: "Sadkow."
Hadley: Symphony.
Gluck (Mottl): Ballet Music from Suite II.
Guy Ropartz: Fantasia in D major.
Schillings: "Der Vespertag."

The programmes for the first three concerts are as follows:

I. CONCERT, OCT. 14 AND 15

Overture to "Othello."
Aria from "Stabat Mater."
Mme. Louise Homer.
Suite in D major, Op. 39.
In memory of Anton Dvorak: Quartette from "Stabat Mater."
Mrs. Grace B. Williams, Mme. Louise Homer, Mr. Theodore Van York, Mr. L. B. Merrill.
Symphony No. 5, "From the New World."

II. CONCERT, OCT. 21 AND 22

Beethoven: Symphony in B-flat major, No. 4.
Joachim: Hungarian Concerto for Violin.
Mr. Willy Hess.
Paul Dukas: Scherzo L'Apprenti Sorcier.
(First time.)
Wagner: Overture, "Tannhauser."

III. CONCERT, OCT. 28 AND 29

Weber: Overture, "Oberon."
Bach: Three Movements orchestrated by W. Gericke.
Chopin: Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor.
Mr. Vladimir De Pachmann.
Joseph Suk: Symphony in E major, Op. 14.
(First time.)

WILLY HESS TO CONDUCT.

Engaged as Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Company.

Willy Hess, a well known German violinist, has been engaged by Charles Ellis to take the place of Fernandes Arbos as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and both he and Col. Higginson hope that a successor to Franz Kneisel, who held that post for such a long time, has at last been found. M. Arbos has returned to London and resumed teaching.

Mr. Hess has played in a number of the best known orchestras of Germany and has recently been concert master of the Cologne Philharmonic. He came to this country as an infant phenomenon years ago and played in concerts with Theodore Thomas's orchestra.

The engagement of Mr. Hess settles finally the reports that Franz Kneisel, who with his quartet seceded from the orchestra two years ago, was to return to his old post. There was never any foundation for that rumor and Col. Higginson has no desire to include Mr. Kneisel again among the members of the orchestra. The Kneisel Quartet has been so prosperous since the independent tours began that its seasons will be continued as they have been for the past two years.

SYMPHONY TICKETS
HEARD, HOTEL TOURAINE
9t[A]: 66

HESS WILL LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Well-Known German Violinist at the Head of the Famous Musical Organization.

IS OF WIDE EXPERIENCE

First Public Rehearsal and Concert
Will Be Given Oct
14 and 15.

Journal Aug. 30, 1904.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will have a new concert master the coming musical season in the person of Willie Hess, the well-known German violinist who has been recently the concert master of the Cologne Philharmonic Orchestra.

Ever since the end of last season, when Fernandes Arbos withdrew from the orchestra, to resume his musical work in London, there has been much conjecture among the musical people hereabouts as to who his successor might be. It had been rumored quite frequently that Franz Kneisel, who left the orchestra with his quartet two years ago, would resume his former position, which has now proved to be unfounded.

Mr. Hess is a man of great experience, having been connected with a number of the best orchestras of Germany, and is well known throughout continental Europe. He has many friends in this country and is well remembered by the musical fraternity on this side of the water as the infant phenomenon violinist who toured this country several years ago in the palmy days of the Theodore Thomas orchestra.

The first public rehearsal and its following concert this season by the orchestra will be given Oct. 14 and 15. Many notable soloists, both vocal and instrumental, especially some famous violinists, will mark the concerts the coming season.

As a forerunner of one of the winter's staple delights comes the announcement of the soloists to appear and many of the novelties to be presented during the twenty-fourth season of the Symphony Orchestra. With the average Boston individual going to these concerts annually, quite as a matter of course, it is hardly necessary for the management to send these advance agents through the mails; still, it is well probably to allow the concert public to have besides all the pleasure the performances afford them, the joy of anticipation. And this joy may be given all the license it wants in this instance, for the array of soloists is perhaps the most brilliant ever composed for a symphony season, and the novelties to be heard are sufficient in numbers and in promised interest to gratify even those who have in past seasons been apparently much exercised because the moderns were forgotten in the worship of the old masters.

Trans. Sept. 28, 1904.

Trans. Oct. 7, 1904 Symphony Orchestra Tickets

The announcements which have partly forecasted the work and special attractions planned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its coming season's performances have aroused an interest in this musical event which seems to be even keener and more widespread than usual. A marked evidence of the eager expectancy on the part of the musical public is seen at the auction of season tickets which is progressing this week at Symphony Hall, where the number of people appearing among the bidders for the first time, and the quick disposal of seats at substantial premium prices, have been a noticeable feature of the sale.

This increased interest is no doubt partly due to the unusually brilliant attractions announced as special features of the orchestra's twenty-fourth season. Mr. Hess, the new concert master and first violinist of the organization, who has just arrived from London, will be heard in solo performance for the first time in America, at the second rehearsal and concert of Oct. 21 and 22. The list of soloists who will appear during the season is in itself sufficient to excite the enthusiastic interest of the concert-going public, including as it does many of the world's greatest artists in their respective domains of pianoforte, violin and vocal music, while the performances of the orchestra itself, besides the usual varied and choice selections from the greatest works of the master composers, will comprise more than the ordinary number of orchestral novelties and innovations, the first of which will be an entire programme of Dvorak music, scheduled for the opening concerts of Oct. 14 and 15.

Tomorrow (Thursday) and Friday will be devoted to the sale of season tickets for the evening concerts, seats for the afternoon performances having been closed out at the auction sales of Monday and Tuesday.

HESS TO BE CONCERT MASTER

Trans. Aug. 29, 1904
Noted German Violinist Will Be a Member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the Coming Season, Taking the Chair Long Filled by Franz Kneisel and More Recently by Fernandes Arbos

It having been understood at the close of the last musical season in this city that Fernandes Arbos, who had been concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, would not be identified with that organization another season, there has been in consequence much conjecture regarding his successor. Several prominent violinists have been mentioned as possible successor to this first chair in the orchestra, so long filled by Franz Kneisel, whom Mr. Arbos succeeded, but nothing at all definite has been known until now as to the solution of the problem in which all musical people hereabout are interested. It may be stated as a settled matter that the first violinist of the orchestra will be Willy Hess, a German player who recently has been concert master of the Cologne Philharmonic Orchestra. Through private sources it is known as a fact that he is the man chosen by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Although the story regarding Mr. Hess's coming to Boston could not be corroborated at the Symphony Hall today, in the absence from town of Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and also Frederic R. Comee, assistant manager, the fact can be stated definitely, from information obtained through private sources, that Mr. Hess is the man chosen to be concert master. He has many friends in this city as well as in New York, and they, among others, know that the matter has been finally settled. Mr. Hess is a man of experience, and throughout Continental Europe is well known, as he is by reputation in this country. He has played in leading orchestras in Germany and is well equipped for the new position to which he comes in Boston. Mr. Arbos, the concert master of last season, is now in London, busy with musical work.

The first public rehearsal and its following concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given respectively on Oct. 14 and 15. The concerts this coming season will be marked by the appearance of many notable soloists, both vocal and instrumental, including especially some famous violinists. The sales of seats at auction for the rehearsals and concerts will not take place until the first week in October, a week later than has been the custom in past years.

PERSONALITY OF PROF. WILLY HESS, THE NEW CONCERT MASTER OF THE SYMPHONY

Herald
Oct 9, 1904

A single glance at Prof. Willy Hess, who succeeds Mr. Fernandes Arbos as concert master of the Boston Symphony, would be sufficient to satisfy a stranger that a man stood before him who could do something. If wholly ignorant of the musician's identity, the stranger might be a little puzzled to guess what. The somewhat fierce expression lent by the beard of martial type, and a certain air of authority might lead him to suggest the soldier; but a second glance would reveal the expanse of white forehead speaking nothing but gentleness. The keen eyes, the quick, nervous movements might suggest the modern man of business, but here again the correction would be made by the eyes, the brow and quicker still by the conversation. His thoughts are all of his art, and when practical matters in regard to his present movements are mentioned he is apt to turn quickly aside with, "Oh, Mr. Ellis arranges all that!"

Of middle height, a bit inclined to droop when at ease, with a face concealed by a bushy beard sprinkled with gray and of German cut, a broad sweep of white forehead from which the hair is brushed back—every feature sparkling with life as though charged with electricity—such is Mr. Hess. He is full of energy. As a man he is of the type who makes friends quickly, and keeps them. Good humor, kindness and evenness of temper, in contradistinction to many musical leaders, have all contributed to make for him a wide circle of friends wherever he has been. His disposition, together with what we have come to look upon as almost a national characteristic, make him a strong lover of home. That he had to leave his wife and four beautiful children behind him is at present his greatest personal concern.

"If I remain," he said, after a quick glance at a group picture of his children, "they shall come, and I shall settle down here. I do not like this bachelor life."

His professional record is proof of the amount of hard work of which he is capable. To many it will be something of a surprise to learn that this is not his first appearance in Boston. He played here in 1869 with Thomas' orchestra.

"No," he said, "I do not remember much of that. I was only about 10-years old. I was here two days. Little I thought then that I should ever come back."

Prof. Hess was born in Mannheim in 1859, and began his musical studies under his father when 6 years old. When 10 years old he was touring Holland and was looked upon as an infant prodigy. When 13 he distinguished himself by leading the famous "Harfen quartet." From Holland he extended his trips through Germany, Belgium and France. When in Paris he attracted the notice of Vieuxtemps, who at once became interested in him, and at his first Philharmonic concert there conducted the orchestra for him.

In 1876 he went to Berlin, where he studied under Joachim, and at the end of two years he received the appointment of leader of the opera and museum orchestra at Frankfort-on-the-Main. He remained here eight years. He then accepted the position of professor and leader of the orchestra at Rotterdam, which succeeded to the well known string quartet formerly led by Prof. Wirth. The leadership of the Halle orchestra of Manchester was the next post he accepted, and here he succeeded Ludwig Straus. He remained seven years.

In 1895 he returned once more to Germany to accept a post at the Cologne conservatory. His work there as leader of the Guersnich quartet won him national fame. His next appointment was to the Royal Academy of Music in London, and this he resigned to take up his work in Boston.

When Prof. Hess chooses to become reminiscent he can tell with rare interest of experiences as a player to royalty. He has many autograph portraits of people of exalted rank, and his friends among members of royal families seem to be without number. He played frequently at Clarence House for the late Duke of Edinburgh. There he had for companions one evening Paderewski and Hollman. Once at a Royal Amateur Orchestral Society's concert the Prince of Wales, now King Edward, personally offered him praise and decorated him with an honorary badge of membership.

Then the distinguished musician remembers keenly to this day his experience in playing before Queen Victoria. At the time he was leading the orchestra at the Chester festival. In order to obey the summons from her majesty he had to leave the quaint little cathedral town at 4 A. M. He reached Osborne at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, played to the delight of her majesty, started for Chester at 5 the next morning, travelled all that day, and that night led the orchestra at the festival. However, he declares, the Queen's praise, expressed in faultless German amply repaid him for his trouble.

Among the insignia which Prof. Hess is entitled to wear is that of the Order of the Ritterkranz von Adolph, conferred by the Grand Duke of Luxembourg. He bears also the title of Koenigliche Preussische Professor, received on the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the Cologne Conservatory.

Prof. Hess is already busy on plans for his work here, arranging programmes and doing much practicing. He is the fortunate possessor of a magnificent Guadagnini violin, which he acquired some time ago.

"I have been teaching a great deal of late," he said wearily, "and that takes a great deal out of a man. I am glad to give it up."

When asked if he thought he would like his new post and surroundings, he exclaimed frankly: "Oh, I am sure I shall. And I hope the people will like me."

SYMPHONY SEATS—One seat for Saturday eve., $25. Also one seat for alternate Saturdays, $12. Both in front row of second bal., one-third way from stage. Box 175, Waban, Mass. Tel. 61-3 Newton Highlands. (A)

SYMPHONY CONCERTS
Half of two evening tickets, floor, JJ, 4 and 5. $16. HERBERT F. SYLVESTER, 43 Bowers St., Newtonville, Mass. (A):

FOR SALE—CHOICE SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TICKET IN K
Apply to Mr. HICKS, 50 Congress St., Room 220. Post Office Box 2310 ThS(A): o 13

PAYS $95 BONUS IN SYMPHONY BID

Broker Gives High Premium for Two Seats Separated by Aisle —Good Prices Realized at the First Auction of the Season.

FIGURES ABOUT SAME AS THOSE OF LAST YEAR

Involuntary Bidder, Whose Nod
Was Due to Nervous Affliction, Unconsciously Ran up Prices—
Two Slight Accidents.

Herald ——— Oct. 4, 1904

About the same prices as last year were bid yesterday morning at Symphony Hall at the first public auction of tickets for the Boston Symphony orchestra season. The tickets sold were for the $12 seats for Friday afternoon rehearsals. The prices bid were added to the $12 on each seat, and no more than four seats were allowed on each bid.

The highest bid was given by Pratt, the ticket broker, who paid $95 premium for each of two seats in row H, numbered 18 and 19, end seats, across the centre aisle from each other.

Shortly after the sale began two ladies suffered mishaps while approaching the desk where the money was paid for the seats after the bidding. One of these ladies overlooked a slight step-off in the floor aisle, and fell, injuring her ankle so that she had to be carried from the hall and taken home in a cab. Shortly after this another lady misstepped at the same place, and fell flat upon her face. After these two incidents a rail was put up so that those approaching the desk could do so in safety.

She Nodded, to the Cost of the Rival Bidders for Seats.

There was one humorous incident, which cost some of the bidders dearly. Not far from the front row sat a lady who apparently suffers a nervous affliction which causes her head to nod involuntarily. It so chanced in the mutations of the building, which went on here and there among the large assemblage of society people and music lovers who filled the larger portion of the floor of the hall, that one of the brisk auction skirmishes took place near this woman. Auctioneer Henry Jackson, glancing over the hall keenly searching for bidders to pit against an enthusiastic broker, saw this woman nodding away as though she meant to have the seat at any price.

"Twenty dollars," said he, pointing the ebony baton at the man.

"Twenty dollars and a half?" pointing at the woman.

"Twenty-one dollars?" to the man.

And then back and forth swung the baton until the man got the seat at a nice premium, when the woman, becoming interested in something else, took her eyes from the auctioneer.

The sale started shortly after 10 A. M. and continued until 1:30 o'clock, when a recess of half an hour broke the continuous bidding. At 2 P. M. the sale continued.

Most of the choice sections were bought through the bids of ticket brokers. The first offer on No. 1, row A, was $2, and the seat was knocked down at $17. In row B, when the centre aisle seats were reached the first enthusiasm began. Pratt took two on the centre aisle for $29.50 each. Herrick took two across the aisle at $29 each. In row C, Pratt secured for a client a centre aisle seat at $41 premium.

Prices in Row D Ranged from $12 up to $42 in Premium.

In row D, Herrick got a seat near the centre aisle for $42 premium. The lowest premium in the row was $12, on the end seat, 36; 1 and 2 sold for $13 premium. Through the row extra prices were $30.50, $38, $39.50 and $39.

In row E, right aisle seats went at $40. Centre aisle seats were at $30. Four seats in this row were at $16 premium.

In row F, Heard, the broker, bought four aisle seats at $42 premium on each. In row G, seat 18, on the centre aisle, sold for $51, and four seats across the aisle sold at $33.50 premium on each.

The highest bid of $95 premium on each of two seats split by the centre aisle, was preceded by four seats selling at $29, and was followed by the sale of four seats at $59 premium. This row sold high throughout.

In the next row Pratt bought four seats at $74 premium on each, and four at $86.

Seats 18 and 19 split by the centre aisle were reserved in rows L and N; in row J they sold at premium of $61 and $60 to Connelly; in row K at $93 to Herrick; in row M at $68 to Heard.

The sale tomorrow at 10 A. M. will dispose of the $7.50 seats to the Friday afternoon rehearsals.

WANTED

Two Symphony tickets for alternate Friday afternoons. Address O.J., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY

TICKETS FOR SALE in all parts of the Hall. WADSWORTH, 40 State St., Room 53. Telephone 4235-5. 4t(A): o 10

FOR SALE—CHOICE SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TICKET IN K

Apply to Mr. HICKS, 50 Congress St., Room 220. Post Office Box 2310 ThS(A): o 13

SYMPHONY TICKETS

A few excellent locations at reasonable rates. Apply to MR. HARDING, 137 Milk St. (A):

HIGHEST PREMIUM WAS $95

Sale of Seats for the Public Rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Coming Season Opened This Morning at Symphony Hall

This morning, in Symphony Hall, the opening of the sale at auction of season tickets for the Symphony Orchestra's public rehearsals opened soon after ten o'clock with a fairly good number of people present to bid on seats, or merely watch the proceedings. The crowd was by no means so large as in some years, and the bidding was comparatively slow, but the highest premium, $95, was an increase over last year. This will be the twenty-fourth season of these concerts, and today only the higher-priced, or $12, seats for the twenty-four public rehearsals were put on sale. Walter Jackson, as in former years, was the auctioneer.

The sale began with the disposal of seat No. 1, in row A, and then in regular consecutive order all the sales were made, buyers having the usual privilege, on their bid, of taking any part of four seats. Seat No. 1 was begun on a bid of $2 and gradually was run up to $17, and at this figure the buyer took two seats. For two years past the premium on this first seat has been $11, so today's price is an advance of several dollars. The first year that Symphony Hall was opened, this identical seat at the auction sale brought a premium of $280, the purchaser making a record for himself as the first buyer of the first seat sold in the then new hall. Other seats in row A next were started on a bid of $10 and sold at $17.50, while $18.50 was the highest premium paid in this row, with $13 as the lowest, for the seat on the extreme left end of the row.

In row B, beginning at a $10 bid, seats sold at from $12 to $29.50 premium, several ticket brokers securing several seats on orders. In the third row $6 was the opening bid, with a sale at $11 for three seats, and then the prices reached $39 for two end seats in the middle of the hall, and $41 for a single aisle seat in the centre. Then the price fell to $27 and recovered to higher before the row was finished, and fell again to as low as $12 for the extreme left end seat. Row D showed a range of from $13 as the price of the first seat in the row, to $39.50, the seats on the centre aisle bringing the highest premiums. The last seat, left wall, brought $12. In rows E and F prices ran from $14.50 to as high as $42, which a broker paid for seats. Bids in these rows began at $15, and later were started at $25. In row G seats could be had as low as $14.50, in comparison to $53.50 paid for premiums on four choice centre seats. In row H the first really high price was paid, after the first seat had sold for $15.50 premium, and the same buyer, a broker, paid $59 premium on the next four adjoining seats. This same buyer took seats in the next line, row I, for $74, and also $86, while other seats in the row went for about $30, after a start at $26. In J the first bid was $21, and the sales ran up to as high as $61 premium, while in row K $20 was the start, and soon $60 was reached, then $45 for two aisle seats, centre, while across the aisle the corresponding seats fetched $93.

Prices then went down gradually to as low as $17, for the odd end seat, on the wall aisle, but the buyer took his privilege of four, and secured three good seats on the first end of the next row behind, which was to his advantage. In row L $34, $47, $40, 35 and $26 were the chief prices, and in row M the first sale was at $22, which increased by degrees to $68. Many ticket brokers bought hereabout, this being a favorite place in the hall.

The bidding was no so spirited as in some years, nor was there the strong rivalry to secure this or that coveted place which has marked some previous years at these sales. Ladies were prominent among the bidders, who for once did not seem afraid to "speak right out in meeting." They seem to have overcome former diffidence in making their bids, so they manage to pick up some pretty good seats here and there in the hall. The sale did not progress as rapidly as sometimes, and when intermission was declared, at 1.30 o'clock, by no means half of the seats had been sold. There were no special features to mark the sale this morning, and it went on quietly and with not over-lively bidding.

When the sale was resumed this afternoon, following the intermission, the prices seemed to strike an average premium of about $30 for seats in row L and back of that, with about $50 as the average for the choicest seats on the main aisles, and smallest premiums as the rows reached the extreme left wall of the hall.

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS ARE SELLING BRISKLY

Splendid Array of Talent for This Season Causes Unusual Interest.

Journal — Oct. 5, 1904

The auction sale of season tickets in progress at Symphony Hall this week affords palpable evidence that the interest of the musical public in the annual season of Symphony concerts, far from being on the wane, is undergoing a substantial increase. The unusual interest evidenced in the sales can be partly traced to the array of distinguished solo-artists and the forecasting of notable orchestral attractions this season.

The orchestra's new concertmaster and first violin, Mr. Hess, has just arrived from London and will make his first solo appearance in America at the rehearsal and concert of Oct. 21 and 22.

PREMIUMS HIGHER THIS YEAR

Sale of Seats for the Symphony Orchestra's Public Rehearsals Shows a Greater Average of Prices Than Those Paid Last Year Trans. Oct. 4, 1904.

Continuation this morning of the sale begun yesterday of seats for the twenty-four public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought out, at Symphony Hall, about the same number of people as attended yesterday's auction sale. Both days show a higher average of premiums than those paid last year. Today's sale was for the lower-priced, or $7.50 seats, the premiums paid being added in all cases to this price. As compared with yesterday, the sale was soon over, occupying only the forenoon hours, whereas yesterday's sale lasted till well after dark.

There are only a few more than four hundred tickets of the $7.50 class. They include seats on the floor beginning with row KK and extending back through row SS, nine rows. They also include rows E, F, G, H and I in the rear part of the first balcony. The opening sale today, seat No. 1, on the right-hand end of row KK, was made at $16 premium, the buyer taking three seats out of the four which any bid gives the purchaser the privilege of doing. Other seats in this row sold up to as high as $23 premium for what may be considered as the best places in the line. In the next following row the premiums ranged from $15 to $20, and about the same figures were obtained for premiums in succeeding rows, where in some places the premiums fell to $10 and a number of seats at this figure and others at $12 were sold.

When it came to the seats in the first balcony the first sale was made at $13 premium, and this figure increased to $18 as the centre of the row, which was E, was reached. In the next row the prices were a little better, running to $19 and $20, with more tickets sold at these higher figures than at the lower prices in the preceding row. Back of these rows very good seats, commanding a clear view of the stage and players and in all ways desirable for people who do not care especially to be very near the stage, could be had at $10, $12 and $13 premiums on the average.

The sale was somewhat livelier than that of yesterday, because of the fewer number of tickets offered and a larger number of buyers in proportion who wished to secure something. The sale of the $12 seats will be held on Thursday, and that of the $7.50 seats on Friday, each day beginning at ten in the morning at Symphony Hall.

There has been awakened widespread interest in this season's concerts and public rehearsals, because of the notable list of distinguished soloists engaged to appear, including Miss Muriel Foster, Mme. Johanna Galski, Mme. Louise Homer, Miss Edith Walker, Theodore Van Yox, Eugene D'Albert, Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, Carlo Buonamici, Rafael Joseffy, Vladimir De Pachmann, C. Rubner, Fritz Kreisler, Miss Marie Nichols, Eugene Ysaye, T. Adamowski, Ignace Paderewski and other eminent musicians. The fact that Willy Hess has been engaged as concert master also has aroused general interest.

SYMPHONY SEAT SALES SURPRISE

Two or Three Times as Much Secured as Last Year—Interest of Public Substantially Increasing—New Faces Seen.

Herald — Oct. 5, 1904

The auction sale yesterday of the $7.50 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Symphony orchestra furnished something of a gratifying surprise to the managers, the seats selling for two and three times what they brought last year. The ticket brokers were not so much in evidence. Those who were present were made up for the most part of those sincere lovers of music with somewhat lean purses.

The sale began with row KK on the floor, nine rows from the back. The highest bid was $20 for seats 22 and 23 in row LL. There was but little spirited bidding, but the prices were remarkably steady. An average of about $14 premium was paid on the first two or three rows offered, and this fell, with only sudden rallies, about $1 a row.

Rows E, G, F and H, in the first balcony centre, brought prices ranging from $11 to $15 and $17. A block of four seats in F cost the purchaser a premium of $19, inasmuch as some one else happened also to want the same seats. The greater part of the purchasers were for single seats.

The auction sale affords palpable evidence that the interest of the musical public in the annual season of Symphony concerts is substantially increasing. Many new faces are seen among the participants in the spirited bidding for seats and many new names have been added to the regular list of patrons. The orchestra's new concert master and first violin, Mr. Hess, has just arrived from London and will make his first solo appearance in America at the rehearsal and concert of Oct. 21 and 22.

The sale of seats will continue through Thursday and Friday for the season of evening concerts, tickets for the afternoon rehearsals having been disposed of.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Two First Balcony, C: fine location, end seats; price very low. Clerk Hotel Buckminster, Beacon St., Boston. (A):

THE Boston papers recently stated that Franz Kneisel would return next season to his old post as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in place of Fernandez Arbos, the present incumbent. We are in a position to state that there is absolutely no foundation of fact in such a rumor. Kneisel will not rejoin the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and already has planned a whole season's work with his chamber music organization. Our information further leads us to believe that the new Boston concertmaster will be Willy Hess, concertmaster of the Gürzenich Orchestra, in Cologne. Gregorowitsch, of Helsingfors, had also been thought of in connection with the Boston post. Hess' salary will be $6,000 per annum.

WOMEN BID AT SYMPHONY SALE

Auction of Seats for the Coming Season Opens and a Premium of $95 Is Reached.

Journal Oct. 4, 1904

The auction sale of seats yesterday in Symphony Hall for the public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's coming season was marked by a large attendance and a premium of $95 for the highest in choice of seats. Unlike former years there were many women among those present who for the first time seemed courageous enough to speak up and they thus secured many good lots of seats. By noon nearly half were sold and during the forenoon there were many high premiums, ranging from $50 up to $80, while a great many were, of course, from $15 to $25.

During the afternoon the sales were brisk and the premiums seemed to strike an average of $30. The highest premium, $95, was a considerable increase over last year's record. The sale began with No. 1 in Row A and were sold in consecutive order.

SYMPHONY SEAT SALE

$95 High Bid for $12
Friday Seat Record
Oct. 3, 1904

About 300 persons attended the sale of $12 symphony orchestra seats for Friday afternoons. Bidding started at $2 premium for A1, and the seat was finally knocked down at $17. Last year an $11 premium was obtained for this seat, and in 1902 the premium for A1 was $11.50.

The bidding for the end seats in the first few rows lacked enthusiasm, but when center seats were reached competition became very spirited.

Seats in row A ranged from $18.50 to $13. Seats in row B near the end averaged about $12, while center seats sold as high as $29.50. The range in row D was $41 to $11.

Last year the highest price paid for a $12 Friday afternoon seat was $77, for M 19; the highest price during the previous year was $305.

The highest premium bid was $95 for H 18, sold to a Mr. Pratt.

Other high bids were: $92 for K 18; and $86 each for seats I 19, 20, 21, and 22, also taken by Mr. Pratt.

HIGHEST PREMIUM WAS $36

Auction Sale of Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts by the Symphony Orchestra Trans. Oct. 6, 1904

At today's sale of the $12 seats for the evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened in Symphony Hall, at ten o'clock, by no means as many people were present as was the case on Monday, when the sale of public rehearsal tickets took place. As a whole, much smaller premiums were obtained today than were paid at the rehearsal sale, and the bidding often lacked the spirit and eagerness shown earlier in the week and at times it really lagged.

The highest premium paid this forenoon was $36, which was paid for seats Nos. 18 (an end seat), 19 and 20 in row K. At the rehearsal sale, seats 18 and 19 brought, in comparison, $93 premium, or $2 less than the highest premium paid at the previous sale. The next highest price this morning was at $35.50 premium, which Mr. Herrick, the broker, paid for seats 19 and 20 in row G, these same seats for rehearsals selling on Monday last at $53.50 premium. Whereas seats 18 and 19 in row H, which are separated by the centre aisle of the hall, went at $95 premium on Monday, the very highest price of the entire sale, these same places today were sold at $18 premium for seat No. 18 (the buyer taking also Nos. 15, 16 and 17) and across the aisle seat 19 went for $26, to Mr. Herrick, who took No. 20 also, to get a pair. The first sale today, seat No. 1 in row A, right-hand end of the line, was made at $7.50 premium and the second sale was half a dollar less than that. The beginning was rather slow and without wild desire on the part of anybody to secure front row places, but later in the sale the activity increased.

When rows H and I were reached the first general eagerness was shown to secure places. In H the prices ran from $9, as the opening premium, up to $26 and down to $6 on the left end. In I from $9 up to $28 and back to $8 was the range of premiums. At the rehearsal sale it was in this row that $95 was obtained for Nos. 18 and 19, and at that time $59 was paid for Nos. 20, 21, 22 and 23. As against $23 for the highest premium today in row I, as high as $74 and $86 represented prices paid on Monday last.

In row J prices were from $10 to $30 and back to $9, and in K, with brisk bidding, they ranged from $9.50 to $36, with several sales at about $17 and off to $11.50. Brokers bought extensively in this row, as they did in L, where premiums were from $9.50 to $25 for seats Nos. 28 (end) and 29. Row M brought out lively competition, with premiums running from $11, at the start, up to $26 and back to $11 for the left end. The highest price in row O was $31 for centre aisle seats Nos. 18 and 19, bought by Mr. Connelly, who secured many other places in various rows.

Directly after noon the hall thinned out considerably, and prices were then at what might be termed normal premiums, without the occasional flights to unreasonable figures which in this part of the hall marked the rehearsal sale. All in all, the average prices obtained for the evening concerts show much higher premiums than last year, just as was the case at the rehearsal sales. Music lovers had ample opportunity today to secure fine seats at most reasonable rates, or even cheap prices, comparatively, when one considers that in so many instances really modest premiums secured desirable places, which, added to the regular price of tickets, $12, as is done in all cases, makes the average cost of each concert per night remarkably low, especially when it is realized the very high character of the entire course and the chance to hear at these concerts some of the world's greatest and most famous musical artists. The sale of $7.50 seats, including the second balcony, will take place Friday.

SYMPHONY SEAT SALE OVER

Highest Premium Paid for the Lower-Priced Seats for the Evening Concerts
Was $9.50 Trans. Oct. 8, 1904

Friday brought to a close in Symphony Hall the sale of seats for this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the $7.50 tickets being offered yesterday. These include the seats in nine rows in the rear part of the floor, five rows in the rear part, centre, of the first balcony, and the entire second balcony. At public rehearsals on Friday afternoons these places are not reserved, but are known as the "rush" seats, open to anybody having admission tickets, so long as the seating capacity holds out. Yesterday, the premiums on the whole were good, just as they had been at the sale of the higher-priced seats for the evening concerts and for the seats for the public rehearsals. The highest premium paid yesterday was $9.50. Many seats went at from $7 to $8 premium and good places were to be had, now and then during the sale, at even lower rates, at $5 and thereabout. The entire sales this season have shown far greater interest in the series of concerts and more enthusiasm and eagerness to secure tickets than marked the sale of last year.

SYMPHONY TICKETS—FOR SALE—The use of two Symphony Tickets for alternate Friday afternoons. Apply at CASHIN'S TICKET OFFICE, Young's Hotel. (A):

SYMPHONY
TICKETS FOR SALE in all parts of the Hall.
WADSWORTH, 40 State St., Room 53.
Telephone 4235-5. St(A): 04

SYMPHONY TICKETS
A few excellent locations at reasonable rates.
Apply to MR. HARDING, 137 Milk St.
SMW(A): 08

SYMPHONY TICKETS
Two seats for alternate nights, Second Row
Balcony Centre, $20. W. W., Box 341,
Boston. (A):

THE Boston papers recently stated that Franz Kneisel would return next season to his old post as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in place of Fernandez Arbos, the present incumbent. We are in a position to state that there is absolutely no foundation of fact in such a rumor. Kneisel will not rejoin the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and already has planned a whole season's work with his chamber music organization. Our information further leads us to believe that the new Boston concertmaster will be Willy Hess, concertmaster of the Gürzenich Orchestra, in Cologne. Gregorowitsch, of Helsingfors, had also been thought of in connection with the Boston post. Hess' salary will be $6,000 per annum.

WOMEN BID AT SYMPHONY SALE

Auction of Seats for the Coming Season Opens and a Premium of $95 Is Reached.

Journal ———— Oct. 4, 1904

The auction sale of seats yesterday in Symphony Hall for the public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's coming season was marked by a large attendance and a premium of $95 for the highest in choice of seats. Unlike former years there were many women among those present who for the first time seemed courageous enough to speak up and they thus secured many good lots of seats. By noon nearly half were sold and during the forenoon there were many high premiums, ranging from $50 up to $80, while a great many were, of course, from $15 to $25.

During the afternoon, the sales were brisk and the premiums seemed to strike an average of $30. The highest premium, $95, was a considerable increase over last year's record. The sale began with No. 1 in Row A and were sold in consecutive order.

SYMPHONY SEAT SALE

$95 High Bid for $12 Friday Seat

About 300 persons attended the sale of $12 symphony orchestra seats for Friday afternoons. Bidding started at $2 premium for A1, and the seat was finally knocked down at $17. Last year an $11 premium was obtained for this seat, and in 1902 the premium for A1 was $11.50.

The bidding for the end seats in the first few rows lacked enthusiasm, but when center seats were reached competition became very spirited.

Seats in row A ranged from $18.50 to $13. Seats in row B near the end averaged about $12, while center seats sold as high as $29.50. The range in row D was $41 to $11.

Last year the highest price paid for a $12 Friday afternoon seat was $77, for M 19; the highest price during the previous year was $305.

The highest premium bid was $95 for H 18, sold to a Mr. Pratt.

Other high bids were: $92 for K 18; and $86 each for seats I 19, 20, 21, and 22, also taken by Mr. Pratt.

HIGHEST PREMIUM WAS $36

Auction Sale of Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts by the Symphony Orchestra

At today's sale of the $12 seats for the evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened in Symphony Hall, at ten o'clock, by no means as many people were present as was the case on Monday, when the sale of public rehearsal tickets took place. As a whole, much smaller premiums were obtained today than were paid at the rehearsal sale, and the bidding often lacked the spirit and eagerness shown earlier in the week and at times it really lagged.

The highest premium paid this forenoon was $36, which was paid for seats Nos. 18 (an end seat), 19 and 20 in row K. At the rehearsal sale, seats 18 and 19 brought, in comparison, $93 premium, or $2 less than the highest premium paid at the previous sale. The next highest price this morning was at $35.50 premium, which Mr. Herrick, the broker, paid for seats 19 and 20 in row G, these same seats for rehearsals selling on Monday last at $53.50 premium. Whereas seats 18 and 19 in row H, which are separated by the centre aisle of the hall, went at $95 premium on Monday, the very highest price of the entire sale, these same places today were sold at $18 premium for seat No. 18 (the buyer taking also Nos. 15, 16 and 17) and across the aisle seat 19 went for $26, to Mr. Herrick, who took No. 20 also, to get a pair. The first sale today, seat No. 1 in row A, right-hand end of the line, was made at $7.50 premium and the second sale was half a dollar less than that. The beginning was rather slow and without wild desire on the part of anybody to secure front row places, but later in the sale the activity increased.

When rows H and I were reached the first general eagerness was shown to secure places. In H the prices ran from $9, as the opening premium, up to $26 and down to $6 on the left end. In I from $9 up to $28 and back to $8 was the range of premiums. At the rehearsal sale it was in this row that $95 was obtained for Nos. 18 and 19, and at that time $59 was paid for Nos. 20, 21, 22 and 23. As against $23 for the highest premium today in row I, as high as $74 and $86 represented prices paid on Monday last.

In row J prices were from $10 to $30 and back to $9, and in K, with brisk bidding, they ranged from $9.50 to $36, with several sales at about $17 and off to $11.50. Brokers bought extensively in this row, as they did in L, where premiums were from $9.50 to $25 for seats Nos. 28 (end) and 29. Row M brought out lively competition, with premiums running from $11, at the start, up to $26 and back to $11 for the left end. The highest price in row O was $31 for centre aisle seats Nos. 18 and 19, bought by Mr. Connelly, who secured many other places in various rows.

Shortly after noon the hall thinned out considerably, and prices were then at what might be termed normal premiums, without the occasional flights to unreasonable figures which in this part of the hall marked the rehearsal sale. All in all, the average prices obtained for the evening concerts show much higher premiums than last year, just as was the case at the rehearsal sales. Music lovers had ample opportunity today to secure fine seats at most reasonable rates, or even cheap prices, comparatively, when one considers that in so many instances really modest premiums secured desirable places, which, added to the regular price of tickets, $12, as is done in all cases, makes the average cost of each concert per night remarkably low, especially when it is realized the very high character of the entire course and the chance to hear at these concerts some of the world's greatest and most famous musical artists. The sale of $7.50 seats, including the second balcony, will take place Friday.

SYMPHONY SEAT SALE OVER

Highest Premium Paid for the Lower-Priced Seats for the Evening Concerts Was $9.50

Friday brought to a close in Symphony Hall the sale of seats for this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the $7.50 tickets being offered yesterday. These include the seats in nine rows in the rear part of the floor, five rows in the rear part, centre, of the first balcony, and the entire second balcony. At public rehearsals on Friday afternoons these places are not reserved, but are known as the "rush" seats, open to anybody having admission tickets, so long as the seating capacity holds out. Yesterday, the premiums on the whole were good, just as they had been at the sale of the higher-priced seats for the evening concerts and for the seats for the public rehearsals. The highest premium paid yesterday was $9.50. Many seats went at from $7 to $8 premium and good places were to be had, now and then during the sale, at even lower rates, at $5 and thereabout. The entire sales this season have shown far greater interest in the series of concerts and more enthusiasm and eagerness to secure tickets than marked the sale of last year.

SYMPHONY TICKETS—FOR SALE—The use of two Symphony Tickets for alternate Friday afternoons. Apply at CASHIN'S TICKET OFFICE, Young's Hotel. (A):

SYMPHONY TICKETS FOR SALE in all parts of the Hall. WADSWORTH, 40 State St., Room 53. Telephone 4235-5. 5t(A): 64

SYMPHONY TICKETS

A few excellent locations at reasonable rates. Apply to MR. HARDING, 137 Milk St. SMW(A): 08

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Two seats for alternate nights, Second Row Balcony Centre, $20. W. W., Box 341, Boston. (A):

HOW MAJ. H. L. HIGGINSON HAS WORKED.

An Example of His Devotion to the Symphony Concerts.

"Your paragraph on the symphony seats, saying that Maj. H. L. Higginson deserves all the high premiums he can get, is right to the point," said an old friend of The Record, and an able writer on its staff today.

With that he produced a letter written 14 years ago.

At that time an article had appeared in which an "old gentleman," name not mentioned, had been quoted as objecting to the prices of symphony tickets, probably 50 p.c. of what they cost today. But it reached Maj. Higginson's eye. He sent this letter to the paper. It has never been published.

It illustrates now in 1902 what he was doing in 1888 for music here, what he was ready to do and always will do:—

Dear Sir: I notice a few remarks about the sale of Symphony concert tickets in your paper, more especially the remarks of an old gentleman who is a great lover of music.

Would it be too much trouble to ask that gentleman to see me, or allow me to see him? I am going away to finish my vacation, and expect to be back a week from tomorrow. Of course, some people are disappointed about tickets and some people are provoked at having to pay so much.

It is very easy to find fault with the existing arrangements, but it is only from such fault finding that I can alter the plan for the better. It does not provoke me at all because the criticisms, after all, are made in a friendly spirit and are well meant, and it is only from them that I can learn anything. It is all a new business to me, comparatively speaking, and naturally I make mistakes. What is forgotten is the fact that really a large number of seats are sold at a very low price. But these are details which I should be glad to discuss with this old gentleman, or with any other critic of value who cares to discuss it. After I have heard what they have to say, I can perhaps do better another year. The only facts in regard to the concerts worth considering are that an excellent public gives them handsome support, and that it has never paid the cost, nor is it ever likely to do so.

H. L. HIGGINSON.

I would not trouble you, if I could get at this gentleman in any other way. I, certainly, do not wish to enter into any public discussion of the subject or make any defence for the present arrangements. I have given the matter a good deal of consideration and am very glad to learn of anybody who can teach me, or help me in the matter. I am,

Very truly yours,

Sept. 24, 1888.

Henry L. Higginson.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

AND HENRY LEE HIGGINSON, ITS FOUNDER

An Appreciation of What Mr. Higginson Has Done for Boston, for America and for Music in the Establishment and Maintenance of His Orchestra—How It Was Organized and How It Is Run—Its Difficulties, Its Achievements and Its Future

[Richard Aldrich, in the Century Magazine]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is Mr. Henry L. Higginson's yacht, his racing stable, his library, and his art gallery, or it takes the place of what these things are to other men of wealth with other tastes. It is a remark that he himself once made in disavowing any philanthropic ends when he set up in the city of Boston a musical organization that has few peers in the world of music anywhere. And though few will be persuaded to accept his disavowal as a complete expression of the case, it is true that Mr. Higginson has found in the establishment, the upbuilding, and the maintenance of a consummate artistic institution the keen personal delight that other men take in perfecting a collection or pursuing supremacy in a sport. If horse racing is the sport of kings, there is also something regal, even imperial, in the possession of an orchestra. Mr. Higginson's orchestra, whatever he may declare as to his own motives, has been for twenty-three years as much for the benefit of his townsmen as for himself; and, in a way by no means indirect, for the benefit of his countrymen.

Henry L. Higginson, born in New York, but brought up in Boston as a scion of a Boston family socially and intellectually most distinguished, passed in his youth through the days of the Germania Orchestra and the Harvard Musical Association and the other local institutions that decorated the town with the epithet of "musical," and that contributed in large measure to that connotation of "culture" still inseparable from its name. The young Higginson, no doubt, like the good Bostonian, he has always been, thought these things were all they should be or could be, till he was sent to Vienna to complete his education.

There he saw a great light. He associated much with musicians and musical amateurs, and heard what orchestral playing might be at the hands of accomplished musicians constantly in training under great conductors. Then and there he formed the resolution that when his time came he would give to Boston an orchestra on a higher plane than all its culture had ever known; an orchestra the members of which should not be summoned to its service upon occasion from other pursuits, but whose business should be its business; an orchestra that should not be dependent upon the caprice of the public, or limited in its scope by the conservatism of a clique.

His time came in the midst of a successful business career, when, moreover, Boston was ripe for the experiment he intended to try. The old Harvard Musical Association had shrivelled up to nothing. To take its place, there was a newly formed Philharmonic Society supporting an orchestra upon the basis that was the only possible one under existing conditions. Its purposes were sincere, but it was glad to retire from the field when, in February, 1881, Mr. Higginson made public his intention of establishing a new orchestra in a new way. There was in Boston at the time a clever young baritone singer, musical through and through, a man of uncommon intelligence and force, and in certain ways of rare accomplishment. To Georg Henschel, though he was without experience as an orchestral conductor, was intrusted the organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He proved, not unnaturally, to be far from an ideal conductor, since the art of conducting is not in-born, but is acquired by great toil and long experience; but he did well the pioneering work for the new orchestra.

As he organized it, it numbered seventy performers. There were twelve first and eleven second violins, eight violas, nine cellos, nine double-basses, and the number of wood and brass-wind players usual in a small orchestra.

The growth of the orchestra is shown by a comparison of these figures with those of its present constitution. There are now, when all the players are in requisition,—which, of course, they are only in the most modern compositions,—about ninety men; namely, sixteen first and fourteen second violins, ten violas, ten cellos, eight double-basses, four flutes, three oboes, one English horn, three clarinets, one bass clarinet, three bassoons, one contra-bassoon, four horns, four trumpets, three trombones, and one player each of the harp, tuba, timpani, bass drum, cymbals, triangle and tambour. It gave its first concert on Oct. 22, 1881.

The purpose was at first to make it minister specially to listeners of limited purse. The best places cost fifty cents; at the so-called public rehearsals, on the afternoons of the day preceding the concerts—really exact duplicates of the concerts themselves,—there were seats for twenty-five cents. But the concerts speedily became not only popular but fashionable. There was a great competition for tickets among those of unlimited as well as of limited purse, and advantage was soon taken of this eagerness by the institution of an auction sale at the beginning of each season for the choice of places. Some have said that this has tended to restrict the popular privileges upon which emphasis was laid at first, and to increase the reliance put upon the support of wealth and fashion. Some have affirmed, too, that attendance upon these concerts is for many in Boston only a compliance with fashionable necessity. Yet for twenty-three years, week after week, the hall has been filled, often to the very limit of its capacity. Now, Boston is doubtless not to be judged as other towns; but it is hard to believe that, even in Boston, the necessity of being fashionable after the Boston manner can continue to constrain hundreds to weekly boredom unremittingly for twenty-three years, with few signs of relief yet in sight. It is almost easier to believe that love of music has really permeated the several strata of Boston society, and that the audience goes to the concerts because it wishes to hear them.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was not founded to provide an instrument for any particular conductor, but its conductors have been summoned to fill the need it created—a fact that should be taken into consideration by zealous but not always wisely prompted orchestral founders elsewhere. It has had four different men at its head in the course of its existence, each a man of special qualification in certain directions, who has not escaped fiery ordeals of criticism for one reason or another, especially at home. It has been observed that the angel Gabriel would be disparaged by the American public if he came in contact with it long enough; and in Boston the critical faculty has always been highly developed.

Mr. Higginson had seen and heard Wilhelm Gericke in Vienna as Hans Richter's colleague at the Imperial Opera, and as conductor, also, of the Society of Friends of Music. Keen, alert, of imperious and overmastering will, with all the technic and routine of the difficult art of conducting at his fingers' ends, not without a certain pedantic quality to restrain the musician's temperament, which increasing years have rather mellowed and softened than intensified, he found his orchestra a body of men loosely knit together and sorely in need of the rigorous discipline that makes for perfect mobility and adaptability in orchestras as well as in armies. There is something of the martinet in Mr. Gericke's nature, and he needed all he had in those first years of the formative period. The greatest distinctions of the Boston orchestra, its perfection of ensemble, its brilliancy, its plasticity, its beauty of tone, are his work. He achieved them not only through drill and the instillation of an ardent feeling of esprit de corps, but also, and in large measure, through the improvement of the personnel.

There were many veterans and some incompetents of the earlier dispensation in the orchestra when he came to it, who had found in it a "pleasant refuge" for declining years. Many new men came from Europe at his summons,—young men of eager blood, like the "young lions" of the Conservatory orchestra that were the delight of Berlioz in Paris,—for whom the orchestra was not a refuge, but a field for ambitious and energetic labor.

It was a fortunate chance that brought Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Svecenski, Mr. Roth, Mr. Gliese, the Adamowski brothers, Mr. Schuecker, and still others in the earlier years, and that has since added such men as the ill-fated Pourtau and Mr. Longy, to name only a few of many accomplished players who have helped make the Boston Symphony Orchestra admired as "a band of virtuosos." Their coming caused wailing and gnashing of teeth in certain quarters. It is not a pleasant task to dismiss veterans who have deserved well; but it sometimes must be done. Strange though it may seem, it is a difficult undertaking to secure the best men from abroad as orchestral players in the American Promised Land. It stands upon the records that, having heard many aspirants during a certain summer in Europe, one of Mr. Higginson's conductors personally chose and brought over sixteen new men. Every one of them proved quite incompetent and had speedily to be sent back.

The American life, and his strenuous part in it, caused Mr. Gericke, after the season of 1888-89, to return to the quieter atmosphere of Vienna; and to succeed him Arthur Nikisch was summoned from his post of conductor at the Neues Theatre—the municipal opero-house—of Leipsic. He was just then emerging into that fame that has since made him one of the most distinguished, and, it may also be added, one of the most highly paid conductors in the world; but he had not quite arrived at it then, and the series of concerts that he had conducted the previous winter in Berlin had been a disastrous financial failure.

In Boston he did much in the next three years to bring himself into prominence as one of the most original, daring, and intensely subjective of the modern school of conductors—a man who, with certain exaggerations and affectations is illuminated by the living flame of genius. As about his predecessor, so even more about him, was Boston rent into contending factions. So it was also about his successor, Emil Paur, who, having stepped into Nikisch's position at the Leipsic opera, stepped into it again in Boston as one who came to tide over an emergency. For after Mr. Nikisch's contract had been canceled in 1893, under circumstances of some stress and strain, Mr. Higginson fully expected to secure for his orchestra, Dr. Hans Richter. It is not perhaps generally known by how narrow a margin the great Viennese conductor, then as now recognized as one of the most gifted and authoritative in the world, failed to come to this country. He had just had trouble in the intriguing court circles of the Austrian capital, where the strings that direct the management of the Imperial Opera are pulled. He was disgusted and ready to leave Vienna. He had actually signed a contract with Mr. Higginson and was expected in Boston. Then came salve to his wounded feelings, auf hohem Befehl, in the shape of a decoration and an appointment to the post of Hofkapellmeister at the opera on the death of Hellmesberger. So he calmly ignored his American contract and stayed. Mr. Paur exercised a rude, but vigorous sway for five years, when he was succeeded, in 1898, by Mr. Gericke, who returned to a place that had been kept warm in the hearts of his admirers during the nine years of his absence.

It would be wrong to neglect the part that was played in the upbuilding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Franz Kneisel, whom Mr. Gericke took as a lad of twenty from the post of concert-master of Bilse's orchestra in Berlin, and put in the corresponding post in Boston in the autumn of 1885. To the eye of the audience the concert-master—so we somewhat unintelligibly translate the German word Konzertmeister, ignoring the more descriptive French name of chef d'attaque—is the man who plays at the forefront of the first violins at the left of the conductor. He is, in a way, the autocratic conductor's grand vizir, his executive officer, one of his chief means of making effective his wishes; and, where the right relation exists, his best friend and right-hand man. His functions resemble those of a constitutional monarch's prime minister. The king can do no wrong. If all goes well in the orchestra, it is the conductor's achievement; if anything goes amiss, it is very likely to be the concert-master's fault. He must always see that all the instruments are in tune with one another before rehearsals and concerts begin. If there is a misunderstanding between the conductor and a player, the concert-master's good offices are invaluable in setting it right. Few conductors are thoroughly familiar with the details of the technic and the limitations of all the orchestral instruments, their possibilities in the way of phrasing and the production of special effects; for, though most conductors have begun their careers as performers upon some instrument, their playing days are past and they have other things to think of. So, if the conductor gives a direction as to phrasing or accentuation that is impracticable, or if he demands something that cannot be done, the concert-master must be ready, after the rehearsal, to explain to the bewildered or derisive player that he is not to understand thus and so exactly as he thought, but rather this and that, which was what the conductor really meant; and likewise adroitly to intimate to the mistaken autocrat that some slight modification of his desires would be advisable. In case of direst need, should conductor and orchestra lose touch with each other in a public performance, the concert-master must divine the cause of the trouble, and, through his intimacy with the men and his knowledge of the conductor's wishes as well as of the score, bring them together again with the sound of his instrument, at a critical moment more potent than the conductor's stick. Or, should a soloist miss a cue or make a false entrance, he must, if possible, give such a hint or catch up such a missing strand as shall set the unlucky one right. In short, his office is of an importance to the prosperity of the orchestra only less than that of the conductor himself. It may easily be seen how valuable a man of force and tact, of accomplished musicianship and fertile resource, may be in such a place, or how futile one must be who has not these qualities. It is only needful to say that Mr. Kneisel, during the eighteen years he was concert-master, was the very ideal of what a concert-master should be; and that, without services such as his, the Boston Symphony Orchestra could scarcely have attained the perfection it has. The orchestra has at present, in Professor Willy Hess, a player of style, authority, and technical accomplishment, and a man of the vigorous and commanding personality needed for its concert-master—one who is carrying on the best traditions of his office in the economy of the orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the creature of Mr. Higginson's will, and never has been anything else; and if he should choose tomorrow to disband it, it would cease to exist. He has made it what he desired; but he has never interfered with the absolute authority of his conductors, and he has always upheld their hands and met their wishes in a way that has often entailed great and sometimes extravagant expense. Indeed, the price of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has never been measured by the guarantee of salaries and rentals. There was once one of Mr. Higginson's conductors who thought that the tone of the violins—the greatest glory and strength of the organization—would be improved if all the players had instruments of the same make and quality, instead of such as each individual had chosen or been able to possess himself of. Nothing would do, therefore, but that he should send to Germany and import for the score or more of his violinists a set of violins by one maker. The experiment was tried for a time, but the results were not what were expected, and most of the instruments are now packed away in the storeroom, gathering dust.

The terms under which the Boston Symphony players are engaged are very various. The rank and file are for the most part under annual contracts for a season of twenty-nine weeks (of which twenty-four are devoted to the Boston concerts, and five to travelling), at a salary of from thirty or thirty-five dollars a week upward. The chief players—the first violin, or concert-master, and some of the other best violinists, the first cellist, the first performers on the other instruments—receive more, up to an annual salary of five thousand dollars, with engagements of several years. Some receive weekly salaries of various amounts guaranteed for various periods of time beyond the regular season, sometimes as long as forty-five weeks in the year. The conductors have received salaries of about eight or ten thousand dollars.

The contract that each member has to sign requires that he shall have "a good and suitable instrument and keep it, at his own expense, constantly in the best condition"; that he shall "support to the best of his ability all rehearsals and per-performances," and "play to the best of his ability as a musician." He shall comply with the instructions of the conductor as to music, deportment and order; shall play at no balls and at no other orchestral concerts or rehearsals in Boston or elsewhere without permission. There are fines imposed for lateness at rehearsals; five dollars for a period not exceeding fifteen minutes, ten dollars for a longer one, and ten dollars for absence, unless there is sufficient excuse. There are certain penalties and indemnities which Mr. Higginson is entitled to claim on the non-fulfilment of contract stipulations. It may be remarked, however, that the contract is much more severe than Mr. Higginson is; and the pound of flesh is rarely exacted, and then only for the sake of discipline.

Such a thing could never happen, for instance, as happened to Dr. Richard Strauss in New York last spring, when he was rehearsing his enormously difficult "Symphonia Domestica," for the eighth or ninth time with an orchestra supposed to have some claims to at least a season's permanency. An unlucky horn-player made a mistake that the composer had repeatedly corrected at previous meetings, and when Dr. Strauss angrily threw down his baton and reproached the musician for inattention and neglect of his directions, the culprit replied: "But, Herr Doctor, I haven't been here before—I'm a substitute!" Playing in the theatre orchestras is forbidden; but if, in a few occasional instances, it is tolerated, it is because a special necessity is recognized. Many of the players teach; but few beyond the violinists and cellists have that resource open to them. The purpose is—and it is effectively realized—to make the orchestra, during the season, a united body of men with but one main object in view and free to devote themselves to it—following a single director's counsels of perfection, with as little as possible to weary them or to distract them from it. How high an ideal that is, and how few of the great orchestras of the world make any pretence of reaching it, is perhaps not often realized. Mr. Thomas's Chicago orchestra is one of them. The orchestra of the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam is one. Are there many others? The Gewandhaus players in Leipzig, those of the Vienna Philharmonic, and those of the great Paris orchestras have their operative and other duties; the members of the Berlin Philharmonic are subject to the wear and tear of almost daily popular concerts.

But twenty-nine weeks' salary is not enough to support the rank and file of Mr. Higginson's men throughout the year. Hence arose the "Pops" of the early Boston summer time. Not chiefly to supply his fellow-citizens with fantasies on "Carmen," Strauss waltzes, and sarsaparilla, but to lengthen the period of his men's earnings, Mr. Higginson, twenty years ago, began to give a series of concerts of light music in the Music Hall, lasting for eight weeks after the close of the regular season. The leading players take no part in these, except upon one of them is annually bestowed the brief glory of conducting. But even when these eight weeks are ended, the lesser players of the orchestra find that they still have a famine period to reckon with before the rehearsals are taken up again in the autumn. There remains for them the "summer snap," the orchestra of the summer hotel, in which four or five players whom the proprietor proudly advertises as "from the Boston Symphony Orchestra" provide agreeable diversion for the guests. The matter is harmless and unimportant, except for the spectacle of the Musical Union that it has evoked, and that has in recent years increasingly troubled the serenity of the orchestral brotherhood, touching chiefly the interests of the lesser men. Mr. Higginson's position as to the union is very positive. He thinks that unions are an excellent thing; he believes in them—but not in the "closed shop." He is willing that his men should belong to the union, but not that they should compel the unwilling to do so. He has told the players frankly—and they all know that he means it—that if the union undertakes to dictate in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or to interfere in any way with its management or the freedom of its members, he will pay off all hands and disband the organization on the spot. Recent events resulting in the resignation from the union of all of the Symphony men who belonged to it, seem to have relieved this situation.

It might be supposed that, after twenty-three years, everybody who knows the orchestra knows that back of it stands Henry L. Higginson. Yet it was only a few months ago that its manager, Mr. Charles A. Ellis, who with his assistant Mr. F. R. Comee, has guided its fortunes skilfully and in the spirit of Mr. Higginson's purpose from the very beginning received a note from an unknown but ardent admirer of the orchestra, who thought that it was such a very good thing, such a great public benefit, that some rich man like Mr. Carnegie ought to back it up and support it.

Mr. Higginson knew, when he embarked upon the scheme of his orchestra, that it would cost him heavily; and it has. Mr. Higginson has never taken the public into his confidence as to the orchestra's finances, but it may be said on the highest authority that it has cost him as much as $52,000 in a year; that in one season it paid its expenses, and only one though in another it lacked only $2000 of doing so; and that last season, after several more prosperous ones, the deficit mounted up again to $40,000. It may also be said, on the highest authority, that Mr. Higginson has made provision for the continuation of the orchestra on the same lines after his death. Mr. Higginson is not a wealthy man in the modern acceptance of that term, and what the orchestra costs him in money comes out of his annual earnings. What it has cost him in time and trouble, in annoyances great and small, in perplexities, in demands upon his patience, wisdom, and sense of justice, no man may know. He is always accessible to his players, in his busy hours and out of them, and they seldom have shown any hesitation in coming to him as to an unfailing friend, counsellor and guide, or as to a tribune of last resort.

It is in ways such as this that Mr. Higginson's achievements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra have spread their benefits far outside of Boston. He has raised the standard of orchestral playing in this country immeasurably, and has created a taste and a demand for what was unknown before he began his work. He has set Chicago, Philadelphia, Pittsburg and Cincinnati to an emulation of Boston; and has made many good people in New York very uneasy in their desire to do so. He has caused American music to be spoken of with respect and admiration by every European musician. And all the lovers of music in his own country ought to rise up and call him blessed.

JANUARY 13, 1905.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There is little of interest to say about last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the simple reason that it was a most uninteresting "entertainment." Before the concert, one felt like commending Mr. Gericke for giving New Yorkers an opportunity to hear a novelty by a prominent member of the modern French school, but after hearing this work—the second symphony of Vincent d'Indy—one wondered why the conductor had deemed it worth while to try it on more than one audience. The symphony lacks what alone can give life to a work of art—a fount of original melody. Without such melody the utmost ingenuity of orchestration and the most bizarre harmonic effects go for naught, especially if there is no descriptive "programme," such as a piece like this demands. In a scene like that between the infuriated Alberich and Mime in "Siegfried" there is a reason for page after page of unmitigated dissonances: but in a work of absolute music, such discords are out of place. It is the old, old story. "First catch your hare" is the advice given in an ancient cook book. "First catch a melody" is the advice needed by nineteen out of every twenty contemporary composers; but hares are coy and elusive animals.

Johannes Brahms, too, was not an expert hunter in the realm of melody. It was, therefore, depressing to have his second concerto follow the French novelty. There are fragments of melody in this work—especially in the orchestral part of the andante—but far from enough to furnish forth an interminable work in four relentless movements. The piano part is neither brilliant, nor does it give the player any opportunity for emotional expression. It is deficient in dynamic contrasts, too, and Mr. Joseffy emphasized this deficiency, so that some one remarked that the work he played should really be called a "pianissimo concerto." All the more remarkable was the personal triumph of Mr. Joseffy, who was cordially recalled at the end, half a dozen times. It was a delight to hear so consummate an artist, even in so dry a work, for there is a delicacy, a refinement, in his playing that makes it a welcome contrast to the Amazonian thunderings of some other pianists, both of the strong sex and the fair, especially the latter. That Mr. Joseffy may give a recital (with not too much hermit music of the Brahms type) is beyond doubt the ardent wish of all who heard him last night.

Instead of the "Gemoveva" overture, which was to have opened the concert, Mr. Gericke played the deep-felt Schubert funeral march, as a tribute to the late Theodore Thomas, whom Mr. Gericke, in a recent interview, declared to have been "the greatest orchestral conductor in the world." At the other end was the brilliant and stirring "Carnaval" overture of Dvorák. These two short pieces furnished the real musical pabulum of this "symphony concert."

One of the features of Saturday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall will be a set of Brahms waltzes orchestrated by Mr. Gericke. An excellent thing! Maybe the time is coming, after all, when the Strauss waltzes will no longer be tabooed at symphony concerts. Why they should be tabooed is a mystery, for surely Strauss was a better waltz writer than Brahms, as the latter would have been the first to concede. It was he who, at the jubilee of the Waltz King, sent him the opening bars of the "Blue Danube" waltz with the words: "Leider nicht von Brahms"—"Not, alas! by Brahms." And the "Blue Danube" is one of the poorest of the Strauss waltzes.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 1, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS, TRAGIC OVERTURE.

TSCHAIKOWSKY, CONCERTO for VIOLIN.

HUGO WOLF, ITALIAN SERENADE.
(First time.)

HANS HUBER, SYMPHONY in E minor.

Soloist:

Mr. KARL BARLEBEN.

Anton Dvořák
Director of the National Conservatory of Music of America
New York
1877-94

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

In Memory of ANTON DVOŘÁK.

BORN, SEPT. 8, 1841.

DIED, MAY 1, 1904.

DVOŘÁK,

OVERTURE to "Othello," op. 93.

ARIA. "Inflamatus et Accensus," from "Stabat Mater," op. 58.

SUITE for ORCHESTRA, in D major, op. 39.

I. Praeludium (Pastorale): Allegro moderato.

II. Polka: Allegretto grazioso.—Trio: Poco più mosso.

III. Menuet (Sousedská): Allegro giusto.

IV. Romanze: Andante con moto.

V. Finale (Furiant): Presto.

QUARTET, "Quis est Homo" from "Stabat Mater," op. 58.

SYMPHONY No. 5. "From the New World," op. 95

I. Adagio.—Allegro molto. III. Scherzo.

II. Largo. IV. Allegro con fuoco.

Soloists:

Mme. LOUISE HOMER.

Mrs. GRACE B. WILLIAMS.

Mr. THEODORE Van YORX.

Mr. L. B. MERRILL.

Antonín Dvořák
 Director of the National Conservatory of Music of America
 New York
 18th 94

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 15, AT 8. P. M.

Programme.

In Memory of ANTON DVORÁK.

BORN, SEPT. 8, 1841.

DIED, MAY 1, 1904.

DVORÁK,

OVERTURE to "Othello," op. 93.

ARIA. "Inflamatus et Accensus," from "Stabat Mater," op. 58.

SUITE for ORCHESTRA, in D major, op. 39.

I. Præludium (Pastorale): Allegro moderato.

II. Polka: Allegretto grazioso.—Trio: Poco più mosso.

III. Menuet (Sousedská): Allegro giusto.

IV. Romanze: Andante con moto.

V. Finale (Furiant): Presto.

QUARTET, "Quis est Homo" from "Stabat Mater," op. 58.

SYMPHONY No. 5. "From the New World," op. 95.

I. Adagio.—Allegro molto.

III. Scherzo.

II. Largo.

IV. Allegro con fuoco.

Soloists:

Mme. LOUISE HOMER.

Mrs. GRACE B. WILLIAMS.

Mr. THEODORE Van YORX.

Mr. L. B. MERRILL.

OPENS SEASON IN SYMPHONY HALL

Herald ——— P. Hale

Programme of First Concert of Boston Orchestra Chosen in Memory of Anton Dvorak —
Wilhelm Gericke Conductor.

GEORGES LONGY SITS IN ACCUSTOMED SEAT

Selections Exhibit Variety of Work by Composer, Who Died in Prague Last May, Including Stabat Mater Pieces.

The 24th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra began last night with the concert in Symphony Hall. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke was the conductor. Mr. Willy Hess, the new concert master, and Mr. Georges Grisez, the new first clarinet, played for the first time at these concerts. It has been stated in New York, and with an insistence and a passion which now seem pathetic, that Mr. Georges Longy would live in Paris this winter, but the master of the oboe sat in his accustomed seat. Mr. Gericke was warmly greeted, and the audience applauded heartily in the course of the performance.

The programme was chosen as a tribute to the memory of Anton Dvorak, who died at Prague on May 1, the Sunday following the last Symphony concert of last season. This programme was as follows:

Overture, "Othello".....Dvorak
Aria, "Inflammatus," from the "Stabat Mater".....Dvorak
Suite in D major, op. 39.....Dvorak
Quartet, "Quis est Homo," from the "Stabat Mater".....Dvorak
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, "From the New World," op. 35.....Dvorak

"Let us now praise famous men, and our fathers that begat us * * * such as found out musical tunes and recited verses in writing."

It was a good and proper thing to pay tribute publicly in Boston to the memory of Dvorak, not by pomp of spoken praise, not by the reading of papers on Bohemian musicians in general and on Dvorak in particular, but by listening to the composer's music. He then, though dead, spoke for himself; others did not praise with reservation or apology. No one came before him and the hearer.

This tribute was not due to Dvorak simply because he lived for a time in New York, because he taught in this country, because he once visited Boston, because, pleased with plantation tunes, he used some of them or imitated others as thematic material for the symphony performed last night and for two chamber works, one of which was played for the first time in this city. The tribute was one to a composer who knew both poverty and success and was prepared for either fortune; to a composer of indubitable native talent, who at his best said things worth hearing in his own speech; to a patriotic composer, whose name, often based on Bohemian themes and charged with Bohemian spirit, was nevertheless by reason of melody and rhythm and emotional quality universal, not parochial music; to a man of simple, natural honesty in his art and in his life.

The winning and endearing qualities of childhood were in his best music: artless simplicity, irresistible frankness, delight in nature and life. His music was best when it smacked of the soil, when he remembered his early days, the strains of vagabond musicians, the dances dear to his folk. One of a happily primitive people, he delighted in rhythm and color. He was not the man to translate pictures, statues, poems, a system of metaphysics, a gospel of pessimism into music. He was least successful when he would be heroic, mystical, profound. It was an evil day for him when England "discovered" him, patronized him, ordered oratorios from him for her festivals, made him a doctor of music (as though he were a cathedral organist, the composer of a sacred work, "Job's Daughters" in three parts: "Jemima," "Kazia" and "Keren-happuch"), and tried to turn this "Naturmensch" into a drawing room and church celebrity. When Dvorak is dull, he is very dull. His Slavonic Dances and such a song as "Als die alte Mutter" are worth a wilderness of "St. Ludmilas" and "Heldenlieder." And his work as a creative musician was no doubt at an end when he left this country to go back to his beloved Prague.

Some have been inclined to think lightly of Dvorak because his best and vital qualities were recognized by the people. This popularity irritated those who believe that pure art is only for the few—the purists; they forget Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Chopin, Verdi, Wagner, Tschalkowsky. But this popularity was based on the quick recognition of essential qualities; melody, rhythm, color. Slavonic intensity frets the nerves of the genteel, unless they are told by lecturers and other learned men that this intensity has a purpose, an esoteric meaning. Dvorak might have replied to lecturers, essayists, and the genteel in Whitman's words:

Do you guess I have some intricate purpose? Well, I have—for the Fourth-month showers have, and the mica on the side of a rock has. Do you take it I would astonish? Does the daylight astonish? Does the early redstart, twittering through the woods?

Dvorak had his faults and they were tiresome and exasperating. His naivete became a mannerism. Like a child, he delighted in vain repetitions; he was at times too much pleased with rhythms and colors, so that he mistook the exterior dress for the substance and forgot that after all there was little or no substance behind the brilliant trappings. We believe that he will ultimately be ranked among the minor poets of music.

His complete works may gather dust in libraries; but no carefully chosen Anthology will be without examples of his piquancy, strength and beauty in thought and expression.

We prefer now to speak of the composer rather than of this particular programme or of the performance, for the music itself was for the most part familiar to concertgoers, and the first performance of the season is seldom fully abreast of the high reputation of the orchestra. Yet it may be said that the music of this programme showed as in a looking glass the strength and the weakness, the originality of beauty and the platitudinous side of the composer. The Dvorak of the "Othello" overture is a much more sophisticated being than is the singer and dancer of the suite. The mood of Desdemona's prayer music is strongly reminiscent of Verdi's incomparable scene, and Dvorak's Othello is often a Slavonic Moor, not unacquainted with the furiant. The suite reveals the true Dvorak before attempts were made to tame and educate him. Fortunately the symphony is now removed from the field of politics. It may be discussed as music, not necessarily as an argument for or against the possibility of an American school, founded on Congo-American Indian-Creole folk tunes. There is much in it that gives pleasure, there are also pages that seem meretricious and too designedly sentimental.

The quartet of singers was made up of Mrs. Grace B. Williams, Mrs. Louise Homer, Messrs. Theodore Van Yorx and L. B. Merrill. The "Stabat Mater" is not one of Dvorak's best works, and where fragments are thus given the audience is hardly in a sympathetic mood. Here the thought of the virgin's woe was sandwiched between that of a Bohemian dance and that of a plantation breakdown, and the prayer of a worshipper at her shrine followed Othello's murderous deed. Yet the programme perhaps would not have been complete without some exhibition of Dvorak's vocal composition. No singer, however gifted, can make much out of Dvorak's "Inflammatus." In the "Quis est Homo" there is greater vocal opportunity. The quartet was sung with understanding, but the voices were not well balanced.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr Gericke opened the 24th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra with a program in memory of Anton Dvorak, the five selections being of his composition. The members comprised the overture, "Othello"; suite in D-major, the "New World" symphony and two excerpts from "Stabat Mater," the solo "Inflammatus et Accensus" and "Quis est Homo," for quartet. Mrs Louise Homer sang the "Inflammatus" and with Mrs Grace B. Williams, Theodore van Yorx and L. B. Merrill made up the quartet. Symphony hall held the usual concourse of patrons at the rehearsal and concert that have been regular in attendance for many seasons. Mr Gericke was welcomed with the usual polite demonstrations, the orchestra played as it always does, which leaves little or nothing to be desired in the way of interpretation, and the winter's musical feast opened as auspiciously as those of former years. There are but few changes in the personnel of the orchestra, the new concert master, Mr Willy Hess, being the most conspicuous, of course, and so the ensemble work didn't vary from that of the past.

From the nature of the selections, which are quite familiar to patrons of the Symphony concerts, it will be seen that there was little to awaken more than respectful enthusiasm. It was solid, dignified music, rather somber as a whole, with the "New World" symphony the nearest approach to anything frivolous on the program. Mrs Louise Homer, whose rich mezzo-soprano voice has so often been heard and praised in concert and grand opera, sang the "Inflammatus" admirably, and in the "Quis est Homo" the quartet—Mrs Williams, Mrs Homer and Messrs Van Yorx and Merrill—were very satisfactory, for their voices blended well and each performed the solo work commendably.

The "Othello" overture was given with due regard to the nature of the theme—smoothly, with contrasts well preserved and each contingent in harmonious accord. The prayer of Desdemona was beautifully played by the muted strings, and the Othello interruptions, fortissimo and mainly by the full orchestra, displayed to the usual advantage the well-known ensemble playing of the men. The solemn and measured accompaniments to the "Stabat Mater" music were given with good effect, and the understanding between the orchestra and singers appeared to be perfect.

The orchestral suite is so thoroughly characteristic of the Bohemian composer and is so oddly phrased and modulated that there are many musical "surprises" in each of the five parts and the rhythmic changes, unless given perfectly, appear inharmonious and harsh. In this familiar number the various woodwinds may be credited with delightful phrase work, their parts being quite prominent. In the finale the whole orchestra played the elaborate movement as brilliantly and vigorously as one could reasonably wish. The "New World" symphony went about as usual and calls for no special comment.

The new concert master, Mr Willy Hess, will appear as soloist at this week's concerts, playing Joachim's Hungaria concerto for violin. The other numbers will be Beethoven's fourth symphony, scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," Paul Dukas, first time, and the overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser."

THEODORE VAN YORX.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Advertiser Programme, Oct 17 1904
Overture to "Othello," op. 93.....
Aria, "Inflammatus et Accensus," from "Stabat Mater".....
Suite for Orchestra, in D major, op. 39.....
Quartet, "Quis est Homo," from "Stabat Mater".....
Symphony No. 5, "From the New World".....
All by Dvorak.

Soloists: Mme. Louise Homer, Mrs. Grace Williams, Theodore Van Yorx, L. B. Merrill.

"Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more," for the first symphony concert has given the signal for the opening of the musical season. Saturday's programme was a fitting tribute to the memory of the great composer who has passed away so recently. "Othello" given in overture form is, however, by no means Dvorak's strongest work. There is, however, anxiety and apprehension in its first part, also a strong contrast between Othello and Desdemona in the subsequent measures, and, of course, the inevitable catastrophe.

There was a lack of ferocity in the interpretation; the "green-eyed monster" was little more than blue-eyed in this case, and Desdemona was smothered with a lace handkerchief. A luke-warm Moor is as unbearable as a tolerable egg. We can still remember Paur's furious interpretation.

The vocal selections were in a higher school of music. In his "Stabat Mater" the composer has united modern emotional effect with lofty counterpoint. This work and Brahms' "German Requiem" are the loftiest recent expressions of classical music. The "Inflammatus" was finely sung by Mme. Homer; it can, however, never achieve the popular success of Rossini's soprano conflagration on the same subject; it is too noble for that.

The quartette,—"Quis est Homo,"—was also beautiful music, infinitely higher than much of the rickety modern school of Passion. The soprano was too light for the other voices, but all sang with care and good finish.

The Suite was a good contrast to the subtle contrapuntal numbers, for it went frankly into the domain of folk-music. It was read and played with just the right amount of simplicity and directness. The finale was as naively rustic as the old German "Grandfather dance" ("Als der Grossvater die Grossmutter nahm"), which it somewhat resembles. There was some excellent flute-playing in the Romance. Altogether it was good, melodic, enjoyable music, but not very exciting.

The American symphony, which closed the concert, is as beautiful as ever. It is the greatest treatment of plantation music that has yet been achieved, although there was an excellent development of this kind of music in the Scherzo of Chadwick's B flat (second) symphony, some time before we were "discovered" by the Bohemian musician. We wish that this American Scherzo might have a hearing soon again. The work was finely played, and Mr.

Gerike gave a commendable reading of it. We can forgive the comical break of the horn, in the first movement, since the same instrument was excellently used in the Largo which followed. The English horn was very beautiful in the Largo, but it might have been a trifle louder to advantage, and, in the first and last movements of this plantation symphony, the first banjos,—we should say violins,—were especially incisive.

How good it seemed to hear beautiful melody, sweet and intelligible tunes, in a modern orchestral work! We shall, however, have plenty of tuneless music, numbers of orchestral puzzles, a little later on.

Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Orchestra Pays High Tribute To Dvorak

Journal ————— Oct 17 04

Program of Twenty-Fourth Season's Opening Night Devoted to the Works of the Great Musician.

The opening of the season of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony, which has most properly come to mean the beginning of the musical year in Boston, was made the occasion for paying the tribute of art to Antonin Dvorak, whose music formed the entire program. Such recognition was but just, for the eminent Bohemian who died last May, took out of the world with him a great light. Master of melody, a genius in form, a wonderful man in his appeal to the heart, he still lives and will live long.

Unequal, as all geniuses are, Dvorak produced much that we do not care to hear but once; yet for the other things—the glories of his richly dowered nature, we can be grateful without waxing argumentative.

An Interesting Overture.

The "Othello" overture, which had first place on the program, is one of the finer examples of Dvorak's work. It need not, of course, be taken as an accurate tone picture of the killing of Desdemona, for its other significance and title is "Love." But the beauty of the fair wife's prayer, the frenzied entrance of the Moor, the murder and the remorse, are each portrayed with sure touches and great musicianship. The overture is an interesting bit of writing, although giving no special intimation of Dvorak's peculiar national style. It was played rather coldly, and with that lack of emotional "tang" that often descends upon this splendid orchestra. Perhaps there was lack of sympathy with it, perhaps the beginning of the season finds emotion yet unfrozen. At any rate, a more poignant effect might have been made.

The Suite in D contains much of gentle interest rather than of great originality or power. Of the five movements, the polka and the finale are most characteristic and fine. The romance is an over-sweet and dawdling thing, reminding one alternately of that once beloved of the people "The Shepherd Boy," and of the English horn melody in the "William Tell" overture.

Dvorak's Greatest Work.

"The New World" symphony, which came as the benediction, wears so wonderfully well that it warrants the prophecy that it is to be considered the greatest of all Dvorak's orchestral writings. Its composer is now in his grave; dead, too, should be the sneers of those who could not find it in their souls to admire this marvel of life and beauty because, forsooth, they thought that Dvorak intended by it to establish an American school of music. Nothing was

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Twenty-fourth season, first concert.
Louise Homer, Grace B. Williams,
T. Van Yorx and L. B. Merrill,
soloists.

THE PROGRAM.

Overture, "Othello," Op. 93...Dvorak
Solo, "Inflammatus et Accensus," from the "Stabat Mater," Op.
58.....Dvorak
Suite in D major, Op. 39....Dvorak Quartet, "Quis est Homo," from the Stabat Mater," Op. 58.Dvorak
Symphony No. 5, in E minor,
"From the New World," Op.
95.....Dvorak

further from his mind; he gave musical voice merely to certain impressions he received in this country. Yet how truly he painted the picture of the South. In the first movement, who can listen and not hear the modulations of the plantation dardies in the evening? In the exquisite largo, is there not the vision of the bayou in the red of sunset, the odor of the magnolia, as the English horn sings that tender song? After these two movements, the rest is merely pleasant music, but they are as entertaining as anything that modern music can show.

The playing of the symphony was less fine than it has had on other occasions. There was occasional roughness, and a horn phrase in the first movement was cracked and blurred.

Some Vocal Music.

There was vocal music of Dvorak's as befitted an occasion of the kind. Mrs. Louise Homer sang the "Inflammatus" from his "Stabat Mater," a not especially interesting selection. Mrs. Homer's voice is as large as ever and, it seemed, a bit more strident and acidulous than of yore. At all events, it is best fitted for grand opera. The quartet, "Quis est Homo" went very well, although the voices were not perfectly balanced.

OPENING SYMPHONY SEASON.

First Public Rehearsal This Afternoon in Memory of Dvorak—Programme from His Works.

The 24th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, will open this afternoon with the public rehearsal in Symphony Hall. The concert will be in memory of Anton Dvorak. The programme will include his overture to "Othello," which is the third of a series entitled "Triple Overture: Nature, Life, Love," when the work was first produced at Prague at a farewell concert to the composer on the eve of his departure for America. The three overtures, now known as "Nature," "Carnival," "Othello," were performed at the concert given in New York in 1892 as a welcome to the director of the National Conservatory of Music, in which Mrs. Thurber was so much interested. It is said that Dvorak was moved to the composition of "Othello" by the scene of Desdemona's murder in Shakespeare's play.

The other pieces to be performed are by Dvorak, and all are familiar here: The Suite in D major, which includes a Pastorale, Polka, Bohemian Minuet, Romance and Furiant, a genial composition in Dvorak's most characteristic vein, and the symphony "From the New World," which at the time of its production excited controversy concerning the possibility of founding a national school of music on negro-Indian-Creole melodies, and now pleases so many by its tunefulness and marked rhythms.

Mrs. Grace B. Williams, Mrs. Louise Homer, Mr. Van Yox and Mr. L. B. Merrill will sing the quartet "Quis est Homo" from Dvorak's "Stabat Mater," and Mrs. Homer will sing the "Inflammatus" from the same work.

SYMPHONY SEAT AUCTION.

Saturday Evening Concert Sale Maintains Last Year's Prices—Highest Premium $9.50.

The auction sale of $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra was begun yesterday morning in Symphony Hall. Although the company of music lovers present had not diminished, the bidding for these, the least desirable seats in the series, fell off somewhat. However, the prices of of last year were maintained. The highest bid made was $9.50, and the remaining seats sold for an average of an $8 premium.

SYMPHONY TICKETS HEARD, HOTEL TOURAINE

9t(A): o 6

SYMPHONY
TICKETS FOR SALE in all parts of the Hall.
WADSWORTH, 40 State St., Room 53.
Telephone 4235-5. 5t(A): o 4

SYMPHONY TICKET
For Friday afternoons, fine location, G.G.,
No. 7, for sale; price $36.00. Address H.,
P. O. Box 3451, Boston. (A):

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor
NINE CONCERTS

On Thursday Evenings at 7.45, Oct. 27, Nov. 10,
Dec. 1, Dec. 15, Jan. 26, Feb. 9, March 9,
April 6, April 27.

Soloists: MRS. WETHOVD, MR. BACHNER-
MR. HESS, MR. BUONAMICI, MR. ADAM-OWSKI, MR. KRASSETT, and others to be announced.

Season Tickets, $7.00. On sale at Sever's
University Bookstore, Harvard Sq., Saturday, Oct. 22, at 8 o'clock. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests. (A)

Lovers of classical music will find pleasure in the announcement that Mr. Willy Hess, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will continue the string-quartet chamber concerts which have delighted so many of Boston's musical people in past seasons. The Hess Quartet, as it is called, will be made up of Mr. Hess, first violin; Mr. Roth, second violin; Mr. Ferir, viola, and Mr. Krasselt, violoncello. All of these artists, with the exception of Mr. Hess, are well and favorably known here both by their quartet work and as members of the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Hess, while possessing exceptional abilities and large experience as an orchestra leader, comes to Boston with an established European reputation as an artist of the highest merit in quartet and trio work, having led some of the most noted organizations of this character in Europe, and in this connection made many successful continental tours. Mr. Hess has planned a series of six concerts to be given at Jordan Hall on the Monday evenings of Oct. 24, Nov. 28, Jan. 2, Feb. 6, March 6 and April 10. The quartet will be assisted by eminent artists to be announced.

Trans. — Oct. 17, 1904.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

Without the usual preliminary flourish of stray pianoforte or song recitals, on Saturday evening, the musical season in Boston was opened by the first symphony concert of the year, the twenty-fourth of the orchestra's existence. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke is again the conductor of the organization, in the ranks of which there are but two important changes: the accessions of Mr. Willy Hess as concert master and of Mr. Georges Grisez as first clarinet player. This opening concert was, very appropriately, made a memorial to the composer, Anton Dvorak, who died, at his home in Prague, the first day of May. With the assistance of Mrs. Grace B. Williams, Mrs. Louise Homer, Mr. Theodore Van Yox and Mr. L. B. Merrill, the following programme of works by Dvorak was presented:

Overture, "Othello."
Aria, "Inflammatus," from the "Stabat Mater."
Suite in D major, Op. 39.
Quartet, "Quis est Homo," from the "Stabat Mater."
Symphony No. 5, in E minor, from the "New World," Op. 95.

To do honor to the memory of the famous Bohemian composer, who once lived in New York, Mr. Gericke evidently thought it best to bring to a hearing those works with which we are most familiar. From certain points of view, furthermore, the "New World" symphony and the "Othello" overture are among Dvorak's most admirable compositions, both being musicianly, carefully written, logically developed and free from the redundant prolixity to which he was unfortunately prone, to an extent not often found in his earlier, or later, opuses. In the symphony, especially, Dvorak most closely approaches Mendelssohn in excellence of workmanship and mastery of form. So severely has the man been taken to task for his not very exhaustive study of the rudiments of composition, for his leanings toward the trivial in music, and for his general lack of powerful intellect, that Mr. Gericke may well have regarded it as a pious duty, when the time came for honoring his memory, to arrange a concert of works that would show how clearly, logically and intelligently Dvorak could write when he chose. If this was his aim, Mr. Gericke could not have made a more judicious selection.

But almost the entire programme of Saturday displayed the Dvorak who tried to compose music like other people. Of Dvorak, the Bohemian butcher's son, who earned his living by playing for country dances, who listened with keen delight to the legends of old peasant women, who would stand many minutes listening to a hodgepodge sing old songs his mother taught him, of Dvorak the friend of gypsies, of Dvorak the semi-civilized product of a half-barbaric people, of Dvorak the passionate patriot, there was little to be heard Saturday. And yet, surely, it is this Dvorak, who, with subtle feeling for the picturesque, translated into symphonic poems old wives' tales of Bohemia, who set all the world a-dancing with his boisterous rhythms of polkas and furiantes, who wrote down songs that picture for us gypsies and their life, who wrote Biblical songs—breathing forth genuine, honest piety—this Dvorak, one must think, will live through his music long after the accomplished follower of Mendelssohn is forgotten. At the concert in his memory one would gladly have heard certain works that savor strongly of Bohemia.

Since Dvorak wrote and achieved more or less success with choral compositions on a large scale, it was probably necessary that a concert of the character of Saturday's should contain excerpts from these works. Whatever the intrinsic worth of the aria and the quartet from the "Stabat Mater" may be, it was inevitable that on Saturday they should make no effect at all, for an audience cannot at once jump from a consideration of the adventures of Othello to that of the divine mother's sorrows. Nor can one feel that Dvorak himself wrote of these sufferings with the sincerity which he put into the writing of the Biblical songs. The quartet went very smoothly, and Mrs. Homer, in the aria, was much admired for the exquisite purity and skilful handling of her voice. The audience, after welcoming Mr. Gericke cordially, showed no overwhelming interest in the concert.

On Saturday evening next Mr. Willy Hess will make his first appearance in Boston. This is to be the programme: Symphony in B-flat major, No. 4, Beethoven; Hungarian Concerto for violin, Joachim; Scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier," Paul Dukas; overture, "Tannhäuser," Wagner.

R. R. G.

Symphony Tickets

ORDERS FOR SEASON TICKETS PLACED
WITH ME WILL BE EXECUTED WITH CARE AND FOR A SMALL COMMISSION.

Plan of hall and all information sent on request, gratis.

CONNELLY'S Theatre Ticket Office
Adams House
Phone OX. 942
7t(A) s 24

SYMPHONY

Orders for tickets taken by G. F. WADSWORTH, 40 State St., Room 53. P. O. Box 2216. Tel. 4235-5 Main. 4t(A): s 28

SYMPHONY
TICKETS FOR SALE in all parts of the Hall.
WADSWORTH, 40 State St., Room 53.
Telephone 4235-5. 4t(A): o 10

SYMPHONY—Saturday evenings; two end seats in third row, first balcony, centre.
Alternate concerts $9.50 each seat. Address
O.R.E., Boston Transcript. (A):

52

53

Symphony Hall.

---

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

---

II. CONCERT.

---

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22, AT 8, P. M.

---

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY in B flat major, No. 4, op. 60.

I. Adagio; Allegro vivace.

II. Adagio.

III. Allegro vivace. Trio: Un poco meno allegro.

IV. Finale. Allegro ma non troppo.

JOACHIM,

CONCERTO (in the Hungarian manner) for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, op. II.

I. Allegro un poco maestoso,

II. Romanze: Andante; più moto, poco allegretto; allegretto.

III. Finale alla zingara: Allegro con spirito. Presto.

PAUL DUKAS,

SCHERZO, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"
(After a ballad by Goethe.)
(First time.)

WAGNER,

OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser."

---

Soloist:

Prof. WILLY HESS.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.
Symphony in B flat major, No 4.....Beethoven
Hungarian Concerto for Violin.....Joachim
Mr. Willy Hess.
Scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier".....Paul Dukas
(First time.)
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

Let us remember that in 1807 the critics considered Beethoven's Fourth symphony quite as crazy music as the conservatives of today regard "Heldenleben" or the "Sinfonia Domestica" to be. Weber scorned the work and ridiculed it, and many a lesser musician followed his lead. The symphony at this concert was admirably read and not a single repeat was spared. The finale was whipped up to a furious speed. This was well enough for the violins, but when the figure (founded on the first 4 notes) came to the bassoons, they were almost overthrown, while the contrabasses struggled vainly with that sting in the symphony's tail. It was pleasant to notice that the performance was enthusiastically applauded. Beethoven and symphonic form are not fading perceptibly, as yet.

Can any reader imagine the nervous strain of a "first appearance" of a new Boston symphony first violinist! He comes to Boston imagining that he is well in advance of his brother-musicians, and finds a phalanx of artists back of him, each one a soloist of ability, some even of high rank. He has the memory of great predecessors to contend with, and a hall not especially favorable for solo violin effects. Mr. Hess added to these another handicap—a concerto of great length, really a symphony upon the heels of a symphony! He was greeted with so much cordiality that he must have gained courage, if he needed any, and he began the brilliant passages of double-stopping with splendid effect.

Everyone felt, in a moment, that there was a great artist and a thorough musician in the "concertmeister" post this year. Flawless intonation, as sympathetic a tone as the work allowed, excellent work in the high positions, great delicacy of shading in the Romanza—one might give a long catalogue of artistic merits. There was a little lack of breadth in G string work, we thought, but this may have been the instrument or the hall; we shall know definitely when Mr. Hess plays the Bach Chaconne at his string quartette concert.

The concerto ends with a furiously difficult movement, and this was conquered without a trace of blur or of weakness. Spite of the length of the work the audience seemed deeply interested to the very end, and then burst out in wild enthusiasm. A laurel wreath and many recalls (5, we believe,) rewarded the artist.

Next followed the musical tale of an enchanted broomstick, with which Mr. Gericke made a sweeping success. If this is a fair example of his work, Dukas may be the chief of the young French orchestral school. The story told is of a sorcerer's assistant, who, in his master's absence, succeeds in turning a broomstick into a servant to carry water to his bath.

He forgets how to dissolve the spell, and the slave brings bucket after bucket, threatening inundation. He seizes the broomstick and cuts it in 2. All in vain, for now there are 2 servants to bring water! At last the master returns and turns the servants back into a broomstick. This is a very different kind of a water-carrier from Cherubini's; it is fully as effective, in the modern vein, as St. Saens in his "Danse Macabre"; it has the humor of Richard Strauss, which it somewhat resembles.

Not only is Dukas master of his vast orchestral forces, but he presents lucid and graphic ideas. There are several composers now alive who have achieved the acme of orchestral coloring, but, of these, only a few—Strauss, Hausegger, etc.—have strong musical thoughts back of their powerful instrumentation. We hope that Dukas may be added to the list.

The interpretation was excellent. Mr. Gericke is a wonderful master of the minutiae of these complex modern works, as well as a great classical conductor. His reading of "Don Quixote" last year, for example, brought out some points of the picture better than the composer himself was able to do. There was nothing lost of the meaning of the work at this concert.

One heard the broomstick give a few bassoon grunts and come to life; equally graphic was the cutting in 2 of the waterman; easily grasped, also, the return of the magician and the disenchantment of the stick. A musical joke as graphic as "Tip Eulenspiegel" and a splendid contribution to the repertoire of humorist music.

In listening to the noble performance of the "Tannhauser" overture, we could not but think that the Wagner of "Tannhauser" was greater than the Wagner of "Parsifal." Wagner himself affected to look down upon this early work, but the world at large will not share his opinion.

There is not, in "Parsifal," any climax as great and intense as the final entrance of the Pilgrim's chorus in this overture. Like "Parsifal," too, this overture draws a sharp contrast between religion and vice, between purity and sensuality; the scheme of the "Tannhauser" overture would make a perfect introduction to the later opera, and a more powerful one than it possesses at present.

How our orchestra plays this work, how the woodwind shivers, the flutes trill, the trombones blare and the violins give their descending hailstorm of chromatics, every Boston concert-goer knows.

Louis C. Elson.

A NEW SCHERZO AT SYMPHONY

For Its Second Concert the Famous Orchestra Produced "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Paul Dukas, with Success.

WILLY HESS MADE
FIRST APPEARANCE

Was Cordially Welcomed and Made Favorable Impression — Presented with Wreath—Whole Performance Polished.

The programme of the second Symphony concert given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Symphony in B flat, No. 4.....Beethoven
Hungarian Concerto for violin.....Joachim
Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice".....Dukas
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

Paul Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" is now seven years old—at least it was first played at Paris in 1897. Theodore Thomas' orchestra has played it twice in Chicago, and Mr. Van der Stucken produced it in Cincinnati last season. The composer, who was born at Paris in 1865 and studied at the conservatory of that city, has written comparatively little, but that little has excited attention and commanded respect: an overture to "Polyeucte"—two other overtures have not been published—a symphony, and a formidable piano sonata that takes 40 minutes in performance even when the pianist is urged to do his best.

All these works are eminently serious. But Mr. Dukas, like many serious persons, has his light moments. The "Sorcerer's Apprentice" is his best joke.

It is a musical illustration of Goethe's ballad of the same name, the story of the apprentice who, in the absence of his master, tried to work one of his more remarkable tricks, that of turning a broom into a water-carrier, and by not knowing the words to end the spell was nearly drowned. The tale is a pleasant one, and it was told still more delightfully by Lucian, the satirist, centuries before Goethe. Where did Lucian hear it, or who told it before him?

Dukas has made a singularly picturesque and effective transliteration into music. Many young Frenchmen have glib and colored orchestral expression, but, unfortunately, their thought is insignificant or scrappy. Dukas has striking thoughts, the gift of developing them logically; he is clear even when he is most fantastic in his orchestral speech, and, above all, he has fancy and imagination. There is no attempt at mosaic work; there is no inter-linear translation.

"You know the poem?" asks the composer; "now what do you hear in this?"

After the introduction which prepares the mood for witchcraft of haunted Thessaly or of mysterious Egypt, the spell works, and the chief theme, developed, varied, swells with the wretched apprentice's terror, and then enters the vexed and saving sorcerer. The spell is broken. The broom is again a broom.

The scherzo was played brilliantly and Mr. Gericke is to be thanked for producing here this excellent example of the better modern French school and congratulated for the performance itself.

Mr. Willy Hess, the new first concert master, made his first appearance in America since he attained man's estate. When he was 10 years old he played here in Music Hall with Theodore Thomas' orchestra (in 1869), as "Master Willy Hess." He chose last night Joachim's "Hungarian" concerto, a very long and for the most part labored and tedious work. Mr. Listemann, who delighted in Herculean feats, played the whole of it at a symphony concert in 1881.

Insatiable violinist! Could not one movement suffice?

Messrs. Kneisel and Winternitz were more discreet and compassionate; they were content with one movement. But perhaps Mr. Hess wished to perform a pious duty in honoring his master, Joachim.

Mr. Hess, who was cordially welcomed and heartily applauded after each movement, made a most favorable impression in spite of the handicap of the concerto itself. He displayed the confidence and the agility of the virtuoso and the phrasing and the musical intelligence of the experienced concert master. The music did not call for, did not allow, in fact, any exhibition of deep emotion, but whenever there was opportunity, there was a display of amiable sentiment without trickery or exaggeration. The violinist was presented with a wreath.

The symphony was played with the care bestowed by Mr. Gericke on all classic compositions, and the performance, as a whole, was polished and yet vital. The finale was taken with much spirit. The ever stirring overture to "Tannhauser" brought the close.

The program of the concert this week will be as follows: Overture to "Oberon," Weber; concerto in F minor No. 2 for piano, Chopin (Mr. de Pachmann, pianist); three sonata movements, Bach (scored by Mr. Gericke); symphony in E major, op. 14, Suk (first time).

SYMPHONY

Tickets for sale in all parts of the hall.

WADSWORTH

40 State St., Room 53.

Telephone 4235-5 Main.

MUSICAL.

Willy Hess Soloist at Symphony Concert.

Last Week of "Parsifal" in English at Tremont Theatre.

Recitals of Note Soon to Be Given Here.

Blake Oct 23-1904

The second Symphony program introduced the new concert master as soloist, Prof Hess playing the Joachim Hungarian concertos for violin, a work so difficult and long that one of those movements usually serves as a solo number for a violinist. The other selections included Beethoven's wonderful fourth symphony, a scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas, given for the first time at these concerts, and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture. A Symphony audience evinces but little enthusiasm for a soloist unless the artist displays abilities of unusual merit and although anyone to become a concert master must necessarily be a man of very high musical attainments, and especially so to become associated with Mr Gericke's orchestra, but few in the audience expected a performance of Joachim's concerto that would create a sensation. A more spontaneous and overwhelming tribute of appreciation is seldom heard at these concerts than that which greeted Prof Hess after each movement of the concerto, culminating at the close in demonstrations which evidently embarrassed the performer, who was called and recalled to the platform amidst showers of plaudits from auditors and the members of the orchestra.

Evidently nervous during the orchestral introduction the new violinist showed no traces of trepidation as soon as his work began, and then for more than a half hour he was master of himself, and held his auditors spellbound by a wondrous art which at a single performance established him in the foremost rank of violin virtuosos of the present day. He is an artist combining grace with dignity, sentiment and power, with a strong masculine style, with every difficulty in fingering thoroughly mastered, a tone big, resonant and pure, and, in short, a man whose musical endowments seem liberal enough to compass successfully the whole field of violin literature.

He played the immensely intricate concerto with full appreciation of its beauty, its strength and suggestions of barbaric nature. The breadth of the first movement was splendidly shown, the romantic daintiness of the second part was an exquisite exploitation of the composer's ideas and the queer, rapid staccato scoring of the last movement was brought out with a crispness and clarity that was very effective in its dynamic variations. His three and four-finger chord passages and double stops in the first movement were in perfect harmony, the lighter and lightning like jumps and runs in the second part, in single fingerings chiefly, showed no deviations from pitch, and throughout the whole performance his playing was free and without exaggeration despite the fact that forte and piano passages are very frequent and call for great arm power. He is an artist whose advent adds dignity to the season's concert schedule, and his coming appearances at the head of the Boston Symphony quartet will be welcome events.

The orchestra played very beautifully with Prof Hess, making the performance of the concerto a memorable one. The ever-welcome Beethoven symphony, which opened the program auspiciously, and the "Tannhauser" overture were each given in splendid style, especially the former, which appeared to be faultless in interpretation. The Dukas scherzo is a grotesque piece, pleasing in spots, but not particularly interesting except as an illustration of the skill of the modern composer in arranging orchestral effects that a few years ago would hardly pass muster as harmonious combinations. It was played admirably.

Vladimir de Pachmann will be the soloist this week, playing Chopin's F minor concerto for piano. Joseph Suk's E major symphony will be given for the first time at these concerts and the other numbers will be the overture of Weber's "Oberon" and Mr Gericke's orchestration of three movements by Bach.

Symphony Seats For Sale To Rent
CONNOLLY'S TICKET OFFICE
ADAMS HOUSE
Phone Oxford 942.

tc(A) o 8
SYMPHONY TICKETS
HEARD, HOTEL TOURAINE
9t(A): o 6

SYMPHONY TICKET FOR SALE
Season ticket, Friday afternoons, end seat, third row, centre section first balcony; price $24. Address R.E. Boston Transcript. (A)

SYMPHONY
TICKETS FOR SALE in all parts of the Hall.
WADSWORTH, 40 State St., Room 53.
Telephone 4235-5. 4t(A): o 10

SYMPHONY TICKETS
A few excellent locations at reasonable rates.
Apply to MR. HARDING, 137 Milk St.
SMW(A): o 8

SYMPHONY TICKETS
Exceptional locations; left balcony only; aisle seats. Apply Mr. HARDING, 137 Milk St.
2t(A): o 19

SYMPHONY
Two Saturday evening tickets for sale, $30 each; Rear Row, First Balcony. Address S.C.L., Boston Transcript. (A):

Violinist Of High Rank Is Professor Willy Hess

Journal Oct 24, 1904

His First Appearance as a Soloist Crowned With Success Despite His Choice of the Joachim Concerto.

What a naive and simple thing is the fourth Beethoven symphony with which Mr. Gericke began the second concert of the Symphony Orchestra. How artless its prattle, how sweetly garrulous and poetically tender its romancing. Almost the weakest of the nine sisters, it still has the right to be called great if for its beauty alone. Not once after the rather solemn introduction does it strike under the most suave emotions, but such as it is we can afford to welcome it—not too often. The reading was in Mr. Gericke's gentlest style—one might almost say genteel. A pretty performance, but not eminently Beethovenish.

Mr. Hess, the new concertmeister, who made an excellent impression so far as could be judged from his impersonal work in the first concert, lost no time in coming before his Boston public as a soloist. And he chose that ponderous, unimaginative, machine-made thing, the Joachim violin concerto "in the Hungarian manner." Appalling in length, generally dull and unattractive, it is bestrewn with difficulties that are scarcely worth while.

Yet Mr. Hess made it almost interesting, and thus triumphed emphatically. He has a refined, yet powerful tone, a clean-cut mastery over technical matters, an earnest style that might, as a moment or two in the andante showed, become poetic if opportunity should present itself. He is not a virtuoso, in the showy and popular sense; he is a violin player of high rank, a man to whom art seems more than the plaudits of a crowd. Of these latter, however, he received full many, as well as a huge wreath, and he may feel perfectly that he has made a success. Of the accompanying work of the orchestra, it need only be said that it was occasionally more ragged than one would expect of such a body of men.

The scherzo of Paul Abraham Dukas, the French composer, whose works are very little known in this country, is a curious bit of program music, wierd, but not grotesque, distinctive in its approaches to melody, fascinating in its

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Twenty fourth season; second concert, Oct. 22, 1904. Professor Willy Hess, soloist.

THE PROGRAM:

Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Op. 60..... Beethoven
Concerto (in the Hungarian manner) for violin and orchestra, Op. 11..... Joachim
Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," ..... Dukas
(After a ballad by Goethe—first time.)
Overture to "Tannhauser"...Wagner

main theme and enormously clever in a technical way. It is frankly a musical picture; the sorcerer's apprentice, in the absence of his master, decides that he, too, can work magic. He knows just enough to command a broomstick to fetch water, but not enough to stop the performance. So he is half-drowned before his chief returns and breaks the aqueous spell. All this is told with jocular rhythm, odd uses of the woodwind, a wild whirl of brass and strings and some bits of color that, of course, might mean anything, but which, when one knows, are pretty well adapted to the illusion. The piece was played in masterly fashion. Here shows at its best the great technique of our orchestra.

The splendid "Tannhauser" overture, that made a glowing finale to the concert, once more proved how absolutely unimpaired by age is the genius of Wagner. Yesterday, today and tomorrow he is without a peer.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

On Saturday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, gave their second concert of the season. The occasion was unusually interesting because Mr. Willy Hess, the new concert-master, made his first appearance here. This was the programme:

Beethoven: Symphony in B-flat major, No. 4, Op. 60.
Joachim: Concerto (in the Hungarian manner) for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 11.
Paul Dukas: Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," (After a ballad by Goethe.) (First time.)
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhauser."

The programme contained a work played here for the first time, Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," after a ballad by Goethe. This ballad rehearses in poetical form an ancient tale of a sorcerer's apprentice who, one day when his master was abroad, himself undertook to practise the magic art. At first all went well; a broom in the corner, promptly obeying his magical words, hastened to the well to fetch a pail of water. Again and again it went to the well for water, and its course could not be arrested, for the sorcerer's boy had learned no formula that would serve. By good fortune, however, for the world, at all events, if not for the apprentice, the aged warlock returned to his house in time to save too much of a flood, and, by the use of the proper words of enchantment, the broom once more became a broom, with only a broom's attributes.

Although Dukas has written other works that have been produced in Paris concerts of importance, in Boston he can be judged only by his scherzo. For the opportunity of hearing it we must be grateful. Orchestral music at present so largely consisting of doubtful experiments, it is a distinct pleasure once in a way to hear a composition manifestly written for the sole purpose of pleasing. The scherzo is indeed delightful to listen to, even if it attempts no more than to give a musical impression of a picturesque episode. No effort has been made to deplete details of Goethe's ballad through music. But the composer Dukas is evidently a man who possesses imagination. He has at his command, furthermore, remarkable skill at writing for a large modern orchestra. His scherzo, therefore, very properly opening with a cleverly suggested air of mystery and enchantment, soon develops into a rushing, whirling movement that presents a lively picture of the silly boy's adventure. For music of this simple, pleasure-giving nature, written with technical skill and imaginative feeling, let us be thankful. The scherzo was brilliantly played.

So was the "Tannhäuser" overture, remembered from last season as one of Mr. Gericke's highest achievements. This year it went still more excitingly than last, the chorus with great dignity, the Venus music passionately, all with splendid rhythm and rich tone; in short, a triumph of orchestral playing.

The lovely Beethoven symphony, on the other hand, proved disappointing. A large share of the time devoted to the preparation of this concert was spent, perhaps, on the new scherzo, at the expense of the symphony. Whatever the cause, at all events, the symphony was performed without the needful animation, without the keenness of rhythm that made the playing of the overture remarkable, and with decidedly more of prose than of poetry in its interpretation. Yet this symphony, surely, is worthy of high pains.

Mr. Hess, for his first performance here, was so ill-advised as to play Joachim's Hungarian concerto, a composition exceptionally dull and of inordinate length. So long is it, in fact, that other violinists, notably Mr. Winternitz, have been content with one movement from it. From his playing of a work of this calibre it is difficult to judge of Mr. Hess's musical characteristics. It is clear, however, that he is an artist of highly developed technique, with a strong tone and brilliancy of execution—a musician of intelligence and energy. His success with the audience was immediate and great. It will be interesting to hear Mr. Hess in more worthy music than the concerto by Joachim.

At the coming concert Mr. de Pachmann is to play. This will be the programme: Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Three Movements (orchestrated by W. Gericke), Bach; Concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, Chopin; Symphony in E major, op. 14 (first time), Joseph Suk. R. R. G.

Trans.

Given an afternoon of November's best blend of sunshine and shadow and Jordan Hall, and last and best of all de Pachmann, and musical Boston has a period of rare enjoyment. For admirers of this pianist are many here and when, yesterday, they generously and handsomely demonstrated their admiration, it seemed that he must have been gratified by it, accustomed or even hardened as he may be to the world's approval. And then there is the approval that he bestows upon himself which must after all be the most satisfying to him. He can't help knowing what goes to make a master of the piano and it would be impossible for him not to realize that he complies with all the requirements, and his manner of showing to an audience that he possesses this knowledge is so naive, so purely impersonal, that it but makes his charm the more complete. The intimacy he maintains with his hearers is unique, and is no more to be attained by other pianists than his work is to be approached by them.

New York audiences, as well as the critics, went quite wild over the Boston Symphony orchestra performances last week, and especially over the new concert master, Willy Hess. A leading conservative critic says: "Mr. Gericke has renewed his temperament. He is striking fire afresh. He has become elastic and even gay. The band showed all its old virtues at their clearest and fullest. Never did it seem a more responsive or flawless instrument." And again, to quote from the same authority: "Since Cesar Thomson played in America 10 years ago there has been no such display of the technique of brain and temperament in contrast to that of mere manual dexterity as Willy Hess shows." With all this fresh testimony, the first of the Boston Symphony quartet concerts at Jordan Hall tomorrow night, with Mr. Hess for leader, will be an especially marked occasion, and that the pick of the musical and society contingent will fill every seat goes without saying.

SYMPHONY MEN RESIGN FROM UNION

Journal — Nov. 5, 1904

Twenty-Seven Musicians Said to Have Left the Protective Association in a Body.

NOT RESULT OF DURESS

Union Had Excepted Famous Band in Regard to Playing With Non-Members.

There was great surprise in musical circles yesterday when it leaked out that twenty-seven members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had resigned from the Boston Musicians' Protective Union, a local of the American Federation of Musicians. No word of affirmation for this statement could be secured, however, from President Fred Kingman of the union or Maj. H. L. Higginson, representing the owners of the orchestra. At the present time the orchestra is out of town and will be back Sunday.

President Kingman was seen by a Journal reporter yesterday afternoon. He said that at the present time he was not at liberty to say whether the men had resigned. It is always the custom for such matters to be referred to the executive committee before they come before the union as a whole. He says that if the men feel that they can better themselves they have the right to withdraw, but even if this is the case he does not think that there will be anything like a wholesale resignation of members as some say. Maj. Higginson says that this is a matter for the players to decide, and as far as he can see it is not of his business. It has not been called to his attention officially as yet.

At the present time the Symphony Orchestra has been looked upon by the union as being different from the others and union men were allowed to play with non-union men in that orchestra but not in others, but there has always been the most harmonious feeling between the members of the orchestra and the union. There are a few large orchestras, however, that offer good money that are barred by the union, and it may be that this action on the part of the symphony players will bring about a change so that these will be recognized by the union so that union men can play with non-union men where the compensation is sufficient.

NO TROUBLE IN SYMPHONY RANKS

Players in This Famous Orchestra Not Dissatisfied with Conditions Regarding Their Employment and Its Relation to Membership in the Musicians' Union

Trans. — Nov. 2, 1904

A report of trouble in the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra players, stirred up, so it is said, by the Boston Musicians' Union, lacks all foundation of truth, according to Major Henry L. Higginson, who states that, so far as the management of the orchestra knows there is no unpleasantness or dissatisfaction on the part of the members. The orchestra has begun its season under especially favorable conditions, and everything points toward a continuance of these.

The report probably arose and received exaggeration from the fact that one member of the orchestra refused to join the union, and it further was told that the other members refused to continue in the orchestra on this account. So far as the management of the orchestra knows, there are few members of the orchestra now belonging to a union, at least none of the more important players belong, and if any of the less well-known players do belong they are not making the fact evident or expressing any dissatisfaction at this time.

All the men are under a strong contract made with Major Higginson, and it is improbable that any outside considerations or inducements would actuate them in breaking these contracts or resigning from the orchestra. Nowhere else, in any musical body, could they hope to be so well situated as in the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. All the men well realize this condition, and they are loyal to Major Higginson. Those best informed say that, in event of any trouble arising to affect the interests of the performers, they would not hesitate, providing they are members of any union, to withdraw from such membership rather than sacrifice their chances in the orchestra. Major Higginson knows that several members of the orchestra have resigned from the union, in which they paid annual dues and derived very little advantage or benefit from such membership.

TWO SYMPHONY REHEARSAL SEATS
FOR $25 EACH, No. 4 and 5 in row E on the floor. Please address M. C. G., Boston Transcript. (A)

BALCONY SEATS, A-39, 40, RIGHT
FOR THE SYMPHONY REHEARSALS FOR SALE. Price $20 each. Kindly address G.T.S., Boston Transcript. (A)

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL SEATS, EE-20-
21 may be secured at $29 each for the balance of the season if taken at once. Address D. O. F., Boston Transcript. (A)

Vladimir de Pachmann
29. XI. 98.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

WEBER,

OVERTURE to "Oberon".

BACH,

THREE MOVEMENTS.
Orchestrated by W. GERICKE.

CHOPIN,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in F minor, No. 2.
op. 21.

- I. Maestoso.
- II. Larghetto.
- III. Allegro vivace.

JOSEPH SUK,

SYMPHONY in E major, op. 14.

- I. Allegro ma non troppo.
  - II. Adagio.
  - III. Allegro vivace.
  - IV. Allegro.
- (First time.)

Soloist:

Mr. VLADIMIR De PACHMANN.

The Pianoforte is a Baldwin.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

Vladimir de Pachmann
29. XI. 98.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

WEBER,

OVERTURE to "Oberon".

BACH,

THREE MOVEMENTS.
Orchestrated by W. GERICKE.

CHOPIN,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in F minor, No. 2.
op. 21.
I. Maestoso.
II. Larghetto.
III. Allegro vivace.

JOSEPH SUK,

SYMPHONY in E major, op. 14.
I. Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Adagio.
III. Allegro vivace.
IV. Allegro.
(First time.)

Soloist:

Mr. VLADIMIR De PACHMANN.

The Pianoforte is a Baldwin.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Weber, Overture to "Oberon." am
Bach, Three movements.

Orchestrated by W. Gericke.

Chopin, Concerto for pianoforte in F minor,
No. 2.

Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann.

Joseph Suk, Symphony in E major, op. 14
(First time).

It was in some degree a conservative concert, given entirely by an orchestra that did not exceed the classical proportions. Suk's symphony, to be sure, added trombones, piccolo and tuba, but there were none of the extra instruments with which modern colorists expand their scores. It was conservative in its forms and melodies too, until Mr. Suk became the "enfant terrible" of this happy family, and began alternately crashing and whispering in a rather sensational manner. But even he did not depart from the accepted sonata form, so that this enjoyable programme may go on record as being almost free from puzzling vagaries and ultra-modern innovations.

The overture was most brilliantly played, and we may speak a word of commendation for the clarinette work, which is fairly prominent in this composition. Weber and Mendelssohn were the real discoverers of what the clarinette could do, although Mozart introduced it first into the symphonic orchestra.

The Bach movements were calm and reposeful counterpoint scored in just the right spirit by Mr. Gericke. The first movement was the gem of the set, and the Siciliano the least important and attractive. Such music is never fully appreciated by a large audience, it is for the select few, the "cognoscenti," yet it was heartily applauded and the earnest orchestrator and conductor recalled with much enthusiasm at its end. Mr. Gericke has certainly caught the spirit of the old numbers.

The chief point of the concert was the appearance of De Pachmann. The concerto that he played is one that we do not often hear, and it cannot be given at its best in a very large hall. But in spite of handicaps the great artist made an entire success. He is the perfect master of the "rubato," of that elastic tempo which is the life and soul of Chopin, and the orchestra seconded this freedom of movement splendidly. It meant more than a perfunctory compliment when the pianist shook hands with the conductor at the end of the work, for such an ensemble was almost miraculous when the unfettered vein of the interpretation is considered.

De Pachmann was never mawkish or weakly sentimental, not even in the slow movement, where there is some danger of sugar-coating the love sentiments which Chopin here poured out to Constantia Gladkowska. The finale was brilliant and exciting. Occasionally there was more of loudness than one is accustomed to associate with this flimsily scored work. It may be remembered that Chopin was anything but a master of the orchestra, and although the score has been tinkered at, and improved, by Tausig, Klindworth and Burmeister, the composition still remains rather a piano solo with occasional orchestral support than a true concerto, which should be first of all symphonic.

De Pachmann played from notes, a proceeding so unusual that it ought to be recorded. It is a plan which has much to commend it. Why should the pianist be forced to display his memory as well as his technique in such a performance? Placing the music on the rack is much better than placing the musician there. Many an artist is made unnecessarily nervous by the preconceived idea that he must discard reference to the printed music in his performance.

De Pachmann was recalled again and again with great and thoroughly deserved enthusiasm. It was a memorable performance.

Suk's new symphony was largely in the accepted form, yet it had its hazardous attempts at originality. The pupil and son-in-law of Dvorak once in a while imitates his leader, as in the melancholy theme of the adagio, which suggests the English horn of the American Symphony. But, on the whole, the new composer is not an imitator. He has a tendency to military grandeur and to very sharp contrasts. He serves up tender melodies alternated with fierce martial progressions. Sometimes there is great power displayed. The very free Scherzo, for example, is grotesque rather than playful, and is so intense that it might have been danced by "Sans-culottes" around the guillotine. Nor are phrases of terror wanting; terror as abject as might exist in a Russian war fleet on meeting a fishing vessel.

Without enjoying the entire symphony, the reviewer can pay tribute to its earnestness and to its greater moments. Its lack of coherent development is its chief fault, but Suk is a young composer who may go very far, and his efforts to combine modern passion with classic form deserve recognition and commendation.

Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Exceptional locations; left balcony only; aisle seats. Apply Mr. HARDING, 137 Milk St.
2t(A): o 19

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Two seats for alternate concerts; second row, first balcony, centre; $19 for both. W. H. Box 341, Boston. (A):

SYMPHONY

Rehearsal and Concert Tickets for sale or to rent. WADSWORTH, 40 State St., Room 53. Telephone 4235-5 Main. 4t(A): o 18

2 SYMPHONY SEATS

FOR SALE—Evening concerts, "R" Centre. sell at sacrifice, party going abroad. Apply 20 India Square. Tel. 5243 Main. 2t(A): o 28

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Two aisle seats in left lower balcony; very desirable; cheap. Address R. E. T., Boston Transcript. 2t(A): o 28

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT IS HELD

Herold

Reappearance of Mr. Vladimir de
Pachmann Hailed by Boston
Music Lovers—Triumph He Achieved Is Overwhelming.

The programme of the third Symphony concert, given last night, under
Mr. Gerlicke's leadership, was as follows:

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Three movements.....Bach-Gericke
Concerto in F minor No. 2.....Chopin
Symphony in E major.....Suk
(First time.)

Mr. de Pachmann played last night at a symphony concert in Boston for the first time since 1891. His last visit here as a giver of recitals was in 1900.
During the last four years his triumphs in foreign cities have been many and distinguished. Last night his triumph was overwhelming.

There is no pianist like him. There is no pianist who has such an exquisite, marvellous touch, and after all that may be said about intellectuality, the nobility of conception, astounding tech-nic, etc., the first and chief distinguishing characteristic of the truly great pianist is touch. There is no touch like that of this interpreter of Chopin; the terms "velvet," "pearl," "liquid"—there are here inexpressive. Tones played by de Pachmann are music without regard to any relation to the phrase. They haunt by their beauty. This pianist also excels in spontaneity and continuity of song. A phrase of Chopin, to borrow a fine thought of Hazlett inspired by a Mozartian melody, when it is invoked by de Pachmann, comes from the air and then returns. The fingers work the spell; but when the phrase is heard, the effect is not as one produced by mortal hands.

The melancholy song—one of eternal passion, eternal pain—floats and is sustained; it takes its flight, and is lost;
yet, through the mysterious artistry of the pianist, the hearer longs for its return, and in its return the song is still more beautiful in its expression of longing and sadness than before. Incomparable touch, continuity of heart-melting song—and rhythm, which, however capricious it may seem at times, is as the rhythm of Nature—these qualities make the performance of de
Pachmann pre-eminent.

But this pianist of extraordinary gifts and acquisitions will soon give a series of recitals here, and further analysis or eulogy—the terms in this instance are convertible—must be deferred for the present. It is enough to say that the performance was memorable, and that the enthusiasm of the audience was at its height.

Josef Suk's symphony was played here for the first time, and it was played with extreme brilliance. The composer was a pupil of Dvorak, and he married a daughter of his teacher. It is not, therefore, surprising to find here and there the spirit of the late composer in this symphony; and, as Dvorak worshipped Schubert, there are also suggestions of that lyric writer, especially in the first movement, which is strongly thought and euphoniously expressed. If the spirit of Dvorak be in this music, it is the spirit of Dvorak, careful and prudent, rather than reckless and throwing about dance-phrases and folk-tunes as a madman scattering firebrands.

The second movement, a series of variations, is the least interesting and the most labored. When a modern symphonist comes to his variations we tremble for him, as Cobbett trembled for the user of adjectives. Such in the slow movement is scholastic, not imaginative; while in the first and third movements he displays fancy, at least, if not the higher quality. The symphony is not one to be dismissed carelessly. It has strong pages; there is often the expression of genuine individuality.

When Mr. Gerlicke's orchestral version of movements from chamber music by Bach was first played here, some objected to the liberty taken with the old master. We doubt whether this objection would be made seriously today. It is now not blasphemous to say that Bach wrote an enormous amount of music, both vocal and instrumental;
that a good deal of it is perfunctory, built after a fixed pattern, dull; that much of the music composed for solo voices is more effective when played by instruments, and that certain instrumental airs might well be sung.
All but hardened fetishists will applaud
Mr. Gerlicke's orchestration, which is ingenious, mindful of the ancient period, effective.

The performance of the orchestra throughout was of a very high order of excellence.

The programme of the concert of Nov.
12 will be as follows: Haydn's symphony in E-flat major, No. 1; Vieuxtemps' concerto for violin, No. 4, in D minor (Mr.
Hakon Schmedes violinist); introduction to act 1 of "Guntram," R. Strauss; Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice."

SYMPHONY MEN RESIGN

Twenty-Seven Give Up Membership in Musical Union.

Twenty-seven members of the Boston
Symphony Orchestra resigned their membership in Boston Musicians' Protective Union yesterday. It is stated in musical circles today. President Kingman of the union absolutely refused to either affirm or deny the report that the resignations were presented yesterday and were accepted by the union. He said a statement might be issued by the union in a week or so. It is also said that every member of the union who plays in the Symphony Orchestra will resign from the union.

MUSICAL.

Star

De Pachman Soloist at Symphony Concert.

The soloist at the third rehearsal and concert by the Symphony orchestra was the celebrated pianist Vladimir de Pachmann, who played the second piano concerto by Chopin. The other numbers were three selections from chamber music by Bach, orchestrated by Mr.
Gerlicke; Weber's overture to his "Oberon" and Josef Suk's E major symphony. De Pachmann's fame as an interpreter of Chopin's works rests upon such artistic grounds that to many people there is no pianist his peer in this particular field, and in this music
he is at his best. To hear him play Chopin is to hear Chopin played probably more satisfactorily on the whole than by anyone else, especially, when,
as was the case in the second concerto, works in the more delicate and lighter mood are performed. At the concerts there were but few of Mr de Pachmann's peculiar mannerisms and affectations shown, and as the eminent artist appeared to be in exceedingly good humor there was nothing to mar
the effect of his superb playing.

As the concerto gives but little opportunity for any exhibition of strong emotional power, being mainly written in a gentle and delicate vein, it was for many years very prominent in the repertory of women pianists; but it is in this style of composition that de Pachmann is specially fascinating, and his playing was as wonderfully crisp and impeccable in accuracy and celerity in execution as of yore, and showed no loss in finish of phrasing, technique, sweetness, exquisite tonal coloring and velvet-like daintiness in fingering. His orchestral support was very fine, especially in the second movement, in which the muted strings furnished a beautifully shaded accompaniment. The audience was very cordial in its reception of the artist.

The Bach excerpts were taken from sonatas for clavier and flute, flute and violin and flute; andante, Siciliano and rondeau. In his orchestration Mr Gerlicke has preserved admirably the characteristics of Bach. The first is rather precise in form, the second is a flowing melody with muted strings, accentuated strongly at times, and the third is a series of short dancing refrains, some, of which have several repetitions. They are pleasing bits of compositions, and the orchestra gave them with good effect.

The Suk symphony changes in the first movement from pastoral to an entirely different tone picture at the end. The second part is composed of some pretty idyllic material, with delicate song phrases given to the clarinet, and later to other wind instruments; the third movement is very gay and blithe-some, and the final part is puzzling

in its frequent changes in rhythm, modulations and tonal vigor.

The symphony was generally satisfactory as far as the composer was concerned, excepting, possibly, in the final movement, which does not appear to be fully worked out. The wind instruments deserve credit for their harmonious work in the themes allotted them in the first part; the clarinet and oboes did well their parts in the second movement, so did the cellos, and the forte passages by the full orchestra were smoothly played. The third movement was delightfully interpreted, joyous and vivacious throughout, with a capital scherzo. In the last part the orchestra handled the material scored skilfully enough, but the matter seemed to be lacking in coherency and was rather uninteresting. The Weber overture was played well, of course.

The soloist at the concerts Nov 11 and 12 will be Mr Hakon Schmedes, who will play the Vieuxtemps D minor violin concerto. Haydn's first symphony, introduction to act 1 of "Guntram," by Richard Strauss, and Tschaikowsky's "Capricio Italien" will complete the program.

DE PACHMANN PLAYS TODAY.

Renowned Pianist Will Be Soloist at Public Rehearsal of Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, the renowned pianist, will be the soloist at the third public rehearsal of the Boston
Symphony Orchestra this afternoon at Symphony Hall. He has not visited this city since the season of 1899-1900, and his only performance here with the Symphony orchestra was in 1891, when he played the concerto which he will play
today—Chopin's in F minor.

The programme will include the overture to "Oberon"; three movements by Bach, orchestrated by Mr. Gerlicke, and a symphony by Josef Suk. The pieces by Bach were orchestrated by Mr.
Gerlicke for a concert in Vienna. They are chosen from his chamber works.
The symphony by Suk will be played here for the first time. Published in 1900, it was performed at Prague, Utrecht, Berlin, and in November of that year it was produced in New York by the Philharmonic Society of that city. We believe it has also been performed in Philadelphia. Suk, a pupil and son-in-law of Anton Dvorak, is a member of the famous Bohemian Quartet, and lives in Prague. A suite by him has been played at a Symphony concert in Boston, and his string quartet has been heard here at an Adam-owski concert. The symphony is neither a "programme" nor a daringly radical work, but it has been warmly praised wherever it has been heard. Some find in the finale a departure from conventional form, while others consider the finale to be orthodox. There will be no rehearsal and no concert next week, for the orchestra leaves on Sunday for its trip to New York, Philadelphia and other cities.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Haydn. Symphony in E flat.
Bruch. Violin Concerto in G minor.
Professor Willy Hess, soloist.
Richard Strauss. Introduction to Act I. of "Guntram."
Tschalkowsky. Capriccio Italien.

We can congratulate Mr. Gericke upon a programme that was interesting and well-contrasted, not too great in length, and admirably performed. Perhaps exception might be made of the symphony. But even this was more modern than much of Haydn's orchestral music, and the pleasing character of Mr. Adamowski's "obbligato" in the variations, and the strong effect of the kettle-drums, not only in the opening trills but in other movements, must be chronicled.

Nevertheless there were many of the composer's formulas before the end was reached, repetitions and conventionalities which are not for the 20th century auditor. One may accept Johnson's "Rasselas," or Richardson's "Clarissa Harlowe," as masterpieces in their day, without poring long over their pages, and, in the same manner, we may realize that the "Symphony with the kettle-drum trill" may have been very exciting in its time, without being entertained by it at present.

Mr. Hakon Schmedes, who was to have appeared as solo violinist, has evidently yielded to the exigencies of our climate and taken to his bed; wherefore the Vieuxtemps Concerto was quickly changed into Bruch's beautiful G minor work and Hakon Schmedes transformed into Willy Hess. Certainly the audience was the gainer as regards the composition, for Bruch's first concerto is worth all the violin music that Vieuxtemps ever wrote.

With such a sudden change there must have been scant opportunity for rehearsal, yet the work went with an abandon and breadth that aroused great enthusiasm.

There was perhaps a little less of tenderness in the second movement than Mr. Adamowski used to invest it with, but the virile power, the lofty interpretation, were something to hold in memory for a long time. We have seldom heard the preluding of the introduction so effectively performed, and the Ossianic finale, full of the warlike ardor characteristic of Bruch, was magnificently done. The work is reminiscent of other compositions of the same pen; "Odysseus" has some phrases almost identical with certain passages in this concerto.

The audience were thoroughly aroused by the time the end was reached and the brilliant violinist was recalled four times in the midst of considerable excitement—a great Hessian victory over the Americans, even if a century or so belated.

The prelude to "Guntram" showed Strauss in the early stages of his musical reforms. Oddly enough, the radical opera is dedicated to his father, who was a conservative of conservatives. In this work we find the Wagner influence very distinctly marked; Lohengrin has merely disguised himself as Guntram. The development of two figures (one of 3 and one of 4 notes) is entirely in the Wagnerian vein.

But there are touches of orchestration that foreshadow the Strauss of that fearful battlefield of "Heldenleben." We should have liked the second prelude also; it made a good impression under Paur, years ago, when the two were given together.

Tschalkowsky's Italian Caprice has the advantage of being really Italian, or rather Neapolitan. From the cavalry signal of the beginning, through the folk-song that forms the body of the work, up to the wild Tarantella which ends it, the auditor is in a real Naples. In the "Italian Symphony," which Strauss wrote, we are in a Naples where all the inhabitants speak only German! Even in the Tschalkowsky Caprice one wishes that there had been a less inflated character.

The Italian does not thunder out his pretty folk-tunes in such a portentous manner. Occasionally Tschalkowsky treats the pretty central theme with becoming simplicity, with thirds and sixths in simplification, such as a Neapolitan might enjoy, but sometimes also he magnifies them unduly and begins to cook his macaroni in a Samovar.

Perhaps some day the Italian will become synphonic and will possess more than a single classical instrumental composer (Sgambatti), and then we may hope to have Italian music served in the Italian manner, even in an orchestral work.

Nevertheless the Caprice was throughout interesting and it was performed in a manner that calls for renewed commendation of Mr. Gericke and his men.

Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The third Symphony concert of the season was made notable by the reappearance in Boston of that famous pianist Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann. This was the programme of the concert:

Weber: Overture to "Oberon."

Bach: Three Movements, orchestrated by W. Gericke.

Chopin: Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, Op. 21.

Joseph Suk: Symphony in E major, Op. 14. (First time.)

Despite the fact that on the programme was a symphony by a composer of no mean talent, still unheard here, the main feature of the concert was the wonderful playing of Mr. de Pachmann. The distinguished artist, glorying in his amazing powers, dared to risk his reputation on the F minor concerto of Chopin, a work that, never of the strongest, has now grown strangely old-fashioned; indeed, it sounds quite roccoco, and only perfect playing can make it tolerable. But Mr. de Pachmann might with impunity, if he so chose, venture before an audience armed only with scales, trills, arpeggios and odd snatches of song, for tone of such entrancing beauty as his never is heard from others. It glows. It sparkles with color, like snow, now warm, as when the noon sun shines brightly, now cool, again cold, sometimes melting. Mr. de Pachmann's song is like that of a Sembrich—and when perfection has been called into comparison, no more need be said. Rhythm, too, must not be forgotten in recalling the remarkable qualities of Mr. de Pachmann. In short, the artist was at his best, in very different case from his last visit here, when his work seemed a curious mixture of the beautiful and the meretricious. At the end of the concerto he received an ovation.

The symphony, even as the concert's novelty, cannot be discussed before mention has been made of the extremely brilliant performance of the "Oberon" overture. Never before last Saturday has the supernatural character of the overture's opening pages been brought out so sympathetically, never has the quick movement rushed along with such fire and fury. This brilliancy of performance lasted all the evening, right through the symphony, as well as the Bach pieces so pleasantly orchestrated by Mr. Gericke. The playing was all a triumph. If only Mozart, Haydn and early Beethoven symphonies could always be played with the warmth, spirit and carefulness that went into Saturday's performance of the Weber overture! It was an event to be remembered.

The symphony, coming late in the evening, when nearly enough music had been heard for a single sitting, proved somewhat tiresome. The work is very melodious, logically developed and written with studied avoidance of the bizarre. For this much be all thanks! In the year 1904, however, one cannot help feeling doubtful as to the original qualities of a composer who sets out to write a four-movement symphony (Suk's symphony, to be sure, was made several years ago). The third movement seems best, for in it are strains of Bohemia, vital and animated, and the opening allegro is not without the same character. Least interesting are the very long adagio, and the finale, both examples of conscientious effort, straightforward music that one must respect, even when their monotony becomes wearisome. However, Suk is a composer whose productions must be heard, that we may all judge for ourselves, and the symphony's performance was amazingly brilliant. Few concerts, all in all, are so satisfactory as was this third symphony concert of the year. Everybody must have been pleased, classicists and those interested in the new alike.

This week there will be no concert. On Saturday, the 12th, Mr. Hakon Schmedes is to appear as soloist, the programme of the evening being as follows: Haydn, Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major; Vieuxtemps, concerto for violin, No. 4, in D major; Richard Strauss, introduction to Act I. of "Guntram"; Tchaikovsky, Capriccio Italien, op. 45.

R. R. G.

OUR ORCHESTRA'S SUCCESS.

NEW YORK, Nov. 3, 1904. The Boston Symphony Orchestra brilliantly opened its 19th local season at Carnegie Hall tonight. Not a vacant box or empty chair showed anywhere in the room. Mr. Gericke's list was headed by Beethoven's little known fourth symphony in B flat major, opus 60. It proved one of the most wonderfully finished pieces of playing the men from Boston have ever put to their credit here. A highly interesting novelty was Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a miniature tone poem based on a ballad of Goethe. For originality of plan and deftness and novelty of orchestration this work was noteworthy.

Willy Hess, the orchestra's new concert master, is a thoroughly worthy successor of Franz Kneisel, and an artist of big attainments. The audience fairly rose to him at the end.

SYMPHONY CONCERT PLANS.

Mr. Willy Hess Will Take the Place of Mr. Schmedes, Who Is Prevented by Sickness.

Mr. Hakon Schmedes, who was announced as the soloist at the public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra this afternoon, is sick and will be unable to appear. Mr. Willy Hess has kindly volunteered to take his place, and he will play Bruch's violin concerto in G minor.

The orchestral pieces will be Haydn's symphony in E flat major, the one with the opening drum-role, written for Solomon's concerts in London; the prelude to Richard Strauss' singular opera, "Guntram," and Tschalkowsky's tuneful and sonorous Italian Caprice, based on Italian folk songs and composed during the composer's sojourn at Rome.

UNION MUST LET ORCHESTRA ALONE

Maj. Higginson Says Interference with His Plans Will Cause Symphony Organization to Perish and He Will Tell Reasons.

B Herald ——— Nov 3/04

Regarding the statements, emanating from various sources, that the welfare of the Boston Symphony orchestra is threatened, through the demands of the Musicians' Federated Union, Maj. Henry L. Higginson said, yesterday, to a Herald representative: "Musicians' unions are good, if they are for proper motives; and proper motives seem to me charity, brotherhood, and social purposes. When, however, they adopt the 'closed door,' I am absolutely opposed to them. Whether or not the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra belong to the union is not for me to decide, providing that they live up to their bargain with me, and to the spirit of the orchestra."

"The orchestra was intended for the enjoyment and education of the public, and has been carried on by the employment of much pains and work, until it has become a very good band. By the bylaws of the union, the union men are not allowed to play with non-union men. I object to any interference with the playing of the members of the orchestra, either for the symphony concerts or for any outside work. I want the men to earn what they can, both from me and from outsiders."

"Our men who joined the union were told that they could do our work, without regard to the bylaws of the union, but the representative of the union said to me that the point was waived until explained to me. The explanation consisted simply in telling me the fact. Nobody has thought of disintegration, unless the union causes it. There is no discontent among the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and I don't know how many belong to the union, if any. The members now know all the facts and understand them fully."

"If allowed to carry out this work, in the original manner and spirit, I shall go on, and I expect that my death will not limit the life of the orchestra. If, however, there is an interference in my plans, which prevents unity and harmony in the orchestra, or among its members, the organization will perish, and I shall state publicly how the organization was broken up, and by whom. It has been a great joy to forward this work, and I hope that it has been worth while. It is clear, however, that I must have a free hand. I trust that the work of the orchestra may continue."

SYMPHONY MEN ALL OUT

Their Resignations from the Musicians' Protective Association Accepted

President Kingman of the Boston Musicians' Protective Association, Local 9, of the American Federation of Musicians, announces that all the players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra have resigned from the union, and their resignations have been accepted. He says the orchestra has ninety-four members and of these seventy-seven were members of the union. Some of them resigned a month ago. Since then their resignations have been coming in regularly and now they are all out of the union. The reason why the union officials have declined to discuss the matter, he says, is that they did not wish to antagonize the Boston Symphony Orchestra or Major Higginson. On Thursday, Dec. 1, the union will have a meeting for the election of officers. The following-named are the nominees: President, E. A. Franklin and President F. C. Kingman; vice president, F. E. Partridge and G. E. Stevens; secretary-treasurer, J. B. Fielding and E. D. Sherburne; trustees, William Hill and A. B. Roundy. Trans. Nov. 12, 1904

SYMPHONY MEN LEFT UNION.

Orchestra Members, 27 Strong, Resigned from Musicians' Protective Organization. Nov 5/04

The Musicians' Protective Union held an important meeting Thursday afternoon, when matters pertaining to the attitude of the owners of the Boston Symphony orchestra toward the union were discussed. From information given to The Herald reporter the interesting fact was developed that 27 members of the Symphony orchestra, who had become members of the union, tendered their resignations, and they were accepted.

The fact that a meeting was held Thursday afternoon, and that the resignations of some members were acted upon, is not denied by President Kingman of the Musicians' Union, but he absolutely refused to give any information regarding the action of members of the Symphony orchestra.

Maj. Henry L. Higginson did not care to discuss the matter any further. His attitude, he said, had been stated in The Herald. When told by the reporter that it was rumored that a large number of his players had resigned, he declared that it was news to him. The orchestra is out of town at present. They will return on Sunday.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Maj. Henry L. Higginson's statement concerning the relations of the Boston Symphony orchestra to the Musicians' Federated Union shows how easy it might be to push the "closed shop" or "closed door" theory of service to a point which would cause serious public loss. The Boston Symphony orchestra was not established as a money-making enterprise, and if Maj. Higginson, contrary to his original intentions, has found a balance to the good in the annual account of this enterprise, it has been with good reason assumed that this was to be made a part of a fund out of which the orchestra was to be maintained through an indefinite future. In order to develop this idea along the lines originally laid down and thus far adhered to, of providing the citizens of eastern Massachusetts with the finest orchestral music at cost and without profit, it is necessary that those in control should select their musicians on the score of merit and without regard to such artificial restraints as any self-constituted outside body might see fit in its own interest to endeavor to impose. There is no question about the generous payment given to those who are members of this orchestra, for it is doubtful if any musicians receive as a body as large remuneration. It is only a question of whether as non-union men other musicians shall be prohibited from having professional relations with them. Maj. Higginson plainly announces that, if these barriers are to be thrown in the way of his public-spirited enterprise, it must be brought to an end, this coming as the result of what we think almost every one will concede to be entirely unwarrantable interference.

Symphony Tickets

Evening—Front Row—Upper Balcony—Left, $22 each. Address E.S.T., Boston Transcript. 2t(A) n 10

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Alternate Fridays; one seat, Left Balcony, Row B, near stage. P.H.O., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Two aisle seats in left lower balcony; very desirable; cheap. Address R. E. T., Boston Transcript. 2t(A): o 26

SYMPHONY TICKET SEASON

Saturday evenings. Seats in U. 20 cents for $15. Address F.V.S., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY
TICKETS FOR SALE in all parts of the Hall.
WADSWORTH, 40 State St., Room 53.
Telephone 4235-5. 5t(A): o 4

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Single Seat, X No. 21, for $45, if taken at once. Address G.E.B., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

In S. S. Floor; price $10. P. O. Box 3245, Boston. (A):

SYMPHONY SEATS

One half of two seats for Concerts for sale. Address R. F., Boston Transcript. (A):

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The programme for the first two concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall this week are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony in B flat major, No. 4.....Beethoven
Hungarian concerto for violin.....Joachim
Mr. Willy Hess.
Scherzo, "L'Apprenti Sorcier".....Paul Dukas
(First time.)
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner

SATURDAY MATINEE.

Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2...Chopin
Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann.
Symphony in E major, Op. 14.....Josef Suk
(First time.)

The novelties are the symphony in E major by Joseph Suk and the scherzo "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Paul Dukas.

Josef Suk's first teacher was his father, an excellent musician. The son entered the Prague Conservatory in 1885, where he studied the violin under Bennewitz and composition under Dvorak, who later became his father-in-law. "A Dramatic Overture," written after study of two years, was highly praised; and a piano quartet brought from the Government a stipend. Suk has written a suite, "A Fairy Tale," made up chiefly of material taken from the entr'actes and incidental music composed by him for J. Zeyer's "Radúz and Mahulena," (produced at Prague, April 10, 1898;) a pianoforte quartet in A minor, (New York, November, 1901;) a string quartet in B flat major, an overture to Shakespeare's "Winter's Tale," a serenade for strings, a ballade and serenade for 'cello and piano, a suite for pianoforte, songs for three-voiced female chorus and pianoforte, (four hands,) &c.

Suk has always been the second violinist of the Bohemian Quartet, which made a sensation on its first appearance in Vienna in the season of 1892-93, and is now famous throughout Europe.

Paul Dukas was born in Paris, Oct. 1, 1865, and is now living in the same city. "L'Apprenti Sorcier," an orchestral scherzo, was performed for the first time at a concert of the Société Nationale, Paris, May 18, 1897. The scherzo was produced at Chicago by the Chicago Orchestra, Mr. Thomas, conductor, Jan. 14, 1899.

HAKON SCHMEDES,
VIOLINIST.

Owing to illness, Mr. Schmedes is unable to appear,
and Professor Hess has kindly consented to play the Concerto for Violin, in G minor, by Max Bruch.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in E flat major, (B. & H. No. 1.)

I. Adagio: Allegro con spirito.

II. Andante.

III. Menuetto: Trio.

IV. Allegro con spirito.

VIEUXTEMPS

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, No. 4, in D minor, op. 31.

I. Introduzione: Andante moderato.

II. Adagio religioso,

III. Finale marziale, Andante; Allegro.

RICHARD STRAUSS,

INTRODUCTION to Act I. of "Guntram".

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

CAPRICCIO ITALIEN, op 45.

Soloist:

Mr. HAKON SCHMEDES.

Owing to illness, Mr. Schmedes is unable to appear, and Professor Hess has kindly consented to play the Concerto for Violin, in G minor, by Max Bruch.

HAKON SCHMEDES,
VIOLINIST.

Owing to illness, Mr. Schmedes is unable to appear,
and Professor Hess has kindly consented to play the Concerto for Violin, in G minor, by Max Bruch.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in E flat major, (B. & H. No. 1.)

I. Adagio: Allegro con spirito.

II. Andante.

III. Menuetto: Trio.

IV. Allegro con spirito.

VIEUXTEMPS

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, No. 4, in D minor, op. 31.

I. Introduzione: Andante moderato.

II. Adagio religioso,

III. Finale marziale, Andante; Allegro.

RICHARD STRAUSS,

INTRODUCTION to Act I. of "Guntram".

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

CAPRICCIO ITALIEN, op 45.

Soloist:

Mr. HAKON SCHMEDES.

Owing to illness, Mr. Schmedes is unable to appear, and Professor Hess has kindly consented to play the Concerto for Violin, in G minor, by Max Bruch.

OLD SYMPHONY FOR MODERNS

Herald ——— P. Hale

Boston's Famous Orchestra First Plays Works of Haydn and Bruch, and Then Those of Strauss and Tschaikowsky.

WILLY HESS PLAYS THE CONCERTO

Performance Distinguished by Excellent Qualities, Straightforward, Broad, Sturdy and Full of Sentiment.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony hall, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Symphony in E flat major (B. & H., No. 1)... Haydn
Concerto in G minor for violin..... Bruch
Prelude to act I. of "Guntram"..... R. Strauss
Italian Caprice..... Tschaikowsky

There are symphonies and piano concertos that are out of proportion in a huge concert hall. They are built on such a scale, with a view to the orchestra and the piano of the period, that played by a modern full orchestra or with a modern concert grand, they seem dwarfed or trifling or dull when brought into, say, Symphony Hall. The woodwind instruments may be doubled to preserve the due balance with the present body of strings, but the effect of the whole is lost. There is no true intimacy of thought between performers and hearers. The musical fluid, to use the phrase of Berlioz, does not enwrap
the listener.

But let a symphony by Haydn or Mozart be performed by a comparatively small band in a small hall, and,
unless the music itself be one of the younger works of these composers, there is contagious enjoyment. The antique charm, melodic simplicity, contrapuntal rush or downright gollity then make their way. The ideal music hall has two rooms: one for the dramatic intensity, the roar and the bustle of the mighty of today; and one—it should be in the rococo style—for the music that charmed cavaliers in wigs and noble dames adorned with powder and patches. It may also be said that the smug cheerfulness of Haydn, which puts one in good humor when the orchestra and the hall are small, aggra-vates when it is proclaimed by a great band of players.

Richard Strauss' "Guntram" has a symbolical libretto, and as his stage characters were not creatures of flesh and blood, the opera quickly died. No opera that is purely symbolical will have a better fate. There are some ingenious persons who are prating constantly about the symbolism in Wagner's music-dramas; but the characters in the "Ring" and in "Tristan" are first of all human, often shabbily human, in their godlike disguises. Bruennhilde and Fricka and Sieglinde and Isolde are women; they are something more than mouthpieces for symbolism. "Guntram" is an opera of renunciation, and where there should be action there's nothing doing. Audiences are impatient with such librettos, and, unless the music be incongruously dramatic and imaginative at the same time, Time smiles on the few months or even weeks that bear the work of so much labor and anxiety and prayer and hope to his enormous dust-bin.

The prelude to the first act of "Gun-tram," played last night, was naturally intended to put the opera audience into the suitable mood for receptivity; but Strauss also looked toward the concert hall for fame and applause, and thoughtfully provided an explanatory note for such performance. It might be better for a concert hearer to be let alone, to be unacquainted with any purpose of the composer as with any knowledge of the operatic story, so that listening to the music he might dream dreams and create the world in which Guntram should play the hero. The music itself, as absolute music without any thought of the tale about to be told, is not stamped with the individuality of the Strauss now famous, or according to some sensitive souls, infamous.

The composer of "Guntram" had shaken off the influence of Schumann and Brahms, but he was under the spell of Wagner. Still here and there are hints at the future Strauss, as in the fleeting suggestion of two conflicting tonalities, and there are certain orchestral effects that are Strauss' own. The work, however, is too evidently a prelude—not a sharply defined overture;
and it is doubtful, even when it is played as well as it was last night, whether it would be effective thus taken from its proper place.

Tschaikowsky, ailing in mind and in body, sojourned in Rome in 1880 and found pleasure in Italian music only in the folk songs sung in the streets or sung to him by an acquaintance, a guitarist. He used some of these tunes, sentimental or passionate, in this caprice. The sentiment is often characteristically Italian sentimentalism, and some of the tunes are characteristically banal; but the caprice is full of ingenious detail; there are many reminders of the Italian opera of the fifties
—witness the brass accompaniment that recalls the last scene of "La Traviata" or the "Misere" in "Il Trova-tore"; and the swing, the drunkenness of the rhythm should be irresistible.

The performance last night, while brilliant in mechanical detail, might well have been more elastic and extravagant. When a great man is coarse, his coarseness might as well be accentuated; there is nothing gained by endeavoring to soften or refine. And it is not too much to say that in every elemental man there must be a streak of coarseness.

Mr. Schmedes was announced as the solo violinist, but a slip in the programme book stated that he was sick, and Mr. Hess would take his place and play Bruch's concerto in G minor. Mr. Hess was warmly applauded. His performance was straightforward, broad and sturdy, rather than one distinguished by fine or overpowering emotional quality, yet it was conspicuous by reason of many excellent qualities; it was the performance of a well equipped, accomplished, experienced violinist and musician, and in the interpretation of the slow movement there was sentiment.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Fourth of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

There was a change made almost at the last minute in the program of the fourth rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the Danish violinist, Hakon Schmedes, pupil of Tofte, Wirth and Ysaye, who was announced as soloist, being too ill to fill his engagement, and Mr. Willy Hess, the new concertmeister, volunteering to play the lovely and always welcome concerto for violin in G minor, by Max Bruch. This noble composition was a worthy substitute for the Vieuxtemps concerto, described with much elaboration in the programs, and was never played with deeper feeling or under more perfect conditions. It is a powerfully impressive and uncommonly colorful concerto; and its evident familiarity to the members of the orchestra gave the piece a support and background which was perfection itself. The soaring melody, phrased most poetically and exquisitely bowed, was given a memorable rendering by Mr. Hess. The orchestration at times barely more than a whispered suggestion of the glowing nether-theme with which Bruch commences the andante, was given in a way that could not have failed to win praise from the composer himself. It was received, as it deserved to be, with pronounced favor.

There was variety enough to please any one in the program, which began with the dignified four-movement Haydn symphony in E flat major, opening with martial drum roll. A music student was heard explaining to one who inquired why it was always marked "R. and H. No. 1." in the programs, that it had "something to do with work done by Bach and Haydn in collaboration," he thought! The initials allude to the Breitkopf and Hartel catalog, and the symphony's relative rank. This was the symphony's second hearing in Boston, it having been first given here in November, 1891. The massive beauty of the theme, its splendid delivery by the company of musicians playing as one man, gave the delightful impression of absolute confidence so necessary to perfect enjoyment of such a sterling number. In the crisp rendition of the menuetto movement, as well as in the majestic climax, it was worthy of the initial place it commonly receives in program-making.

But it is not to be denied that the two selections after the intermission were in some respects the most eagerly anticipated numbers of the program. Doubtless the recent appearance of Dr. Richard Strauss in this city has had much to do with his extraordinary popularity as composer. The performance of his "Introduction to Act I" of his first opera "Guntram," was of especial interest from the fact that the lady who afterward became the wife of Dr. Strauss, Pauline de Ahna, was the heroine "Freihild" of its first hearing in Weimar in 1894, and that she is personally known to many here. The piece has a strong Wagnerian trend, and yet is sufficiently individual to warrant particular praise for its poetic power. The music which aroused everybody's desire to dance was the amazing Tchaikowsky "Italian Caprice for Orchestra," with a military opening, varying from the Haydn number in that the "challenge" was by trumpets, rather than by the drums.

The composer placed at the very head of his "Caprice" this stirring reminiscence of the Roman chivalry which he admired during his visit to the Eternal City in 1879. Suggestions of Neapolitan folk-songs and dance music, wild "gitanas" melodies, and a "tarantella," full of Paganini-like capriciousness up to its startling prestissimo finale, and sufficiently vivacious to cure a dozen spider bites, are characteristic of this tuneful description of what the imaginative composer saw and heard almost in the shadow of the vatican. Its playing showed what the orchestra can do with a sprightly theme, filled with the light-some street songs of the people, threaded together with scoring which of itself was at once masterful and delightful. The more one hears of the work of this intensely emotional Russian the more his genius appears. His name is used on an increasing number of programs and his works are always well received.

Mme. Joanna Gadske is announced as the soloist at the fifth symphony rehearsal and concert on Nov. 18 and 19, singing a Mozart aria. The closing scene of Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung"; a "first time" symphonic poem, "Penthesilea," by Hugo Wolf, and the favorite Brahms "No. 3" symphony in F major are included in the program. The special announcement is made that the concert which has been widely advertised to be given on Christmas eve will instead be given on the previous Thursday evening, Dec. 22.

Symphony Rehearsal Seats T 4, 5

Price $24 for each seat. Address N.W.C., Boston Transcript. (A)

HESS STEPS INTO THE BREACH AGAIN

Takes Place of Indisposed Soloist at Symphony and Plays Bruch's Concerto.

Journal Nov. 14, 1904
"Papa" Haydn wrote many a symphony whose tinkle is like that of a pleasant fountain, but he had his times of dry and enforced production. At such a period must have been composed the symphony in E flat which was played by the Symphony Orchestra Saturday night. It is genial, merely; containing no spark of inspiration, no compelling melody.

Such as it was, it was played carefully and with the customary beauty of tone by the orchestra. Only one may be pardoned for wondering if, even in Haydn, there could not be more of the breath of life.

Mr. Willy Hess stepped into the breach once more, and did good service. Mr. Schmedes, who had been expected to play the Vieuxtemps violin concerto in D minor, was indisposed and the concert-master took his place with the well-known Bruch concerto. This he gave with scholarly and accurate musicianship, rather than with the emotional fervor the piece demands. However, it must be said that the slow movement, that beautiful song of tenderness, was played with extreme purity and charm. The finale lacked dash and abandon.

The "Guntram" overture of Richard Strauss—an early Strauss—is, on the whole, suggestive of the earlier Wagner. There are violin passages closely akin to the swan music of "Lohengrin," and brass effects not unlike those in "Tannhauser." There is no slavish imitation, but the influence is there. On the whole, the overture is a strong and inspiring work. The overture was admirably played.

Jibes have been cast at the Tchaikowsky Italian caprice because of its frank melodiousness, its so-called "vulgarity" of themes and treatment. The criticisms are not valid. The genius of the Russian took what he found in Italy and made the folk-songs scintillate and throb by the splendor of his style. It was not interpreted with best effect, for the portion where the characteristic tune in D flat major is developed was played in a logy and wooden style. The tarantelle went much better.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

After their recent visit to New York the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to town and gave a concert, the fourth of the season, in Symphony Hall Saturday evening. Owing to the illness of Mr. Hakon Schmedes, who was to have made his first appearance here as a solo player, Mr. Willy Hess very kindly offered to be the soloist of the occasion. This was the programme.

Haydn: Symphony in E-flat major (B. & H. No. 1).
Bruch: Concerto for Violin, in G minor.
Richard Strauss: Introduction to Act I. of "Guntram."
Tchaikowsky: Capriccio Italien, Op. 45.

The Haydn symphony has not often been heard in Boston; why, it would be hard to tell, if ancient symphonies are to be performed at all in an auditorium like Symphony Hall, for it surely compares favorably with the orchestral works of Haydn more frequently produced. In its place, indeed, the introduction to the symphony, with its roll of drum and the sombre color of its first theme, must make a really dramatic effect. All the first movement, in fact, has much about it that charms, and so have certain of the variations of the andante; the minuet and the finale, too, stand the test of time as well as most of Haydn's minuets and closing movements. But in Symphony Hall Haydn's tone color, which is truly much varied, all is lost. It is no disrespect to the memory of a genuinely great composer to protest against the producing of his works under conditions manifestly wrong. Since Haydn and Mozart symphonies are well worth hearing, why would it not be worth while to afford Bostonians an opportunity of hearing them properly? In place of twenty-four orchestral concerts in Symphony Hall, would it not be practicable to give perhaps four in Jordan Hall or Chickering Hall, when the programmes could consist of compositions, ancient and modern, that demand, for their adequate performance, a small music room? The artistic results of such a scheme have already been partially proved. Is the plan impracticable? If so, there is no more to be said, but, at least, it is not necessary to put the old masters in a false position by attempting to play their pieces in a hall of vast dimensions. Haydn symphonies are probably put on symphony concert programmes today with the idea of pleasing certain portions of his audiences. If the audience Saturday was pleased with the symphony offered, they successfully hid their pleasure. The silence at the end of the first movement was quite as "audible" as that which greeted Hausegger's "Barbarossa," a few years ago.

The remainder of the concert demands few words of comment. The work by Strauss is a prelude to an opera that has shown itself lifeless, and the prelude is as lifeless as the opera it precedes. In it there is little to be found of the Strauss we are interested in today, although there is a very good deal of Wagner as he was imitated by his disciples. The themes, if there are any themes, are vague and meaningless; the orchestration is not particularly effective; the composition, in short, is dull and dreary, with less vitality in its whole length than there is in one page of the gay, animated, vulgar capriccio of Tchaikovsky. Nearly all Northern composers show themselves vulgar when they attempt to strum airs of Italy, but, to write vulgarly of a vulgar subject, it is useless to try to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. Common as it is, the capriccio can be made immensely effective if it be performed in the right spirit, with the sort of rhythm Mascagni once showed us. Mr. Gericke tried to refine Tchaikovsky's music, thereby taking away from its effect and making it sound even coarser than usual. A former performance from Mr. Gericke was far more brilliant.

The greatest enthusiasm of the evening was aroused by Mr. Hess's playing of the Bruch G minor concerto. On this, his third appearance here as a soloist, Mr. Hess strengthened the impression he made when he first played here; he is unquestionably a musician of parts, with a highly developed technique and a keen intellect. That he is a player of strong appeal, of warmth or of charm he has not yet demonstrated. On Saturday he was most cordially applauded.

There will be a symphony concert this coming Saturday evening, when Mme. Gadski is to be the soloist. The programme follows: Brahms, Symphony in F major, No. 3; Mozart, Aria; Hugo Wolf, Symphonic Poem, "Penthesilea" (first time); Wagner, closing scene from "Die Götterdämmerung." R. R. G.

Mr. HAKON SCHMEDES was born at Copenhagen, October 31, 1877. His father, a pupil of Spohr. His teachers His first appearance in public was at a Ysaye heard him in Berlin, and invited Schmedes was his pupil for two summers. In 1903 he was the second violin of Jacobson and in the course of that season he gave his first appearance before an American audience by the Philharmonic Orchestra. He has since made appearances at Brussels, and in other foreign cities. His first appearance before an American audience, is the well-known tenor of the Bayreuth (as Parsifal, 1899) and

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE

W. G. F. 1904
Nov. 4, 1904

Superb Playing at Its First Concert in Carnegie Hall.

PROF. WILLY HESS AS SOLOIST

The New Concert Master Makes a Highly Favorable Impression on First Appearance.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last evening in Carnegie Hall, was a greeting of old and well beloved friends. The hall was filled to its utmost capacity, and there was enthusiasm that signified in every way the delight that the concert gave. And, indeed, the orchestra never so fully justified or so irresistibly compelled enthusiasm as it did in its performance last evening. It is the same orchestra, with very few changes, as last year; it has recovered its greatest perfection of form after the Summer vacation, and has not yet lost the freshness that a vacation is intended to restore. Its playing seemed the very paragon and perfection of orchestral art—brilliant, mellow, of golden beauty in its tone, absolutely plastic under the conductor's hand, never for an instant faltering from the flexible precision that is the ideal of orchestral ensemble.

The symphony was the fourth of Beethoven's, one of the less familiar, yet one of the most youthfully beautiful. Mr. Gericke's rendering of it was one that showed his highest qualities. It was glowing and pulsing with life; its movement was elastic, and it was a marvel of exquisite proportion, not only in its larger outlines, but also in the adjustment of every phrase and of every instrumental value in the whole color-scheme. It had the sweep of spontaneity—yet such perfection in that of the art that conceals art. Mr. Gericke's tempo in the adagio was inexplicably fast—a tempo that robbed it of its pregnant significance; but the movement was at least made to cohere logically and stood for a definite conception.

The other orchestral pieces were Paul Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and the overture to "Tannhäuser." The scherzo is a brilliant and altogether fascinating product of the modern French school. It is programme music in the more suggestive style, not slavishly depicting details, but stimulating the listener's imagination as it satisfies his sense of musical beauty. Its vein is humorous, and the wit and gallantry of the musical representation keeps pace with Goethe's ballad "Der Zauberlehrling," upon which it is based. The composer plays delightfully with the most subtle combinations of instrumental timbre, and makes each instrument yield characteristic expression. It is all done with finesse and a certainty of touch that are a delight, and it was played with a virtuoso brilliancy that was dazzling.

The concert was made especially notable by introducing the new concert master of the orchestra, Prof. Willy Hess, as a soloist, and by confirming the good reports of his skill and resource that had preceded him. Prof. Hess is a man approaching middle age, and we are reminded by his biographer that this was not his first appearance here, for he played with Theodore Thomas's orchestra in 1869 as a "wonder child" of ten. He has put away childish things long since, however, and comes as a ripe artist of authority and of uncommon technical accomplishment. He chose for his introduction, strangely enough, Joachim's Hungarian concerto, a work that must be regarded as little more than a display piece, uncomfortably long for listeners as well as player, and bristling with difficulties of every sort.

Prof. Hess can scarcely be blamed that he did not show the deepest qualities of musicianship, poesy, sentiment, passion, fiery temperament, for Joachim was little moved by these things when he wrote the work. But he showed much that stamps him as an artist of the highest rank, and one worthy to occupy the responsible post he does. Strength, solidity, and firmness of bowing, remarkable fluency and accuracy with the left hand, a fine and masculine tone, even if not, as it was disclosed last evening, always warm or capable of pregnant expression, are his. His style is vigorous and masterful, and quite without affectation; his taste is sound, his performance on the whole finely poised.

There were times last evening when his intonation was not absolutely perfect, but the masters are few who can be certain of their intonation in this piece. Yet Prof. Hess is a master—of that there was left no doubt—and there will be a general desire to hear him in music that will allow him higher flights of imagination, and that will set his remarkable technique to the service of the finer side of art.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert last evening included the following numbers:

Symphony in E flat major.....Haydn
Concerto for violin, G minor.....Bruch
Introduction to Act I. of "Guntram".....R. Strauss
Italian Caprice, Op. 45.....Tschalkowsky

Hakon Schmedes, violinist, was announced as the soloist, in Vieuxtemps' concerto in D minor, but owing to illness Mr. Schmedes was unable to make his initial appearance in this city. In consequence Concert Master Willy Hess was the soloist for the second time.

His success upon the former occasion was very marked and last evening he played the familiar Bruch concerto in masterly manner. Nothing was lacking either in technique, tone or artistic interpretation, the result being all that one could well desire. Mr. Hess was enthusiastically applauded and several times recalled.

There was nothing strictly in the way of novelties offered in the remainder of the programme, yet none of the various numbers has been heard here for some time.

The Haydn symphony, except for a drum roll, which opens the first movement, resembles in general character all the others. And also for some reason it is rarely given, the performance last evening being the second at these concerts. It made a pleasing opening number, but in any event Haydn's symphonies are better adapted for a moderate orchestra in a small hall, as they were originally intended.

The prelude to "Guntram," opera by Richard Strauss, was heard here for the first time nine years ago. The performance last evening was the second, but to many in the audience it proved to be a novelty.

The prelude as a concert excerpt conveys little impression as absolute music, for one must hear the opera to realize any meaning from the introduction. It is a brilliant piece of orchestral writing and not much else, viewed as a concert number. The performance was very effective.

The closing number was Tschalkowsky's "Italian Caprice," Op. 45, which has had two previous performances in this city. The composer wrote it nearly 25 years ago, during an extended visit to Rome and other Italian cities. The themes have more or less of the characteristics of sunny Italy, but the treatment is Russian from the first to the last, and while not among the greatest of Tschalkowsky's works, is brilliant, forceful and interesting. The performance was excellent in every way.

MUSICIANS LEAVE UNION.

All of the Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Become Non-Union.

BOSTON, Nov. 12.—All of the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who were members of the Boston Musicians' Union have resigned. There are 94 players in the orchestra and of this number 77 were members of the union. The resignations began to come in more than a month ago. They have continued to come in gradually ever since.

"We have done nothing to prevent the symphony men from resigning," said President Kingman. "Peculiar conditions confront those men. They have been practically given to understand that Major Higginson does not wish them to belong to the union. I believe that Major Higginson has said that he gave no orders or instructions to the effect that members of the orchestra should not belong to the union, but his attitude remains the same, as I understand it. The union does not want to antagonize the symphony orchestra or Major Higginson. We do not desire to have a controversy and anticipate no trouble of any kind."

imitated by his disciples. The themes, if there are any themes, are vague and meaningless; the orchestration is not particularly effective; the composition, in short, is dull and dreary, with less vitality in its whole length than there is in one page of the gay, animated, vulgar capriccio of Tchaikovsky. Nearly all Northern composers show themselves vulgar when they attempt to strum airs of Italy, but, to write vulgarly of a vulgar subject, it is useless to try to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. Common as it is, the capriccio can be made immensely effective if it be performed in the right spirit, with the sort of rhythm Mascagni once showed us. Mr. Gericke tried to refine Tchaikovsky's music, thereby taking away from its effect and making it sound even coarser than usual. A former performance from Mr. Gericke was far more brilliant.

The greatest enthusiasm of the evening was aroused by Mr. Hess's playing of the Bruch G minor concerto. On this, his third appearance here as a soloist, Mr. Hess strengthened the impression he made when he first played here; he is unquestionably a musician of parts, with a highly developed technique and a keen intellect. That he is a player of strong appeal, of warmth or of charm he has not yet demonstrated. On Saturday he was most cordially applauded.

There will be a symphony concert this coming Saturday evening, when Mme. Gadske is to be the soloist. The programme follows: Brahms, Symphony in F major, No. 3; Mozart, Aria; Hugo Wolf, Symphonic Poem, "Penthesilea" (first time); Wagner, closing scene from "Die Götterdämmerung." R. R. G.

Mr. HAKON SCHMEDES was born at his father's country-house near Copenhagen, October 31, 1877. His first teacher was Tofte, of Copenhagen, a pupil of Spohr. His teachers in Berlin were Wirth and Halir. His first appearance in public was at a concert in Copenhagen in 1900. Ysaye heard him in Berlin, and invited him to study with him; and Mr. Schmedes was his pupil for two summers. During the season of 1902-1903 he was the second violin of Jacques Thibaud's quartet at Paris and in the course of that season he gave a concert in Berlin, assisted by the Philharmonic Orchestra. He has also given concerts in Denmark, at Brussels, and in other foreign cities. This is Mr. Schmedes' first appearance before an American public. His brother, Erik Schmedes, is the well-known tenor of the Vienna Opera House, who has sung at Bayreuth (as Parsifal, 1899) and in other cities as a guest.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE

Nov. 4, 1904

Superb Playing at Its First Concert in Carnegie Hall.

PROF. WILLY HESS AS SOLOIST

The New Concert Master Makes a Highly Favorable Impression on First Appearance.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last evening in Carnegie Hall, was a greeting of old and well beloved friends. The hall was filled to its utmost capacity, and there was enthusiasm that signified in every way the delight that the concert gave. And, indeed, the orchestra never so fully justified or so irresistibly compelled enthusiasm as it did in its performance last evening. It is the same orchestra, with very few changes, as last year; it has recovered its greatest perfection of form after the Summer vacation, and has not yet lost the freshness that a vacation is intended to restore. Its playing seemed the very paragon and perfection of orchestral art—brilliant, tells, but stimulating the listener's imagination as it satisfies his sense of musical beauty. Its vein is humorous, and the wit and gallantry of the musical representation keeps pace with Goethe's ballad "Der Zauberlehrling," upon which it is based. The composer plays delightfully with the most subtle combinations of instrumental timbre, and makes each instrument yield characteristic expression. It is all done with finesse and a certainty of touch that are a delight, and it was played with a virtuoso brilliancy that was dazzling.

The concert was made especially notable by introducing the new concert master of the orchestra, Prof. Willy Hess, as a soloist, and by confirming the good reports of his skill and resource that had preceded him. Prof. Hess is a man approaching middle age, and we are reminded by his biographer that this was not his first appearance here, for he played with Theodore Thomas's orchestra in 1869 as a "wonder child" of ten. He has put away childish things long since, however, and comes as a ripe artist of authority and of uncommon technical accomplishment. He chose for his introduction, strangely enough, Joachim's Hungarian concerto, a work that must be regarded as little more than a display piece, uncomfortably long for listeners as well as player, and bristling with difficulties of every sort.

Prof. Hess can scarcely be blamed that he did not show the deepest qualities of musicianship, poesy, sentiment, passion, fiery temperament, for Joachim was little moved by these things when he wrote the work. But he showed much that stamps him as an artist of the highest rank, and one worthy to occupy the responsible post he does. Strength, solidity, and firmness of bowing, remarkable fluency and accuracy with the left hand, a fine and masculine tone, even if not, as it was disclosed last evening, always warm or capable of pregnant expression, are his. His style is vigorous and masterful, and quite without affectation; his taste is sound, his performance on the whole finely poised.

There were times last evening when his playing was not only perfect, but so perfect that there was left little room for a general desire that will allow him to be unique to the service.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

the fourth Symphony included the following:

for.....Haydn
minor.....Bruch
"Guntram".....R. Strauss
.....Tchaikovsky
violinist, was an-oist, in Vieuxtemps'
but owing to illness
unable to make his this city. In conster Willy Hess was second time.

the former occasion and last eventhe familiar Bruch
ly manner. Notheither in tech-
istic interpretation,
that one could well

desire. Mr. Hess was enthusiastically applauded and several times recalled.

There was nothing strictly in the way of novelties offered in the remainder of the programme, yet none of the various numbers has been heard here for some time.

The Haydn symphony, except for a drum roll, which opens the first movement, resembles in general character all the others. And also for some reason it is rarely given, the performance last evening being the second at these concerts. It made a pleasing opening number, but in any event Haydn's symphonies are better adapted for a moderate orchestra in a small hall, as they were originally intended.

The prelude to "Guntram," opera by Richard Strauss, was heard here for the first time nine years ago. The performance last evening was the second, but to many in the audience it proved to be a novelty.

The prelude as a concert excerpt conveys little impression as absolute music, for one must hear the opera to realize any meaning from the introduction. It is a brilliant piece of orchestral writing and not much else, viewed as a concert number. The performance was very effective.

The closing number was Tchaikovsky's "Italian Caprice," Op. 45, which has had two previous performances in this city. The composer wrote it nearly 25 years ago, during an extended visit to Rome and other Italian cities. The themes have more or less of the characteristics of sunny Italy, but the treatment is Russian from the first to the last, and while not among the greatest of Tchaikovsky's works, is brilliant, forceful and interesting. The performance was excellent in every way.

MUSICIANS LEAVE UNION.

All of the Players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Become Non-Union.

BOSTON, Nov. 12.—All of the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who were members of the Boston Musicians' Union have resigned. There are 94 players in the orchestra and of this number 77 were members of the union. The resignations began to come in more than a month ago. They have continued to come in gradually ever since.

"We have done nothing to prevent the symphony men from resigning," said President Kingman. "Peculiar conditions confront those men. They have been practically given to understand that Major Higginson does not wish them to belong to the union. I believe that Major Higginson has said that he gave no orders or instructions to the effect that members of the orchestra should not belong to the union, but his attitude remains the same, as I understand it. The union does not want to antagonize the symphony orchestra or Major Higginson. We do not desire to have a controversy and anticipate no trouble of any kind."

S CO.

MOBILE CLUB
LL BUILD NEW HOME

Include Garage with Storage and Repairing Facilities.

BE CENTRALLY LOCATED

Morris Heads New Ticket for An-Meeting W. K. Vandenberg

Photograph Copyrighted, 1899, by Aime Dupont.
MME JOHANNA GADSKI, THE EMINENT OPERATIC SINGER, WHO WILL BE HEARD
IN CONCERT THIS SEASON.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY in F major, No. 3, op. 90.
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante.
III. Poco Allegretto.
IV. Allegro.

MOZART,

RECITATIVE, "How Susanna delays!" and ARIA "Flown forever" from "The Marriage of Figaro."

HUGO WOLF,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Penthesilea," after the like
named tragedy of Heinrich von Kleist.
(First time.)

WAGNER.

FINALE of "The Dusk of the Gods."

Soloist:

Mme. JOHANNA GADSKI.

Photograph Copyrighted, 1899, by Aime Dupont.
MME JOHANNA GADSKI, THE EMINENT OPERATIC SINGER, WHO WILL BE HEARD IN CONCERT THIS SEASON.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY in F major, No. 3, op. 90.

- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante.
- III. Poco Allegretto.
- IV. Allegro.

MOZART,

RECITATIVE, "How Susanna delays!" and ARIA "Flown forever" from "The Marriage of Figaro."

HUGO WOLF,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Penthesilea," after the like
 named tragedy of Heinrich von Kleist.
 (First time.)

WAGNER.

FINALE of "The Dusk of the Gods."

Soloist:

Mme. JOHANNA GADSKI.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

This season of much instrumental and little vocal music was agreeably varied in its monotony by the presence of Mme. Johanna Gadske, as soloist, Saturday, with the Symphony Orchestra. This was the programme of the concert:

Brahms: Symphony in F major, No. 3, Op. 90.
Mozart: Recitative, "How Susanna delays!" and Aria, "Flown forever," from "The Marriage of Figaro."
Hugo Wolf: Symphonic Poem, "Penthesilea." (First time.)
Wagner: Finale of "The Dusk of the Gods."

The programme was admirable. Not only were all the compositions played either beautiful or interesting, sometimes both, but they were judiciously arranged, with the symphony first, where surely it ought to be, and the most exciting number, in this case the "Götterdämmerung" excerpt, at the end. Mr. Gericke may not please everybody in the hall by following this scheme, to which lately he has seemed inclined, for no arrangement ever conceived will satisfy everybody, but he will undoubtedly gratify a large proportion of the audience by so doing.

The wondrous beauty of the Brahms symphony, however, must tend toward the contentment of the greater part of the music-loving world, or else nothing would. With every hearing it seems even greater than it did before. This symphony might well be called, "A Forest Symphony," for its music constantly sends the imagination a-posting off toward the vast, silent woods. The very first theme has all the sturdy strength of towering oak trees; the second episode, like Siegfried's forest music, flutters and shimmers with the tremulousness of many thousands of green leaves. The mystery that haunts ancient woods, too, is suggested by the opening theme of the finale, stealthily sung by strings and bassoons. All the music breathes of nature, the melody, the rhythm of nature, in many aspects, frowning, sunlit, serene. For such music may God be thanked!

After it, the efforts of poor Hugo Wolf to find music illustrative of the horrible tale of Penthesilea seemed pitiful. That Wolf, the unfortunate crazed genius, should have been attracted to Kleist, is not astonishing, for the poet was another such mad genius as the musician, only a far greater one. By the same token, it was only to be expected that Wolf would peculiarly fancy "Penthesilea," that nightmare of a diseased brain, from the revolting horrors of which, despite the exquisite features of the drama, most sane people have turned in disgust, preferring to remember Kleist by his powerful and singularly human portrait of Prinz Friedrich von Homburg. With all his genius, Wolf lacked both the poetical imagination and the technical skill to discover music worthy of the beauties, or of the horrors, of "Penthesilea." The din of battle he has depicted forcefully, and the love dream of Penthesilea is not without beauty. But this love dream, as well as beautiful, must be voluptuous, passionate, sensuous. It cannot be that Wolf failed to grasp the force of the text; he must have lacked freedom of expression. Weakest of all is Penthesilea's awakening from her dream, for fury and a thousand conflicting emotions are not suggested by mere orchestral uproar. The piece was splendidly played. Since it has made the round of German concert halls the past year or so, it was necessary that we should hear it in Boston, but once will probably prove sufficient.

Between Brahms and Wolf came Mozart, Mme. Gadske singing the Countess's aria, "Dove sono," very beautifully indeed, with pure, free tone, an exquisite legato, and very tasteful phrasing. In the "Götterdämmerung" excerpt Mme. Gadske sang with the same vocal care that she applied to the aria from "Figaro," and the effect was excellent and instructive, proving, if proof were necessary, that even the late music of Wagner can be properly sung, if the singer know how. Admirable artist that she is, however, Mme. Gadske has not yet reached a height where she can give an exhaustive performance of Brünnhilde's last scene on earth. If not great, though, she was always thoroughly good.

This will be the programme for Saturday evening, when Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler will appear as soloist: Saint-Saëns, Symphony No. 1 in E-flat major (first time); Henselt, Concerto for Pianoforte, in F minor; Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "Hunnen-schlacht"; Goldmark, Overture to "Sappho." R. R. G.

GADSKI SOLOIST FOR SYMPHONY

Program Included a Novelty for Boston in Wolf's Symphonic Poem, "Penthesilea."

For the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mme. Gadske was the soloist, and the following was the program:

Symphony in F major, No. 3.....Brahms
"Dove Song," from "Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Symphonic poem, "Penthesilea".....Wolf
(First time.)

Finale of "Götterdämmerung".....Wagner
Good Master Brahms in his third symphony paid more attention to the mechanics of music than was even his wont. Ever on the point of being genial, he seems to have remembered that his reputation as a wonderful technician was threatened, and straightway became astutious again. The work has beauties—no Brahms composition of length could be devoid of them—but on the whole, this particular symphony is the least attractive of the four. The playing of it was pretty close to perfection. There is no man with whom Mr. Gericke seems more in sympathy than Brahms, and no music which his own quality of artistic repression better fits.

At last Boston has heard an orchestral work of that weird and unhappy genius, Hugo Wolf, who died in a madhouse after a life of bitter striving, some successes and many disappointments.

Wolf's symphonic poem, "Penthesilea," is based upon the poem of that other strange character, Heinrich von Kleist. The tale is bloody and harrowing.

For a gruesome bit of fiction, Wolf's music is scarcely poignant or horrible enough. Its tragic essence is apparent, and some of its stormy passages are genuinely impressive. But the scoring is more musicianly than flamboyant. In its moments of calm, Wolf's music is full of beauty and poetic suggestion. Other of his works will be heard with interest, especially if played with such superb virtuosity as was shown by the band on this occasion.

Mme. Gadski was in excellent voice, and her singing of Mozart aria was remarkable for purity and loveliness. In the great final scene of the "Gotterdammerung" she showed both her training and her own natural gifts.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Gadski the Symphony Orchestra Soloist.

"Parsifal" Will Return Next Week to the Tremont Theatre.

Concerts and Recitals in Great Number.

Glabe — Nov 20 1904

Mme Gadski was the soloist at the fifth symphony concert, singing the recitation and aria, "Flown Forever," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and Brunnhilde's music from the finale of Wagner's "Gotterdammerung." The orchestral numbers were Brahms' third symphony and Hugo Wolf's symphonic poem, "Penthesilea," the latter for the first time here. The prima donna, who temporarily has deserted the grand opera stage, has returned to America with a voice which appears to be fuller and more resonant than when heard here last season. Not being tired by the exacting demands of opera all the vocal beauties are in evidence; the tones are almost faultless, the execution is as fluent as ever and there is an evident gain in dramatic breadth, as shown in the Brunnhilde music, which was delivered with splendid effect and was a distinct advance over her singing the same music in opera last April.

The great contrast between the Wagner and Mozart style of song enabled the singer to show the versatility of her art and the wide range of her abilities, and in the familiar excerpt from the latter composer's opera Mme Gadski achieved even greater success than in Brunnhilde's aria, the dainty legato passages being sung with exquisite beauty of tone, especially in the mezzo voice, and without an apparent effort in the highest vocal parts. It was a delightful interpretation, and the cordial welcome the great artist received on her entrance was more than duplicated at the close of her first number.

The orchestra played the Mozart accompaniments admirably, of course, and Mr Gericke made the "Gotterdammerung" music as effective as could be looked for when the makeup of the orchestra is considered. In the Brahms' symphony all the work was of the usual high standard, the fortissimo development of the finale being the most striking because of its vigorous and complicated nature.

Hugo Wolf's symphonic poem was played here for the first time. The gruesome subject chosen for musical illustration is skilfully, at times brutally, treated as the story requires, and many of the orchestral combinations are fairly startling in their presentation. All the weird, uncanny effects were characteristically set forth, and although the poem isn't very pleasing to hear, there is no denying its strength, orchestral cleverness and consistency to the sentiments of the story.

This week's soloist will be Mme Bloomfield-Zeiser, who will play Henselt's F minor piano concerto. The other program numbers will include Saint-Saens first symphony, first time here; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hunnenschlacht," and Goldmark's "Sappho" overture.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Nov 21 1904

Symphony in F major, No. 3, op. 90: Brahms
Recitative, "How Susanna delays!" and Aria
"Flown forever" from "The Marriage of Figaro" .....Mozart

Mme. Gadski.
Symphonic Poem, "Penthesilea," after the like named tragedy of Heinrich von Kleist.....Hugo Wolf

(First time.)
Finale of "The Dusk of the Gods".....Wagner
Mme. Gadski.

The Brahms symphony was glorious. Such music is a bulwark against the musical hysteria that mars so much of the most recent composition. It was finely performed and at its close Mr. Gericke was recalled to acknowledge the plaudits of the audience. There was a time when Brahms was thought abstruse, but this delicate work seemed brimful of melody and was

"like an open book
That he who runs may read."

Was it sarcasm that induced the conductor to place Hugo Wolf's symphonic poem almost in juxtaposition with this shapely symphony?

Mme. Gadski was in excellent voice, but we are not convinced that "Dove Sono" is the best number for her style of singing. She seemed more successful in the great finale to "Gotterdammerung." Nevertheless the audience became enthusiastic over the first number and recalled the singer three times.

Then came the problem of the concert, Wolf's remarkable "Penthesilea." The work plunged into "medias res" in its very first measures, with the fiercest and most forcible of chords. There was originality even in the fanfares which pictured the war-like Amazons on their way to Troy.

The episode of the Dream of the Feast of Roses is very tender and tuneful enough (in the "continuous melody" vein) to be attractive even in a piano transcription. But the final fury is the dramatic nub of the whole work and is graphic in a high degree. Its battle-scene is more intelligible than the bewildering combat of "Heldenleben," and as a whole the symphonic poem is not as labyrinthine as some of the puzzle-music of the present.

There is more in the score, however, than the ear can clearly grasp. It is another illustration of Herbert Spencer's remark that modern music often demanded physical impossibilities of the human brain, that it presented more than the mind could possibly comprehend simultaneously. Although we greatly admired some portions of the work we must admit that it is strangely unequal, that there are occasional passages of commonplace beside the loftiest thoughts.

It is quite possible that the reviewer (as every auditor) is swayed somewhat by sympathy in forming a judgment of the composition. It is impossible to shut out from one's mind the story of the composer's pathetic career, the bitter injustice which he so often suffered, the wretched poverty, the final scourging into insanity,—one of the saddest tales in the tear-stained pages of musical history. But allowing for this favorable bias it is still quite certain that there are flashes of genius in this "Penthesilea."

Of course it was dimmed, as was all the rest of the concert, by the great finale to "Gotterdammerung." If there is anything quite as great as this scene, in "Parsifal," we have failed to perceive it. We doubt whether there is such another summing-up in music anywhere.

Mme. Gadski sang it with much dramatic fervor, although occasionally strident in the highest passages. Her artistic triumph was heartily acknowledged by the audience, which did not rush out at the end of the programme, but stayed to applaud vociferously.

The conductor and the orchestra, of course, shared in this ovation. The work is pre-eminently orchestral, and it was performed with utmost effect. Altogether then, this concert was either beautiful or interesting in every part of every number.

Louis C. Elson.

"PENTHESILEA" DISAPPOINTING

Wolf's Symphonic Poem Given Its First Performance in Boston at the Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

MME. GADSKI NEVER MORE SATISFACTORY

Sings Admirably Music by Mozart and Wagner — Brilliant Programme for the Coming Pension Fund Concert.

Herald — Nov. 20, 1904

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke, conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in F major, No. 3.....Brahms

84
Symphonic poem, "Penthesilea".....Wolff
(First time.)

Finale of "Goetterdaemmerung".....Wagner

Hugo Wolff, who died early in 1903, after he had spent about five years in a Viennese madhouse, was from his youth an enthusiastic admirer of Heinrich von Kleist, whose powerful and horrible tragedy, based on the story of the Amazon and Achilles, urged the composer to music. Not only did Wolff read the tragedy constantly, he insisted on reading it to others. He composed his symphonic poem, his only orchestral work of long breath; his thoughts were on his "Penthesilea" during his first stay in an asylum, and he was anxious to compose an opera with the erotically cruel woman as the heroine.

The symphonic poem is in three sections: "The Departure of the Amazons for Troy"; "Penthesilea's Dream of the Festival of Roses" (it was the traditional and rigid law of the Amazons that only conquered foes should celebrate with them this feast in their own town, Themiscyra); and the third section, which Wolff wished to amplify, portrays "Combats, Passions, Frenzy, Annihilation," for after Achilles had determined to yield to her in the fight, she, suspecting his design, and her amorous frenzy turning to raging hate, slew him with an arrow, and, setting her hands on his body, tore with them his flesh and rejoiced in his blood; then, with the return to reason, she stabbed herself and fell on the mutilated corpse.

Wolff composed "Penthesilea" in 1883, when he was 23 years old. He never heard it performed except once at a slingshot rehearsal that was for the purpose of deriding him. The work was produced at Halle in November of last year, and it has since gone the round of German cities. Theodore Thomas produced it in Chicago last April.

The subject tempted Goldmark, whose overture is not wholly successful, and Felix Draeseke wrote to Kleist's tragedy a symphonic prologue which we have never heard. Did Wolff find the adequate musical expressions of the emotions that undoubtedly surged within him?

His talent, from what we know by his music and through hearsay, was lyrical, not dramatic, and in this overture the lyrical episodes are those most poetic and effective. The opening measures of the symphonic poem immediately fix the attention and the interest is well maintained in spite of certain crudities until the dream section, which is prettily sonorous and contains some beautiful measures, but the individuality of the music is not pronounced, and there is little suggestion of the wild sensuousness of the festival. The last section, which should have been strikingly dramatic, poignantly tragic, disappointed, and it did not apparently satisfy Wolff.

There are a few ingenious details in the battle music, there are tragic strokes toward the end, and the last measures are impressive, but throughout this section the composer, to borrow a homely phrase, is revealed as one sparring for wind. No doubt there was in his mind the fitting musical expression, but he had not then the ability to formulate it, and his orchestral speech was often thick and stammering.

Mr. Gericke, it was plain, had taken was sympathetic; the superb orchestra did all in its power to second him; but the music itself disappointed. Perhaps this female Sadist, this queen of masochism, whose full-length portrait deserves the place of honor in the gallery of royal perverts, will never find a supreme eulogist in music. As for poor Wolff, he was not the first composer to glow with enthusiasm over a literary work and then to fall in an attempt at transmutation.

85

Nevertheless, Mr. Gericke, deserves hearty thanks for acquainting us with the symphonic poem, much of which, at a first hearing, seemed ordinary or futile and both futile and ordinary; for Wolff's music has excited attention since his death; already there is a Wolff bibliography; his sworn admirers praise him preposterously; and it is always a good thing for a Symphony audience to receive impressions from a work rather than from what has been written about it.

The symphony was played with what might be called Brahms bravura. The exposition was clear, yet not coolly anatomical; the nuances were skilfully prepared and delicately contrasted; the rhythmic treatment was spontaneous, and the continuity of the long line was admirably preserved. The performance was most euphonious, and it is impossible to refrain from mentioning with special praise the work done by flutes, oboes and clarinets.

Mme. Galski reached and maintained a higher standard of excellence than ever before at these concerts, and in fact she has never sung here so well as she sang last night the music by Mozart and Wagner. In the air of the countess she displayed a beautiful quality of tone and a pure and sustained legato. Her interpretation was Mozartian, for the music of Mozart is not so emotional in its melodic thought as in the suggestion. His vocal passion has the self-restraint, the classic calm of the figures on Grecian frieze or urn.

In the finale of "Goetterdaemmerung" Mme. Galski was dramatic within the frame of the concert stage. She did not try to convert the concert hall into an opera house, yet her discretion did not choke emotion. She was a mortal Bruennhilde, a woman who had known life's joys and sorrows, not a shrieking goddess of viragoes.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY in B flat major, No. 4.

JOACHIM,

HUNGARIAN CONCERTO for VIOLIN.

PAUL DUKAS,

SCHERZO, "L'Apprenti Sorcier"
(First time.)

WAGNER,

OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser."

Soloist:

Mr. WILLY HESS.

First appearance in America.

"Dove Sono," from "Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Symphonic poem, "Penthesilea".....Wolf
(First time.)
Finale of "Goetterdaemmerung".....Wagner
Hugo Wolf, who died early in 1903, after he had spent about five years in a Viennese madhouse, was from his youth an enthusiastic admirer of Heinrich von Kleist, whose powerful and horrible tragedy, based on the story of the Amazon and Achilles, urged the composer to music. Not only did Wolf read the tragedy constantly, he insisted on reading it to others. He composed his symphonic poem, his only orchestral work of long breath; his thoughts were on his "Penthesilea" during his first stay in an asylum, and he was anxious to compose an opera with the erotically cruel woman as the heroine.

The symphonic poem is in three sections: "The Departure of the Amazons for Troy"; "Penthesilea's Dream of the Festival of Roses" (it was the traditional and rigid law of the Amazons that only conquered foes should celebrate with them this feast in their own town, Themiscyra); and the third section, which Wolf wished to amplify, portrays "Combats, Passions, Frenzy, Annihilation," for after Achilles had determined to yield to her in the fight, she, suspecting his design, and her amorous frenzy turning to raging hate, slew him with an arrow, and, setting her hands on his body, tore with them his flesh and rejoiced in his blood; then, with the return to reason, she stabbed herself and fell on the mutilated corpse.

Wolf composed "Penthesilea" in 1883, when he was 23 years old. He never heard it performed except once at a slingshot rehearsal that was for the purpose of deriding him. The work was produced at Halle in November of last year, and it has since gone the round of German cities. Theodore Thomas produced it in Chicago last April.

The subject tempted Goldmark, whose overture is not wholly successful, and Felix Draeseke wrote to Kleist's tragedy a symphonic prologue which we have never heard. Did Wolf find the adequate musical expressions of the emotions that undoubtedly surged within him?

His talent, from what we know by his music and through hearsay, was lyrical, not dramatic, and in this overture the lyrical episodes are those most poetic and effective. The opening measures of the symphonic poem immediately fix the attention and the interest is well maintained in spite of certain crudities until the dream section, which is prettily sonorous and contains some beautiful measures, but the individuality of the music is not pronounced, and there is little suggestion of the wild sensuousness of the festival. The last section, which should have been stirringly dramatic, poignantly tragic, disappointed, and it did not apparently satisfy Wolf.

There are a few ingenious details in the battle music, there are tragic strokes toward the end, and the last measures are impressive, but throughout this section the composer, to borrow a homely phrase, is revealed as one sparring for wind. No doubt there was in his mind the fitting musical expression, but he had not then the ability to formulate it, and his orchestral speech was often thick and stammering.

Mr. Gerlicke, it was plain, had taken great pains in rehearsal; his reading was sympathetic; the superb orchestra did all in its power to second him; but the music itself disappointed. Perhaps this female Sadist, this queen of masochism, whose full-length portrait deserves the place of honor in the gallery of royal perverts, will never find a supreme eulogist in music. As for poor Wolf, he was not the first composer to glow with enthusiasm over a literary work and then to fail in an attempt at transliteration.

Nevertheless, Mr. Gerlicke deserves hearty thanks for acquainting us with the symphonic poem, much of which, at a first hearing, seemed ordinary or futile and both futile and ordinary; for Wolf's music has excited attention since his death; already there is a Wolf bibliography; his sworn admirers praise him preposterously; and it is always a good thing for a Symphony audience to receive impressions from a work rather than from what has been written about it.

The symphony was played with what might be called Brahms bravura. The exposition was clear, yet not coolly anatomical; the nuances were skilfully prepared and delicately contrasted; the rhythmic treatment was spontaneous, and the continuity of the long line was admirably preserved. The performance was most euphonious, and it is impossible to refrain from mentioning with special praise the work done by flutes, oboes and clarinets.

Mme. Gadske reached and maintained a higher standard of excellence than ever before at these concerts, and in fact she has never sung here so well as she sang last night the music by Mozart and Wagner. In the air of the countess she displayed a beautiful quality of tone and a pure and sustained legato. Her interpretation was Mozartian, for the music of Mozart is not so emotional in its melodic thought as in the suggestion. His vocal passion has the self-restraint, the classic calm of the figures on Grecian frieze or urn.

In the finale of "Goetterdaemmerung" Mme. Gadske was dramatic within the frame of the concert stage. She did not try to convert the concert hall into an opera house, yet her discretion did not choke emotion. She was a mortal Bruennhilde, a woman who had known life's joys and sorrows, not a shrieking goddess of viragoes.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERLICHE, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN,	SYMPHONY in B flat major, No. 4.
JOACHIM,	HUNGARIAN CONCERTO for VIOLIN.
PAUL DUKAS,	SCHERZO, "L'Apprenti Sorcier" (First time.)
WAGNER,	OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser."

Soloist:

Mr. WILLY HESS.

First appearance in America.

Bloomfield - Zeisler

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

SAINT-SAENS,

SYMPHONY No. 1, in E flat major, op. 2.

- I. Adagio: Allegro.
- II. March scherzo.
- III. Adagio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro maestoso.
(First time.)

HENSELT,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in F. minor, op. 16.

- I. Allegro patetico.
- II. Larghetto.
- III. Allegro agitato.

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM No. 4, "The Battle of the Huns." after Kaulbach's Painting.

GOLDMARK,

OVERTURE, "Sappho," op. 44.

Soloist:

Mme. FANNIE BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Bloomfield-Zeisler

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

SAINT-SAENS,

SYMPHONY No. 1, in E flat major, op. 2.

I. Adagio: Allegro.

II. March scherzo.

III. Adagio.

IV. Finale: Allegro maestoso.

(First time.)

HENSELT,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in F. minor, op. 16.

I. Allegro patetico.

II. Larghetto.

III. Allegro agitato.

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM No. 4, "The Battle of the Huns." after Kaulbach's Painting.

GOLDMARK,

OVERTURE, "Sappho," op. 44.

Soloist:

Mme. FANNIE BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Nov. 25, 1904
Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

Here is the programme of the sixth Symphony Concert, at which Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler was the soloist:

Saint-Saëns: Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major, Op. 2. (First time.)
 Henselt: Concerto for Pianoforte, in F minor, Op. 16.
 Liszt: Symphonic Poem No. 4, "The Battle of the Huns," after Kaulbach's painting.
 Goldmark: Overture, "Sappho," Op. 44.

The symphony in E-flat was written, it seems, when Saint-Saëns was eighteen years old. That a young musician should have written a symphony, even a young French musician, is not at all remarkable. It is extraordinary, however, that the work of so young an unknown person should have been produced in Paris at the time, and it is still more remarkable that Mr. Gericke should have thought it worth playing in Boston today—at least, the whole of it. The march-like scherzo is sufficiently animated and piquant to give pleasure at any time, anywhere, for its chief theme is attractive and the movement sounds well, but why the rest? The first movement is hopelessly commonplace, even if very well made for a novice. The adagio, which was admired in 1853, shows more signs than the rest of the mature Saint-Saëns, but Saint-Saëns in his sentimental, drawing-room mood. And the finale is noisy and dull. The early works of a genius of forceful originality, like Richard Strauss or Liszt, are worth hearing for the light they throw on their composers' development, but it is difficult to conceive how the early studies of a man like Saint-Saëns, who, despite his melodic charm, his grace, and his elegance, was never a great force in musical progress, can be of value. A juvenile drama by Shakespeare might repay study, but scarcely one by Mr. Stephen Phillips.

The "Battle of the Huns," too, is a composition calculated to inspire less delight than interest. It has been told before how Liszt was led to write it by his admiration for Kaulbach's frescos in Berlin. The subject is certainly enticing to an imaginative mind; spirits of dead warriors, conquerors and conquered, rising to fight their battle over, without the walls of Rome. As material for a symphonic poem the worth of this subject is not lessened by the fact that the Huns probably never fought a battle near Rome, at least not under the guidance of Attila. Nor will music-lovers of today be disturbed by an objection that occurred to a London critic when the work was first produced at the Crystal Palace, London: "Nor do we think that the subject agrees with modern religious doctrines." Many will object, however, to the comparative dullness of the composition. Liszt well knew how to suggest the ghostliness of atmosphere necessary for his poem; the depicting of battle cries and martial uproar lay entirely within his powers; and he could lead up to a tremendous climax. But it was long before the height was reached; listeners grew weary with waiting. In this battle-piece one can do little more than admire the composer's fertile imagination, his in-genulty, and his cunning at writing music fifty years ago that sounds today more modern than the moderns. But Liszt wrote much better music than that of the "Battle of the Huns." The poem was grandly played.

Mrs. Zeisler did herself an injustice in electing to play once more Henselt's concerto, a work ever more noted for its consummate technical difficulties than for its intrinsic musical beauties, although, to be sure, in its day it was held high. Now, however, it sounds hopelessly old-fashioned, but, like black walnut furniture, it is not sufficiently decayed to have acquired the dignity or the fascination of an "antique." Much of it, furthermore, must have been vulgar even in the concerto's heyday of fame. It was superbly played by Mrs. Zeisler, who took the music precisely for what it was worth, not trying to make something out of nothing. In her performance there was wondrous beauty of tone, now strong and full, again sparkling coldly, sometimes as sweet and warm as Mr. de Pachmann's. Since there is no pianist at present before the public who can play a waltz with such entrancing rhythm as Mrs. Zeisler, one can pardon the common little waltz that appears in the third movement of the concerto; she did play it enchantingly. Throughout the work Mrs. Zeisler was at her best, rhythmic, brilliant, and glowing with temperament. Hers was playing of a sort too rarely heard, even from Mrs. Zeisler herself, much less from anyone else. At the end she was recalled four times.

This week there is to be another soloist: Mr. Ysaye. Here is the programme as announced: Berlioz, overture, "King Lear"; Beethoven, concerto for violin; Liszt-Mottl, Saint Francis' sermon to the birds; Schumann, Symphony No. 3, Rhenish.

R. R. G.

SIXTH SYMPHONY SUCCESS SCORED

Famous Orchestra Plays Saint-Saëns' First Symphony—It is a Boyish Work, Performed in Boston for First Time.

MRS. BLOOMFIELD-
 ZEISLER SOLOIST

Plays an Antiquated Concerto of

Henselt's with Musical Intelligence and Imagination—Did Not Modernize It.

Herald — Nov. 27, 1904.

The programme of the sixth Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke, conductor, in Symphony Hall last night, was as follows:

Symphony in E flat major, No. 1, op. 2... (first time.) Saint-Saens
Concerto in F minor.....Henselt
Symphonic poem, "The Battle of the Huns".....Liszt
Overture, "Sappho".....Goldmark

Saint-Saens' symphony was played here for the first time. It was produced in Paris when the composer was 17 years old, and it was produced anonymously. Some, after the performance last night—and it may here be said that Mr. Gericke and the orchestra bestowed on this work the care with which they would treat a symphony by Brahms or Bruckner—may wonder why the symphony was played at all; for the purely musical interest of this youthful work is indeed slight. The march-scherzo is pretty in its naivete, and its opening is Haydnesque; the adagio is mellifluous, and now and then escapes from the salon; but the first movement is like unto the church of the Laodiceans, and we doubt whether the entrance last night of the sax instruments added by Saint-Saens in the finale would have made the last movement any less inherently common.

It may also be said by some that it is a wrong to a distinguished composer to revive works of his young years; that he himself, if living, would gladly see them forgotten. Two of Saint-Saens' symphonies, performed in 1857 and 1860, were dropped overboard; they disappeared, as the boy Xury in "Robinson Crusoe"; but this one in E flat was revived in Paris as lately as 1896. Perhaps the composer, reversing the order, loves this work as his little Benjamin.

It should be remembered that young French composers in the fifties did not instinctively look to the concert hall for glory; they strained every effort to gain a hearing in the opera house, and, failing in that, they began with operettas. Saint-Saens was serious in his youth; his irony as revealed in the "Danse Macabre" and in "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" came later, and it has remained until some may be excused for believing that he is now ironical when most serious.

It was a surprising thing in 1853 for a young Frenchman to write a symphony; and there is much in this particular work that was then creditable to a lad. Let us not forget musical perspective. We are inclined to judge a work that is 50 years old by comparing it with some stupendous machine, "The Day of Judgment," or "Kosmos," which will be completed next year. A boy of 17 wrote in 1853 a symphony. He knew his Haydn, his Mendelssohn, and he appreciated at least Mozart and Beethoven. He did not attempt to out-Berlioz Berlioz, as some young composers of today endeavor to go beyond Richard Strauss and Claude Debussy. He remembered the traditions and he tried to do his best in the approved way. Yet here and there, not often it is true, are hints at the mature Saint-Saens, in the use of wind instruments, in a certain elegance of expression that distinguishes him from all other composers.

Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler gave an exceedingly fine performance of a concerto that is for the most part antiquated. When she is at her best she has few rivals in the expression of passion. Some years ago an enthusiastic admirer hailed her as the Duse of the piano—or was she the Bernhardt of the piano? She outlived this praise. She is a heroic pianist, yet not such a reckless Amazon as Sophie Menter. The color of her passion glows, it is not that of the white heat which we associate with Miss Aus der Ohe. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler has warmth and strength and the nervousness of woman. To call her a virile player would be to misunderstand her, to fail in appreciation.

She chose Henselt's concerto, which has long been dear to her. She played it years ago in New York when she made her first appearance there after study in Europe. The concerto was famous in its day. It was considered in the '40s superbly romantic. Nothing is so short-lived as the modernity of romanticism. That which made Byron famous in his day and generation now makes him intolerable to many. The Byron that lives is the poet of "Beppo" and "Don Juan," the writer of the letters, not the creator of Lara, Manfred and the rest of the scowling band.

Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler showed her musical intelligence and imagination by playing Henselt's music in the manner of its period. She did not attempt to modernize its spirit. Her beautiful tone, her brilliant technic, her song and dash, her control of the phrase and her cunning preservation of the flowing line—all this display of rare talent almost persuaded one that Henselt's concerto still has vitality.

Liszt's "Battle of the Huns" improves on acquaintance. There is no doubt concerning the man's sincerity in composing as he did. No one can do as much as he did and be constantly a possessor in his works, his letters—Liszt was an amazing correspondent—his life. He heard the symbolical battle in his music; he saw the triumph of the cross. The mere attempt to portray such things in a symphonic poem would have staggered a lesser man of his time. That Liszt not only escapes being ridiculous, but actually makes an impression by this work is much. And how constantly composers now living are in his debt! How grateful Wagner should have been to him!

Goldmark has written several overtures, and his latest will be produced here this season. "Sappho" is unmistakably Goldmarkian; but does this music really put the little dark woman with a beautiful smile before one? To us the one overture of Goldmark is still the "Sakuntala." The most passionate and yet the most reserved, the most human of women poets, whose sex cried out in lines that have mocked the centuries, should have more rapt and growing music associated with her name.

The performance of the orchestra throughout was of the highest order.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme. Nov 28 1904
Saint-Saens....Symphony No. 1, in E flat major (First time.)

Henselt.....Concerto for Pianoforte, in F minor
Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Liszt.....Symphonic Poem, "Hunnenschlacht"
Goldmark.....Overture to "Sappho"

There was no very great necessity for a hearing of Saint-Saens' first symphony. It is interesting to know that Saint-Saens was, chronologically as well as intrinsically, the first of French symphonic composers. One also feels some interest in the fact that a youth of 18 could write so good a musical work. But, in music, very young men never write important orchestral works. Bryant wrote "Thanatopsis" at 19 years; Dante G. Rossetti achieved "The Blessed Damosel" at the same age; but music is a deeper language than words, and no one who has not lived and suffered sufficiently can deliver an important message in this emotional field. In this domain, more than in any other, the words of Goethe are true:—

Who ne'er in tears hath broken bread,
Who never through the night's dark hour
Sat tortured, weeping, on his bed,
He knows ye not, ye heavenly Powers!

The only musical masterpiece that we can recall as having been composed by a youth (pace, Pergolesi!) is Mendelssohn's "Midsummer-night's Dream Overture," and that deals with jollity and animal spirits, not with deep emotion.

Possibly for the same reason, the Scherzo of this symphony is the best movement. It gave our great oboist, M. Longy, a chance to display his exquisite tone, and the flute and wood-wind generally were prominent in its measures. Its dainty ending, with violin obbligato, was charming.

The Adagio, however, seemed like Mrs. Winslow's soothing syrup set to music. The conductor should here have discarded his baton and led his men by waving a lace handkerchief at them. The finale grew more heroic, in fact its chief figure and parts of its development bore close relationship to the first movement of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony. There was also some strict counterpoint displayed here, and the symphony ended in a blare of brasses which would have been still heavier if all the Saxhorns and Cornets of Saint-Saens had been there.

If the word "virile" can be applied to feminine playing, Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler deserved it for the immense amount of force that she put into the Henselt concerto. The piano fairly dominated the orchestra. The wrist action and double octave work was simply astounding. The concerto itself has little to say to the auditor who has steeped himself in modern progressions; all the fortissimo effects in the world cannot make Henselt's ideas massive, and in his tender and more delicate touches he is left far behind by Chopin.

Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler played with solute mastery of every technical point, and if there was more of vehemence than of subtlety, more of technique than of poetry, in the performance, we fancy that much of the fault must be charged against Henselt himself. The pianist was recalled 4 times, responding with alacrity to the public demand.

Liszt's "Hunnenschlacht" gave the first really great example of scoring of the programme. The work is not as attractive as his great "Les Preludes," and it is scarcely one of those compositions which can appeal to the entire public. Possibly this was the first orchestral work to attempt to transcribe a painting into music. Since that time the picture gallery of the orchestra has been increased by Weingartner's symphonic poem on Boecklin's "Elysian Fields," by Hans Huber's symphony on several paintings by the same artist, by Paine's "Island Fantasy" upon a couple of paintings by J. Appleton Brown, and by other bits of pictorial music.

The introduction of the organ in the finale was very impressive and the entire interpretation was finely given. It was an especial evening for the solo flute. Before this number M. Maquarre had given some excellent obbligato passages, but in this he shone pre-eminent, the flute solo being beautifully given.

In Goldmark's "Sappho" the harp came to the front. Not once in a dozen seasons does the harp have so prominent an obbligato in an orchestral work as in this overture. Yet we imagine that the original Sappho would have been rather astonished at the effects of an Erard double action harp! Mr. Schuecker played the brilliant passages with splendid power. Few can imagine how difficult it is to make the harp effective in Symphony Hall. It was played, on this occasion, not only with the necessary freedom and elasticity, but with exactly the right degree of power.

Since this concert seemed largely made up of solo points of excellence, we must add a few words of praise for Mr. Hess' breadth and brilliancy in the violin obbligato at the end. There is not the slightest doubt that the concert-meister's chair is again well filled.

Louis C. Elson.

SIXTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

The program for the sixth Symphony rehearsal and concert had for a novelty Saint-Saens' E flat major symphony, which was given for the first time here. Mme Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist, playing the Henselt F minor concerto for piano. "The Battle of the Huns," by Liszt, and Goldmark's "Sappho" overture completed the program. Henselt's concerto is a show piece of immensely difficult proportions, the composer having written it to suit his own abilities. He had unusually large hands and many of the chord passages, which he could finger readily, prove almost insurmountable obstacles to players whose stretch of fingers are of the average range. Mme Zeisler fulfilled the requirements in this direction admirably, playing the massive octave runs with a dexterity and sustained power that was really masculine, and showing a technique and finger strength very, very seldom displayed by women pianists.

In the lighter passages, such as the cantabile theme in the first movement, the melody in octaves and arpeggios in the earlier part of the second movement and in the various graceful ornamentations of the finale there was a splendid display of tonal beauty in fingering, the passages being played with a skill, delicacy and clarity that showed Mme Zeisler's well-known abilities to the greatest advantage. Very brilliant and very powerful were the bravura phrases of the first part, the octave chords and left-hand arpeggios of the larghetto and the elaborate fortissimo runs of the allegro; yet such a vast amount of piano "thunder" with but few contrasting episodes arouses wonder more than it does a sustained interest, and an auditor is liable to be more impressed by the physical than by the artistic abilities of the performer, which of course is a disadvantage to the player. All in all, Mme Zeisler gave a wide and rather unusual exhibition of the pianistic art of a woman and her interpretation won her much applause and many recalls to the stage.

The Saint-Saens symphony, his first, contains a great deal of melody, which probably will not enhance the worth of the composition in the minds of music lovers prone to advanced ideas. It should find favor though with many concert patrons, for it is skilfully scored, there is a lot of real good music in each of the four movements and the melodies are worked out and not chopped off short, as is so frequently the case in the larger compositions of the present day.

The first part impresses one as being a charming score without much depth of motive, but pleasing, rather light and of a pastoral nature, the latter being suggested, but the dainty harmonies given to the horns. In the march one simple theme is fully developed by the single instruments and afterwards by ensemble work, with possibly a touch of a Mendelssohn march in its motif. The scherzo is very delicate in its construction, gay, tripping and delicate and in fine contrast to the following adagio, which is more grave in character and contains a captivating background of united string accompaniments and quaint throbbing phrases given out at times by the brasses. One finale, in which some of the fugal writing finds parallel in Sullivan's march of the peers, in "Iolanthe," is fairly effective, but rather too boisterous in some portions of the working out.

The orchestral work was up to the usual standard. The "accompaniments" for the piano were not so vigorous as to cloud the work of the soloist, and the symphony offered no obstacles to a sympathetic and thoroughly delightful interpretation. The violin part of the third movement calls for special praise. "The Battle of the Huns" was a musical conflict which raged in a manner to please everyone, and the "Sappho" overture was given with beautiful results, all the lights and shades being splendidly preserved. Mr Hess performed his violin part artistically, and Mr Schencker deserves a good word for his playing of the harp passages, which are very prominent in the score.

The celebrated violinist, Ysaye, will be this week's soloist, playing Bach's E major concerto and the "Scotch Fantasy," by Bruch. The other selections on the program will comprise the "King Lear" overture Berlioz; "St Francis Sermon to the Birds," Liszt-Mottl, and Schumann's "Rhenish" overture.

cycling recently. giving cycles of t, Schumann and please a few, especially something in other is German is not it will do for the it would think it hing sung in good

304. No. 1

armoi

for nearly y program er season lusty, an yet espe e of any turbulence ason and cally the te atten- r so be mind as hing to ostly in ho are ike up ound. d his long. do. Well.

ems all ing in ay ly e e l

Post, diff figure

tively speaking he has "sawed wood" since then, and knows the fiddle from top to bottom. But who of that early date ever dreamed that the youthful fiddler would return at the head of a great organization. Time works great changes in more ways than one.

And in many respects Willy Hess has already earned his salary, for as an emergency soloist he is the real thing. At a recent concert one Hakon Schmedes, who had aspirations as a soloist, was to have waked the echoes of Symphony Hall with his dulcet strains, but when the fateful hour approached, I am informed that the aforesaid Hakon fell by the wayside with an acute disease that is popularly known as "cold feet."

Conductor Gericke, with his well known astuteness, considered this young fiddler from classic Europe a comer that would put Gsaye and Kreisler away back in the although I am told his value as a routine player is not of the phenomenal; became, so to speak, one of the elect name appeared on the list of musical binders. But when the day came for rehearsal I learn that our friend was up to it good and hard, and Mr. Gericke saw through a glass darkly. What has been kept with the greatest secrecy outcome was that Willy Hess did and trick and did it well.

And I believe that H. S. does not ride the parlor cars with Conductor Gericke, Adamonski and others of the elect orchestra makes its little monthly side he goes in the smoker with the other b transit gloria Schmedes.

The orchestra offered a good program benefit concert last Sunday evening and greatly surprised at the comparative audience. There was De Pachmann, who played as well as he ever did in his life. Then there was a new suite by Massenet, and a piece strings and organ by the Italian Sgambati, who was musically "made in Germany." Both these numbers pleased and Mr. Gericke should bring them out at the regular symphony concerts. They are better than such things as the Hugo Wolf monstrosity and others of its kind. Let us have them again.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Post. Nov. 27
Saint-Saens' First Symphony Given as the Novelty

The programme of the sixth Symphony concert last evening included the following numbers:
Symphony No. 1, Op. 2.....Saint-Saens
Concerto for pianoforte, Op. 16.....Henselt
Symphonic poem, "Battle of the Huns".....Liszt
Overture, "Sappho".....Goldmark

Mme. Bloomfield Zeisler was the soloist. The performance of the Saint-Saens symphony was probably the first in the United States. It is a product of the composer's early thought, and written at 18 years of age. The work is of historic interest mainly, though the scherzo shows indications of that skill in orchestration that is so manifest in Saint-Saens' later productions.

But it is hardly worth a place on a Symphony programme, although the performance last evening satisfied the curiosity of many who wished to hear the early work of the most eminent among living French composers.

The other works for orchestra heard at this concert are not especially noteworthy. The overture, however, has pleasant moments, although much inferior to the composer's "Sakuntala."

Mme. Zeisler played the Henselt concerto with her old-time brilliancy and technical proficiency. The slow movement, the gem of the entire work, was played in well-nigh ideal manner, and was most enjoyable in every way. Mme. Zeisler was loudly applauded for her superb performance, and several times recalled.

The programme of the seventh rehearsal and concert this coming week will include the "King Lear" overture of Berlioz; Liszt's piano piece, "St. Francis' Sermon to the Birds," orchestra led by Felix Mottl; the third Schumann symphony, and the Beethoven violin concerto, played by Ysaye, who makes his return here after several years' absence.

Symphony Rehearsals

for both. E. F. K., Boston Transcript.

H 24 & 25, near centre aisle; $25 for one, $45 for both. E. F. K., Boston Transcript. SWS(A); ja 7

The celebrated violinist, Yehudi Menuhin, will be this week's soloist, playing a major concerto and the "Serenade" by Bruch. The other items on the program will comprise Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Berlioz's "Symphony in E-flat major," Liszt's "Symphony for the Grand Organ," and Schumann's "Rhenish" overture.

I don't know how little Willy impressed those who heard him at the time, but figura-

The orchestra offered a good program at its benefit concert last Sunday evening and I was greatly surprised at the comparatively small audience. There was De Pachmann, who played as well as he ever did in his life. Then there was a new suite by Massenet, and a piece for strings and organ by the Italian Sgambati, who was musically "made in Germany." Both

Symphony Rehearsals H 24 & 25. near centre
aisle; $25
for one, $45 for both. E. F. K., Boston Transcript.
SWS(A). 3 7

Yearsals H 24 & 25,
near centre
aisle; $25
F. K., Boston Transcript.
in 7

SYMPHONY THRONES IS CHARMED BY MME. ZEISLER.

Boston American Nov. 27.
Sixth Concert Marked by a Program of Rare Beauty, and Was Finely Interpreted by the Soloist and Orchestra

SELECTIONS OFFERED
STRONG CONTRASTS

By Kent Perkins.

It was a musical feast of rare and exquisite beauty that was served last night by the Symphony Orchestra to the great audience that filled Symphony Hall at the sixth concert. The melodic and harmonic beauty was of two contrasting kinds, that of the passion of love and that of religious aspiration and triumph. It was expressed through the following programme:

Saint-Saens—Symphony No. 1, in E flat major, op. 2.
Henselt—Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, op. 16.
Liszt—Symphonic poem No. 4, "The Battle of the Huns," after Kaulbach's painting.
Goldmark—Overture, "Sappho," op. 44.

Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler was the piano soloist.

The orchestra, under Mr. Gericke's masterful leadership, never displayed more remarkable sympathy, depth and sincerity of feeling and skill in interpretation than it did throughout the above programme.

In the Saint-Saens Symphony, which was performed for the first time in Boston, the note of love was introduced. The work was written when the composer was eighteen years old and was offered for a competition in Brussels in 1853 for the celebration of the wedding of the Prince of Brabant, but was rejected.

One may readily suppose that a nuptial character was given to the work on account of the princely marriage. Preparations for a courtly wedding in Brabant can be heard through the opening adagio movement. The march-scherzo, which follows, pictures the procession entering the church. The third movement, adagio, sings beautifully with the joy of love's fruition, while the triumphal march of the final allegro maestoso splendidly closes the ceremony.

Religious aspiration appeared in the Henselt concerto, and Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler was warmly acclaimed for her delightful interpretation of it. With a technique that merits the warmest praise and with most sensitive and delicate feeling, she portrayed the alternating tenderness and depth of emotion in the work. Much of the keen pleasure given by this selection was due to the intimate sympathy apparent between the orchestra and the soloist.

Religious triumph in the victory of the Cross over heathendom was vividly portrayed in the "Battle of the Huns," to which Liszt wrote as a musical interpretation of Kaulbach's mural painting in the Berlin Museum. The ghostly rising of the slain warriors, their spectral battle, the clash of arms and the final victory in the "Crux Fidelis" theme were splendidly suggested. Battle, defeat and glorious victory filled the air, the final triumph being magnificently completed by the all-pervading tones of the organ.

Love, yearning, passionate and despairing, returned in the "Sappho" overture. Its song was sung under the cloudless skies of Hellas, with the blue Aegean flashing in the sunlight, nymphs and shepherds dancing on the hillside and the classic atmosphere of Greece filling all the melodies and harmonies. The orchestra did much of its finest work in this selection, which was marked by the exquisite playing of the first violin, Professor Willy Hess.

At the seventh symphony concert next Saturday evening the soloist will be Mr. Ysaye.

To-night the concert for the benefit of the Symphony orchestra's pension fund takes place, with M. de Pachmann at the piano.

SYMPHONY HALL

Sunday Evening, November 27, at eight

Pension Fund Concert

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

ASSISTED BY

De PACHMANN

WALLACE GOODRICH, Organist

and Vocal Artists to be announced

PROGRAM

1. OVERTURE, "Star of the North" . . . Meyerbeer
2. CONCERTO in E-flat major, for Piano and Orchestra, Liszt
3. HUNGARIAN SCENE (First time) . . . Massenet
4. SELECTIONS FROM "HANSEL AND GRETEL,"
for Voices and Orchestra . . . Humperdinck
5. PIANO SOLO
6. TE DEUM LAUDAMUS, for Strings and Organ, Sgambati
7. CAPRICCIO ITALIEN . . . Tschaikowsky

TICKETS, $2.00, $1.50, and $1.00, on sale at Symphony
Hall, Monday, November 21.

Symphony Hall . Sunday Evening, November 27, 1904<sup>95</sup> at eight

Pension Fund Concert

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

ASSISTED BY

De PACHMANN

MRS. GRACE B. WILLIAMS, Soprano
MRS. HELEN ALLEN HUNT, Contralto
WALLACE GOODRICH . Organist

PROGRAM

1. OVERTURE, "Star of the North" . . . . . Meyerbeer
2. CONCERTO in E-flat major, for Piano and Orchestra, . . . . . Liszt
3. HUNGARIAN SCENES . . . . . J. Massenet
SECOND SUITE (First time).
  - I. Allegro risoluto.
  - II. Allegretto leggiero.
  - III. Andantino, tr s calme.
  - IV. Allegro risoluto; Andante molto sostenuto religioso;
Allegro risoluto.
4. SELECTIONS FROM "HANSEL AND GRETEL,"
for Voices and Orchestra . . . . . Humperdinck
5. PIANO SOLO . . . . . Chopin
  - a. Nocturne in F minor, Op. 55, No. 1
  - b. Berceuse in D-flat, Op. 57
  - c. Etude in A-flat, Op. 25, No. 1
6. TE DEUM LAUDAMUS, for Strings and Organ . . . . . Sgambati
(First time.)
7. CAPRICCIO ITALIEN . . . . . Tschaikowsky

THE PIANO IS A BALDWIN

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, at Symphony Hall next Sunday night should crowd the hall to the doors, by reason of the purpose for which the concert is given and by reason of the programme itself. The programme will include Meyerbeer's overture to "The Star of the North," which has not been heard here for a long time; a scene from the Hungarian suite of Massenet; selections from Humperdinck's "Hansel und Gretel," for voices and orchestra; Sgambati's "Te Deum," for strings and orchestra, which was produced here by the Cecilia March 20, 1896 (the work is also known as "Andante Solenne," and when it was played at the Crystal Palace in 1894 other instruments were introduced); Tschaiowsky's Italian Caprice.

Mr. De Pachmann will play Liszt's brilliant concerto in E flat, and his performance is looked forward to with more than ordinary anticipation. He will also play solo piano pieces. Mr. Wallace Goodrich will be the organist.

It is an indisputable fact that no orchestra in the world surpasses the Boston Symphony; it is doubtful whether any European orchestra equals it in euphony of tone, in discipline, and in virtuos qualities. Perhaps we are all too much in the habit of taking the superb performances of this orchestra as a matter of course; perhaps we do not always realize what an honor this organization is to the city, what an important factor it is in the life of the town. New York and Philadelphia, cities that have their own orchestra, appreciate this band of players as highly as do Bostonians who have seen the growth of the organization founded and maintained by Maj. Higginson. What higher compliment could be paid this orchestra than the appeal made early this month to the citizens of Providence by Dr. Faunce of Brown, who asked them to show this season "the same interest in fine music and the same civic pride" as last year. "We do not ask much," wrote Dr. Faunce to the Providence Journal: "We ask only that each citizen who believes that life is more than bread and butter, who believes in the things of the spirit, shall give his patronage and his influence to this unselfish enterprise. Let every music teacher be there and interest his or her pupils. Let every serious student of music seize the opportunity. Let every man who would be a leader in the activities of our city be found there."

And now the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra give a concert that their pension fund may gain thereby. The years pass; one by one those who by their skill have given so much pure pleasure will be forced to retire through physical disability or by reason of old age. Nor does death spare players on instruments of strings, wood or brass; he sounds his pipe or beats his drum as in the mediaeval dances, and they must follow his call. This concert is given that the incapacitated, that the wives and children left behind may not suffer from material want. It is the orchestra's own concert; it is for the players and their families. Can there be any save a generous response? Herald

PLAYS FOR ITS PENSION FUND

Journal — Nov 28 1904

The first of this season's concerts for the benefit of its pension fund was given by the Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall last evening, with the assistance of Mr. De Pachmann, pianist; Mrs. Grace B. Williams, soprano; Mrs. Helen Allen Hunt, contralto, and Mr. Wallace Goodrich, organist. The program was:

Overture, "Star of the North".....Meyerbeer
Concerto in E flat major, for piano and orchestra.....Liszt
Hungarian Scenes.....J. Massenet
Selections from "Hansel and Gretel," for voices and orchestra.....Humperdinck
Piano solos.....Chopin
Nocturne in F minor, Op. 55, No. 1.
Berceuse in D flat, Op. 57.
Etude in A flat, Op. 25, No. 1.

Te Deum Laudamus, for strings and organ.....Sgambati
Capriccio Italien.....Tschaiowsky

The concert was brilliant, varied, entertaining, and should have made a stronger appeal to those who could well afford to fill the best seats. But the true music lovers were out in force, and thoroughly enjoyed everything, from Meyerbeer's flowery and antiquated "Star of the North" overture to the highly spiced, sensuous and enchanting "Italian Caprice" of Tschaiowsky. This latter, by the way, was played with much more bravura and abandon than when it was given at a regular Symphony not long ago.

Between the two extremes was set a musical bill of fare to please all tastes. Chief provider, of course, was Mr. De Pachmann, who played the sparkling Liszt concerto with power and sufficient diablerie to fascinate his audience. In the Chopin pieces later he seemed not quite in the mood, although the berceuse was given with his customary beauty.

The Massenet "Hungarian Scenes" were amiable and tuneful in a commonplace way, but smacked nothing of Hungary, and had no special message of any sort. In the "Hansel and Gretel" prayer music Mrs. Williams and Mrs. Hunt sang to good effect, and the orchestral portion revived pleasant memories of the Boston performance of the beautiful operetta some years ago. Sgambati's "Te Deum" has marked beauty, simplicity and devotional spirit, and it was played delicately and well.

THE PENSION FUND CONCERT.

If Charity covers a multitude of sins, sometimes Beneficence embellishes a number of merits. The latter was the case last night in Symphony hall. In these days, when Labor Unions are endeavoring even to rule Art, it is surely a most important matter to have the greatest artistic organization in the American orchestral field as independent as possible, and nothing can conduce more to such an independence than a well-organized pension fund to take care of the old age of the artists constituting our orchestra.

Thus much for the excellence of the cause; the excellences of the resulting concert might be given at much greater length, save for the fact that, since animadversion is prohibited at a beneficent occasion such as this, enthusiastic praise, even when thus fully deserved, loses its force. Many artists had volunteered their services. Wallace Goodrich was at the organ, Mrs. Grace Williams and Mrs. Helen Hunt appeared in a vocal number, but the bright particular star, among the artists assisting, was that pianist who is ruling Boston at present—De Pachmann. He played the Liszt E-flat concerto, and he gave it with considerable dalliance, as regards tempo and shading, but, as it is more of a Rhapsody than a concerto, this made the work more attractive than ever. The three Chopin solos that came later were exquisitely given, without any of the eccentricities and audacious alterations that we have been obliged to censure in the recent past. There were five recalls, but the pianist resolutely refused an encore.

The programme in full:—

1. Overture, "Star of the North".....Meyerbeer
2. Concerto in E-flat major for Piano and Orchestra.....Liszt
3. Hungarian Scene (First time).....Massenet
4. Selection from "Hansel and Gretel," for Voices and Orchestra.....Humperdinck
5. Piano Solos.....Chopin
6. Te Deum Laudamus, for Strings and Organ.....Sgambati
7. Capriccio Italien.....Tschaiowsky

It was a pleasant relaxation to hear a frankly popular Meyerbeer overture given by our orchestra, and the presentation of a work by the chief orchestral genius of Italy, Sgambati, was also an unusual pleasure. The "Hansel and Gretel" number was the exquisite slumber duet, and the orchestral postlude that accompanies the descent of the 14 angels. It has never yet had so perfect a performance in Boston.

The Massenet Suite was brilliant and spicy of orchestration, but we would have preferred his Suite of "Scenes Pittoresques," those dainty pictures of French village life.

The Sgambati work was a noble one and deserves an early hearing at the symphony concerts. Its melodic charm is very marked; it confines itself largely to the soft stops of the organ, and it makes excellent use of the pizzicato effects upon the contrabasses—where they sound better than upon any other orchestral instrument. Adm. Nov 28 1904 Louis C. Elson.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Globe — Nov 28 1904
De Pachmann Shows Perfection of His Art at Symphony Hall—Two "First Time" Numbers Given.

The Boston Symphony orchestra laid its usual splendid tribute of music upon the altar of its pension fund last night in Symphony hall, which should have been better filled, considering the object and the rare excellence of the program. Mr. Gericke conducted with his usual grace and precision, and his reading of the imaginative scores was enjoyed by no one more than by the distinguished guest-artist, de Pachmann, who was not only on uncommonly good terms with his own artistic achievements, but made no concealment of his appreciation of the scholarly work of Mr. Gericke and his orchestra. The audience was slow in getting into the hall, a great many coming in after the overture, "Star of the North," by Meyerbeer, one of the "bright, particular" pieces of a program designed, evidently, more for the popular taste than is usual with this sterling organization's always instructive concerts.

There were two "first time" numbers in the selections offered, a Sgambati "Te Deum Laudamus," in which the organ part was skilfully performed by Wallace Goodrich, and the second suite of the strangely beautiful Massenet "Hungarian Scenes." This latter composition opens with a fantastic theme, carried mainly by flute notes, accompanied by plucked strings, and plaintive threads of under melody. The second movement, equally charming, is notable for its violin unison passages, with harp accompaniment; while the feature of the third was a melting air, full of feeling, for the first violin. It was a number one would wish to hear many times again. The "Italian Caprice," by Tschaiowsky, first produced in Boston in October, 1897, and again in a recent regular symphony program, was the most keenly enjoyable of any purely orchestra number. From the instant of its opening trumpet fanfare, down through the wild witchery of its hunting gitana and tarantella airs, full of suggestions of the Romance folk-tunes, gypsy dancing and street songs; it was a thing of weird beauty. It made a brilliant close to an uncommonly brilliant program.

The soprano and contralto, Mrs. Grace B. Williams and Mrs. Helen Allen Hunt, had little to do, but did that little with remarkable effectiveness. Mrs. Williams' tender and lovely soprano part in the romantic "Hansel und Gretel" selection, with the unexpectedly long postlude, was sung with flawless expression. As in the lamented Sig. Rotoli's "Roman Festival Mass," she lifted her part above somewhat colorless surroundings, and made it memorable, and that with a vocal method more resonant than powerful, but always clear and true.

Of De Pachmann nothing but praise can be said. His Liszt concerto, the brilliant E-flat major one, was a marvel of technique and virtuosity, but it was in his three Chopin numbers that the dainty perfection of his art was more nearly reached. The F minor nocturne was the dreamy, filmy thing of the nether-realm its composer intended it should be. The familiar "A flat Etude" was played with extraordinary dash and skillful regard for shading. In the lovely "Berceuse in D flat," beginning with the singular bell-chiming effect, and proceeding with the quaintly simple left-hand part while the right is soaring into all sorts of fantasies, the effect was somewhat marred by a premature unmuzzling of the great organ, which was being made ready for the next number, but the blur, while it evidently disturbed both Gericke and De Pachmann, was of only momentary duration. The appearance of the enterprising piano movers while the audience was indulging in its propensity to recall again and again the uniformly good-natured pianist, was the signal for some hissing, a rather remarkable happening for Symphony hall of a Sunday evening, rather more reminiscent of "Pop" concert nights. But the affair was a grand musical success, and all who participated in it are worthy the highest praise.

98

Symphony Hall: Pension Fund Concert

Symphony Hall was rather sparsely filled yesterday evening on the occasion of the Pension Fund concert. The programme included the overture to Meyerbeer's "Star of the North"; a suite by Massenet called "Hungarian Scenes," played for the first time; a Te Deum Laudamus for strings and organ by Sgambati, Mr. Wallace Goodrich at the organ, and Tchaikovsky's "Capriccio Italien." There were also selections from Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel," in the course of which Mrs. Grace Williams sang the sandman's song (if memory serves) and Mrs. Williams and Mrs. Helen Hunt sang the evening prayer. Mr. de Pachmann contributed the E-flat concerto of Liszt, and three Chopin solo pieces—nocturne in F minor, the berceuse, and the A-flat study, Op. 25.

The feature of the evening was Mr. de Pachmann's playing. When it was not beautiful, as once in a while it was not, it was very interesting to see what Mr. de Pachmann of the limpid scales would make of the thundering chords and wickedly contrived springs of the E-flat concerto. In this work he was not always comfortably at home, but it was astonishing to hear the depth of beautiful tone he produced in chord passages when he chose to. And throughout the concerto there was much playing that can never be forgotten; Robin Goodfellow might have been by to cast his influence on the keys, so elfin-like was much of Mr. de Pachmann's music, so uncanny. The end of the concerto, by the way, was not happy. Even more beautiful still was the berceuse from Mr. de Pachmann, for, after all, emotions that are simply, broadly human are the highest. The scherzo movement of the concerto made one shiver, but the berceuse might easily have made one cry. Trans. Nov 28, 1904. R. R. G.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Vladimir De Pachmann's Interpretation of Chopin's Berceuse a Brilliant

Herald Performance. Nov 28, 1904

The first concert this season in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gericke conducted. The programme was of a designedly popular nature. It included Meyerbeer's overture to "The Star of the North," an overture of the pot-pourri order, which has not been heard here for a long time; Massenet's Second Suite, "Hungarian Scenes," of which the third movement is the most interesting; a scene from Humperdinck's "Hänsel and Gretel," with Mrs. Grace B. Williams, soprano, and Mrs. Helen Allen Hunt, contralto, as the praying and sleepy children in the forest; Sgambati's "Te Deum Laudamus" for strings and organ (Mr. Wallace Goodrich, organist), which was produced here some years ago at a Cecilia concert, and Tchaikovsky's "Italian Caprice."

Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann played, with orchestra, Liszt's piano concerto in E flat major, No 1, and Chopin's nocturne in F minor, op. 55, No. 1, "Berceuse," and etude in A flat, op. 25, No. 1. His performance of the concerto was characterized by beauty of song and exquisite ornamentation, though in the stormier passages the pianist was the brilliant virtuoso.

The feature of the concert, however, was his beautiful performance of Chopin's "Berceuse." Mr. De Pachmann's interpretation of this much abused, maltreated piece was as sane as it was poetic. It was more than a wondrous triumph of euphony; its tenderness was ineffable and it was so free from affectation of sentimentalism. The audience would gladly have heard him in other compositions, for he was recalled again and again after the group of solo pieces.

The audience was one of fair size, but the occasion should have filled the hall. There was much applause, especially after the excerpt from "Hänsel and Gretel," and for Mr. De Pachmann.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

SAINT-SAËNS,

SYMPHONY No. 1, in E flat major.
(First time.)

HENSELT,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in F. minor.

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Hunnenschlacht."

GOLDMARK,

OVERTURE to "Sappho."

Soloist:

Mme. FANNIE BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.

was played with extraordinary dexterity and skilful regard for shading. In the lovely "Berceuse in D flat," beginning with the singular bell-chiming effect, and proceeding with the quaintly simple left-hand part while the right is soaring into all sorts of fantasies, the effect was somewhat marred by a premature unuzzling of the great organ, which was being made ready for the next number, but the blur, while it evidently disturbed both Gericke and De Pachmann, was of only momentary duration. The appearance of the enterprising piano movers while the audience was indulging in its propensity to recall again and again the uniformly good-natured pianist, was the signal for some hissing, a rather remarkable happening for Symphony hall of a Sunday evening, rather more reminiscent of "Pop" concert nights. But the affair was a grand musical success, and all who participated in it are worthy the highest praise.

Symphony Hall: Pension Fund Concert

Symphony Hall was rather sparsely filled yesterday evening on the occasion of the Pension Fund concert. The programme included the overture to Meyerbeer's "Star of the North"; a suite by Massenet called "Hungarian Scenes," played for the first time; a Te Deum Laudamus for strings and organ by Sgambati, Mr. Wallace Goodrich at the organ, and Tchaikovsky's "Capriccio Italien." There were also selections from Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel," in the course of which Mrs. Grace Williams sang the sandman's song (if memory serves) and Mrs. Williams and Mrs. Helen Hunt sang the evening prayer. Mr. de Pachmann contributed the E-flat concerto of Liszt, and three Chopin solo pieces—nocturne in F minor, the berceuse, and the A-flat study, Op. 25.

The feature of the evening was Mr. de Pachmann's playing. When it was not beautiful, as once in a while it was not, it was very interesting to see what Mr. de Pachmann of the limpid scales would make of the thundering chords and wickedly contrived springs of the E-flat concerto. In this work he was not always comfortably at home, but it was astonishing to hear the depth of beautiful tone he produced in chord passages when he chose to. And throughout the concerto there was much playing that can never be forgotten; Robin Goodfellow might have been by to cast his influence on the keys, so elfin-like was much of Mr. de Pachmann's music, so uncanny. The end of the concerto, by the way, was not happy. Even more beautiful still was the berceuse from Mr. de Pachmann, for, after all, emotions that are simply, broadly human are the highest. The scherzo movement of the concerto made one shiver, but the berceuse might easily have made one cry. Trans. Nov 28. 1904. R. R. G.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Vladimir De Pachmann's Interpretation of Chopin's Berceuse a Brilliant

Herald Performance. Nov 28. 1904

The first concert this season in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gericke conducted. The programme was of a designedly popular nature. It included Meyerbeer's overture to "The Star of the North," an overture of the pot-pourri order, which has not been heard here for a long time; Massenet's Second Suite, "Hungarian Scenes," of which the third movement is the most interesting; a scene from Humperdinck's "Hänsel and Gretel," with Mrs. Grace B. Williams, soprano, and Mrs. Helen Allen Hunt, contralto, as the praying and sleepy children in the forest; Sgambati's "Te Deum Laudamus" for strings and organ (Mr. Wallace Goodrich, organist), which was produced here some years ago at a Cecilia concert, and Tchaikovsky's "Italian Caprice."

Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann played, with orchestra, Liszt's piano concerto in E flat major, No 1, and Chopin's nocturne in F minor, op. 55, No. 1, "Berceuse," and etude in A flat, op. 25, No. 1. His performance of the concerto was characterized by beauty of song and exquisite ornamentation, though in the stormier passages the pianist was the brilliant virtuoso.

The feature of the concert, however, was his beautiful performance of Chopin's "Berceuse." Mr. De Pachmann's interpretation of this much abused, maltreated piece was as sane as it was poetic. It was more than a wondrous triumph of euphony; its tenderness was ineffable and it was so free from affectation of sentimentalism. The audience would gladly have heard him in other compositions, for he was recalled again and again after the group of solo pieces.

The audience was one of fair size, but the occasion should have filled the hall. There was much applause, especially after the excerpt from "Hänsel and Gretel," and for Mr. De Pachmann.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SAINT-SAËNS,

SYMPHONY No. 1, in E flat major.
(First time.)

HENSELT,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in F. minor.

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Hunnenschlacht."

GOLDMARK,

OVERTURE to "Sappho."

Soloist:

Mme. FANNIE BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.

Eugen Ysaye.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BERLIOZ,

OVERTURE to "King Lear." op. 4.

BACH,

CONCERTO in E major No. 2, for VIOLIN, with accompaniment of Strings and Organ.

I. Allegro.
II. Adagio.
III. Allegro.

(First time at these concerts.)

LISZT,

LEGEND: "The Sermon of St. Francis of Assisi to the Birds," transcribed for ORCHESTRA by FELIX MOTTI.

(First time.)

BRUCH,

CONCERTO for VIOLIN in D minor, No. 2, op. 44.

I. Adagio ma non troppo.
II. Récit: (Allegro moderato.)
III. Finale: (Allegro molto.)

SCHUMANN,

SYMPHONY in E flat major, No. 3, Rhenish, op. 97

I. Lebhaft.
II. Scherzo: Sehr mässig.
III. Nicht schnell.
IV. Feierlich.
V. Lebhaft.

Soloist:

Mr. EUGENE YSAYE.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

Eugen Ysaye.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |           |   |
|-----------|---|
| BERLIOZ,  | OVERTURE to "King Lear." op. 4.   |
| BACH,     | CONCERTO in E major No. 2, for VIOLIN, with accompaniment of Strings and Organ.I. Allegro.II. Adagio.III. Allegro.(First time at these concerts.) |
| LISZT,    | LEGEND: "The Sermon of St. Francis of Assisi to the Birds," transcribed for ORCHESTRA by FELIX MOTTL.(First time.)  |
| BRUCH,    | CONCERTO for VIOLIN in D minor, No. 2, op. 44.I. Adagio ma non troppo.II. Récit: (Allegro moderato.)III. Finale: (Allegro molto.)                     |
| SCHUMANN, | SYMPHONY in E flat major, No. 3, Rhenish, op. 97I. Lebhaft.II. Scherzo: Sehr mässig.III. Nicht schnell.IV. Feierlich.V. Lebhaft.              |

Soloist:

Mr. EUGENE YSAYE.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

SPELLBOUND BY GENIUS OF YSAYE

At Seventh Symphony Concert Great Virtuoso Made Music of Bach Take on New Beauty—
Surpassed Triumph of Art.

HE BEGINS WHERE TECHNIC LEAVES OFF

Face of the Violinist Transfigured
While Playing—Great Audience
Wished to Hear More of Such Wonderful Music.

The programme of the seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, last night, Mr. Gericke, conductor; Mr. Eugene Ysaie, solo violinist, was as follows:

Overture to "King Lear".....Berlioz
Concerto in E major, No. 2, for violin...Bach
St. Francis' Sermon to the Birds...Liszt-Mottl
(First time.)

Concerto in D minor, No. 2, for violin...Bruch
Symphony in E flat minor, No. 8.....Schumann

Now and then a great virtuoso-musician visits us, and the Symphony concert is merely the occasion for the display of his rare qualities. There are some who cry out against the performance of any concerto in a concert of symphonic works, and in Paris the more hot-headed hiss when violinist or pianist makes his bow.

It will be a long time before audiences are trained to enjoy concerts without a pronounced solo individuality, before they are interested only in symphonies, overtures, symphonic poems. Until that time comes, and it will not be in our day and generation, the chief care should be in the selection of the singers and of the players on instruments.

Neither Mr. Ysaie nor the audience is to be blamed for wishing to hear him play as much as possible, for such violinists are rare. Sarasate is advanced in years and it is not likely that his every tone will be heard again in our cities. Joachim is already a tradition. Lady Halle was the last of the grand old school who showed us how Spohr should be played according to the spirit of his period.

Mr. Ysaie himself talks of abandoning the virtuoso's career to devote himself to orchestral conducting for which he has uncommon gifts. Let us then take pleasure in such artistry while we may, for Mr. Ysaie is today without a rival.

In him we find the blend of the purely classical and the ultra-modern romantic. The romanticism of his classicism is one of the most striking features of his performance, and this romanticism is by no means modernization. He does more than breathe the breath of life and beauty into old forms, into conventional figures and ornaments. By the wondrous quality of his tone, by nuances that seem as though they must have been indicated by Bach himself, in an inspired moment, by the love that the violinist himself feels for this music, that which would otherwise be a succession of formulas becomes a personal message charged with the highest poetic feeling.

Here we have nothing to do with technique. Mr. Ysaie begins where technique leaves off. In a way, he creates this music, but the creator himself does not step between the music and the rapt hearer. As the face itself of this violinist becomes illuminated with the beauty of the thoughts suggested to him by Bach, so the music itself takes on the form of beauty, and with the repetition of each formula there is a still loftier imaginative flight. The hearer is not then concerned with Bach or with Mr. Ysaie; he is conscious only of the presence of ineffable beauty, and he, too, though perhaps inherently prosaic, dreams dreams and sees entrancing visions.

This is not criticism; it is eulogy. And in this instance the eulogy of haunting impressions is the only just criticism.

This absence of the very thought of technique is the first step in the engrossing pleasure of Mr. Ysaie's performance. Whether he play music by Bach or by Bruch, the hearer is not aware of the labor of a violinist. He may remember one of the last speeches of Vieuxtemps, who, far away in enforced exile 'neath an alien sun, sighed plaintively for the sound of Ysaie's chanterelle. He may remember vaguely terms used by violinists in their discussions concerning the relative merits of the acknowledged great virtuosos, but all this is quickly forgotten. He is as absorbed as is Ysaie. The two listen to the music. The face of the violinist is transfigured, as was that of Cesar Franck when he heard celestial harmonies. Nor is the spell broken when the music ceases. Long afterward the tone, the phrase, the grace and the delicacy are remembered as by poor paralyzed Vieuxtemps in Algiers.

The word "interpretation" here seems pedantic, for the music has the spontaneity, the freedom of an improvisation. It is as though the music were for the first time called into being. Rare and flawless art! And there is that in Mr. Ysaie's performance that surpasses the triumph of art.

And here one might stop, without comment on Berlioz's "King Lear," an extraordinary work for its year, a work charged with the extravagance of the romantic period, when Shakespeare was the fetish of the revolutionaries; when Byron was a name to conjure with. The transcription by Mottl of Liszt's familiar piano piece in which St. Francis preaches to the chirping and twittering birds and turns their lightness to pious contemplation is an excellent example of imaginative scoring, and it was played with exceeding finesse. The symphony was heard by sated ears, and it is to us the least interesting of Schumann's four. The feature of the concert was the music of Bach as recreated by Mr. Ysaye, who also raised the concerto of Bruch to a higher level than that on which it naturally rests. The accompaniment to this concerto was by no means flawless.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Ysaye Plays With the Symphony Orchestra.

Melba, DePachmann and Other Noted Artists This Week.

Cecilia Club and Kneisel Quartet Concerts.

The celebrated violinist, Eugene Ysaye, appeared at last week's Symphony concerts, playing the E major Bach concerto and the "Scotch Fantasia," by Bruch. The program opened with the "King Lear" overture, by Berlioz; the Liszt-Mottl legend, "The Sermon of Francis of Assisi to the Birds," was played for the first time at these concerts and Schumann's "Rhenish" overture closed the concert. Mr Ysaye returns with the same impressive presence, wonderful virtuosity and subordination of self that characterized his former appearances in this city. No virtuoso seems freer from vanity and self-consciousness, and no violinist of the present day invests his music with more beauty and power. The simplicity, majesty and austerity of Bach's noble concerto was shown in beautiful form, technically faultless and masterful in breadth of expression, vitality and depth of feeling. The emotional appeal of the adagio, as played by Ysaye, was unusually effective; the perfection of sympathetic interpretation and accurate intonation.

The Bruch fantasia, also a familiar number, displayed the art of the great violinist in other phases; less impressive, to be sure, than in the Bach concerto, but just as wonderful. The grace and elegance, the dash and serenity with which he played the fantasia was in absolute keeping with the spirit of the work and formed a splendid contrast to the earlier selection. An unusual tribute was paid to Mr Ysaye by the members of the orchestra, who applauded vigorously after the second movement, which was given throughout its continuous legato with impeccable finish in phrasing, tonal contrasts and dexterous fingering. Mr Ysaye's perfect mastery of the violin needs no analysis. His superb attainments are well known and appear in no ways diminished. His reception was very cordial.

The novelty piece was the Liszt "legend," which was orchestrated by Felix Mottl and performed for the first time here. The suggestion of bird music, light, twittering and fantastic, coupled with the deeper tones of the "sermon," is charmingly shown in the score and the delicacy and joyousness of the whole piece makes it a very welcome addition to musical literature. The orchestra played the "legend" exquisitely, the bird music being sung by the lighter instruments in delicious harmony, with the "sermon" set forth with due resonance by the other contingents.

The orchestral accompaniments for Mr Ysaye's selections sounded particularly well, probably by reason of an incentive to good work aroused by the grand interpretations of the soloist. The "King Lear" overture and the Schumann symphony call for no special mention, each being up to the usual high standard expected of Mr Gericke's forces.

The next rehearsal and concert will be given Dec 16 and 17, with Mr Carlo Buonamici as soloist. The program will comprise Mozart's C major symphony, Rachmaninoff's piano concerto, suite, "Pelleas and Melisande," by G. Faure, and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

YSAYE WINS OVATION AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The especial feature of the seventh symphony concert last evening was the appearance of Eugene Ysaye as the solo violinist, after an absence of several years. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "King Lear".....Berlioz
Concerto for violin, E flat.....Bach
Legend, St. Francis Preaching to the Birds, Liszt-Motte
Concerto, No. 2, for violin.....Bruch
Symphony No. 3, "Rhenish".....Schumann

It was first announced that Mr. Ysaye would play the Beethoven concerto, afterwards changed to the Bach concerto, and the Bruch Scotch Fantasia, these latter being, it is understood, played at the rehearsal of Friday afternoon. But for last evening Mr. Ysaye played the Bruch D minor concerto instead of the Fantasia, which proved a most desirable change.

Mr. Ysaye returns the same virtuoso as before, with the same exquisite tone, ease of manner and supreme artist in every way. In his general performance he illustrates perfectly the maxim that the greatest art is to conceal art. The Bach concerto was inimitable, and the Bruch concerto, not as interesting as the composer's more familiar one in G minor, was interpreted in most convincing manner. Mr. Ysaye received an immense ovation and numerous recalls.

The rest of the programme does not require extended comment. The Berlioz overture is not distinctive, and the Liszt number orchestrated by Felix Mottl, proved a very clear adaptation of a virtuoso piano piece. The Schumann symphony closed the programme. There will be no rehearsal and concert the coming week.

FOR SALE
Very Desirable Symphony Rehearsal Tickets.
H 24 and 25, near centre aisle; $25 for one;
$45 for both. E.F.K., Boston Transcript.
SWS(A): Ja 7

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The seventh symphony concert, at which Mr. Eugene Ysaye made his reappearance in Boston, took place Saturday evening, with this programme:

Berlioz: Overture to "King Lear," Op. 4.
Bach: Concerto in E major, No. 2, for Violin, with accompaniment of Strings and Organ.
(First time at these concerts.)

Liszt: Legend: "The Sermon of St. Francis of Assisi to the Birds," transcribed for Orchestra by Felix Mottl.
(First time.)

Bruch: Concerto for Violin in D minor, No. 2, Op. 44.

Schumann: Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, Rhenish, Op. 97.

Mr. Ysaye, having been absent from Boston since the spring of 1898, and not having played with the Symphony Orchestra for precisely ten years, Saturday's concert at once assumed the character of a "concert with orchestra by Mr. Ysaye." Many persons came only in time to hear the great violinist, thus missing the ill-sounding overture by Berlioz, which was but coldly received. Nor was much delight occasioned, to judge from the applause, by the beautiful performance of Mottl's orchestral version of Liszt's pianoforte piece "St. Francis Preaching to the Birds." Perhaps this is not to be wondered at, for Liszt's picturesque legend becomes strangely trivial when arranged for orchestra, despite Mottl's exquisite instrumentation. In orchestral dress the birds and the saint are quite too obviously depicted. Nor, again, is it surprising that many people withdrew before the symphony, although by so doing they failed to hear some very poetic and sympathetic playing; the concert was very long indeed, and before the symphony they had heard enough.

The concert was Mr. Ysaye. Of this wonderful artist's technique it is not necessary to speak, and of it, furthermore, the non-violinist has no right to speak. It is precisely to a non-violinist, however, that his technique gives pleasure, for in Mr. Ysaye's playing there are none of the disagreeable qualities often present in the work of men we are assured play admirably, that are so distressing to many musical people. His intonation is nearly always absolutely pure, a characteristic which it appears to be unreasonable to expect of most violin players. And his tone, instead of sounding harsh and scratchy, falls always on the ear as a caress. For mere sensuous beauty of sound, Mr. Ysaye is unrivalled by any violinist we have heard in Boston for years—since he was here before.

Coming to speak of his interpretations, again one must wonder if Mr. Ysaye is in the right of it, when he plays a concerto by Bach with such a succession of lovely nuances, such elasticity of rhythm, and such warm expression of emotion that a listener shivers with delight. If Mr. Ysaye's is the proper way to play Bach, making it sound as modern as Brahms, what is to be said of the dry, harsh, rigid performances of Bach which violinists so frequently praise, to the perplexity of persons who have never learnt to play the violin? Whoever may be in the right, the fact remains that Mr. Ysaye's noble, dramatic, but splendidly reserved performance of Bach's marvellous adagio will not soon be forgotten; it was epoch-making. And the Bruch concerto was all very beautiful, a remarkable combination of warmth, delicate sentiment, exquisite phrasing, sharp rhythm, and brilliancy. The close was electrifying. From the audience Mr. Ysaye received an ovation.

This week there will be no symphony concert. On the 17th of the month Mr. Buonamici will appear, this being the programme: Symphony No. 34, in C major, Mozart; concerto for pianoforte, S. Rachmaninoff; Suite: "Pelleas and Melisande" (first time), G. Faure; overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner. R. R. G.

COLOR IN SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Eugene Ysaye's Return to Boston One of the Features.

For the seventh concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra the program was:

Overture to "King Lear".....Berlioz
Concerto in E major, No. 2, for violin.....Bach
St. Francis' Sermon to the Birds.....Liszt-Mottl
(First time.)

Concerto in D minor, No. 2, for violin.....Bruch
Symphony in E flat minor, No. 3.....Schumann

The Berlioz "King Lear" overture is seventy years old and more yet it might have been written yesterday—not by a Richard Strauss, of course, but by some modern who is "safe and sane" musically—so fresh and spontaneous and undimmed by time is the work. To be sure, it is program music only by brevet—that is, it is "King Lear," because the tragedy suggested the music, not because the music suggests the tragedy.

Sonorous and Dignified.

But it is sonorous, dignified, nobly if simply colored, and well worth hearing as an example of one phase of Berlioz's style. It was read and played with rather square-cut precision, yet beautifully so far as its tonal effects went.

That great poet of the violin, Eugene Ysaye, returns to us after several years' absence, a trifle more portly than before, but with the same magic in his finger tips, the same perfection of tone, the same marvelously true and appropriate sentiments in his soul. He plays like no other man, and he therefore enchants his audiences as none other can. Analysis of his style and his technique is wholly needless, for what he does depends not upon any great gift alone, but upon the complete roundness of a musical genius in whom there is no flaw. His imposing figure and his rapt face are legitimate parts of his influence.

Sermon to the Birds.

Felix Mottl's arrangement for orchestra of Liszt's pianoforte piece "St. Francis' Sermon to the Birds" is clever, well toned and interesting. The twitterings of the feathered songsters, their awakening to interest in the holy man's words, the solemn chant of the sermon and the rush into the air of the little auditors in full song of praise are all happily told in the music.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adv PROGRAMME: Dec 5 1904
Berlioz—Overture to "King Lear."
Bach—Concerto in E major, No. 2. For violin strings and organ.
Liszt—Legend, Sermon of St. Francis of Assisi to the birds; transcribed by Felix Mottl.
Bruch—Violin concerto No. 2, in D minor.
Schumann—Symphony No. 3, in E flat, "Rhenish."

Soloist: Mr. Eugene Ysaye.

The overture had its points of marked excellence in solo work and in unity rather than in a graphic presentation of the tortured king. The oboe, probably a picture of the soft-voiced Cordelia, was most pathetically played, and the kettle-drums gave their important strokes very steadily. But we received the impression of a King Lear who kept cool and restrained himself, rather than of one who became frenzied with the scourgings of Fate.

Undoubtedly the chief point of the concert was the "rentree" of Ysaye, who may be called the greatest living violinist. We were delighted that he presented himself first as a musician rather than as a virtuoso. In the Bach concerto (naturally in the old form, unlike the later symphony with interwoven solo) there were no showy technical displays, there was no playing at the galleries.

Yet Ysaye modernized the work boldly and effectively. We see no reason why Bach should always be kept within pedantic lines; there are romantic touches and melodic beauties in the old master that deserve passionate treatment, and the expressive charm of the adagio and the strong contrasts of the finale were brought out finely by the great soloist.

We were less impressed with the subsequent Bruch concerto. There had been two changes made since the programme was first announced. Originally the Beethoven violin concerto was promised. We wish that this great work could have been given, for it is a long time since we have heard it in all its grandeur. Then Bruch's Scottish fantasia was substituted; and finally Bruch's D minor concerto was performed.

Bruch's first violin concerto was a mountain peak, from which the two succeeding concertos tobogganed downward. We but recently had heard the great G minor concerto nobly played, and this less inspired work did not gain by the contrast.

All through the piece the auditor was kept waiting for a climax that never arrived. Even at the very end the composition seemed to say,—"to be continued in our next!"

The performance was masterly, especially in brilliant double-stopping and in beauty of shading, but we longed for the massive Ysaye of old; we hoped for something akin to the titanic power with which he used to give the 4 notes of the great figure in the Beethoven concerto, and this was not present in his work at this concert.

We must wait for the violin recitals which he is to give here very soon, before we can judge of the artist. We hope that the broad-toned majesty of his past performances will reappear then. We must hasten to state that if the reviewer missed something, the audience did not; for the artist was recalled over and over again.

We did not find St. Francis gaining much by his translation into an orchestral score. Those who have heard Busoni play the Liszt work on the piano need scarcely to be reminded of its superb effect. The warblings of wood-wind instruments did not enhance the beauty of the feathered congregation, although they were excellently played. But a warm tribute must be paid to the shading of the horn and the violoncello in the sermon; it was as beautifully done as anything we have heard this season. The violins were also very sure in their different high positions.

The Schumann symphony was the most satisfying part of the programme to the present writer; yet many auditors thought otherwise and left after Ysaye had finished his performance. The work has a pathetic interest in that it portrays the last gleam of happiness that came into Schumann's life. His advent in Dusseldorf, his first taste of the sunny Rhine-life, lifted up for a short time the clouds that were fast gathering over his intellect.

Glorious is that contentedly sober and serious Scherzo; loftily religious the grand organ-effects of the fourth movement, a portrayal of a scene in the great cathedral of Cologne; and best of all the chattering holiday mood that is pictured in the finale, as the multitude pour out of the church with all the geniality of a German Sunday feeling, after the religious duties of the day have been attended to.

And the work was played in the right spirit, Mr. Gericke and his men being at their best; nevertheless there was an exodus that showed that there were some with whom a star soloist could outweigh a dozen Schumanns. We can, however, lay the flattering unction to our soul that Boston is by no means alone in this standard of measurement of musical values.

Louis C. Elson.

AN AESTHETIC SEESAW.

Ysaye, the violinist, played in Boston at a Symphony concert and delighted everybody, even the professional carpers and growlers. Eulogy was at its height. Boston had good cause to indorse the opinion of all the great European cities. But Mr. Ysaye made the gross blunder of playing this season in Boston before he appeared in New York. When he fiddled last week with the Boston Symphony orchestra in the "megapolis," the critics were sorely displeased with him. His technic never was wholly adequate, his intonation was not flawless, he blurred rapid passages, he made an excessive use of "the sliding finger," and so on through the catalogue of faults, crimes and sins. The Sun published last Sunday this amiable paragraph: "There seems to have been a pretty general consensus of opinion that Ysaye's reappearance was disappointing. But the dread cabal of fiddlers in the Boston Symphony orchestra applauded him ecstatically. A cunning lot are those cynics of the St. Botolph Club." The inference is plain. If Mr. Ysaye had played remarkably well, the Symphony violinists would not have applauded.

This is only another instance of what—to speak courteously—may be called difference in taste. Seldom does the distinguished violinist, singer, pianist, play-actor, who is eminently successful in Boston, achieve the same success in New York, if his renown is first indorsed or enlarged in this city. On the other hand, the one who is often the fashion in New York is much less conspicuous in Boston. This city is still reproached for its "coldness," its "severe intellectuality" in aesthetic matters. As a matter of fact, the highly emotional interpreter is much more appreciated here than in any other American city. When opera is performed here there is not the distraction of the stockholders' display boxes. The audience is concerned only with the opera and the performance. It has not been so Germanized that it cannot find pleasure in operas by Frenchmen and Italians. It has, as it always has had, a catholic taste, in opera and in drama. It would never have occurred to a Bostonian that Coquelin is "only a low comedian," that Mary Anderson is a far greater play-actress than Bernhardt or Duse, that Salvini is a mere blusterer. Yet such wild-and-preposterous opinions have been expressed with extreme violence of language by the leading critic of New York and have been listened to respectfully by the inhabitants of that city.

The virtuoso who shows color, warmth, emotion, enslaves Bostonians. In New York he is accused of extravagance, eccentricity, unpardonable mannerisms, especially if he has ventured to play here first and has won applause. The prudent virtuoso should always appear first in New York. He may then come to Boston with the assurance that, if he have moving and commanding gifts, he will be a welcome visitor without reference to the verdict of the "megapolis." Whatever may be the faults of a Boston audience, it is willing to be persuaded, it gives a fair hearing, it is not swayed unduly by a cabled reputation, it thinks for itself, it is not ashamed of showing emotion, it is not material, it is not superficially cynical.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

The programme of the 7th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon includes one novelty—the familiar piano piece of Liszt, "The Sermon of St. Francis of Assisi to the Birds," which has been orchestrated by Felix Mottl. Liszt wrote the piano piece at Rome and dedicated it to his daughter Cosima. Mottl continues the line; he dedicated his transcription to Daniela, the daughter of Cosima while she was the wife of Von Buelow. In the piano piece the birds twitter in arabesques and the saint preaches with a baritone voice. These relations have been preserved by Mottl.

The other orchestral pieces are Berlioz' overture to "King Lear" and Schumann's symphony in E flat major, No. 3, known as the "Rhenish."

Mr. Eugene Ysaye, although this is his third visit to Boston, will make his second appearance at these concerts. Instead of Beethoven's concerto, which was announced, he will play Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs" and Bach's concerto in E major, No. 2, for violin, orchestra and organ. The distinguished violinist will be heartily welcomed.

SYMPHONY

Rehearsal and Concert Tickets for sale or to rent. Telephone 4235-5 Main. 40 State St., Room 53. St(A): n 16

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Exceptional location and price; aisle, left balcony; evening. Address S.A.V., Boston Transcript. (A)

REHEARSAL SEATS

JJ. 24-25 are for sale at $20.00 each. Please address D.O.K., Boston Transcript. (A)

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS—S 25-26

For balance of season for $21.00 each. Kindly address R.M.P., Boston Transcript. (A)

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART,

SYMPHONY in C major No. 34, (Köchel No. 338).

- I. Allegro vivace.
- II. Andante di molto.
- III. Finale. Allegro vivace.

S. RACHMANINOFF,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, in F sharp minor, No. 1, op. 1.

- I. Vivace, moderato, vivo, etc.
- II. Andante cantabile.
- III. Allegro scherzando; Andante espressivo; Allegro scherzando; maestoso; più vivo.
(First time.)

G. FAURÉ,

"Pelléas and Mélisande." SUITE from stage music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, op. 80.

- I. Prelude: Quasi Adagio.
- II. "The Woman Spinner": Andantino quasi allegretto.
- III. Molto Adagio.
(First time at these concerts.)

WAGNER,

OVERTURE to "The Flying Dutchman."

Soloist:

Mr. CARLO BUONAMICI.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Gabriel Faure's Music to a Play by Maeterlinck Produced with Poetic Charm and Rare and Subtle Beauty by Orchestra.

CARLO BUONAMICI
THE SOLO PIANIST

His Performance Glowed with Virtuoso Blood—Brilliant and Forceful—Given Wreath by a Very Applausive Audience.

Herald ————— Dec. 18, 1904

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, was given in Symphony Hall last night.
Mr. Carlo Buonamici was the solo pianist. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in C major, No. 34.....Mozart
Concerto in F sharp minor No. 1, op 1, for piano and orchestra.....Rachmaninoff
(First time.)

"Pelleas and Melisande," suite from stage
music to Maeterlinck's tragedy...Gabriel Faure
(First time at these concerts.)

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"...Wagner

Mr. John Sargent once made a drawing of Gabriel Faure and Mrs. Patrick Campbell. The white-haired composer was sketched in a peculiarly meditative mood. The face of the play-actress is seen over Faure's shoulder. She has a far-away expression and her eyes are languorous. Had the two been discussing the question of music for her production of Maeterlinck's "Pelleas and Melisande," that tragedy of infinite pathos, the tragedy of poor souls in an unnamed land who were chosen by malevolent inhabitants of the air as the victims of wanton cruelty?

Mrs. Patrick Campbell produced the play in London in 1898, and Faure composed the prelude, entr'actes and incidental music for this performance.
When she produced the play at the Boston Theatre, April 12, 1902, this music was played. Faure based the suite performed last night on this stage music, and the suite was played in Paris early in 1901, and at a New England Conservatory orchestra concert in Boston last March.

Stage music almost always suffers
when it is transferred from the theatre to the concert hall. The prelude is no longer the quickener of anticipation.

It cannot serve to prepare a sympathetic mood. It no longer contains hints and auroral flushes. The entr'actes become in the concert hall absolute music; they neither comment on the scene that preceded nor prepare for that which is to follow. On the other hand, there is this compensation: the music when performed in the concert hall is heard, while in the playhouse it is generally lost in the din of assembling and in the chatter.

The suite is in three movements. The first is the prelude to the first act; it is simple and suggestive; there is passion,
but it is the passion of Maeterlinck, which when at its height is supreme resignation to the will of the unseen who direct the action of the human puppets. There is no wild melancholy.
Only toward the end is there the irresistible impression of bodement; the mysterious horn calls and the listening and the disquieted, hopeless answer.
The second movement is entitled "Fileuse"; for at the beginning of the third act the curtain rises on Melisande spinning with a distaff, and Pelleas is with her.

The music is exquisite in its refinement;
in the refinement of its sadness. The third movement is the final entr'acte, the prelude to the death scene. It is funeral music—but how far removed it is from commonplace and formulated lamentation! Perhaps in its most forcible expression there is the suggestion of Golaud and his importunate questioning of the dying woman, but for the most part the musical thought is of the old and dazed Arkel, who looks on with wondering sadness, and of Melisande herself. "She must no longer be disturbed. The human soul is very silent. The human soul likes to depart alone. It suffers so timidly.
But the sadness, Golaud—but the sadness of all that one sees * * * She wishes silence now. It was a little being, so peaceful, so timid, and so silent. It was a poor little mysterious being like all of us."

The music has the shadowy charm and the shifting and vague beauty that characterize Faure. The performance was poetic. The work is of small dimensions, but it is of rare and subtle beauty, one of the most imaginative and truly musical works that have been heard here of late years.

Mr. Buonamici gave a very brilliant performance of a brilliant concerto. The composition itself is fresh and interesting, a most grateful work to the pianist, a pleasure to the hearer. It is frankly a virtuoso piece, but it is neither conventional nor bizarre. There is the exotic flavor of the Russian folksong in certain themes, and the occasional oriental delight in changing and strongly accentuated rhythms is most pleasing.

Mr. Buonamici's performance was glowing with virtuoso blood. He has gained in his command of rhythm, in his poise, and also in quality of tone.
His brilliance is not mere glitter; his force is not brute strength; his speed is no longer enthusiastic recklessness; his song is emotional, very human. He has learned the value of tonal contrasts and gradations. All in all, his performance was an extraordinary one,
and he richly deserved the applause
and the wreath.

Mozart's symphony has more than historical interest. While many pages of it are only decorative according to the old formula of the Italian theatre overture, there are passages that foretell the composer of "Figaro's Marriage" and the three great symphonies. The work was played with both the appropriate vivacity and grace. Wagner's overture brought the close to a concert that gave marked enjoyment and was not too long.

EIGHTH CONCERT AN INTERESTING ONE

B Journal — Dec 19 1904
Carlo Buonamici the Soloist at Boston Symphony Orchestra's Recital.

At the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mr. Carlo Buonamici was the soloist and the program was:

Symphony in C major, No. 34....Mozart
Concerto in F sharp minor, No. 1
op. 1, for piano and orchestra,
Rachmaninoff

(First time.)
"Pelleas and Melisande," suite from stage music to Maeterlinck's tragedy.....Gabriel Faure
(First time at these concerts.)
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" .....Wagner

The Mozart symphony in C, a "small and early," so to say, is a charming and joyous bit of composition, suggestive of old laces and gold snuffboxes.

Wonderfully Artistic.

Its proper habitat is, of course, not a great auditorium, but the wonderfully artistic way in which it was played, with just the proper dynamic force to conserve its antique flavor yet make it strong enough for the hall, gave it a vital tone that delighted everyone.

How Mr. Buonamici has grown in the big and telling phases of his art his handling of the Rachmaninoff concerto gave ample evidence.

Fine Crystalline Tone.

The boyish enthusiasm has not left him; the splendid technique and fine crystalline tone are still more marked, perhaps, than several years ago. But above and beyond those great gifts to a pianist is now the lofty and virile poise of a man who is certain of himself. The authority of the keyboard is as necessary and as effective as that of the stage or the pulpit. When to it is added other gifts like those of Buonamici's you have a great pianist, and that this young adopted citizen of Boston surely is.

Russian Romantic School.

The concerto itself is of the Russian romance school. Not of high originality—for it pays tribute to Tschalkowsky and to Borodine at least—it is poetic in atmosphere, pensive, beautiful and glitteringly brilliant by turns, and always highly interesting. If the art of war is proving a delusion in Russia, not so its music, for from the land of the Slav are coming those things that stir and thrill the world, and the end seems by no means near.

Unbroken Level of Gloom.

Maeterlinck's "Pelleas and Melisande" is on an almost unbroken level of gloom and dusk, and the Faure music, written for Mrs. Patrick Campbell's production of the play, is admirably in keeping. In the first movement is the haunting suggestion of night in some weird garden full of exotic madness always repressed. And in the part depicting Melisande's passing there is much beauty, but it is the beauty of a classically cold and dead face. Such music cannot be attractive when played from the concert stage, nor was that the intent of this. Heard with the drama in the theater it must be highly effective. The playing was in the characteristic refined style of the orchestra.

A brilliant performance of the "Flying Dutchman" overture ended a concert whose quality was fine and whose length was ideal.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Last Night's Symphony Orchestra Offerings.

Concert of Notable Character in Symphony Hall Tonight.

Attractive Announcements of the Week.

Globe — Dec 18 1904

The eighth symphony program introduced Mr Carlo Buonamici as soloist in the F minor piano concerto by the Russian composer, Rachmaninoff. The orchestral selections were the C major Mozart symphony, suite from "Pelleas and Melisande," by Gabriel Faure, and the "Flying Dutchman" overture. Mr Buonamici, who is very favorably known in Boston, is to be commended for his ability in making a somewhat uninteresting work acceptable in parts. There is little in the first movement, either in the orchestral or solo score, that commands attention, although some cleverness is shown in the instrumentation, until the piano is given prominence in the closing cadenza. The second part is the best of the three and is mainly for the solo instrument. The finale has some of the so-called Slav characteristics, but aside from the piano part has nothing particularly original in theme or in treatment.

Mr Buonamici displayed an admirable technique, his tone was very pleasing in the cadenzas and figurations, his pedaling being thoroughly good and not clouding his finger work, and all the rapid tempos were given with a clarity and ease which showed him to be an artist of high attainments. He lacked somewhat the thundrous vigor requisite for the fortissimo finale, but in the lighter moods his work was very fine and well deserved the favor with which he was received.

Mozart's C-major symphony opened the program, and the charmingly melodic and dainty work was played with beautiful expression, delicacy and harmony of execution. It was the gem of the evening. In the Rachmaninoff concerto the orchestra did its work conscientiously, and the Wagner overture was given with the usual verve and Wagnerian vigor and suggestiveness expected under Mr Gericke's guidance. The three movements in the Faure suite each had its characteristics vividly shown. The mysterious, plaintive air of the first, the spinning melody in the second, which is so, unlike the spinning music of "The Flying Dutchman," and the somber third movement are well contrasted and enabled the orchestra to show its excellence in ensemble work in several different ways. Beautiful phrases by the horn in the first part and the whirling figures by the lighter strings in the second movement are worthy of particular commendation.

Special attention is called to the concert this week, which will be given on Thursday evening, instead of Saturday. The rehearsal will take place as usual on Friday afternoon. Mr Charles Gilbert will be the soloist. The selections will be Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, Tschalkowsky's "Pathetique" symphony, "Pax Triumphant," by Van de Stucken and four vocal numbers.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Dec 19 — PROGRAMME. 1904
Mozart—Symphony No. 34, in C major.
S. Rachmaninoff—Concerto for Pianoforte.
Soloist, Mr. Carlo Buonamici.
G. Faure—Suite: "Pelleas and Melisande."
First time.

Wagner—Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
The Mozart symphony was played with much spirit, so that the finale seemed quite fiery even to ears accustomed to "1812" overtures and "Rides to Hades." Mozart himself probably never dreamed of so perfect a performance of any of his orchestral works. We were glad to note the cordial applause evoked by the work. The fact that brandy punch exists need not utterly abolish claret.

And the punch aforesaid came with the Rachmaninoff Concerto; a work spicy beyond belief, and brimful of technique and displays of virtuosity. It is a modern successor to Liszt's E-flat concerto, but is not as coherent even as its predecessor. It plunged into double octaves and fortissimo chords at once, and from the first measures it was evident that bravura was to rule the day. It had as many changes of tempo as a New England spring has changes of weather, yet amidst all the bizarrerie there were those melodic touches which ("for this relief, much thanks!") the Russian composers have not yet learned to disdain. Even the cadenza was thematic and tuneful, and the first movement evoked great and deserved applause.

The second movement made but a vague impression upon the reviewer, but the finale, spite of its constantly shifting tempi and rhythms, its glittering patches and spasmodic changes, had some strong climaxes, its coda being particularly impressive.

Mr. Buonamici played the work very effectively, without any mannerisms, and with manly sincerity and power. He won enthusiastic applause and a laurel wreath. He is evidently advancing rapidly in his artistic work. He was recalled many times at the close of the performance. We may add to the sketch of his life that he was for a time a pupil of Prof. Carl Baermann.

The Faure suite made a very favorable impression. Here is a Gallic composer who is not infected with the passion for ugliness! He does not score to Brobdingnagian dimensions, and is content occasionally to use melody and to introduce beauty into his work. There is a pathetic sweetness in the Prelude which might picture the discovery of the weeping girl, by the spring in the forest, the timid one who cares not for the crown that she has dropped in the water, and there is some suggestion in it of the threatening sea which Maeterlinck has woven like a thread through all the fabric of this depressing play.

The second movement pictures that spinning scene, where Melisande is using the distaff in the dark room, with Pelleas by her side, where Yniold has the first presentiment of coming evil, and where his "little mother" sings him to sleep. Something of these things we could discern in the tender oboe melody with its tema ostinata of strings.

The death scene of the finale was of most delicate sadness, more beautiful than the sketchy play itself. Possibly the music was the stronger because the Maeterlinck work is such an outline, such a series of mere impressions.

Although one can praise the originality, the melodic charm and the brevity of the French work, it certainly paled somewhat before the "Flying Dutchman" overture. Wagner may insist upon his theories as much as he pleases, yet the "Flying Dutchman," which was composed before he mounted his hobby-horse, will live as long as "Tristan and Isolde." It contains all the essentials of what he afterwards elaborated with extreme detail; it has continuity; its poetry and music are perfectly wedded; it has dramatic power; freedom of modulation; and it has even a graphic use of "leit-motif."

If the reader cares to compare the guiding motive of the Dutchman with the chief figure of Beethoven's 9th symphony, first movement, he will find that the earlier composer made some good use of the same figure, but upside down. The overture was performed with splendid power and was, musically, the peak of the concert, even if some mountain heights were attained in each of the other works presented. It was a programme of sustained interest and of just the right length. The public should bear in mind that this week, on account of the festivities of Christmas eve, the concert precedes its own public rehearsal, and will take place on Thursday evening.

Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

Saturday's was the eighth Symphony concert of the season. The soloist was Mr. Carlo Buonamici, and this was the programme: Trans. Dec. 19, 1904

Mozart: Symphony in C major, No. 34 (Köchel No. 338).

S. Rachmaninoff: Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in F-sharp minor, No. 1, Op. 1. (First time.)

G. Fauré: "Pelléas and Mélisande," Suite from stage music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, Op. 80. (First time at these concerts.)

Wagner: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

This concert was, in every particular, one of the most attractive of the season. The programme, to begin with, was thoroughly interesting, and also cunningly contrived, with the symphony first, and, for the close, Wagner's stirring overture, which on Saturday was grandly played, romantically and brilliantly, with exquisite work from the flutes, clarinets and oboes. The orchestra's work all the evening was singularly beautiful.

Of most moment, naturally, was the suite arranged from Fauré's incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelléas and Mélisande," which was played for the first time at a Symphony concert, although it had already been produced at a Conservatory concert. The behavior of Bostonians at Mrs. Campbell's production of "Pelléas" prevented the music's being heard on that occasion, when it was in its most fitting place. That an audience made up of the most cultivated people in Boston could show themselves so deaf to beautiful music as was the case at Mrs. Campbell's representation is extraordinary. To make people listen attentively, the hall mark of Symphony Concert approval seems necessary.

The music of Fauré, whenever or wherever it be heard, is well worth the hearing, for it is superlatively beautiful. And it is steeped in the spirit of Maeterlinck, all vague, queer, but peculiarly touching. Given an imaginative audience, this prelude of Fauré's must have exercised a potent charm in attuning the mind to the strange drama that was to follow. And still more fancy-pricking is the prelude to the last act, music that breathes of tragedy, not of the declaiming, breast-beating kind, but the true, silent tragedy that hurts. These few pages of adagio are very wonderful. It is to be hoped we can hear them once more, and possibly some time we may hear them in their proper place.

While overshadowed by the genius of Fauré, the rest of the concert was far from commonplace. There was a delightful Mozart symphony, brilliantly and sonorously played, which was not the less agreeable because it contained no minuet. And there was the new Rachmaninoff concerto, a sturdy work grateful to the pianist and agreeable to hear, if not of tremendous musical worth. Mr. Buonamici's lovely liquid tone in the third movement was something to hear and remember. His entire performance, in fact, was excellent, although the end was superior to the rest. It was heartily applauded.

This week's concert will be held Thursday evening, to avoid Christmas Eve. Mr. Gilbert is to sing, and this will be the programme: Goldmark, overture to "Hiawatha"; Haydn, aria from "The Seasons"; Massenet, Elegie; Tchaikowsky, Symphony No. 6, "Pathétique"; songs with pianoforte; Lalo, Aubade; D'Erlanger, "Morte"; P. Van Der Stucken, "Pax Triumphans" first time.

R. R. G.

BUONAMICI, BOSTON PIANIST, TRIUMPHS AT SYMPHONY.

Young Artist Wins Deserved
Plaudits of the Great Throng
Last Night for His Playing of Fine Rachmaninoff Concerto

By Kent Perkins.

ICERT.

That Boston has a pianist of the first rank was demonstrated last night at the eighth Symphony Concert, when Carlo Buonamici, accompanied by the Symphony Orchestra, played Rachmaninoff's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in F-sharp minor No. 1 Op. 1. The audience, a more than usually large and brilliant one, was quick to recognize the young artist's triumph, and gave him round after round of heartiest applause at the close of the selection, calling him out repeatedly, and the marks of approbation reached "stern" proportions, when a huge laurel wreath was borne down the centre aisle for the hero of the moment.

Mr. Buonamici richly deserved the plaudits and the wreath. His interpretation of the great young Russian composer's work was veritably superb. The first movement, the most characteristically Russian in its harmonic coloring, with the inevitable touch of barbaric fierceness suggested here and there, was played with all-sufficient power, firmness and brilliance.

There was no lack of Russian tone in the other two movements, but it was not so obtrusively evident as in the first part of the concerto. In the second division, andante cantabile, Mr. Buonamici was at his best, and he made the lyric measures of the movement, beautiful in their melodic sweetness, sing exquisitely under his delicate and sympathetic touch. The third and last movement was played with a lightness, deftness and skill that were charming in the extreme. Every note in the fastest runs and most rapidly changing intricate harmonies received its full value, and not a shade of expression was lost. The pianist throughout gave a strong impression of possessing a reserve of ability both in execution and expression that he could draw upon whenever it might become necessary. Boston should be proud of Mr. Buonamici and make much of him.

It is to be hoped, too, that more of Rachmaninoff's music may be heard at the the Symphony concerts. The programme of the evening was as follows:

Mozart, Symphony in C major, No. 34 (Köchel, No. 338).

Rachmaninoff, Concerto in F-sharp minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 1.

Fauré, "Pelléas and Mélisande," suite from stage music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, op. 80.

Wagner, Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

The Mozart Symphony was heard with pleasure, though its beauty was eclipsed by the richer feast that followed it.

The "Pelléas and Mélisande" suite was exquisite in its mystic, deeply pathetic and suggestive character and it was played by the orchestra in a manner that brought out its beauties to the fullest extent. It was Maeterlinck's mysticism was successfully set to music. The suite was heard in Boston when Mrs. Patrick Campbell appeared in the play in 1902.

The "Flying Dutchman" overture was given as only the Boston Symphony Orchestra can do it and was heard with pleasure.

The next concert will take place on Thursday evening of this week, Charles Gilbert being the soloist.

NY ORCHESTRA.

RICKE, Conductor.

BER 22, AT 8, P. M.

evening.

mme.

to "Hiawatha."

"The Seasons."

No. 6, "Pathétique."

PIANOFORTE.

MPHANS."

(time.)

ist:

S GILBERT.

is a Steinway.

CLAUDE CHARLES MARIE GILIBERT

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 22, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |                  |   |
|------------------|---|
| MENDELSSOHN,     | OVERTURE to "Camacho's Wedding," op. 10.  |
| HAYDN,           | ARIA, from "The Seasons." "With eagerness the husbandman."  |
| TSCHAIKOWSKY,    | SYMPHONY No. 6, "Pathetic." in B minor, op. 74.I. Adagio: Allegro non troppo.II. Allegro con grazia.III. Allegro molto vivace.IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso. |
|                  | SONGS with PIANOFORTE.  |
| a) D'ERLANGER,   | "MORTE."  |
| b) LALO,         | AUBADE, from "Le Roi d'Ys."   |
| VAN DER STUCKEN, | SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL PROLOGUE, "Pax Triumphans."(First time.)   |

Soloist:

Mr. CHARLES GILIBERT.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

CLAUDE CHARLES MARIE GILIBERT

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 22, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |                        |   |
|------------------------|---|
| MENDELSSOHN,           | OVERTURE to "Camacho's Wedding," op. 10.  |
| HAYDN,                 | ARIA, from "The Seasons." "With eagerness the husbandman."  |
| TSCHAIKOWSKY,          | SYMPHONY No. 6, "Pathetic." in B minor, op. 74.I. Adagio: Allegro non troppo.II. Allegro con grazia.III. Allegro molto vivace.IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso. |
| SONGS with PIANOFORTE. |   |
| a) D'ERLANGER,         | "MORTE."  |
| b) LALO,               | AUBADE, from "Le Roi d'Ys."   |
| VAN DER STUCKEN,       | SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL PROLOGUE, "Pax Triumphans."(First time.)   |

Soloist:

Mr. CHARLES GILIBERT.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Trans. Dec. 23, 1904.
Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The ninth symphony concert was held yesterday evening in place of tomorrow evening, before the public rehearsal, in fact, to avoid taking people from their homes on Christmas Eve. The soloist was Mr. Charles Glibert, and this was the programme:

Mendelssohn: Overture to "Camacho's Wedding," Op. 10.
Haydn: Aria, from "The Seasons," "With eagerness the husbandman."
Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, Op. 74.
Songs with Pianoforte—
D'Erlanger: "Morte."
Lalo: Aubade, from "Le Roi d'Ys."
Van der Stucken: Symphonic Festival Prologue, "Pax Triumphans." (First time.)

Tchaikovsky's poignantly expressed fear of the charnel-house fitted ill with this gay week before Christmas, when, wherever one goes, one sees only good cheer, for even people with troubles try hard at this time to conceal them. Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, however, proved less depressing yesterday than would have been the case ten years ago. The work was heartily applauded, in particular the third movement, but the performance was in no sense an event, to be anticipated for a week, listened to in shuddering silence, and, the next day, be discussed in terms of frantic admiration. On account of its over-emphasis, perhaps, its violence, its hysteria, the emotional quality of the "Pathetic" symphony no longer makes a potent appeal to the public, or, apparently, to the orchestra. The music now can be listened to very calmly. This being the situation, the actual beauty of the score receives closer attention than a few years ago, when persons could not listen to the music for shivering. But in this symphony there is indeed much beauty, and the perfection of workmanship as well; for many a year it will be a great pleasure to heart it, provided conductors no longer expect to wring tears with it. The performance last night was unusually beautiful.

Despite the age of the symphony, its performance was an affair of greater moment than the production, for the first time, of Mr. Van Der Stucken's piece, "Pax Triumphans," a composition for very full orchestra indeed, by means of which the composer contrived to get a tremendous body of tone, the like of which never was heard before in Symphony Hall. To be plain, the work undoubtedly would sound more in place in Haymarket square on the Fourth of July than in any hall at all. It is distinctly a piece for an occasion.

Yesterday, by the way, proved an occasion for Mr. Glibert, who was not in good voice nor yet in his most musical vein. Although he made less effect than usual, therefore, the fact remains that he sang the aria from "The Seasons" better than nearly anyone else could sing it, and in the Lalo song he came still nearer success.

There will not be another symphony concert till the last day of December. Then Mr. Joseffy will appear, and this will be the programme: Overture to "Genoveva," Schumann; concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in B-flat major, op. 83, Brahms; "Après midi d'un Faun" (first time), Debussy; symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Eroica," op. 55, Beethoven.

R. R. G.

WAS SYMPHONY FOR DYING YEAR

At Ninth Concert of Symphony Orchestra Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Was Played with a Grace Seldom Realized.

Herald Dec. 23, 1904

The ninth concert of the Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gerike conductor, was given in Symphony Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:
Overture to "Camacho's Wedding,"

Mendelssohn
Aria from "The Seasons".....Haydn
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic"....Tschalkowsky
Songs with piano—
a. Aubade from "Le Roi d'Ys".....Lalo
b. "Morte".....d'Erlanger
Symphonic festival prologue, "Pax Triumphans".....Van der Stucken
(First time.)

Tschalkowsky's "Pathetic" symphony is music for a dying year. As a work of purely musical art some may, with good reason, prefer the fifth of the same composer, but the emotional contents of the fifth are not so poignant, so tear-compelling. Indeed, the modernity of emotion is so striking in the "Pathetic" that many prophesied the speedy disappearance of the symphony from the repertory, and some intimated knowingly that the composer would soon share the fate of Raff.

But the "Pathetic" symphony is full of the thought of death and the grave, and men and women in all ages have been curious about death. They have said with Branchiano in Webster's tragedy of Italian horror: "On pain of death let no man name death to me; it is a word infinitely terrible;" they have mourned with Moschus the fate of those "unheard of in hollow earth," who sleep "a right long and boundless slumber from which none are aroused;" they may ask with Job: "Man dieth and wasteth away; yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?" or they may speak bravely after the manner of Henry and Walt Whitman—it matters not; there are few who are not curious about the secret of secrets.

And it may be said that supreme funeral music, or music that is shot through and through with the thought of the tomb, does not easily disappear or in the passing of the centuries seem commonplace or out of fashion. The "Dead March" in "Saul" preserves the name of Handel's oratorio, although he used this march in other ways. The horn call of Charon still chills the blood of the hearer of "Alceste"; Mozart's "Don Giovanni" is a "gay opera," according to the title page of the autograph score, but the music of the Statue is tragic today and it will be tragic as long as there is death.

The basic emotion of the "Pathetic" is, then, universal and lasting.

Last night the performance of this familiar work, which is now 11 years old, deepened the impression made at previous hearings, although the performance was not always sustained at a highly emotional pitch. We should have liked, for instance, a less formal reading of the third movement, more animation and greater force—a force akin to frenzy—in the march. So, too, there might have been wildness in the lamentation, shuddering despair, agony unrelieved by glimmer of hope. On the other hand, there was much that was beautiful and impressive in the first movement, and the second movement was performed with a grace indicated by the composer but seldom realized in the concert hall.

Mr. Van der Stucken's "Pax Triumphans" was played here for the first time. It was composed for a special occasion, for a meeting of a Saengerbund in Brooklyn, and it was composed with a view to broad and popular effects. The scheme of its construction, its fresco character, reminds one of a Flemish out-of-door work, and the composition would undoubtedly be more effective in a great hall crowded with enthusiasts eager to join in the final choral than it was last night in Symphony Hall with the statues of ancient gods, goddesses and bards looking down in wonder. There are broad and stirring passages side by side with those that are trivial or commonplace; there are pages where episodes are too loosely connected; there is one passage that last night brought to mind the tales told of Jullien's "Fireman's Quadrille."

Mendelssohn's overture has been little played here. Although it now seems little more than a curtain-raiser, it is eminently Mendelssohnian with all the earmarks and mannerisms.

Mr. Glibert made much of Haydn's air of the husbandman, but he was heard to still greater advantage in the song by the Baron d'Erlanger and in the charming aubade from Lalo's opera. His exquisite singing of the latter song will long be remembered. It was a triumph of vocal artistry.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Globe Dec 23/1914
M Glibert, the Celebrated Baritone,
Soloist of the Evening—"Pathetic"
Symphony Splendidly Performed.

The Symphony program last evening introduced the French baritone, M Glibert, as soloist; the festival prologue, "Pax Triumphans," by Van der Stucken, was played for the first time at these concerts, and the remaining selections were Mendelssohn's overture, "Camacho's Wedding" and Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, the latter proving to be the chief orchestral feature of the evening by reason of its magnificent interpretation. M Glibert has established himself firmly in public favor by the uniform ability he displays in all his vocal work. His voice appears to be less susceptible to climatic influences, and last evening he sang with as much finesse and beauty of tone as at any of his previous appearances in Boston this season.

He is so thoroughly artistic and sympathetic and sings with such ease and finish that it is always a pleasure to listen to him. The aria from Haydn's oratorio, "The Seasons," was delivered with splendid verve and expression, investing the simple harmony with all its pastoral significance. Very tender was his interpretation of d'Erlanger's musical setting of Borelli's "Morte" and equally satisfactory, though in a different vein was the "serenade" from Lalo's opera, "Le Rold 'Ys." The three songs were skillfully contrasted in sentiment and again displayed the masterly abilities of this popular baritone. M Glibert's reception was very demonstrative and at the close of the Lalo number he was recalled many times to the stage. Mr Zach played the piano accompaniments with his usual good judgment.

The great symphony by Tchaikowsky was given in a manner to win hearty applause for Mr Gericke after each of the four movements. The fierceness of the different moods was vividly expressed, the entrancing dance rhythms of the second part were sung with admirable precision and buoyancy by the strings; the grim, intermittent suggestions of a tragedy were vividly shown in the peculiar drum part; in the third movement the brasses and wood winds harmonized perfectly in their combined work, and the finale, with its funereal atmosphere, showed ensemble playing as near perfection as one can reasonably expect to hear.

The "Camacho's Wedding" is a pretty, vivacious tone poem, which was played in the proper spirit. Mr Van der Stucken's festival prologue presents musical contrasts representing "lamentation," "march," "force," "despair," "peace," and closing with a choral. In short, it is a picture of war and peace in conflict, with peace the victor. The orchestration is elaborate and very, very vigorous at times and employs about all instruments of percussion known to orchestras of today. The different "points" of the composition were given with due effect, and the piece was played with the proper regard to the directions in the score, but it has no special claim to be considered more than program music of the so-called "popular" class, brilliant, strenuous and full of fortissimo passages which keep the heavier contingents of the band pretty busy.

The regular Friday afternoon performance will take place today. Next week Mr Joseffy will be the soloist, playing Brahms's second concerto for piano. The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," Debussy's "Apres midi d'un Faune," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adv PROGRAMME. Dec 23/14
Mendelssohn. Overture, "Camacho's Wedding."
Haydn. Aria from "The Seasons."
Mr. Chas. Glibert.

Tchaikowsky. Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique."
Songs with piano.
Mr. Glibert.

F. Van Der Stucken. Orchestral Prologue.
"Pax Triumphans."

To have one's symphony concert on Thursday seemed as strange as if the Bostonian received his beans and brown bread on a Saturday afternoon! But the usual audience was present and a performance of more than usual interest was given. Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture had been announced to begin the concert, but this was changed into the overture to Mendelssohn's operatic fiasco. The overture to "Camacho's Wedding" is the best part of the juvenile work.

In the overture-form the young Mendelssohn was quite at ease,—in the dramatic power of opera he was much at sea. The overture of the Cervantian subject is bright and dainty (the opera itself being prosy and artificial), but it does not attain the perfection that Mendelssohn had achieved at about the same epoch (his 18th year) in the "Midsummer-night's Dream" overture, which is certainly the greatest orchestral success ever won by a boy.

The performance was sprightly and dashing, even a trifle rough, and won applause, but we venture to hope that the work of Rubin Goldmark, certainly one of the most promising of the younger composers in America (born in New York in 1872) will soon come to its hearing.

M. Glibert is one of the most satisfying artists of the concert platform. He has his noble voice under the most perfect control, and can give the most massive breadth or the most delicate "nuance" with equal ease. His Haydn number was Simon's air—"With eagerness the husbandman,"—and it sounded very strange in French. It was well sung, and yet something was lacking,—possibly the quaint, archaic, old English flavor. But the long roulades at "Il germe en son sein" were perfect. There was not absolute unity between orchestra and singer.

Considering that the symphony of the concert pictured death, it was rather lugubrious to follow it with a song entitled "Morte," by d'Erlanger, and even in the next number, an Aubade by Lalo, the singer threatened death if his sweetheart did not come to him soon. These songs, with Mr. Zach at the piano, Mr. Glibert sang in his very best vein; in the first there was sorrow, in the second piquancy, and in both that exquisite taste and fitness which is the great charm of this vocalist's work.

He was recalled over and over again, and we wish he might have added a song like Adams' "Noel," in honor of the season.

The performance of the symphony was something absolutely great. Never have we heard Mr. Gericke and the orchestra to better advantage. We wonder what is to be the verdict of posterity upon Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony"! The present writer has heard it many times and can bear testimony that it is not growing threadbare in his case. Very true it does not attain the lofty atmosphere of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration"; admitted that its philosophy is of a much more nervous and complaining type than the German's great metaphysical suggestion; yet its melodic charm, its fine orchestration, its impressive end, ought always to make it a conspicuous number of the modern repertoire.

Its picture of happiness at the first, and its tender memories of this in the moment of dissolution; its presentation of military glory conquering against all opposition, and the graphic struggle of themes in the third movement; its remarkable achievement of an attractive 5-4 rhythm (it is really 2-4 and 3-4 in alternation) in the second movement; its effective use of deep wood-wind effects in the first and last movements and its impressive trombone chords in the finale; its intense employment of an irregular rhythm of triplets in the finale and its vivid picture of the cessation of the heart-beats at the close,—all these are strong touches even if the feminine, or even at times effeminate, character of this Chopin of the orchestra, pales before the powerful masculinity of the great German composer.

It is a grateful work for the conductor and for the orchestra, and, as already stated, Mr. Gericke and his men were alive to all their opportunities; every orchestral "coup" was made with surety and decision.

The 5-4 rhythm, strongly impressed upon the auditor by the incessant kettle-drum strokes, was especially successful, but every movement had its points of excellence. Mr. Gericke was recalled after the first, third, and last movements, the enthusiasm at the close being very marked.

The concert closed with one of the greatest of American compositions,—and a magnificent performance of it!

If Mr. Van Der Stucken celebrates triumphant peace with so much vigor, we cannot imagine what he would do with explosive war! This great American composer always paints on a large canvas; he is a master of the great modern orchestra and he works up his climaxes with a breadth that is certainly exciting.

Naturally he calls for an array of instruments that rivals Berlioz in his most ambitious moments. In this work, which was written for a Brooklyn Saengerfest in 1900, all the unusual instruments appear; bass clarinet, English horn, piccolo, contra-bassoon, gong, bells, etc., etc., and finally a chorus (absent on this occasion) and organ. Trumpets at a distance, struggles between guiding-motives, and many other devices are in evidence.

The guiding motives are very graphic and well employed. In fine contrast are the savage "brute force" figure and the tender melody which typifies "Longing for Peace," and the chief struggle is between these two themes; but still more prominent is the figure, of 9 notes, which ushers in the "Célébration of Peace," and this is ingeniously varied and led to a climax. The March of the combatants, the Plaint of suffering Humanity, the motive of Despair, are all earnest and picturesque details of the work.

But finally the great climax, the apotheosis of it all, comes with an outburst of Thanksgiving, with the grand old chorale theme,—"Nun danket alle Gott"—

"Let all give thanks to God,
Hands, heart and voice upraising.
His great deeds celebrate
With gratitude and praising."

Even without the chorus this lofty theme with the organ and full orchestra made a most majestic ending to a very powerful work. It was well to give this composition with America's greatest orchestra, and it was gratifying to think that there is in the west so thorough a master of the complexities of modern scoring.

It is quite possible that many did not understand the complex work at a single hearing, but, instead of slighting it on this account, they ought to hear it again. It is distinctly a greater work than the composer's "Ratcliffe" and, spite of an occasional Wagnerian resemblance, is original.

The muted trumpets blew their part nobly and, considering the great difficulties, the whole performance was one that proved the mastery of Mr. Gericke over thorny scores.

It may go even better at the performance this afternoon, for, while the concert took place last night, the public "rehearsal" of it takes place today—which is strange but true!

Louis C. Elson.

SEMI-NOVELTY WORTH HEARING

Mendelssohn's "Camacho" Overture
Reintroduced by Symphony Orchestra After Period of 17 Years.

A PATHETIQUE SYMPHONY

Most Profound and Significant Purely Orchestral Work for the
Last 50 Years.

Out of respect for the evening made notable by the advent of Santa Claus, the Symphony concert this week was given last night, instead of Saturday. The program was:
Overture to "Camacho's Wedding," op. 10 ..... Mendelssohn
Aria, from "The Seasons," "With Eagerness the Husbandman" ..... Haydn
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, op. 74 ..... Tschalkowsky
Songs with pianoforte .....
"Morte," d'Erlanger; Aubade, from "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo.
Symphonic Festival Prologue, "Pax Triumphantum" ..... Van der Stucken
(First time.)

Semi-Novelty Introduced.

The "Camacho" overture, one of the least familiar of all Mendelssohn's works, had not been played at these concerts for seventeen years, and it is interesting to conjecture the thought that impelled Mr. Gericke to drag it forth from the library again.

However, it is worth hearing as a semi-novelty, a sort of musical curiosity—although it is conventional in form and thoroughly genteel and polished in its ideas. It may be called an eminently respectable trifle, yet remarkable for a boy of sixteen.

Pathetique Symphony.

Not so the magnificent "Pathetique" symphony, the most profound and significant purely orchestral work for the last fifty years. An eminent reviewer of Boston called it "sewer music" at the first hearing, but he afterward amply recanted. It is, to be sure, full of the horror of the ultimate destiny of man, but even in its gloom it thrills and fascinates. Tschalkowsky's strange nature here has its full outlet, and here, too, his musical genius is in most splendid flower. The performance was masterly in its technical skill, and more impetuous and fiery than any Mr. Gericke has given of this particular work.

Still, the reserve that he insists upon spreading over the symphony was sometimes in evidence. Nevertheless, it made a great effect, and was warmly applauded.

Curious Mixture.

Mr. Van der Stucken's "Pax Triumphantum" is a curious mixture of commonplace bombast, nobility of thought and deafening noise. A theme of true beauty will be succeeded by one that a popular song composer might have written.

The struggle between "brutal force" and "longing for peace" is often a blur of meaningless sounds, while the finale of bells, gong, organ, bass drum and cymbals suggests a fire rather than an both of peace. However, the work has its merits, and under certain conditions it may doubtless be effective.

Gilbert's Singing.

Mr. Gilbert's singing was of the highest order of artistry. Never has the jovial old Haydn air in praise of the whistling farmer been more delightfully given in this city, while his two songs with pianoforte accompaniment were models in every sense.

1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN,	OVERTURE to "Genoveva."
BRAHMS,	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 2, in B flat major, op. 83.
DEBUSSY,	"Après midi d'un Faun." (First time.)
BEETHOVEN,	SYMPHONY in E flat major, No. 3, "Eroica." op. 55

Soloist:

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

The guiding-motives are very graphic and well employed. In fine contrast are the savage "brute force" figure and the tender melody which typifies "Longing for Peace," and the chief struggle is between these two themes; but still more prominent is the figure, of 9 notes, which ushers in the "Celebration of Peace," and this is ingeniously varied and led to a climax. The March of the combatants, the Plaint of suffering Humanity, the motive of Despair, are all earnest and picturesque details of the work.

But finally the great climax, the apotheosis of it all, comes with an outburst of Thanksgiving, with the grand old chorale theme,—"Nun danket alle Gott!"—

"Let all give thanks to God,
Hands, heart and voice upraising.
His great deeds celebrate
With gratitude and praising."

Even without the chorus this lofty theme with the organ and full orchestra made a most majestic ending to a very powerful work. It was well to give this composition with America's greatest orchestra, and it was gratifying to think that there is in the west so thorough a master of the complexities of modern scoring.

It is quite possible that many did not understand the complex work at a single hearing, but, instead of slighting it on this account, they ought to hear it again. It is distinctly a greater work than the composer's "Ratcliffe" and, spite of an occasional Wagnerian resemblance, is original.

The muted trumpets blew their part nobly and, considering the great difficulties, the whole performance was one that proved the mastery of Mr. Gericke over thorny scores.

It may go even better at the performance this afternoon, for, while the concert took place last night, the public "rehearsal" of it takes place today—which is strange but true!

Louis C. Elson.

SEMI-NOVELTY WORTH HEARING

Mendelssohn's "Camacho" Overture
Reintroduced by Symphony Orchestra After Period of 17 Years.

A PATHETIQUE SYMPHONY

Most Profound and Significant Purely Orchestral Work for the
Last 50 Years.

B Journal Dec 23 1904

Out of respect for the evening made notable by the advent of Santa Claus, the Symphony concert this week was given last night, instead of Saturday.

The program was:

Overture to "Camacho's Wedding," op. 10 ..... Mendelssohn
Aria, from "The Seasons," "With Eagerness the Husbandman" ..... Haydn
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, op. 74 ..... Tchaikowsky
Songs with pianoforte .....
"Morte," d'Erlanger; Aubade, from "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo.
Symphonic Festival Prologue, "Pax Triumphant" ..... Van der Stucken
(First time.)

Semi-Novelty Introduced.

The "Camacho" overture, one of the least familiar of all Mendelssohn's works, had not been played at these concerts for seventeen years, and it is interesting to conjecture the thought that impelled Mr. Gericke to drag it forth from the library again.

However, it is worth hearing as a semi-novelty, a sort of musical curiosity—although it is conventional in form and thoroughly genteel and polished in its ideas. It may be called an eminently respectable trifle, yet remarkable for a boy of sixteen.

Pathetique Symphony.

Not so the magnificent "Pathetique" symphony, the most profound and significant purely orchestral work for the last fifty years. An eminent reviewer of Boston called it "sewer music" at the first hearing, but he afterward amply recanted. It is, to be sure, full of the horror of the ultimate destiny of man, but even in its gloom it thrills and fascinates. Tchaikowsky's strange nature here has its full outlet, and here, too, his musical genius is in most splendid flower. The performance was masterly in its technical skill, and more impetuous and fiery than any Mr. Gericke has given of this particular work.

Still, the reserve that he insists upon spreading over the symphony was sometimes in evidence. Nevertheless, it made a great effect, and was warmly applauded.

Curious Mixture.

Mr. Van der Stucken's "Pax Triumphant" is a curious mixture of commonplace bombast, nobility of thought and deafening noise. A theme of true beauty will be succeeded by one that a popular song composer might have written.

The struggle between "brutal force" and "longing for peace" is often a blur of meaningless sounds, while the finale of bells, gong, organ, bass drum and cymbals suggests a fire rather than an

"apotheosis of peace." However, the work has its merits, and under certain conditions it may doubtless be effective.

Gilibert's Singing.

Mr. Gilibert's singing was of the highest order of artistry. Never has the jovial old Haydn air in praise of the whistling farmer been more delightfully given in this city, while his two songs with pianoforte accompaniment were models in every sense.

1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN,	OVERTURE to "Genoveva."
BRAHMS,	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 2, in B flat major, op. 83.
DEBUSSY,	"Apres midi d'un Faun." (First time.)
BEETHOVEN,	SYMPHONY in E flat major, No. 3, "Eroica." op. 55

Soloist:

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN,

OVERTURE to "Genoveva." op. 81.

BRAHMS,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in B flat major, No. 2,
op. 83.

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Allegro appassionato.
- III. Andante.
- IV. Allegretto grazioso.

DEBUSSY,

PRELUDE to Stephanie Mallarmé's Ellogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun."
(First time at these concerts.)

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.

- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Allegro: Trio.
- IV. Allegro.

Soloist:

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Symphony Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra Jan. 2, 1905

At the tenth symphony concert, given last Saturday evening, Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist, and this was the programme:

Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81.
 Brahms: Concerto for Pianoforte, in B-flat major, No. 2, Op. 3.
 Debussy: Prelude to Stephanie Mallarmé's Ellogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun."
 (First time at these concerts.)
 Beethoven: Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Op. 67.

The concert gained distinction chiefly from the production of Debussy's prelude "The Afternoon of a Faun," which composition, incidentally, had been played twice before in Boston, once by the Orchestral Club, under Mr. Longy, and once by Mr. Lang, at a Chickering Production Concert. As everyone knows by this time, the piece undertakes to reproduce musically the impressions aroused by Mallarmé's extraordinary poem of the same name, a strange work in which probably few persons can discover so much as did Mr. Edmund Gosse. Since the meaning, if there be a meaning, of this singular poem is obscure, it will be quite as well, in listening to the Debussy prelude, to forget the poem and listen solely to the music as music. With each hearing it sounds more beautiful, with a queer, shimmering, glittering beauty all its own. It makes one dream—of what, it would be hard to tell. But a listener does dream, filled with a sense of being in the presence of something beautiful, where analysis of harmonic structure and of instrumentation would be out of place. One can merely listen and enjoy. It is only to be hoped that the experience may soon be offered concertgoers again, for it is not every day that one can hear music of such strange fascination so exquisitely played.

After the prelude, a composition that no musician would at present be likely to call "great," it was interesting to listen to a work that for nearly a century has held its own for grandeur unsurpassed, the C-minor symphony of Beethoven. At the risk of being rudely pounced upon for an impudent upstart, one listener is inclined to venture the opinion that this symphony, long held as lofty, is growing old much faster than the less pretentious symphonies of Beethoven, such as the seventh and the eighth. In all times, it would seem, the reputation of the fifth symphony has rested more on its deep emotional content than on its musical beauties, remarkable as these may be. But it is emotionalism in music that ages, while musical beauty never grows old. Be this as it may, in any case the superb performance of the first two movements of the symphony in C minor aroused on Saturday but perfunctory applause, whereas the first movement of the eighth symphony, at its last production, was greeted with enthusiasm. It is all very curious; what is to become of one's standards if Beethoven's fifth symphony will not stand the test of all time?

Possibly Debussy's "Faun" prelude, which concerns itself chiefly with beauty and sonority, may live the longer.

A second feature of Saturday's concert was Mr. Joseffy's playing of the Brahms B-flat concerto, disappointing as it was to one who for years has been told of his glorious performance of the piece in 1896. Truth to tell, it is difficult to conceive of any pianist making an overwhelming effect with the Brahms concerto, a work that combines all the bad qualities his enemies attribute to Brahms. And yet Mr. Joseffy played very beautifully indeed, with wonderfully sweet tone, and with exquisite phrasing. The last two movements were far superior to the first two, and at the end Mr. Joseffy received much applause. The entire concert was one of splendid playing from the orchestra.

There will be a concert this coming Saturday evening, at which Miss Muriel Foster will sing. The programme is to be as follows: Vincent d'Indy, Symphony No. 2, in B-flat major (first time); Schubert, Song, "Die Allmacht;" Brahms, Waltzes (orchestrated by W. Gericke); Songs with Orchestra; Dvorak, Overture, "Carneval."

R. R. G.

A Word for the Fifth Symphony

To the Editor of the Transcript:

So much has been said by the various critics of the daily papers in regard to the antiquity of Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony" which had such a glorious performance at last Saturday's concert, that a humble layman would like to raise his voice in protest against such condemnation. After all, a critic speaks but his own opinion, and surely there are hundreds in an audience of today who would no more think of assigning a work of such immortal beauty as this symphony to a side shelf than they would think of denouncing a noble and beautiful character as old-fashioned and out of place in the rushing life of today.

"What is good is permanent," in art as well as in human life, and we must never cease to be grateful for the true and the beautiful in whatever form it comes to us. We need only to point to the spontaneous enthusiasm with which the audience greeted the performance on Saturday to feel sure that this is fortunately still true. One word must be added in praise of the magnificent performance by the orchestra—it could not have been better in any way and will linger long in the memory when other trivial sounds have passed into oblivion.

Jan. 5, 1905. A GRATEFUL LISTENER

SYMPHONY TICKET

End seat on aisle GG for FRIDAY AFTER-NOON concert. For information, telephone 811-3 Cambridge. (A)

Symphony Rehearsals

H 24 & 25, near centre aisle; $25 for one, $45 for both. E. F. K., Boston Transcript. (A):

TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Debussy's Prelude to Stephane
Mallarme's "Afternoon of a Faun" Played for First Time
by the Famous Orchestra.

JOSEFFY NOT SEEN IN HIS BEST FORM

In Brahms' Concerto He Showed a Lack of Breadth, Color and Reserve Force—First Movement
Monotonous and Spineless.

Herald — Jan. 1, 1905

The programme of the 10th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann
Piano concerto in B-flat major, No. 2.....Brahms
(Mr. Joseffy, pianist.)
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"
(Eloque by S. Mallarme).....Debussy
(First time at these concerts.)
Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven

The name of Claude Debussy appeared last night for the first time on a Symphony programme, yet this prelude to Mallarme's poem and Debussy's "Nocturnes" have been played here in other concerts, and the performance of the prelude last evening was the third in this city. The first was at a subscription concert of the Orchestral Club in 1902; the second was at a Chickering production concert early in 1904.

Mallarme's poem is cryptic even to Frenchmen who are in sympathy with the symbolists. His aim, as Mr. Gosse puts it, was "to use words in such harmonious combinations as will suggest to the reader a mood or a condition which is not mentioned in the text, but is nevertheless paramount in the poet's mind at the moment of composition." The words serve then as a help to mind reading. The faun awakens and tries to recall his delightful experience of the previous afternoon. Did gracious nymphs visit him? The experience is now unsubstantial, vague. Perhaps he dreamed it all. Then in a dream he can again know joy. A didactic poet of a former century would have entitled these verses "Pleasures of Memory," or "Pleasures of Hope," or "Pleasures of ### Anticipation.

Debussy has been finely characterized by his colleague, Bruneau, as the "very exceptional, very singular, very solitary Claude Debussy." He is attracted by that which is extraordinary, out of the way, and his hatred of the commonplace is malignant. He is by no means a poseur, by no means a precieux. He is as sincere in his use of peculiar scales, harmonies, progressions, as was Mendelssohn in his genteel formulas of the highest orthodoxy. He hears and feels and expresses music in his own way. He shuns the harmonically agreeing crowd as he does the mob of loungers on the boulevard. Never did a composer shut himself up more resolutely in his ivory tower than Debussy dreaming musical dreams of Baudelaire, Verlaine, Maeterlinck, or Dante Gabriel Rossetti.

This prelude was composed in 1892, and it was his first purely orchestral work. The opening and unaccompanied flute melody, the chief theme of the prelude, reminds one a little of the chant of the priestess in "Aida." Perhaps one of the nymphs, having heard it in Egypt, but not wholly sure of the intervals, sang it to the faun, who tried in turn to pipe it. There is a middle section of the work that has a passing flavor of Massenet, but as a whole the music is of singular originality, both in thought and in expression. The very fact that Debussy entitled the composition a prelude shows that he did not attempt the vain task of supplying an interlinear musical translation of the poem. The music is frankly a prelude in dream-pastoral manner to create a mood in sympathy with that of the poet. The success of such impressionistic music depends largely on the poetical or generally imaginative sensitiveness of the hearer. The hearer must meet the composer half way, and he must also be in sympathy with that which inspired the musical impression, whether it be a landscape, a dream, a drama or a lyric. To him that sees in music only a rigidly formulated science this prelude must be a stumbling block, as the operas of Monteverde, the music of Bach, many of the works of Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Wagner were to their respective and respectable and scholarly contemporaries.

This prelude is delicious music, not merely because it is out of the common in vein of thought and in the technic of expression, but because it is highly imaginative and ineffably beautiful. Mr. Gericke is to be thanked for bringing the prelude before such a large audience. There was much that was exquisite in the performance, but the ending was marred by the poor playing of the antique cymbals. In this instance the smaller the cymbals the harder the task, apparently, to the timid and unrhythmical players.

Mr. Joseffy's performance of Brahms' concerto was generally colorless, weak and ineffective. Only in the finale was this accomplished pianist heard to his advantage. When he played the same concerto here early in 1896 he gave a memorable performance. Last night the first movement, so far as the piano was concerned, was monotonous and spineless. The second movement, the allegro appassionato, was passionless. In these two movements there was neither breadth, fire nor nobility, and there was an absence of the distinguishing Josefian qualities that have formerly enabled this pianist to work his spell at will, even when the concerto was of a heroic rather than a purely lyric character. Nor was there in the andante the consciousness of reserve force that must be behind sentiment and delicacy. In the finale the pianist was more like unto the Joseffy of old. It may be said that this concerto of Brahms is practically a symphony for orchestra and piano, and not a virtuoso concerto. This is true, but even then the piano in its solo passages should be righteously assertive not shy, ill at ease, inexpressive. Mr. Joseffy was heartily welcomed and applauded.

The overture to "Genoveva," which was played with both finesse and spirit, brings to the mind the thought of how many operas now live only by their overtures. Schumann's opera was practically stillborn, and the heroine of Brabant is known on the lyric stage only as burlesqued by Offenbach and his librettist. But Offenbach had keen stage instinct, and Schumann was purely lyrical even in a trying dramatic situation.

It was, perhaps, time for a performance of Beethoven's symphony. Such great works should be performed only at stated intervals. As Hauptmann said in substance, dwellers near mountain peaks become too familiar with them. If "The Messiah" were not to be performed again for, say, six years, the work might seem a masterpiece to even those who find little in oratorio as a form of musical art.

JOSEFFY'S WORK AT TENTH SYMPHONY

Plays Brahms' Concerto With Skill, Finish and Taste.

B Journal — Jan. 2, 1905

For the tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the soloist was Mr. Rafael Joseffy, and the program was:

Overture to "Genoveva," opus 81....Schumann
Concerto for pianoforte, in B-flat major,
No. 2.....Brahms
Prelude to Stephane Mallarme's ellogue,
"The Afternoon of a Faun" (first time at these concerts).....Debussy
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, opus 67
Beethoven

Mr. Joseffy played with great skill, with that finish and taste for which he has ever been marked, and he made the concerto as vital and appealing as any pianist could.

The strange Debussy's music to the weird Mallarme's poetic enigma, "The Afternoon of a Faun," is surely not at all incomprehensible. If one has the least imagination, and knows anything whatsoever of the poem, this exquisite bit of tonal fancy will be as an open book.

It is the acme of fantastic expression, the most perfect piece of imaginative writing heard in many a day. And it was played with a poetic tenderness and charm, as well as an absolute elegance of tone, that left no thought that it could be bettered. Its few brief moments are long to be remembered.

Mr. Gericke read the magnificent Fifth Symphony with more unbending, more toleration of power than he has ever before shown in this particular work.

The noble slow movement made a deep impression, and the whole symphony was eloquent and fine.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adv. PROGRAMME Jan 2, 1905
Schumann, Overture to "Genoveva".....
Brahms, Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in
B flat major, op. 83.
Rafael Joseffy, pianist.
Debussy, "Apres midi d'un Faun,".....
(First time.)
Beethoven, Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....

Schumann's "Genoveva" is not the strongest of his overtures, although it is much the strongest part of the opera, in fact the only part that has survived. It is almost amusing to note this gentle composer aiming at dramatic touches that would have required a Wagner. But the work is at least comprehensible and it is melodic, and Keats has said—"Heard melodies are sweet." It is in the demoniacal parts of "Genoveva" that our Florestan fails somewhat. Nevertheless there is a sufficient climax to indicate that Virtue finally triumphs, always a comfortable thing to know. The horns might have played more smoothly; possibly those horns picture the dilemma of the unhappy heroine.

The Brahms piano concerto in B-flat is a veritable symphony; not merely because it has an extra movement, thus bringing it up to symphonic length, but because it is in its essence an orchestral work, and because its tremendous difficulties are never in the line of mere solo display. For once the great Joseffy erred on the side of reserve. Concert-goers may remember that this pianist first came to America as a meteor. He could play more notes in a given time than anybody else; he could do tricks of virtuosity that were not rivalled until Rosenthal came—much later. Then he disappeared for a long time; he lived quietly in Tarrytown, he taught splendidly in New York, but he avoided the concert platform.

When he came back to public life he was as changed as Rip Van Winkle, although not as decrepit. He had become a great musician, a man who thought first of the ensemble and last of himself, an artist to whom the success of a great work was worth more than a personal triumph.

But on this occasion the matter of self-abnegation was pushed too far! He played with a Dresden China tone that was fragile in the extreme. Possibly if the pianist and orchestra had been in Potter Hall, with a select few as audience, this might have been effective, yet even then it would not have pictured the sturdiness of Brahms; in any case it was a mistake to plant musical violets in Symphony Hall.

For all this the work was the greatest (in spite of the C-minor symphony) upon the programme, and it had some glorious moments. Mr. Gericke attended to his part of the ensemble with his usual perfect musicianship, and balanced his forces well against the extreme delicacy of the soloist.

The second movement was clear as crystal and the abstrusity, with which the work is charged, vanished. The andante was the most perfect performance of this romantic movement that we can recall. Here the whisperings of the soloist were quite in place, and one cannot exaggerate the beauty of the violoncello solo; this movement was the finest point of the whole concert.

But the first and last movements of the concerto were disappointing because of the defect mentioned above. In any case the work is a "Crux" for the public; it is so prolix, so subtle in its development, that it will never be a composition to conjure with.

Poor Debussy, sandwiched in between Brahms and Beethoven, seemed weaker than usual. We have now heard this "Afternoon of the Faun" 3 times, and can understand its beauties of orchestration, its delicate pastoral effects, its charming moments of meditation. Nor are we of those who, because there have been musical Miltons and Shakespeares, would deny the right of a tonal Keats to exist. But we cannot feel that all this extreme ecstasy is natural; it seems forced and hysterical; it is musical absinthe; there are moments when the suffering Faun seems to need a veterinary surgeon. Yet the work was much applauded and the conductor bowed his thanks.

Beethoven's "Heroic Symphony" had been announced, but was changed into the C-minor. It was a wise change, for after such a deep work as the Brahms Piano Concerto, it would have been a task to listen to so long a symphony as that in E-flat. We were not altogether delighted with the interpretation. The opening figure was roughly given. Von Bulow's plan, to count an extra measure before the attack, has its merits here. That rising sequence in the basses against the subordinate theme of the first movement might be made much bolder.

In some points there was overshadowing. We are out of sympathy with the over-editing and the excessive shading of Beethoven; with him, of all composers, a straightforward, masculine style is best.

But we must chronicle the splendid work of the contrabasses. We have never heard their difficult work in the scherzo (and the variation in the slow movement, too) go so smoothly and clearly. The concert therefore had its faults, but it had also points of exceptional merit and beauty.

Louis C. Elson.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Joseffy Soloist With Symphony Orchestra.

First Tucker Chamber Concert in Chickering Hall Today.

Other Recitals of the Week —Personal Gossip.

Globe Jan. 11, 1905

The program for the 10th symphony rehearsal and concert had for an orchestral novelty Debussy's prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun," played for the first time at these concerts. The celebrated pianist, Rafael Joseffy, was the soloist in the Brahms B-flat major concerto. Schumann's overture to "Genoveva" and Beethoven's C minor symphony filled out the program. Brahms' concerto may not give unalloyed pleasure to all concert patrons, and much of the first and second parts may be rather precise in form and monotonous, but the third and fourth movements are so full of brilliant moments for the solo instrument, and are so light and cheery in character, that the earlier impressions are almost obliterated by the musical distinction of the last two divisions. Mr Joseffy's art is so sincere and scholarly, and his sympathy with the sentiment and spirit of Brahms is so manifest, that the compelling charm of his interpretation was warmly recognized and met with enthusiastic approval.

The simplicity of the first movement and the more fiery phrases of the second were each skilfully set forth by this master of the keyboard. The elaborate figurations and passages associated with the cello were given with beautiful effect and without any attempt at a display of technique to bring the piano into undue prominence. The brilliant and graceful finale was performed in a manner which brought out all the varied beauties of the work by his masterful mingling of tonal coloring, clearness of phrasing and delicacy of the cantabile measures. He was recalled many times at the close of his performance.

Schumann's "Genoveva" overture calls for no special notice, its interpretation being up to the usual standard of playing by the orchestra. The Debussy prelude, based upon the "supposed soliloquy of a faun resting from the sultry midday heat in the shade of a thick wood," is a peculiar musical inspiration, comprising four themes of a languorous nature, the principal one being five notes of the chromatic scale. It is clearly a fantastic bit of writing and not very interesting, except as an oddity. The somewhat disjointed work gave excellent opportunities to show the melodious tonality of the woodwinds in the orchestra, but aside from that invites no particular comment. The performance of the Beethoven symphony was superb, especially in the andante movement, and proves the most satisfactory number on the program.

Miss Muriel Foster, the soloist this week, will be heard in Schubert's "Die Allonacht" and other vocal selections. The orchestra will play Vincent d'Indy's second symphony for the first time at these concerts, waltzes by Brahms orchestrated by Mr Gericke, and the "Carneval" overture by Dvorak.

RAFAEL JOSEFFY PLAYS; D'INDY SYMPHONY HEARD

Widely Contrasting Music at the Boston Orchestra's Concert.

BRAHMS CONCERTO ON PIANO

Frenchman's Composition Shows Wonderful Harmonic Jugglery, but it Bears No Particular Message.

Wilhelm Gericke and his always precise and punctual Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town last night with two interesting things on their programme. Rafael Joseffy, one of the world's great pianists, was down for Brahms's concerto in B flat major, No. 2, opus 83, and Vincent d'Indy's symphony of similar number and tonality had a first hearing in this city. As might have been expected, the audience in Carnegie Hall was large and many a Joseffy enthusiast was on the spot. But whether the D'Indy number, one of the most extravagant pieces of tone-painting heard in this city, had exerted any special attraction may be doubted.

D'Indy is not unknown in New York. His "Foret Enchantée," an earlier work, is fresh in the memory. This Frenchman, who does not hesitate at the most ear-puzzling dissonances, has, like all modern composers, an astonishing command of orchestral techniques and is not only an expert contrapuntist, but also extremely proficient in devising strange and haunting harmonies. Could they be considered separately from the musical matter they are supposed to clothe, they would inspire much admiration. Unfortunately, however, the musical ideas within the scintillating masses of effects are almost nil, and where they amount to something are borrowed from other composers—Wagner and Liszt in particular.

REMARKABLE TONAL FABRIC.

The symphony in B flat major, the author says, is not "programme music." But does the mere absence of a title make a tone-poem a symphony in the conventional sense? If D'Indy's second "symphony" is not "programme music," neither is Strauss's

"Domestica." There is not the slightest doubt this score is a remarkable tonal fabric, containing much beautiful and effective writing, hard as it is to penetrate its mazes on a first hearing. Yet it cannot be considered an important addition to musical literature. What lasting art work can mere cerebral energy and cleverness produce when there is no true message to convey to the world? D'Indy is a technical wizard and can juggle with harmonic colors with the utmost ease and often with superficially impressive results, but if there is originality of treatment and workmanship in his latest symphonic effort it is without melodic inspiration.

At the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this extraordinary composition received wholly admirable treatment. Mr. Gericke not only exposed its puzzling intricacies with astonishing clearness, but worked up dramatic climaxes with far more vigor and enthusiasm than is generally his wont.

Brahms's second concerto is not one of the master's most inspired works; but certainly it could have had a more enlivening interpretation than Joseffy gave it. The pianist never rose above a mezza-forte. He actually whispered the music—this champion featherweight technician. As for heart impulse, some persons say they have discovered it in Joseffy's playing recently, but his performance last night was cold and colorless.

Instead of Schumann's "Genoveva" overture Schubert's Funeral March, orchestrated by Liszt, was offered in memory of Theodore Thomas. Perhaps some in the audience had failed to notice the slip of paper inserted in the programmes which advertised the change. At any rate the Apparently exhausted him. We beseech him to forswear Johannes and his music. We entreat him to go back to his old favorites, Chopin and Liszt. Chopin is the one, the supreme writer for the piano, and if Mr. Joseffy still wishes to astonish, there is the elegance, there is the bravura of Liszt, and we should much prefer to hear from this pianist a Hungarian rhapsody by Liszt, the true thing, than any distorted recollection of Hungary by Brahms. Sar Peladan is not always a wholesome companion for a young man, but it was he that likened the Muse of Brahms to a gypsy woman trying to dance when tightly corseted.

The second movement was clear as crystal and the abstrusity, with which the work is charged, vanished. The andante was the most perfect performance of this romantic movement that we can recall. Here the whisperings of the soloist were quite in place, and one cannot exaggerate the beauty of the violoncello solo; this movement was the finest point of the whole concert.

But the first and last movements of the concerto were disappointing because of the defect mentioned above. In any case the work is a "Crux" for the public; it is so prolix, so subtle in its development, that it will never be a composition to conjure with.

Poor Debussy, sandwiched in between Brahms and Beethoven, seemed weaker than usual. We have now heard this "Afternoon of the Faun" 3 times, and can understand its beauties of orchestration, its delicate pastoral effects, its charming moments of meditation. Nor are we of those who, because there have been musical Miltons and Shakespeares, would deny the right of a tonal Keats to exist. But we cannot feel that all this extreme ecstasy is natural; it seems forced and hysterical; it is musical absinthe; there are moments when the suffering Faun seems to need a veterinary surgeon. Yet the work was much applauded and the conductor bowed his thanks.

Beethoven's "Heroic Symphony" had been announced, but was changed into the C-minor. It was a wise change, for after such a deep work as the Brahms Piano Concerto, it would have been a task to listen to so long a symphony as that in E-flat. We were not altogether delighted with the interpretation. The opening figure was roughly given. Von Bulow's plan, to count an extra measure before the attack, has its merits here. That rising sequence in the basses against the subordinate theme of the first movement might be made much bolder.

In some points there was overshadowing. We are out of sympathy with the over-editing and the excessive shading of Beethoven; with him, of all composers, a straightforward, masculine style is best.

But we must chronicle the splendid work of the contrabasses. We have never heard their difficult work in the scherzo (and the variation in the slow movement, too) go so smoothly and clearly. The concert therefore had its faults, but it had also points of exceptional merit and beauty.

Louis C. Elson.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Joseffy Soloist With Symphony Orchestra.

First Tucker Chamber Concert in Chickering Hall Today.

Other Recitals of the Week — Personal Gossip.

Globe Jan. 11, 1905

The program for the 10th symphony rehearsal and concert had for an orchestral novelty Debussy's prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun," played for the first time at these concerts. The celebrated pianist, Rafael Joseffy, was the soloist in the Brahms B-flat major concerto. Schumann's overture to "Genoveva" and Beethoven's C minor symphony filled out the program. Brahms' concerto may not give unalloyed pleasure to all concert patrons, and much of the first and second parts may be rather precise in form and monotonous, but the third and fourth movements are so full of brilliant moments for the solo instrument, and are so light and cheery in character, that the earlier impressions are almost obliterated by the musical distinction of the last two divisions. Mr Joseffy's art is so sincere and scholarly, and his sympathy with the sentiment and spirit of Brahms is so manifest, that the compelling charm of his interpretation was warmly recognized and met with enthusiastic approval.

The simplicity of the first movement and the more fiery phrases of the second were each skilfully set forth by this master of the keyboard. The elaborate figurations and passages associated with the cello were given with beautiful effect and without any attempt at a display of technique to bring the piano into undue prominence. The brilliant and graceful finale was performed in a manner which brought out all the varied beauties of the work by his masterful mingling of tonal coloring, clearness of phrasing and delicacy of the cantabile measures. He was recalled many times at the close of his performance.

Schumann's "Genoveva" overture calls for no special notice, its interpretation being up to the usual standard of playing by the orchestra. The Debussy prelude, based upon the "supposed soliloquy of a faun resting from the sultry midday heat in the shade of a thick wood," is a peculiar musical inspiration, comprising four themes of a languorous nature, the principal one being five notes of the chromatic scale. It is clearly a fantastic bit of writing and not very interesting, except as an oddity. The somewhat disjointed work gave excellent opportunities to show the melodious tonality of the woodwinds in the orchestra, but aside from that invites no particular comment. The performance of the Beethoven symphony was superb, especially in the andante movement, and proves the most satisfactory number on the program.

Miss Muriel Foster, the soloist this week, will be heard in Schubert's "Die Allonacht" and other vocal selections. The orchestra will play Vincent d'Indy's second symphony for the first time at these concerts, waltzes by Brahms orchestrated by Mr Gericke, and the "Carneval" overture by Dvorak.

RAFAEL JOSEFFY PLAYS; D'INDY SYMPHONY HEARD

Widely Contrasting Music at the Boston Orchestra's Concert.

BRAHMS CONCERTO ON PIANO

Frenchman's Composition Shows Wonderful Harmonic Jugglery, but it Bears No Particular Message.

Wilhelm Gericke and his always precise and punctual Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town last night with two interesting things on their programme. Rafael Joseffy, one of the world's great pianists, was down for Brahms's concerto in B flat major, No. 2, opus 83, and Vincent d'Indy's symphony of similar number and tonality had a first hearing in this city. As might have been expected, the audience in Carnegie Hall was large and many a Joseffy enthusiast was on the spot. But whether the D'Indy number, one of the most extravagant pieces of tone-painting heard in this city, had exerted any special attraction may be doubted.

D'Indy is not unknown in New York. His "Foret Enchantée," an earlier work, is fresh in the memory. This Frenchman, who does not hesitate at the most ear-puzzling dissonances, has, like all modern composers, an astonishing command of orchestral techniques and is not only an expert contrapuntist, but also extremely proficient in devising strange and haunting harmonies. Could they be considered separately from the musical matter they are supposed to clothe, they would inspire much admiration. Unfortunately, however, the musical ideas within the scintillating masses of effects are almost nil, and where they amount to something are borrowed from other composers—Wagner and Liszt in particular.

REMARKABLE TONAL FABRIC.

The symphony in B flat major, the author says, is not "programme music." But does the mere absence of a title make a tone-poem a symphony in the conventional sense? If D'Indy's second "symphony" is not "programme music," neither is Strauss's

"Domestica." There is not the slightest doubt this score is a remarkable tonal fabric, containing much beautiful and effective writing, hard as it is to penetrate its mazes on a first hearing. Yet it cannot be considered an important addition to musical literature. What lasting art work can mere cerebral energy and cleverness produce when there is no true message to convey to the world? D'Indy is a technical wizard and can juggle with harmonic colors with the utmost ease and often with superficially impressive results, but if there is originality of treatment and workmanship about

Herald Jan. 8, 1905
The Two Joseffys.

Mr. Joseffy's performance of Brahms' second concerto at the 10th Symphony concert was a severe disappointment to many friends and admirers. It seemed as though the vitality had gone from his fingers. His tone did not carry; it was feeble. His delicacy of touch was always famous; it distinguished him; but this delicacy gave one the idea of reserve force behind it.

In former years Mr. Joseffy was conspicuous among pianists by supreme elegance in interpretation and, also by his wooing and caressing touch. Some who delight in thunder and guns used to sneer at his refined sentiment and musical discretion. Perhaps he was tired of hearing this foolish reproach. Whatever the reason, he turned toward one Johannes Brahms and began to practice diligently his piano music. This music of Brahms was the antipodes of all that had made Joseffy celebrated. But the pianist wished to be regarded as an eminently "serious" person.

We are not given to associate a man like Joseffy with Brahms, whose music needs a massive and concrete player. We like to think of a Brahms player as one of stern and rugged features, with a heavy hand, with bushy whiskers in which the birds of the air might build their nests and be at home. It is true that Mr. Arthur Whiting, who has devoted his life with an earnestness almost pathetic to spreading the piano gospel of Johannes Brahms, has a smooth face, but we are all the more inclined to put our trust in plenty of whiskers. The face of the Brahms player should be granitic. An Indian caught young and trained to this music would be an ideal player of the more solid works of the holy Johannes, and in the more passionate moments he could use tomahawk instead of fingers on the keyboard with refreshing and reassuring effect.

Mr. Joseffy, by a tour de force some years ago almost succeeded in turning this second concerto into a thing of beauty by the quality of his tone and by his rhythmic dash. The effort apparently exhausted him. We beseech him to forswear Johannes and his music. We entreat him to go back to his old favorites, Chopin and Liszt. Chopin is the one, the supreme writer for the piano, and if Mr. Joseffy still wishes to astonish, there is the elegance, there is the bravura of Liszt, and we should much prefer to hear from this pianist a Hungarian rhapsody by Liszt, the true thing, than any distorted recollection of Hungary by Brahms. Sar Peladan is not always a wholesome companion for a young man, but it was he that likened the Muse of Brahms to a gypsy woman trying to dance when tightly corseted.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICHKE, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

1 Schubert
3 VINCENT D'INDY,

Funeral March
SYMPHONY in B flat major, No. 2, op. 57.
I. Extrêmement lent: Très vif.
II. Modérément lent.
III. Modéré: Très animé.
IV. Introduction, fugue et finale.
(First time.)

2 BRUCH,

PENELOPE'S LAMENT, from "Odysseus," op. 41.

~~BRAHMS,~~

~~WALTZES, op. 39.~~

~~(Scored for orchestra by W. GERICHKE.)~~

4 ELGAR,

"SEA PICTURES." Three Songs from a cycle of five for CONTRALTO and ORCHESTRA, op. 37.

5 DVOŘÁK,

OVERTURE, "Carnival," op. 92.

As a tribute to the memory of THEODORE THOMAS, the Orchestra will play the Schubert Funeral March.

Soloist:

Miss MURIEL FOSTER.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

1 Schubert
3 VINCENT D'INDY,

Funeral March

SYMPHONY in B flat major, No. 2, op. 57.

- I. Extrêmement lent: Très vif.
- II. Modérément lent.
- III. Modéré: Très animé.
- IV. Introduction, fugue et finale.

(First time.)

2 BRUCH,

PENELOPE'S LAMENT, from "Odysseus," op. 41.

~~BRAHMS,~~

~~WALTZES, op. 39.~~

~~(Scored for orchestra by W. GERICKE.)~~

4 ELGAR,

"SEA PICTURES." Three Songs from a cycle of five for CONTRALTO and ORCHESTRA, op. 37.

5 DVOŘÁK,

OVERTURE, "Carnival," op. 92.

As a tribute to the memory of THEODORE THOMAS, the Orchestra will play the Schubert Funeral March.

Soloist:

Miss MURIEL FOSTER.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

11TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Miss Muriel Foster, the English contralto, was the soloist at the Symphony concert last evening. As a tribute to the memory of Theodore Thomas, Schubert's Funeral March was played as the first number of the programme. This necessitated a change in the order of the numbers, and the Brahms waltzes were omitted. The programme as finally given was as follows:

Funeral March ..... Schubert
Penelope's Lament from "Odysseus" ..... Bruch
Symphony No. 2 in B flat ..... D'Indy
Three songs from "Sea Pictures" ..... Elgar
"Carnival" overture, op. 92 ..... Dvorak

The symphony by D'Indy is new to Boston. It is in the regulation four movements, but is free in form and constructed melodically on what is known as the whole tone scale. This makes the work as to tonality very vague and unsatisfactory to ears that are accustomed to works founded on the usual scale, or even the chromatic twelve half-note scale used by Wagner largely in his operatic scores.

D'Indy has done many clever things as a composer, and some of his works heard here are of great interest and withal pleasing. But on a first hearing, his symphony given last evening gives little meaning. There is much elaboration and ingenious instrumentation. It would to many suggest a "guessing" piece to determine what it was all about. It was finely played, but made little impression on the audience, for it could not understand it.

Post Jan 8

One of the Beauties

ff with a new

It on the
ust now
Martin
e dotty,
it. It is ession of th effect
ndy has his sym-
e. When chaikow-t will be rouble in otes with-
D'Indy

Miss MURIEL FOSTER was born at Sunderland, England, November 22, 1877. She is a great-niece of the late Birket Foster, the artist. She became a pupil of the Royal College of Music, London, in 1896. Her first professional engagement was on November 6 of that year, at Bradford, in Sir Hubert Parry's "King Saul." She won several prizes at the Royal College as a pupil of Anna Williams, and she studied the organ and the piano at the same institution. In 1900 she had her first Festival engagement (at Worcester); in 1901 she was with Albani's concert company in Canada; and in 1902 she sang in Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius" at the Lower Rhine Festival, Düsseldorf. She has sung at Berlin, Cologne, Frankfort, Dresden, and at other German cities, and in Holland and Russia.

She first visited the United States early in 1904, and her first appearance in Boston was at an Arbos Quartet Concert, March 28, when she sang Fontenailles' "Pensée d'Autrefois," Bizet's "Berceuse," and Brahms's "O wüsst ich doch," "Dort in den Weiden," and "Willst du, dass ich geh?" At a Symphony Concert, April 2, 1904, she sang the aria, "Che farò senza Eurydice," from "Orfeo," Dvořák's "Gute Nacht," Rachmaninoff's "Von Jenseits," R. Strauss's "Muttertändelei."

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

In memory of Theodore Thomas, the eleventh symphony concert was prefaced with the Funeral March of Schubert, which Liszt scored for orchestra. While a more worthy tribute to the great musician would have been the Eröica symphony, it may be that there was too little time to prepare it suitably, and the march was indeed played impressively, with deep feeling on the part of all concerned. It was the greater pity, therefore, that many of the audience so far forgot themselves as to applaud the performance.

The programme of the concert was considerably changed, on account of the sad necessity for funeral music. Directly after it Miss Muriel Foster sang Penelope's Lament from the "Odysseus" of Bruch, and then came the first performance in Boston of D'Indy's second symphony, in B-flat, op. 57. The Brahms waltzes being omitted, Miss Foster next sang three of Elgar's "Sea Pictures," and the concert was ended with Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

Interest, of course, centred chiefly on the new symphony by d'Indy. Many works by this famous composer having been received in Boston with enthusiasm, notably the symphony for orchestra and pianoforte, this new symphony was looked forward to with keen pleasure. But the hearing of it proved a burden to nearly everybody. And after this single hearing the wiser part would undoubtedly be to say nothing about the composition, the apparent ugliness of which is only dazing. We have already seen that Vincent d'Indy is a man of tremendous individuality, with a musical personality that is forbidding, austere, without patience for the pretty trifles, the tender nothings that go so far toward making life agreeable. But with all its characteristics of harsh roughness, the music of d'Indy has possessed a potent charm, a fascination not unlike that exercised by vast sweeps of naked sand dunes, or by pine forests in winter, or yet again by breezy country uplands in the chill days of spring—a compelling fascination, if dreary and without touch of human kindness.

This new symphony seems remote and inhuman, like the most of what d'Indy has written, but, at least at first, it casts no spell over listeners. Two contrasting themes, we are told, form the basis of the work, themes which scarcely anyone would recognize at all, so undefined are they, so vague. And these two themes are manipulated through four very long movements, in which the composer, according to his wont, has been at slight pains to secure sonority of orchestration. Many pages, in truth, sound needlessly, uncouthly discordant, to be followed, on the other hand, by passages of amazing beauty. Staggered as a listener might be by the symphony, he could not fail to recognize the beauty of the first movement's close, the charm of the opening pages of the third movement, and the grandeur of the ending of the symphony. Mr. Gericke deserves warm thanks for giving us a hearing of this work, which it would be scandal for us not to have heard in Boston, but, in very truth, one performance of such a composition is of little avail. In justice to concert-goers, the symphony should be played again within a week or two. In justice to a composer of the power of Vincent d'Indy, also, his admirers should not be allowed to retain the idea, if the idea can be dispelled by further acquaintance, that his latest work is less a thing of beauty than of ugliness.

Miss Foster, the soloist of the concert, displayed a contralto voice of wonderfully beautiful quality, velvety and smooth. Unfortunately Miss Foster has not learned to use this splendid organ well, nor is she a singer of fine musical or rhetorical intelligence. She was most successful in the third Sea Picture, "The Swimmer." If a contralto were wanted to sing at a symphony concert there are several singers in Boston far more artistic than Miss Foster.

This week there will be no orchestral concert. Next week there will be two soloists, Mr. Adamowski and Mr. Gebhard. This will be the programme: Haydn, Symphony No. 2, in G major, "Oxford;" Wieniawski, Concerto for Violin, No. 2; Converse, Two Poems for Orchestra and Pianoforte; Wagner, Centennial March.

R. R. G.

PLAYED TRIBUTE TO MR. THOMAS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Changes Its Programme and Plays Funeral March in Memory of the Dead Conductor.

D'INDY'S SYMPHONY HEARD FOR FIRST TIME

A Work of Uncommon Strength and Importance, Yet It Undoubtedly Bored Many Greatly—Miss Muriel Foster the Soloist.

Herald Jan. 8, 1905

The programme of the 11th Symphony concert, given in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Funeral march ..... Schubert-Liszt
Penelope's Lament ..... Bruch
Symphony in B-flat major, No. 2 ..... D'Indy
(First time.)
"Sea Pictures," Nos. 2, 4, 5 ..... Elgar
Overture, "Carnival" ..... Dvorak

11TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Miss Muriel Foster, the English soloist at the Symphony concert, as a tribute to the memory of Schubert's Funeral March was number of the programme. The change in the order of the Brahms waltzes were omitted as finally given was as follows:

Funeral March .....
Penelope's Lament from "Odyssey" Symphony No. 2 in B flat .....
Three songs from "Sea Pictures" "Carnival" overture, op. 92.

The symphony by D'Indy is in the regulation four move in form and constructed melo known as the whole tone scale work as to tonality very vague to ears that are accustomed to the usual scale, or even the half-note scale used by Wagner operatic scores.

D'Indy has done many clever poses, and some of his works great interest and withal pl first hearing, his symphony gives little meaning. There is and ingenious instrumentation suggest a "guessing" piece to was all about. It was finely little impression on the audience understand it. Post. Sc.

The "Symphony" is melodically built on the whole-note scale system, over which just now the French composers, also Charles Martin Loeffler and Homer Norris have gone dotty, and are working the scheme to the limit. It is a case of abuse, not the use, for a succession of whole tones can often be employed with effect if done judiciously and wisely. D'Indy has done many excellent things, but in this symphony he was everywhere and nowhere. When he has something to say, as Peter Tschaikowsky had, then look for something that will be understood and well written, but the trouble in this latest thing of his is, he wrote notes without the something to say to the world. D'Indy should try again and be himself. Dec 14, 1905

Miss MURIEL FOSTER was born at Sunderland, England, November 22, 1877. She is a great-niece of the late Birket Foster, the artist. She became a pupil of the Royal College of Music, London, in 1896. Her first professional engagement was on November 6 of that year, at Bradford, in Sir Hubert Parry's "King Saul." She won several prizes at the Royal College as a pupil of Anna Williams, and she studied the organ and the piano at the same institution. In 1900 she had her first Festival engagement (at Worcester); in 1901 she was with Albani's concert company in Canada; and in 1902 she sang in Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius" at the Lower Rhine Festival, Düsseldorf. She has sung at Berlin, Cologne, Frankfort, Dresden, and at other German cities, and in Holland and Russia.

She first visited the United States early in 1904, and her first appearance in Boston was at an Arbos Quartet Concert, March 28, when she sang Fontenailles' "Pensée d'Autrefois," Bizet's "Berceuse," and Brahms's "O wüsst ich doch," "Dort in den Weiden," and "Willst du, dass ich geh?" At a Symphony Concert, April 2, 1904, she sang the aria, "Che farò senza Eurydice," from "Orfeo," Dvořák's "Gute Nacht," Rachmaninoff's "Von Jenseits," R. Strauss's "Muttertändelei."

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

In memory of Theodore Thomas, the eleventh symphony concert was prefaced with the Funeral March of Schubert, which Liszt scored for orchestra. While a more worthy tribute to the great musician would have been the Erlösa symphony, it may be that there was too little time to prepare it suitably, and the march was indeed played impressively, with deep feeling on the part of all concerned. It was the greater pity, therefore, that many of the audience so far forgot themselves as to applaud the performance.

The programme of the concert was considerably changed, on account of the sad necessity for funeral music. Directly after it Miss Muriel Foster sang Penelope's Lament from the "Odysseus" of Bruch, and then came the first performance in Boston of d'Indy's second symphony, in B-flat, op. 57. The Brahms waltzes being omitted, Miss Foster next sang three of Elgar's "Sea Pictures," and the concert was ended with Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

Interest, of course, centred chiefly on the new symphony by d'Indy. Many works by this famous composer having been received in Boston with enthusiasm, notably the symphony for orchestra and pianoforte, this new symphony was looked forward to with keen pleasure. But the hearing of it proved a burden to nearly everybody. And after this single hearing the wiser part would undoubtedly be to say nothing about the composition, the apparent ugliness of which is only dazing. We have already seen that Vincent d'Indy is a man of tremendous individuality, with a musical personality that is forbidding, austere, without patience for the pretty trifles, the tender nothings that go so far toward making life agreeable. But with all its characteristics of harsh roughness, the music of d'Indy has possessed a potent charm, a fascination not unlike that exercised by vast sweeps of naked sand dunes, or by pine forests in winter, or yet again by breezy country uplands in the chill days of spring—a compelling fascination, if dreary and without touch of human kindness.

This new symphony seems remote and inhuman, like the most of what d'Indy has written, but, at least at first, it casts no spell over listeners. Two contrasting themes, we are told, form the basis of the work, themes which scarcely anyone would recognize at all, so undefined are they, so vague. And these two themes are manipulated through four very long movements, in which the composer, according to his wont, has been at slight pains to secure sonority of orchestration. Many pages, in truth, sound needlessly, uncouthly discordant, to be followed, on the other hand, by passages of amazing beauty. Staggered as a listener might be by the symphony, he could not fail to recognize the beauty of the first movement's close, the charm of the opening pages of the third movement, and the grandeur of the ending of the symphony. Mr. Gericke deserves warm thanks for giving us a hearing of this work, which it would be scandal for us not to have heard in Boston.

but, in very truth, one performance of such a composition is of little avail. In justice to concert-goers, the symphony should be played again within a week or two. In justice to a composer of the power of Vincent d'Indy, also, his admirers should not be allowed to retain the idea, if the idea can be dispelled by further acquaintance, that his latest work is less a thing of beauty than of ugliness.

Miss Foster, the soloist of the concert, displayed a contralto voice of wonderfully beautiful quality, velvety and smooth. Unfortunately Miss Foster has not learned to use this splendid organ well, nor is she a singer of fine musical or rhetorical intelligence. She was most successful in the third Sea Picture, "The Swimmer." If a contralto were wanted to sing at a symphony concert there are several singers in Boston far more artistic than Miss Foster.

This week there will be no orchestral concert. Next week there will be two soloists, Mr. Adamowski and Mr. Gebhard. This will be the programme: Haydn, Symphony No. 2, in G major, "Oxford;" Wieniawski, Concerto for Violin, No. 2; Converse, Two Poems for Orchestra and Pianoforte; Wagner, Centennial March. R. R. G.

PLAYED TRIBUTE TO MR. THOMAS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Changes Its Programme and Plays Funeral March in Memory of the Dead Conductor.

D'INDY'S SYMPHONY HEARD FOR FIRST TIME

A Work of Uncommon Strength and Importance, Yet It Undoubtedly Bored Many Greatly—Miss Muriel Foster the Soloist.

Herald Jan. 8, 1905

The programme of the 11th Symphony concert, given in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Funeral march..... Schubert-Liszt
Penelope's Lament..... Bruch
Symphony in B-flat major, No. 2..... D'Indy
(First time.)
"Sea Pictures," Nos. 2, 4, 5..... Elgar
Overture, "Carnival"..... Dvorak

The news of the death of Theodore Thomas changed the programme that had been announced. The Funeral March of Schubert, written, we believe, in memory of Alexander I. of Russia, and orchestrated by Liszt, was played as a tribute to the great conductor. The waltzes by Brahms, which Mr. Gericke has orchestrated, were omitted, and the order of the remaining pieces was somewhat changed. Some thought that a nobler dead march might have been chosen, but there was no time for thorough rehearsal, and the march that was last played in memory of Gov. Wolcott was heard last night. Either some in the audience took it to be the first movement of the symphony, or the habit of showing pleasure by the clapping of the hands is such a confirmed one that applause followed the tribute, at which an intelligent visiting foreigner might have justly wondered.

The symphony by d'Indy was produced in Paris Feb. 28, 1904. The first performance in America was a week ago last night in Philadelphia by the orchestra of that city.

There is probably no dispute concerning the great technical skill of Vincent d'Indy as master of harmony, counterpoint and orchestration. Technical skill, however, is not all; it must be supplemented by emotion or imagination if the work is to make its way, if it is to be enduring. This symphony is a remarkable example of constructive skill.

Two themes are presented at the beginning; they are developed separately or together throughout the work; they are opposed to each; they war violently against each other; themes of lesser importance are derived from them; at the end of the finale one of them conquers and in the peroration soars triumphantly above the defeated and fettered rival. In this lies the dramatic action of a symphony that is without a programme.

The symphony undoubtedly bored many beyond endurance; it perplexed sincere admirers of the d'Indy known to them by his preceding works; it gave unalloyed pleasure to very few, if any; yet the symphony is beyond doubt and peradventure a work of uncommon strength and importance; it contains pages of marvellous beauty; there are deep musical thoughts, there are intensely dramatic passages; the peroration is one of the most striking and the noblest to be found in purely symphonic works.

But d'Indy has little by little shaped a most peculiar idiom of expression. He is not a born melodist in the common acceptance of the word. His emotion is cerebral rather than sensuous. His loftiness is as the austere peaks and the rarified air of the mountain chain that has been so dear to him from boyhood. His dislike of the commonplace has led him, perhaps unconsciously, perhaps deliberately, to the avoidance of anything that would be immediately accepted by the average audience as beautiful. His melodic thought is seldom a flowing line, and in its angularity there is none of the piquancy that distinguishes an unconventional melody by Chabrier. He occupies today a pontifical position in Paris, and he is constantly pontifical in this symphony.

He has shaped for his use an idiom that is a blend of strange and, at first hearing, unnecessary dissonances, of progressions without apparent logic either in the continuity or in the contrast, of unexpected or irritating orchestral effects, of abrupt, jolting rhythms. This idiom is often used, and when he lapses into even what might be called the vernacular or the ultra-modern French school it is only for a moment, and he suddenly resumes his idiom as one who blushes on account of a solecism.

A most serious work in such an idiom is played before an unprepared audience, an audience of hearers who are unacquainted with the score, who have not been able to hear rehearsals, who do not see the themes expressed in notation in the programme book. No wonder that a musical argument in this peculiar idiom seems to some the jargon of a distracted composer of talent, to others vain babbling. If an author is cryptic in his style, the words on the printed page have at least some meaning. The musician's idiom is in sounds, and there is no specific meaning in the sounds when the musical sentence is not understood. It is the custom in Paris to present essentially the same programme at two successive concerts. Here a work difficult to perform and not easy for the hearer to grasp is produced at a concert and it is then neglected for two, three or a half-dozen years. The labor of preparation seems to be lost. The hearer, with or without technical knowledge, dismisses the work with a sneer, with faint praise, or with the commonplace: "I didn't like it. It may be great music, but I know what I like."

In spite of its often forbidding character, in spite of what now seem to be wilful extravagances in obscurity and debauches in austerity, there is much in the symphony that leads one who remembers the steady development of taste and the changing forms of musical expression to recognize the inherent grandeur and the lofty beauty of page after page. It is not a work to be discussed jauntily while smoking a cigarette or waiting on the corner for a street car.

Let us remember that the scherzo in Beethoven's fifth symphony was mocked by some of his contemporaries, that even such a composer as Weber could not understand Beethoven's idiom in works that now seem to us simple and transparent. There was a time in this country, and not so many years ago, when the prelude to "Lohengrin" was considered revolutionary music.

Mr. Gericke deserves the warmest praise for the courage, the intelligence, the grasp and the comprehension shown in his reading of the symphony. There were a few times when the orchestra did not respond to his wishes, but the performance as a whole was impressive and brilliant.

When Miss Foster sang here about a year ago she had just recovered from a long indisposition, and her vocal failings were excused. Last night she was apparently at her best. She has a superb voice; she is a striking apparition on the stage. It is the more, then, to be regretted that she has not mastered the elementary principles of the art of song.

The programme for the concerts of Jan. 20, 21 will include Haydn's "Oxford" symphony; two poems for piano and orchestra by Converse; Wagner's "Centennial March." Mr. T. Adamowski will play Wieniawski's violin concerto No. 2.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT,

Programme, Jan 9 1905
Schubert.....Funeral March
(In memory of Theodore Thomas.)
Bruch...Penelope's Lament. From "Odysseus."
Soloist, Miss Muriel Foster.
Vincent d'Indy...Symphony in B-flat, No. 2, Op. 57.
Elgar...Sea-pictures, For Voice and Orchestra
Miss Foster.
Dvorak.....Overture, "Carnival," Op. 92.

It is but proper that every orchestra in the United States should pay tribute to the memory of Theodore Thomas, for no man, living or dead, has done as much to advance the orchestral music of America. We should have preferred the loftier Funeral March from the "Heroic Symphony" as a more fitting tribute, for Thomas was a warrior, an earnest pioneer, such as Beethoven portrays in his great work. Many of the audience misapprehended the purport of this first number and loudly applauded it! This was about as fitting as it would be to applaud the clergyman's remarks at the funeral!

We notice that Nikisch, from abroad, suggests Mr. Paur as the successor of Thomas. This would be an excellent idea were Mr. Paur attainable; but his contract in Pittsburg extends for some years yet. Mr. Gericke, of course, belongs to Boston. Far more feasible would it be to bring over Felix Weingartner as a new factor in American orchestral music. There is, besides this orchestral master, another most thorough and progressive musician who is perfectly fitted for the Chicago position—Mr. Fritz Scheel of Philadelphia.

This conductor, although he has been in America but a short time, has already won his spurs and proved his right to the highest orchestral position. He is not too conservative, an essential point with an orchestral conductor of the present. But this is parenthetical; to return to our concert:—

Miss Muriel Foster has some rich and velvety tones in her voice, but the utter wretchedness of her vocal method is apparent in every broad number that she undertakes to sing. We can only express astonishment at her trans-Atlantic reputation. Her interpretation of the Lament was vehement but not broad; many of her outbursts of grief, like Macbeth's "amen," stuck in her throat. But the dramatic number at least prevented the melodious Funeral March from burying d'Indy.

d'Indy's symphony (???) was so utterly shocking to us that we hesitate to express our frank opinion. It is evident that harmony books are now mere waste paper, that there are no more rules, that there is to be an 11th commandment for the composer—"Thou shalt avoid all beauty!" There is certainly no further use of a key-signature in some of this modern music. There is a constant endeavor to bring forth some hitherto unknown scale, especially one that shall consist altogether of major seconds, of whole tones.

We know very well that there are many scales that produce fine results yet are not recognized by our limited key-system; the pentatonic, the hexachordal, the Dorian, the Byzantine, the Hungarian minor, the "modo Lidico" which Beethoven used, the old Church modes—one would think that there is enough scope for originality in some of these, but no! the ultra-modern seeks something more hideous, more cacophonous.

We may at once concede ingenuity to d'Indy. If we could study this work over and over, in time we should see design and subtle plan, and the labyrinth would take on some proportion; but it would still be a subtlety that proceeded altogether from the head and not in the remotest degree from the heart; and it would not be that chaste intellectuality that is in Bach, nor the glorious interweaving that appeals to the mind from the works of Brahms. When the riddle is solved, when the skein is disentangled, the plodding investigator will not have discovered anything to grow enthusiastic over.

That we may not appear to be only "advocatus diaboli" in this hideous matter, let us speak of every good point that we could discover. There was a remarkable continuity of figure development, and the figures employed were generally so vitriolic that they burned themselves easily into the mind. There were short moments of melody, as the harp theme of the second movement, the flute melody in the same, the viola bit in the third movement; we imagine, however, that these by themselves would not sound extraordinary, but that they merely become attractive by the extreme ugliness of their context. The fugal exposition of the finale shows skill and occasionally the musician's feet touched solid ground in the course of this last movement.

But at the end of all this searching for merit one feels like begging this modern horde of invaders of the realm of music to at least spare the symphony! Let the torrent of misapplied Wagnerism invent its own form or shapelessness, but, since Brahms has so recently proved to the world that classic form is not a mere musical mummy but a beautiful and living thing, let the iconoclasts refrain from distorting that! After the infliction one must thank Mr. Gericke for the earnest and careful manner in which he carried through a task in which we are certain he could have found no pleasure. It was modest of him, also, to omit his own arrangement of the Brahms' Waltzes in order to make room for the Funeral March.

The Sea Pictures, by Elgar, were very beautiful and graphic. The orchestral accompaniment was very effective and proved this composer a most fluent writer; but his works sound anything but English.

Dvorak's fiery "Carnival" ended the concert festively but noisily. Here one found plenty of melody and plenty of spirit too. Just a suspicion of Wagner, and the "Tannhauser overture," occasionally, but brilliant from the very first measures. The orchestra played it with so much dash that we suspect that they liked it.

Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY PLAYERS PAY TRIBUTE TO THOMAS' MEMORY.

Post-American Jan 8, 1905
Schubert's Funeral March Is
Giver. at Eleventh Concert,
Out of Respect to the Memory of the Dead Orchestra Leader

MISS MURIEL FOSTER
CHARMS WITH SONGS

By Kent Perkins.

In memory of Theodore Thomas, a great wreath of laurel with a bow of purple ribbon hung on the front of the organ at the rear of the platform in Symphony Hall last night at the eleventh concert of this season. The Symphony Orchestra, as a tribute to Mr. Thomas's memory, played with intense and deep feeling Schubert's Funeral March. So beautifully was this masterly musical thanatopsis performed that a large portion of the audience, forgetful of the occasion, applauded. Mr. Gericke paid no attention to this.

The rest of the programme was as follows:

Bruch...Penelope's Lament, from "Odysseus," op. 41
Vincent d'Indy,
Symphony in B flat major, No. 2, op. 57.
Elgar,
"Sea Pictures." Three songs from a cycle of five for contralto and orchestra, op. 37.
Dvorak.....Overture, "Carnival," op. 92

The special features of the concert were the remarkably beautiful singing of Miss Muriel Foster, contralto, and the D'Indy symphony, which had its first performance by the Symphony Orchestra. Miss Foster sang the "Penelope Lament" with finely appropriate dramatic force and intensity of expression. Her voice showed ample power, richness and beauty of tone, a pleasing method and unusually effective sympathy. In the "Sea Pictures" she had a wider range of feeling to portray than in the "Penelope," and she made excellent use of these opportunities.

That the audience was extremely well pleased with Miss Foster's voice and her use of it was shown by the hearty applause showered upon her.

The D'Indy Symphony was played with marvelous skill by the orchestra, but it was coldly received and no wonder, for one could not help being puzzled to know why it was performed at all. The pamphlet of the concert said the work had "no program of any sort," which was a self-evident fact. It was a confused jumble of incoherent and inconsequential themes, a hash of broken melodies and a hodge-podge of chopped-up harmonies.

It is said of D'Indy that "in painting he prefers the masters of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, and he confesses frankly that he experiences a greater and more artistic stimulus in the presence of Assyrian art than in that of the art known to Pericles." Without doubt! And this symphony should be placed in some secluded museum alongside the Assyrian bas-reliefs of impossible horses and lions with wings and slab-sided kings with stovepipe tiaras on their heads. It would then be in harmonious environment, which it lacked in the presence of the Greek statues of Symphony Hall.

Dvorak's "Carnival" overture was played with spirit and appreciation that brought out its multitude of charming beauties.

The next concert, the twelfth, will take place on January 21, Timothee Adamowski being the soloist.

eat masters are ntralto, was the ost experienced ert last week.
es they should e, for she sang no deception. ent results. I ied off as orig- came the lead-
It is worth not he best there is e of the frame. be exceedingly at the Boston er on this side the prices are . Miss Foster has charge of ce, a big voice artists, and his t mastered the and value of rt. If she had worthy. as great as any orable impres- figure how she e friends than ublic although Confid

vocaliza-Vincent who has aris just work in chestra
tes. I er City
e other on the case of ething

MUSICAL MATTERS

Muriel Foster Soloist at
Symphony Concert.

Recitals by Mme Sembrich,
Fritz Kreisler and Others.

Busy Week in Store for Music Lovers.

Globe Jan 8 1905

The English contralto, Miss Muriel Foster, was the soloist at the Symphony concerts last week, singing Penelope's Lament, from Bruch's "Odysseus," and three songs, "In Haven," "Where Corals Lie" and "The Swimmer," from Edward Elgar's "Sea Pictures." As a tribute to the memory of the late Theodore Thomas, the orchestra played the "Funeral March" by Schubert, instead of the Brahms' waltzes, as originally announced, and at the rear of the stage was placed a handsome laurel wreath decorated with purple ribbons as a mark of respect to the great conductor, whose name will ever be associated with the development of orchestral music in this country. The other selections were D'Indy's B-flat major symphony given for the first time here, and the "Carnival" overture by Dvorak.

Miss Foster, who made a very favorable impression at concerts here last season, sang the Bruch except with excellent dramatic expression, although her voice is hardly big enough to make the tragic lament thoroughly impressive. She was more satisfactory in the lighter group by Elgar, which were given with beautiful tonal coloring and warmth. The second aria, "Where Corals Lie," calls for special praise, the combination of her rich, melodious voice with a singularly effective orchestral accompaniment making the number one of great melodic beauty. The singer was received with many expressions of favor by her auditors.

The Schubert "Funeral March" was given magnificently, the circumstances attending its addition to the program probably affecting both players and audience and making the work specially impressive. The Dvorak "Carnival" overture went well, the different Slav characteristics and varying pictures of mirth, passion, love and pastoral joys being shown with the usual skill by Mr Gericke's men.

The symphony by D'Indy shows the work of a musical scientist who knows the orchestra thoroughly and takes daring liberties in progressions, cross harmonies and modulations and juggles chromatics, ascending and descending, in a way to grieve the ear of the average concert attendant. It is so full of "musical surprises" that there is little continuity of theme in any one of the four movements. But the skill shown in orchestration is wonderful. In the more sane moods of the composer he has given some exquisite measures in the first part to the clarinets and flutes; a brilliant motif in the second part to the smaller strings, and also a dainty scherzo in staccato for the lighter woodwinds, and near the close of the third movement a series of resonant measures for the strings and brasses. But the main part of this movement is chaotic, so too, is the last movement, which contains broad fortissimo effects of a deafening character. The work of the orchestra was admirable in its precision and following of Mr Gericke's baton and the performance was interesting as a whole, but a single hearing does not enable one to grasp clearly all the subtleties of the stupendous work.

The orchestra will be away from Boston this week. Mr T. Adamowski will be soloist Jan 20 and 21, playing the second Wieniawski violin concerto. The other selection will be Haydn's "Oxford" symphony. Mr Converse's two poems for orchestra and piano, Mr Gebhard playing the piano part, and Wagner's "Centennial" march.

TRIBUTE PAID TO THEODORE THOMAS

Journal Jan 9 1905
At the Symphony concert on Saturday night tribute was paid to the late Theodore Thomas by a great wreath upon the organ and by the playing of solemn music at the beginning. On that account the Brahms waltzes were omitted, and this was the program:

Funeral march.....Schubert-Liszt
Penelope's Lament.....Bruch
Symphony in B-flat major, No 2.....D'Indy
"Sea Pictures," (First time.)
Nos. 2, 4, 5.....Elgar
Overture, "Carnival".....Dvorak

The beautiful funeral march was played with great tenderness and feeling, and many an eye grew moist at the memory of the noble figure of Theodore Thomas and his single-hearted devotion to art.

Miss Muriel Foster, the soloist, made a better impression than when she last sang in Boston. She is perhaps more beautiful than ever and her voice is as ponderous.

The D'Indy symphony must be heard again before any valid opinion can be given upon it by anyone.

From beginning to end it is one long stretch of ugliness, a single piece of weird tonalities, hideous progressions, barren wastes of mechanism.

After the tedious expanse of D'Indy's scholasticism, the brilliant lightness of Dvorak's "Carnival" overture was like a burst of sunlight. The work is not great nor an example of Dvorak's best genius. But it seemed a very smiling and beautiful part after the Frenchman's storm.

SYMPHONY PLAYERS PAY TRIBUTE TO THOMAS' MEMORY.

Post-American Jan. 8, 1905
Schubert's Funeral March is Given at Eleventh Concert,

Out of Respect to the
of the Dead Orchestral

MISS MURIEL FOSTER
CHARMS WITH

By Kent Per

In memory of Theodore Thomas, a wreath of laurel with a ribbon hung on the front of the rear of the platform in last night at the eleventh season. The Symphony Orchestra tribute to Mr. Thomas's memory with intense and deep feeling. Funeral March. So beautifully masterly musical thanatology that a large portion of the grateful of the occasion, Mr. Gericke paid no attention.

The rest of the program follows:
Bruch's Penelope's Lament, from Vincent d'Indy's Symphony in B flat major, No. 2.
Elgar's "Sea Pictures." Three songs for contralto and orchestra.
Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

The special features of the remarkably beautiful Muriel Foster, contralto, symphony, which had its first by the Symphony Orchestra sang the "Penelope Lament" appropriate dramatic force of expression. Her voice power, richness and beautiful pleasing method and sympathy. In the "Sea Pictures" a wider range of feeling in the "Penelope," and she use of these opportunities. That the audience was pleased with Miss Foster's use of it was shown by the showered upon her.

The D'Indy Symphony marvelous skill by the orchestra, but it was coldly received and no wonder, for one could not help being puzzled to know why it was performed at all. The pamphlet of the concert said the work had "no program of any sort," which was a self-evident fact. It was a confused jumble of incoherent and inconsequential themes,

...of broken melodies and a mass of chopped-up harmonies. It is said of D'Indy that "in painting he prefers the masters of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, and he confesses frankly that he experiences a greater and more artistic stimulus in the presence of Assyrian art than in that of the art known to Pericles." Without doubt! And this symphony should be placed in some secluded museum alongside the Assyrian bas-reliefs of impossible horses and lions with wings and slab-sided kings with stovepipe tiaras on their heads. It would then be in harmonious environment, which it lacked in the presence of the Greek statues of Symphony Hall.

Dvorak's "Carnival" overture was played with spirit and appreciation that brought out its multitude of charming beauties. The next concert, the twelfth, will take place on January 21, Timothee Adamowski being the soloist.

Muriel Foster, the English contralto, was the soloist at the Symphony Concert last week. This was not her first appearance, for she sang here last year, with indifferent results. I wonder just how Miss Foster became the leading alto of England. If she is the best there is over there, the supply must be exceedingly limited, and we have many over on this side who can sing infinitely better. Miss Foster has a commanding stage presence, a big voice in volume, but she has not yet mastered the elementary principles of vocal art. If she had the right method she would be as great as any of them. But as it is, I can not figure how she takes so well with the British public, although I am told that under certain conditions anything goes over there.

Besides Miss Muriel's attempts at vocalization, I heard a new symphony by Vincent D'Indy, a learned French composer, who has quite a company of disciples over in Paris just now. Fritz Scheel produced this work in Philadelphia, December 31, with his orchestra for the first time in the United States. I wonder what the wise ones in the Quaker City thought of it? And after hearing it the other evening, and observing the expression on the faces of the audience, it looked like a case of "What did the woggle bug say," or something equally as vague.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Muriel Foster Soloist at
Symphony Concert.

Recitals by Mme Sembrich,
Fritz Kreisler and Others.

Busy Week in Store for Music Lovers.

Globe

Jan 8 1905

The English contralto, Miss Muriel Foster, was the soloist at the Symphony concerts last week, singing Penelope's lament, from Bruch's "Odysseus," and three songs, "In Haven," "Where Corals Lie" and "The Swimmer," from Edward Elgar's "Sea Pictures." As a tribute to the memory of the late Theodore Thomas, the orchestra played the "Funeral March" by Schubert, instead of the Brahms' waltzes, as originally announced, and at the rear of the stage was placed a handsome laurel wreath decorated with purple ribbons as a mark of respect to the great conductor, whose name will ever be associated with the development of orchestral music in this country. The other selections were D'Indy's B-flat major symphony given for the first time here, and the "Carnival" overture by Dvorak.

Miss Foster, who made a very favorable impression at concerts here last season, sang the Bruch except with excellent dramatic expression, although her voice is hardly big enough to make the tragic lament thoroughly impressive. She was more satisfactory in the lighter group by Elgar, which were given with beautiful tonal coloring and warmth. The second aria, "Where Corals Lie," calls for special praise, the combination of her rich, melodious voice with a singularly effective orchestral accompaniment making the number one of great melodic beauty. The singer was received with many expressions of favor by her auditors.

The Schubert "Funeral March" was given magnificently, the circumstances attending its addition to the program probably affecting both players and audience and making the work specially impressive. The Dvorak "Carnival"

...characteristics and varying pictures of mirth, passion, love and pastoral joys being shown with the usual skill by Mr. Gericke's men.

The symphony by D'Indy shows the work of a musical scientist who knows the orchestra thoroughly and takes daring liberties in progressions, cross harmonies and modulations and juggles chromatics, ascending and descending, in a way to grieve the ear of the average concert attendant. It is so full of "musical surprises" that there is little continuity of theme in any one of the four movements. But the skill shown in orchestration is wonderful. In the more sane moods of the composer he has given some exquisite measures in the first part to the clarinets and flutes; a brilliant motif in the second part to the smaller strings, and also a dainty scherzo in staccato for the lighter woodwinds, and near the close of the third movement a series of resonant measures for the strings and brasses. But the main part of this movement is chaotic, so too, is the last movement, which contains broad fortissimo effects of a deafening character. The work of the orchestra was admirable in its precision and following of Mr. Gericke's baton and the performance was interesting as a whole, but a single hearing does not enable one to grasp clearly all the subtleties of the stupendous work.

The orchestra will be away from Boston this week. Mr. T. Adamowski will be soloist Jan 20 and 21, playing the second Wieniawski violin concerto. The other selection will be Haydn's "Oxford" symphony. Mr. Converse's two poems for orchestra and piano, Mr. Gebner's "Centennial" march.

TRIBUTE PAID TO THEODORE THOMAS

Journal

Jan 9 1905

At the Symphony concert on Saturday night tribute was paid to the late Theodore Thomas by a great wreath upon the organ and by the playing of solemn music at the beginning. On that account the Brahms waltzes were omitted, and this was the program:

Funeral march.....Schubert-Liszt
Penelope's Lament.....Bruch
Symphony in B-flat major, No. 2.....D'Indy
(First time.)
"Sea Pictures," Nos. 2, 4, 5.....Elgar
Overture, "Carnival".....Dvorak

The beautiful funeral march was played with great tenderness and feeling, and many an eye grew moist at the memory of the noble figure of Theodore Thomas and his single-hearted devotion to art.

Miss Muriel Foster, the soloist, made a better impression than when she last sang in Boston. She is perhaps more beautiful than ever and her voice is as ponderous.

The D'Indy symphony must be heard again before any valid opinion can be given upon it by anyone.

From beginning to end it is one long stretch of ugliness, a single piece of weird tonalities, hideous progressions, barren wastes of mechanism.

After the tedious expanse of D'Indy's scholasticism, the brilliant lightness of Dvorak's "Carnival" overture was like a burst of sunlight. The work is not great nor an example of Dvorak's best genius. But it seemed a very smiling and beautiful part after the Frenchman's storm.

140

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in G major, "Oxford."

I. Adagio: Allegro spiritoso.

II. Adagio.

III. Menuetto: Allegretto: Trio.

IV. Presto.

WIENIAWSKI,

CONCERTO in D minor, No. 2, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, op. 22.

I. Allegro moderato.

II. Romance: Andante non troppo.

III. Allegro con fuoco; Allegro moderato, (à la Zingara.)

CONVERSE,

TWO POEMS, "Night and Day," for ORCHESTRA and PIANOFORTE, op. 11.

(First time.)

Pianoforte, Mr. HEINRICH GEBHARD.

WAGNER,

CENTENNIAL MARCH.

Soloist:

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Hamlin.

OXFORD SYMPHONY OF HAPPY MEMORY

Journal Jan. 23, 1905
At Symphony Orchestra's 12th Concert Mr. Gericke Read Haydn
Number Most Artistically.

For the twelfth concert of the Symphony Orchestra the program was:
Symphony in G major, "Oxford".....Haydn
Violin concerto in D minor, No. 2.....Wienlawski
Two poems, "Night" and "Day," for piano and orchestra, op. 11.....F. S. Converse
(First time.)

Centennial March.....Wagner
The happy old "Oxford" symphony went in the best possible style. Nothing, save its last movement, is of any especial value or great charm, but that is marvelously piquant, fresh and brilliant even today. Mr. Gericke read the whole work with sympathy, and when he does that he is a most artistic interpreter.

The Converse Poems.

The "pieces de resistance" were Mr.
Converse's two poems for orchestra and pianoforte. With their lines of Whit-man's describing "Day" and "Night," they are not altogether in consonance.
Mere difference in mood, in tempo, in rhythm, in musical thought does not depict the enormous imagination of the "good gray poet."

In fact, the two pieces are, to all practical purposes, movements of a pianoforte concerto. Mr. Converse disclaims this, but the musical result is the strongest test. He would have the pianoforte part seem to be merely one of many instruments of the orchestra,
but as he has written it and as circumstances surround it, that is not possible.

Pianist to the Rear.

The pianist comes on and bows to the applause. He sits at the very front of the platform, and his playing invites attention. Would not the purpose have been better served had he been in the rear, screened by the others? The two movements are musicianly, cleverly orchestrated and generally interesting, the first being the better. Heinrich Gebhard played the pianoforte part with large artistry in expression and fluency in technique.

Adamowski's Elegance.

Mr. Adamowski gave the beautiful Wienlawski violin concerto with his usual suave elegance, slightly marred now and then by little, but suggestive imperfections in technical art. Are these rifts growing in his lute? It is to be hoped not.

The famous—and by some considered infamous—march, which Wagner wrote for the Philadelphia Centennial (for $5000) changes no impression of it.
It is much beneath Wagner's ordinary genius and is often pompously empty.
But it is to be doubted if any American composer could have written a better for the purpose in 1876.

13TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the 13th Symphony concert
last evening was as follows:

Overture, "Barber of Bagdad".....Cornelius
Concerto for 'cello in A minor.....Volkman
Symphonic prelude, Op. 11.....Caetan
Symphony, "Fantastic".....Berlioz

Rudolf Krasselt was the soloist.
The symphonic prelude by Caetan was the novelty presented, being for the first time in this country. The composer is the second son of the Duke of Sermoneta, well known at Rome. He has written pieces for orchestra, besides chamber music and smaller works. The prelude heard last evening is written in a conservative manner, effectively scored, and proved to be a pleasing work, if not one of much distinction. The performance was admirable and the work was well received.

Cornelius' effective overture has seldom been heard at these concerts, and to many it was a decided novelty. It wears well and continues to be an overture of interest that should be heard more frequently.

Berlioz's great symphony received a masterly interpretation. It still remains as modern as anything of the present day, although more than 70 years old. It holds its own as one of the finest examples of programme music existing in the orchestral repertory.

Mr. Krasselt played Volkman's concerto with superb technic, beautiful tonal quality and with an authoritative interpretation that left nothing to be desired. The artist was several times recalled and presented with a wreath.

The soloist for the 14th rehearsal and concert
this week will be Eugen D'Albert, the distinguished piano virtuoso, who has not been heard here for 12 years. He will play a concerto of his own composition.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adm - PROGRAMME. Jan 23 1905
Haydn.....Symphony No. 2, in G major, "Oxford."
Wienlawski.....Concerto for violin, No. 2.
Violin, Mr. T. Adamowski.
Converse.....Two poems for orchestra and pianoforte.
Pianoforte, Mr. Gebhard.

Wagner.....Centennial March.
"Oxford, No. 2" sounds like a telephone call, but it is a symphony, and one that has not faded out yet, although it was written over a century ago. It was played exquisitely, the work of the wood-wind, (especially the oboe and flute) in the Adagio, being remarkably excellent. The Minuets of these old symphonies, however, become somewhat tiresome, with their many repeats and unchanging 3-4 rhythm. Even
Mr. Gericke's spirited interpretation could not galvanize this movement into life.

The Wienlawski concerto for violin is a grateful work, since it displays the solo instrument technically and emotionally.
The long "tutti" for orchestra, before the violin enters, is rather a blemish, however, for it gives the soloist an excellent chance to get nervous while waiting for his "cue."
Mr. Adamowski played the first movement very finely. He gave pure intonation, broad bowing, and even in the furiously difficult passages of double-stopping, he was perfectly true and quite clear. His sympathetic tone in the Romance was also effective.

Altogether, in these 2 movements he gave some of the best playing that we have yet had from him. In the finale we might have demanded more power. The Gypsy theme was scarcely fiery enough, and it seemed as if there were some fatigue present. Nevertheless the 4 recalls that followed were well-earned, especially by the brilliance of the first movement.

Persons familiar with Lecocq's "Le Jour et la Nuit" found, in Mr. Converse's 2 orchestral movements, that vastly different thoughts could be derived from the same title. Yet we feel that the "Two Poems" would have been stronger without the label. One is always sure to find, in Mr.
Converse's compositions, good orchestration and an avoidance of that ugliness that seems a "sine qua non" for the modern composer.

The composer evidently tried to avoid the concerto vein, both in the number of movements and their style, for he does not use the piano chiefly as a solo instrument.
During the first part of the work the instrument is made an integral part of the orchestra, just as Glinka, Berlioz, D'Indy and St. Saens have used it. It plays arpeg-gios, accompanying figures, and in general subordinates itself to the rest of the tonal organization.

We scarcely think the instrument a success in this subservient role. It is more in its domain when developing themes or acting as a foil and contrast to the body of the orchestra. It does not submerge itself nor coalesce with strings, wood-wind or brasses.

There were 2 soloists in this programme, and Mr. Gebhart's work was not made easier by its not being continuously in the foreground. This young artist is very reliable and intelligent. He certainly brought out the composer's idea very clearly in the 2 contrasted movements. He was recalled together with the composer, with considerable enthusiasm.

As regards the composition itself, we prefer the first movement, "Night," to the second, which pictures "Day." Walt Whit-man's 2 lines express the thought intended:—

Night—"This is thy hour, O Soul, thy free flight into the wordless."

Day—"Day full-blown and splendid—day of the immense sun, action, ambition, laughter."

The first thought conveys a succinct idea that the composer can seize, but the second is so manifold in its expression that it goes far beyond the scope or possibility of a single movement. The music of the first movement was tender, sympathetic, dreamy, and could in some degree emphasize the thought of the poet. The second was fragmentary, full of very sharp contrasts, but had a powerful climax at the end. Occasionally the composer allowed the piano to step into its sovereign rights, and there was a solo passage of some length in both movements, perhaps corresponding to the cadenza of a concerto.

Then came Wagner at his worst. The American Centennial March, since we cannot get our money back, ought to be shelved as a very bad investment. America should not be held responsible for this noise, for it supposed that a great genius could rise to any occasion, whereas it only received a $5000 "pot-boiler."

Wagner knew nothing about us at the time he wrote the work,—not even "Yankee Doodle." Had he but known he could have pictured Tammany Hall, political caucuses, trust inflations, stock exchange panics,
and a host of other national eccentricities that would have thrown the myriad voices of his "Waldesweben" in the shade, and would have been "fortissimo" throughout.
Louis C. Elson.

II 25, 26, 27 for Symphony Rehearsals

May be secured for $17 each. Address L.W.V.,
Boston Transcript. (A)

Rehearsal Seats Y 24, 25 For Sale

Price $23 each for balance of season. Address
P.L.W., Boston Transcript. (A)

SEATS, BALCONY, A Right, 39-40, FOR THE REHEARSALS are for sale for remainder of season, price $23.00 each. Kindly address J.R.J., Boston Transcript. (A)

FOR SALE—SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TICKET

Left balcony, C 36, $14. 61 Sewall Avenue,
Brookline. (A)

SYMPHONY PLAYS TWO NEW 'POEMS'

Works of Converse, with Mottoes from Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass" on "Night" and "Day"
Performed for First Time.

MOTTO STANDS IN WAY,
ONE EXPECTS TOO MUCH

Music Does Not Rivet Attention—
Thought of Hearer Is on How Pianist Is Playing—Haydn Symphony Is Well Played.

Herald — Jan. 22, 1905

The programme of the 12th Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gerlicke, conductor, was as follows:

Symphony in G major, "Oxford".....Haydn
Violin concerto in D minor, No. 2.....Wienlawski
Two poems, "Night" and "Day," for piano
and orchestra, op. 11.....F. S. Converse
(First time.)

Centennial March.....Wagner

The two poems by Mr. Converse were performed for the first time. Lines from Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass" serve as mottoes. Thus, "This is thy hour, O Soul, thy free flight into the wordless" expresses, Mr. Converse says, the mood which he has tried to create in his music. The motto for "Day" is "Day full blown and splendid—day of the immense sun, action, ambition, laughter." Such mottoes are of value in acquainting the hearer with the mood of a composer, for night and day are terms that do not suggest inevitably the same thing to the men and the women in an audience or at large in the town.
To Whitman himself the night meant various things: he apostrophized it as "huge and thoughtful," and again, in one of his most famous passages, he imagined night as the great amorist:
"I call to the earth and sea half-held by the night. * * * Night of the large few stars! Mad, naked summer night!"
So day is a term of individual application. To many its symbol is a factory whistle; but Whitman's line sums the matter up.

Mr. Converse, to express his musical thought, added a piano to his orchestra. "The piano," he says, "is treated as an although very important part of the orchestral scheme, and whatever technically important moments it may have grow naturally out of the emotional contents, and not from any desire of virtuosity." Such was the honorable intention. There is this risk in the use of the piano with orchestra when a tone-poem is performed: the pianist sits in the accustomed seat of the virtuoso, and however the composer may intend and however closely the pianist may follow the composer's intention, the chief thought of the audience is concerning the performance of the pianist. "How did he play? Did you like him?" are questions asked before there is any inquiry concerning the piece itself. It may here be said that Mr. Gebhard played extremely well and his part was by no means an easy one either technically or aesthetically; but there seemed to be no more question concerning the pianist's performance than about that of Mr. Hess, of Mr.

Maquarre, of Mr. Longy, or of Mr.
Rettberg. They are all players in ensemble.

And it seems to us that Mr. Converse himself is responsible in a large measure for this undue interest in the piano part. When Mr. Bauer played the piano part in d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Folk Song," there was little or no thought of Mr. Bauer, for the piano part, while it was important, was so constructed that even the most careless listener was aware that the instrument was for the time being only orchestral.

Put together the explanation given by the mottoes concerning the aesthetic contents of the music and the dominating thought of the pianist, and the result is this, the pieces seem as though they were any prelude and allegro, or nocturne and allegro designed as a concert piece for piano and orchestra, and what should have been the controlling thought, the transfiguration into tones of characterization of night and its symbolical reminders, was in the background. Perhaps it would have been better, then, if the mottoes that served as arguments had been omitted.
"Night" and "Day" would have been enough, for after all, to go back to Walt Whitman, music is what awakes from you when you are reminded by the instruments.

You cannot find in music anything definite that is not already in your mind.
That which is inarticulate may be suggested by the music, provided you yourself have imagination equal or superior to that of the composer. Mr. Converse probably realized this when he chose the motto "thy free flight into the wordless." And so a seesaw is easily established between the expediency or the in expediency of any sort of a programme.

The first of the poems is musically poetic. There is the nocturne character, and there is the suggestion of the night that leads to contemplation. As a musical illustration of a phase of night it is successful; but this night of Mr. Converse is not so huge as it is thoughtful. There is no suggestion of the elemental shudder that oppresses when the winds are still and the stars are nearest; the shudder recalling the saying of the old philosopher that the earth itself is an animal; the stillness that hints at mysterious voices threatening to speak; nor is there the suggestion in this music of the infinite space peopled as in Mr. Wells' fantastical tale of the stolen body; nor is there soaring flight, though the flight be "free." But to express, or rather to suggest, "the psychological meaning" of night in music would require a composer of Whitman's sweep and thought.

As an Allegro, the second poem is often interesting; but again the motto stands in the way and invites one to expect too much. The opening measures are particularly effective. The world is awakening to activity, but after these measures the programme fades away, and there is the thought of a concert piece for piano and orchestra, a piece very episodic, without any central and controlling idea, such as dominates an entitled symphonic poem.
There are pleasant pages; there are pages that are more than pleasant, but the music does not rivet the attention of the hearer. This is not the allegro of the world, the terrible allegro of daily life, with its ambitions, failures, successes, laughter that is too often ironical or maniacal. As an allegro for piano and orchestra it is episodically
effective.

The Haydn symphony was played in admirable fashion, and the reappearance of the Centennial march reminded some of the year when many Americans—and all American composers—groaned at the thought of Wagner receiving $5000 for such trash.

Mr. Adamowski was most successful in the Romance of the concerto, for his song was often appealing. His performance as a whole was not one that added to his reputation, for it lacked distinction and it was at times technically faulty. Mr. Adamowski has true virtuoso blood, he has many natural gifts.
He at times plays with inspiration. His performance is often engrossing. It is a pity that a violinist of such natural parts does not devote himself wholly and rigidly to self-improvement.

Globe — Jan 22 1905

Last week's Symphony program had for a novelty two "poems" by F. S.
Converse, entitled "Night and Day," written for piano and orchestra. Mr.
Heinrich Gebhard played the piano part. The D minor violin concerto by Wienlawski was given with Mr Timo-thee Adamowski as soloist, and Haydn's "Oxford" symphony and Wagner's "Centennial March" completed the list.
Mr Converse has taken lines of Walt Whitman which suggested moods the composer wished to express by the titles
"Night" and "Day"; poetical fancies, purely symbolical and not illustrating any physical characteristics of the time.
They are musical creations which express the writer's ideas in a pleasing and intangible form to an imaginative auditor; tone pictures which are cleverly handled in orchestration and are admirable examples of this style of poetic composition. The form is so free and unconventional that it is difficult to describe. The general effect is what might be called soothing to one's nerves, for Mr Converse has not attempted reproductions of "sounds from nature," but has merely let his musical genius wander at will in depicting moods and not characteristics. Mr Gebhard played the piano part in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and the orchestra performed its share of the work in a way to make the whole interpretation, taking the two poems as one number,
one of interest and enjoyment. Mr Converse has scored the poems with his usual well-known skill and the young American composer is to be congratulated upon the musicianly quality of the somewhat fantastical work.

In the Wienlawski violin concerto Mr.
Adamowski again made evident his splendid qualifications as an artist, and with the exception of a little uncertainty in execution in parts of the first movement his interpretation was admirable.
The beautiful melody in the second part was played with exquisite phrasing and tonal expression and the gypsy theme in the finale was given with a brilliancy and dash that deserves favorable comment.
He was very cordially applauded at the close of his performance.

Haydn's "Oxford" symphony may be old-fashioned in spots, but the second and closing movements show few marks of age, and as played by the orchestra give plenty of enjoyment to even the average musical ear. Wagner's "Centennial March" was given with the required pomposity and resonance.

This week's program will have Rudolf Krasselt as soloist in Volkmann's A minor cello concerto. The orchestral pieces will be the overture, "Barber of Bagdad," Peter Cornelius; a symphony prelude by R. Caetani, and the "Symphony Fantastique" by Berlioz.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The Symphony Concerts are now half over for this season, the twelfth concert
having been given on Saturday evening.
Mr. Timothée Adamowski was the soloist, and this was the programme:

Haydn: Symphony in G major, "Oxford."
Wienlawski: Concerto in D minor, No. 2, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 22.
Converse: Two Poems, "Night" and "Day," for Orchestra and Pianoforte, Op. 11. (First time.) Pianoforte, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.
Wagner: Centennial March.

In regard to Mr. Converse's poems for pianoforte and orchestra, it will be well to let the composer speak for himself. "This is thy hour, O Soul, thy free flight into the wordless." This expresses quite completely the mood which I have tried to create in my music. Of day Whitman says, 'Day of full bloom and splendid—day of the immense sun, action, ambition, laughter.' As far as it goes, this describes my poem very well, but the real essence is lacking, although it was the best and most fitting quotation I could find for a motto. The moods of action, ambition, laughter, and of love, too (for the erotic mood is suggested in the music), are all there, but strung upon and incident to the one predominant and insistent theme of the struggle of life. This restless, striving, eternal energy, this struggling conscience, is the main stream of the poem and the other emotional phases are eddies momentarily emerging from it, but always being absorbed again in it, until at the end the tragedy of it becomes apparent and dominant. This is what I have tried to express.

"As to the technical side of the poems:
they are free in form and might be described in a broad way as prelude and allegro, if one desires to fall back upon the conventional expression of such things. The piano is treated as an integral although very important part of the orchestral scheme, and whatever technically important moments it may have grow naturally out of the emotional contents, and not from the desire for a display of virtuosity. The piano part must appeal to the pianist's power of intelligent, poetic interpretation, in which virtuosity is the servant, not the master, rather than to anything else. This I believe to be the future field for the piano in combination with the orchestra, and I believe it to be in sympathy with modern feeling in musical expression."

It has been wise to quote Mr. Converse at some length, for, after all, the artist himself knows best the nature of the message he has wished to convey. After reading his words, however, a listener must feel that the composer has made rather more of the pianoforte part in his poems than, from the reading, one would have been led to expect. In short, after hearing the pieces Saturday night, it may be questioned if the first topic of conversation among neighbors were not the merits of Mr. Gebhard's performance, which, incidentally, was a very beautiful performance, indeed, showing the willingness of the genuine artist to keep his place in the instrumental scheme, ability highly to color pianoforte tones, and real poetic feeling. But Mr. Gebhard, despite his honorable intentions and artistic effacement of self, from the nature of things, was bound to attract attention. If Mr. Converse desired to suggest Whitman through orchestral music he would have been wiser had he dispensed with so much service from the pianoforte; something less of the instrument—far less—might possibly have proved effective.

The Whitman mottoes, also, were less a help than a hindrance. Why have mottoes at all, especially when, as Mr. Converse says, they do not precisely express the essence of his music? And Whitman, in particular, must always be a stumbling-block till there comes a musician of his own breadth and grandeur. There is Mr. Converse's first poem, for instance, a short few pages of music charmingly melodious, exquisitely scored, poetically imaginative, a delicately, tenderly felt impression of the gentler aspects of night, or, more seemingly, of twilight. More genuine, spontaneous, poetic music we seldom find written today. But does it in any way suggest Whitman's bald, forceful, elemental pictures of night? Mr. Converse's music suffers only when one recalls his motto.

The poem of "Day" seems less happy than that of "Night." It notably lacks the fresh sweep, the virile strength of Whitman, being episodic, involved, complex. And as music pure and simple it is not, at first hearing at least, so beautiful as the impression of "Night." Beautiful pages there are, undeniably, and many delightful episodes, but throughout it all a listener has difficulty in following the composer's meaning. Why, for instance, should there be three distinct and well-reached climaxes? At a second performance, perhaps, they will seem more reasonable than they did Saturday. It will be to the regret of everybody if these poems are not repeated, for they are not of the order of music to be dismissed after a single hearing. The first poem it would be a pleasure to listen to once more, and the second we would gladly become further acquainted with. The works were very cordially applauded.

About the other numbers of the concert one could write with pleasure. Mr. Adamowski, in fine fettle, displayed to advantage the temperament that makes listening to him a different matter from listening to violinists who, perhaps, play better. His tone on Saturday was unusually sweet and pure, the cantilenas of the concerto were exquisitely sung, and about it all were a warmth, a sentiment, and a brilliancy that made his performance notable. The execution of technical passages, while much better than that of last year, was still unequal to the best Mr. Adamowski is capable of. The artist was applauded heartily, being recalled four times.

Even the Haydn symphony gave much pleasure, to such people as came sufficiently early to hear it. The best symphonies of Haydn are a constant surprise, one is always finding in them such unexpectedly beautiful arrangements of orchestral color. The symphony on Saturday was so carefully played that these color combinations showed forth in all their charm, and only when the strings played their loudest did the tone sound harsh. It is manifest, therefore, that even a Haydn symphony in a large hall can be made agreeable if only adequate pains be taken. The orchestra played admirably throughout the evening.

Mr. Krasselt is to play next time. This will be the programme: Overture to "Barber of Bagdad," Peter Cornelius; concerto for violoncello, in A minor, Volkmann; Prelude Symphonique, No. 5, op. 11 (first time), R. Caetani; Fantastic Symphony, Berlioz. Jan. 23, 1905 R. R. G.

THE SYMPHONY IN NEW YORK

Boston Players Enthuse Big Audience with Programme Brilliantly Performed.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Feb. 16, 1905. It was a programme of unusual interest, brilliantly performed, that marked tonight's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, before a large and enthusiastic audience. Cesar Franck's D minor symphony headed Mr. Gericke's list. This was followed by Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and Goldmark's overture, "In Italy," opus 49. This latter number was a novelty locally, as was also Max Bruch's serenade for violin and orchestra, in which Marie Nichols, violinist, made her reappearance as the soloist of the occasion.

Both Mr. Gericke and his men were in fine feather and roused the house to enthusiasm with their interpretations. Miss Nichols met a warm welcome, well deserved by her finished and effective playing. Mr. Hess, the concert master, conducted her number and supplied an admirable accompaniment for it.

THREE TRIUMPHS AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston American Jan. 22, 1905
Soloist Adamowski, Composer Converse and H. H. Gebhard, Pianist, Are Showered With Most Enthusiastic Plaudits

By Kent Perkins.

One of the most thoroughly enjoyable and inspiring concerts ever given by the Symphony Orchestra was that of last night at Symphony Hall, the twelfth of this season. It was characterized by the pervading consistent beauty of the music performed, the spirit and artistic finish of the orchestra's work and the personal triumphs scored by the soloist of the evening, Tino Adamowski; Frederick S. Converse, whose two symphonic poems, "Night" and "Day," for orchestra and piano, received their first performance, and by Heinrich Gebhard, who was at the piano.

The program was as follows:
Haydn, symphony in G major, "Oxford,"
Wieniawski, concerto in D minor, No. 2, for violin and orchestra, op. 22.
Converse, two poems, "Night and Day," for orchestra and pianoforte, op. 11. (First time.)
Pianoforte, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.
Wagner, "Centennial March."

The Haydn symphony, called "Oxford" because it was performed at the University of Oxford in 1791, when the composer received his degree of Mus. Doc. there, was given with the orchestra's most remarkable power of delicate shading and expression, particularly in the hymnlike, spiritually exalted second movement.

Mr. Adamowski fairly outdid himself in the bewitchingly beautiful Wieniawski concerto, with its enchanting melodies that sing of the free, passionate, tender and warm blooded gypsy life. It was a close contest between the soloist and the orchestra for the honor of the nearest approach to perfection in portrayal of the thrilling emotion of this work, and it was impossible to tell which won. Mr. Adamowski was showered with enthusiastic plaudits and was called out again and again.

Mr. Converse's two "poems" are works of the highest order of musical art. They were composed in 1904. Lines by Walt Whitman serve as mottoes for "Night" and "Day"—for the first: "This is they hour, O, Soul, thy free flight into the wordless," and for the second: "Day full blown and splendid—day of the immense sun, action, ambition, laughter."

No attempt is made to express physical characteristics of night and day. The composer has striven only to figure in music the emotions and spiritual suggestions of the times of darkness and of light—and he has done so most admirably. In the first poem there are felt the obscurity, the mystery, the witchery of night and the blight of the untrammelled spirit under the stars into realms where words are meaningless. With daylight the clear, open harmonies flood the scene with the feeling of sunlight, and the awakening of the senses. Then come action, struggle, ambition, love, tragedy and the strenuous vigor of full life. The orchestra entered with the keenest zest upon the task of giving these poems adequate expression, and succeeded to the highest degree. The piano's portion of the compositions was beautifully conceived and most artistically executed by Mr. Gebhard.

Both the composer and the pianist were called forth repeatedly by the enthusiastic audience to acknowledge the veritable ovation that was given to them.

The Wagner "Centennial March," which

12TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the 12th Symphony concert last evening was as follows: Post Jan. 22

Symphony, G major, "Oxford".....Haydn
Concerto for violin, No. 2.....Wieniawski
Poems, "Night and Day," for piano and orchestra.....Converse
Centennial March.....Wagner

T. Adamowski was the solo violinist, and the piano part of the Converse number was played by Heinrich Gebhard.

The two orchestral poems, by F. S. Converse, suggested by verses of Walt Whitman, were played at this concert for the first time. The poem "Night" is a sort of free prelude, the piano being employed as an orchestral instrument. The second suggests an abbreviated concerto, with the piano more of a solo instrument. The first appears the most interesting of the two, but both are well written and show much talent on the part of the composer. Mr. Gebhard was fully adequate in the piano part, and both pianist and composer were recalled at the close of the performance.

Mr. Adamowski played the familiar concerto of Wieniawski in admirable manner, and this popular artist received a well-merited ovation and several recalls.

The orchestra gave a good performance of the Haydn symphony, and Wagner's Centennial March, written for the Philadelphia exposition of 1876, recalled to many the days of long ago, when the composer was less appreciated here than at the present time.

Rudolf Krasselt, cellist, will be the soloist at the rehearsal and concert this coming week.

The musical critic of the New York Sun pays Mr. Gericke and his orchestra a glowing tribute in writing of their last concert of this season in New York. He says: "Mr. Gericke has never played with so much of the emotional and dramatic quality of a great conductor as he has in the season now closed. Nor has the orchestra ever shown more of the sheer beauty of tone, more of the perfect ensemble which means flexibility, the finest adjustment of color values and dynamic effects, and the broad sweep of line. The exquisite perfection of the wood-wind players was shown at its highest in the 'Faust' overture, and for this enjoyment New York music lovers are particularly beholden. It is something that is not offered them at home." Mar 20 1905

148

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

PETER CORNELIUS, OVERTURE to the Opera "The Barber of Bagdad."

VOLKMANN, CONCERTO in A minor for VIOLONCELLO and ORCHESTRA, op. 33.

R. CAETANI, SYMPHONIC PRELUDE in A minor, No. 5, op. 11.
(First time.)

BERLIOZ, FANTASTIC SYMPHONY, No. 1, in C major, op. 16 A.
I. DREAMS.—PASSIONS. Largo. Allegro agitato e appassionato assai.
II. A BALL. Waltz: Allegro non troppo.
III. SCENE IN THE FIELDS. Adagio.
IV. MARCH TO THE SCAFFOLD. Allegretto non troppo.
V. DREAM OF A SABBAT. Larghetto. Allegro.

Soloist:

Mr. RUDOLF KRASSELT.

149

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME, Jan 30 1905

Peter Cornelius—Overture to the Opera "The Barber of Bagdad."

Volkman—Concerto in A minor for Violoncello and Orchestra, op. 33.

Soloist, Mr. Rudolf Krasselt.

R. Caetani—Symphonic Prelude in A minor, No. 5, op. 11. (First time.)

Berlioz—Fantastic Symphony, No. 1, in C major.

Almost every part of this programme called for a large modern orchestra. Cornelius' overture had, we believe, Liszt's orchestration, which was brilliant and attractive throughout. The themes themselves were bright and well-contrasted, while they were developed with clearness and logic. It is astonishing how melodious those old radicals, who were deemed utterly abstruse and involved 50 years ago, seem to us today. This ought to teach a lesson to the cock-sure reviewers of the present; music has no fixed laws whatever; it may be that our children will find D'Indy's second symphony too simple and melodic! In this overture there was some excellent woodwind playing, and the sly humor of the bombast of the beginning and end (which Hanslick thought quite out of place) was charming.

When Mr. Krasselt came forward to play the violoncello part of the Volkman concerto, he was greeted with such continued applause that it was quite evident that the audience were awake to the fact that he is one of the great artists of our orchestra. He played with a beautiful tone, broad and powerful in the prominent C-string passages, sweet and sympathetic in A-string work; always sure in intonation, and brilliant enough in the cadenza.

This cadenza had some very fine double-stopping, many skips and arpeggios, chromatic runs galore, and some catchy harmonies, which are always more difficult upon the violoncello than upon the violin, because of the thicker strings. The only fault to be found with the young artist was in the recitative passages, where he exaggerated somewhat and became too sentimental. But this sentimentality was as much a fault of the composer as of the performer, for the concerto was frequently caught whispering sweet nothings to the auditor.

It is not as lofty a work as either of the 2 symphonies, or the "Richard III." overture. Mr. Krasselt certainly made all that was possible out of it and was recalled several times after the conclusion of his task, receiving also a very large laurel wreath.

A white blackbird! One ought to welcome an Italian symphonic composer with especial warmth, for Italy has as yet not enough of these to crowd a telephone booth. There is Sgambati, Martucci, Bossi, and one or two more, but of these only the first-named has achieved a standard orchestral work; one single symphony from the country which has been rightly called "the mother of music!"

We listened therefore, with something akin to anxiety, to the new Symphonic Poem by Caetani. He was an Italian, and that made one doubtful; he was of noble family, which made one more doubtful still; and the work began quietly and conventionally, as if it had nothing much to say. But it was melodic, for which we are always grateful, since we are of that rear-guard which holds tune to be an essential element of music; we love the melodic beauty of Wagner as much as his great harmonies.

Very soon, too, it was evident that the composer was writing naturally and fluently. There were fine climaxes worked up without too much bombast. The work had dramatic touches which were somewhat operatic in flavor, and had perhaps a smell of the footlights attached to them, but none-the-less everything was straightforward and intelligible. Caetani used the great modern orchestra without abusing it. The work received some applause and deserved more. This pupil of Sgambati may yet excel his master.

Then came Berlioz's double-headed love-letter to Harriet Smithson and Camille Moke, one of the most important pieces of programme-music in existence, for all that Strauss has done in this field in recent times. It is a fine study of thematic development for the laity, since every intelligent auditor can identify its love-theme and much of its treatment. It is also a most popular lesson in orchestration, all of the instruments being passed in review in an identifiable manner.

In the first movement Berlioz is no more in the domain of programme music (instrumental picture-painting) than was Beethoven in the first movement of his "programme symphony," the "Pastoral." The young lover sighs and rages, but the movement is a portrayal of emotions, not a picture of objects or events. But in the second movement, "The Ball," the young man returns to the World, the Flesh, and the Development of the "love-theme." Only Tschalkowsky and Berlioz have succeeded in making the waltz a good movement in the symphony. The harp, played by Mr. Schuecker, was a charming element of this graceful picture. Mr. Gerleke made a success of the swing of the waltz, as a true "Wienerkind" ought to do.

Paris itself will never hear the dialogue between English horn and oboe better given than it was at this concert. Messieurs Longy and Lenom covered themselves with glory, and especially those final phrases, where the shepherd calls in vain for his lost love, were memorable. But there was too much of conservatism in the thunder-storm. Where was the thunderbolt that killed the shepherdess? It was too mild a storm to suggest even an umbrella, far less a tragedy.

The "March to the Guillotine" is really great music! Here the musical Edgar Allen Poe was on his native heath. Herodotus somewhere tells us of a march which the Spartans played when they took culprits to execution,—the Nome of Kradias,—which inspired terror in every auditor. Such a march has Berlioz achieved. The powerful pizzicato effects of the contrabasses, the strange muttering duet of the bassoons, (picturing the footsteps of the crowd, just as Dickens pictured them in "The Tale of Two Cities") were strokes of genius.

Although there was loudness enough in the march, we could not find in the interpretation the full intention of the composer. It was conservatism at just the wrong place. The culprit was very timidly beheaded with a dull axe. The orchestra seemed almost apologetic when it interrupted the solo of the clarinette!

The same conservatism was noticeable in the finale, which was loud without being at all furious. The parody of the love-theme might have been screamed out far more wildly. When Berlioz found the shrill imp of the orchestra, the piccolo, insufficient for his purpose, and added that squealer from the military band, the E-flat clarinette, to the orchestral forces, it meant something. But the technical points of the work were finely brought out,—and how many there are! They extend even to rapping the violin strings with the back of the bow ("coll' legno") and to a final stroke of cymbal with a drumstick! Praising all the technical perfection which was there, we must yet deplore the lack of the morbid power which is the soul of the last 2 movements.

Louis C. Elson.

LAUREL WREATH TO SYMPHONY 'CELLO SOLOIST.

Rudolph Krasselt and His Colleagues Showered With Honors at the Thirteenth
Concert of Present Season

Boston American Jan 29 1905

By Kent Perkins.

It was the Symphony Orchestra's own night at the thirteenth concert of the season in Symphony Hall last night. The hall was crowded, the audience enthusiastic and the programme was of a character to give full scope to the musicians to exhibit the wide variety of their high abilities. All the honors—and the evening was replete with them—went to the orchestra, for, while there was a soloist, he only appeared in one selection, and the huge laurel wreath that was bestowed on him was added to the organization's rewards, as he was Rudolf Krasselt, the violoncello player, and a member of the orchestra. This was the programme:

The Cornelius overture, bubbling with humor, saturated with passionate melody and tinged throughout with an "Arabian Nights" spirit, was played with inimitable gracefulness and appreciation.

Mr. Krasselt drew from his 'cello in the Volkmann concerto tones of such remarkable sweetness, purity and overpowering tenderness as are rarely heard. That the audience recognized a master and appreciated the ravishing sounds with which he filled the hall was proved by the storm of applause that burst forth when the last exquisite note died away. He was recalled a half dozen times and his associates joined heartily in the tribute given to him.

Overture to the opera, "The Barber of Bagdad".....Peter Cornelius Concerto in A minor for violoncello and orchestra, Op. 33.....Volkmann Symphonic prelude in A minor, No. 5, Op. 11 (first time).....R. Caetani Fantastic symphony, No. 1, in C major, Op. 16A.....Berlioz

Caetani's Symphonic Prelude, heard here for the first time, and rich in pathetic, passionate and yearning harmonies, was given with admirable delicacy of shading and splendid fullness of spirit and power. The astonishing Berlioz Symphony brought out the extreme capabilities of the orchestras. It has a definite programme explained by the composer and represents a hopeless lover who in despair takes opium to end his misery. The dose is not fatal; it gives the youth only fantastic dreams, through all of which there floats a melody into which his vision of his sweetheart has been transmuted.

The work is in five parts, portraying dreams of his loved one: a brilliant ball, where she dances; a pastoral scene in which shepherds' pipes, the love-melody and several thunder storms are mixed together; a dream where the youth thinks he has killed the girl and sees himself marched to the scaffold for it, and finally a Walpurgis night's dream that is a veritable witches' cauldron of harmonic and melodic extravagance.

The many beauties of the piece were fully displayed by the orchestra, and the sensational episodes were produced with the utmost skill and effectiveness.

At the fourteenth concert, next Sunday evening, Eugen d'Albert, the famous pianist and composer, will be the soloist.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

Mr. Rudolf Krasselt was the soloist for the thirteenth symphony concert, of which this was the programme:

Peter Cornelius: Overture to the opera "The Barber of Bagdad."
Volkmann: Concerto in A minor for Violoncello and Orchestra, Op. 33.
R. Caetani: Symphonic Prelude in A minor, No. 5, Op. 11. (First time.)
Berlioz: Fantastic Symphony, No. 1, in C major, Op. 16A.

This season there have been few if any symphony concerts without one work ticketed "first time," a state of things for which the public should be duly grateful to Mr. Gericke. On Saturday last the new composition was a symphonic prelude by one Roffredo Caetani, who, it seems, is a Roman of noble birth, no less a personage, in short, than the second son of the Duke of Sermoneta. Little is known here of this aristocratic musician beyond the facts that he has studied with Sgambati, in Germany, and in Paris, and that he has already written several pieces for orchestra and the small concert hall. The conditions under which he has learned his art would, on the face of it, give one pause, for Sgambati, the Italian musician of parts who sold his birthright for a mess of German and Lisztian ideas, cannot be regarded as the happiest choice of a master for a youthful Italian. But Caetani, despite his training, remains Italian. Although he has learned to use the full modern orchestra skilfully, contriving a constant succession of very beautiful sounds, he has not turned his back on melody, that great gift of the Italian musical nature. His prelude, while dignified, and as well made as though it were the work of a most respectable German, is based on genuine themes; it has melodies that possess a long curve and sweep, even if they are not of the most distinguished order. The composition has its dull moments, when the composer seems not to know just what he would do, but it is far from being one of those awful works where themes are avoided as vulgar, where detached motives of no significance whatever are banded about and twisted and turned till all the audience is bewildered. For the most part the prelude is admirably fresh, direct, and vigorously conceived, with a dramatic force and a warmth of passion all Italian. It would be worth our while to hear more works by this young writer who has had a sufficiently level head to learn much in Germany without becoming ambitious to pass, musically, for a German. The prelude was splendidly played.

The remarkable symphony by Berlioz one would gladly have heard earlier in the evening, for it is rather discouraging when an hour-long work begins its performance at nine o'clock. In connection with this symphony it is interesting to read these words of Berlioz: "If the symphony is played separately at a concert—the programme does not absolutely need to be distributed among the audience, and only the titles of the five movements need be printed, as the symphony can offer by itself (the composer hopes) a musical interest independent of all dramatic intention." Exactly so. To this day the musically intelligent are like to admire the musical content of this work, in which Berlioz, as a discoverer of interesting themes, rose above his own level, the exquisite poetical quality of its orchestral dress, the genuine poetry of the pastoral picture, the distinguished grace of the ball scene, the devilish cunning with which the effects of the march to the scaffold and the pandemonium of the witches' sabbath are contrived. It is all wonderful, music to be listened to with sincere respect and hearty admiration. But is it possible to take the symphony seriously as the expression of a soul's experience, a musical impression of an "episode in the life of an artist?" It seems not so. Berlioz was a rabid romanticist; and romanticism, like Pan, is dead. Such efforts of Byron, Victor Hugo, Dumas, and the others of that remarkable time, as now live, live despite their romanticism, not on account of it. So it is with Berlioz. His fantastic symphony, as he himself trusted, "can offer by itself a musical interest independent of all dramatic intention." One may prophesy that for years to come concertgoers will listen to periodical productions of this symphony, from which they will derive both pleasure and profit, but it is much to be doubted if the symphony will ever again stir an American audience to the depths of the soul. How, after a few years, will it be with Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony?

A delightful feature of Saturday's concert was the charming playing of Mr. Krasselt, playing tuneful, elegant, and of fine sentiment. Although there was no immodest display of virtuosity, Mr. Krasselt's performance was technically brilliant. The artist was recalled many times. All the evening the orchestra played admirably.

Mr. Eugen d'Albert will play with the orchestra this week. The programme has been arranged thus: Goldmark, Overture, "In Italy," op. 49 (first time); d'Albert, Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2; Weber, "Invitation to the Dance"; Rimsky-Korsakoff, Symphonic Suite, "Scherazade," op. 35.

Trans. Jan. 30, 1905 R. R. G.

Blabe Jan 29 1905

Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, the young cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was the soloist at last week's rehearsal and concert, playing Volkmann's A minor concerto, op. 33. The other numbers on the program were the Cornelius overture to "The Barber of Bagdad," a symphonic prelude by Caetani and the "Fantastic Symphony" by Berlioz. Mr. Krasselt's performance of the concerto was masterly and again gave evidence of the good judgment shown by Mr. Gericke in securing this young artist as a successor to the position so long and creditably filled by Mr. Schroeder. The immense difficulties of the Volkmann work seemed to offer but few obstacles to the performer, the runs, double stoppings and four-finger chords were made as perfectly as it upon a keyed instrument and the beautiful tone production was not varied throughout the piece, whether in harmonics or in the sweeping fortissimo passages, where one frequently hears a rasping sound.

The first theme was exploited in the upper register with the effect of a violin and the subsequent development and elaborations, sometimes passionate, sometimes of a sweeter nature, were each played with a clarity of tone and breadth of execution which deserve the highest praise. The cadenza, which was a somewhat remarkable exhibition of finger work, was the one written by Klengel, with whom Mr. Krasselt studied. The interpretation was most heartily enjoyed and the young artist received evidences of appreciation from the audience and his associate players which must have been most gratifying, for he was recalled to the stage at least a half dozen times by tumultuous applause.

The Cornelius overture to "The Barber," a merry, whimsical composition, with a succession of varying themes and rhythms, was delightfully played. The trumpet, clarinet and oboe sang the "Rose" melody in splendid unison, vying with the work of the strings in the same theme, and the repeated phrases of the same air in sustained chords by the brasses, backed by tremulous accompaniments in the heavier strings, in harmony with another motif by the woodwinds, were admirable examples of the perfect ensemble work of the orchestra. The Caetani prelude made a pleasing impression. The lighter portions of the piece contained some excellent melodic material, skilfully orchestrated, and although many of the heavier passages displayed the influence of Wagner's methods, they were not reproductions but more like reflections of the great master. The orchestra in the Volkmann concerto gave Mr. Krasselt splendid support.

The five divisions of the Berlioz symphony were given with a thoroughly sympathetic understanding of the various scenes. The "Ball Scene" was notably suggestive in its delicacy of treatment in the dance themes; the plaintive nature of the third movement was admirably intoned by the woodwinds, and the wild, fantastic characteristics of the fourth and fifth parts were given with thrilling effect.

Mr. Eugen d'Albert will be the soloist at this week's concert, playing his second piano concerto. The other numbers will be Goldmark's overture, "In Italy"; Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" and the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

CAETANI'S WORK IS PLAYED HERE

Symphony Orchestra, for Its 13th
Concert, Gives First Performance of the Young Italian's Delightful Prelude.

MR. KRASSELT PLAYS
THE CELLO ADMIRABLY

Great Fantastic Symphony of Ber-lioz, His Own Love Tragedy Put Into a Poem, Charms Hearers—
Orchestra Wins Favor.

Herald Jan. 29, 1905

The programme of the 13th concert of the Symphony orchestra, given in Symphony Hall last night, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad"..... Cornelius
Concerto for violoncello..... Volkmann
Symphonic Prelude op. 11, No 1..... Caetani
(First time.)

Fantastic Symphony..... Berlioz

It would be interesting to know how much Liszt had to do with this overture, which was composed long after the production of the opera; for the original overture was a very different affair in structure, spirit and tonality, and Liszt frankly told his friends that it was not in keeping with the opera itself. Cornelius died before he had scored this second overture, and the task was performed lovingly by Liszt, who said in a letter to his Princess Carolyn that he had also made alterations.

The overture as it stands is delightful music, melodious, piquant, now animated and now sensuous, full of life and at times sparkling and brilliant. When the opera was performed last July at Weimar at the Cornelius festival, not only was the score presented in its original form and without Felix Mottl's changes and additions, but the original overture was played. It might be worth while to perform it here.

Don Roffredo Caetani is a composer little known, even by name, in this country. It is said that he is the second son of the Duke of Sermoneta, a noble Roman, head of the family of Caetani; that he studied with Sgambati at Rome, and afterward in Germany and at Paris. He is evidently a seriously-minded young man, for his first published work was a string quartet, and he has composed a set of symphonic preludes, the first of which was played in New York at a Philharmonic concert in 1902; an orchestral suite and some chamber music. This prelude in A minor was performed here for the first time. Brahms once said, that one should speak well of music by a prince, for one could not tell who might have written it, but Caetani is, no doubt, his own composer. As a pupil of Sgambati, he was taught to look beyond the Alps, to study the methods and the spirit of Liszt and Wagner. Did Caetani in crossing the Alps give up his inestimable birthright of free and sensuous melody? It is a pleasure to say that this prelude shows that a young Italian can be earnest and at the same time melodious; that he can use the modern romantic dress of Germany to clothe effectively his own Italian thoughts.

Had Caetani a programme in his mind? Is the work a prelude to some play, as Pierre de Breville's "Overture to a Drama" was composed as a prelude to one of Maeterlinck's dramas, but without thought of necessary connection with an actual performance of the play? Surely the ending of Caetani's prelude hints at tragic emotions and the fall of the black curtain. The work is not of constantly sustained merit; there are moments when there is too apparent labor, when there is the thought of one experimenting; but as a whole the music shows true invention, no little command of orchestral expression, and more than once an individual and poignant stroke of imagination.

The "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz is now nearly 75 years old. It is both historically and inherently a marvellous work. To think that when it was produced Beethoven had not been dead four years, and that Wagner was still a student at Leipzig! On the other hand, how boldly imaginative the music seems today! The year 1830 that gave it birth has been called the '93 of the arts. It was a strange period of wild romanticism, the years immediately before and after, and Berlioz was not only a man of the future, he was a revolutionary of revolutionaries. His "antediluvian hair" that rose from his forehead was as much of a symbol as was the flaming waistcoat worn by Theophile on the memorable first night of "Hernani." We smile now at the eccentricities and the extravagancies of the period, but we owe the perpetrators a heavy debt of gratitude. They made the art of today possible.

It is easy to call Berlioz a poseur, but the young man was terribly in earnest. He put his own love tragedy into this symphony; he was the man; he suffered; he was there; and so the music did not pass away with the outward badges of romanticism, with much of Byron's poetry, with plays and novels of the time. The emotions he expressed are still universal and elemental. There is always a Henrietta Smithson, and there is from time to time a Berlioz, who in amorous frenzy dreams his ghastly dream march to the scaffold and would fain see the once beloved unclean at the blasphemous revel. Then he marries her and is profoundly unhappy.

Mr. Krasselt gave an admirable display of pure art by his performance of the concerto. He did not attempt to enlarge, to modernize, the music; he accepted it at its face value, and then by full and rounded and unaffected artistry he made it beautiful. And for once there was no thought of a player seeing between sentimental and cloying melody and unmeaning and buzzing bravura.

The orchestral performance for euphony and brilliance was of the highest order. The first three movements of the symphony were the most effective; the march might well have been played in still more nightmare spirit, and the bassoons that have been likened to ghostly advisers muttering dismal things in the ears of the victim as he nears the scaffold were too far away from him and their whispers were almost reassuring.

Trans. Don Roffredo Caetani Feb. 2, 1905

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Some genealogical data bearing on don Roffredo Caetani whose prelude was played at last week's Symphony Concert may interest a few of your readers.

This young composer, born in 1871, is half English; his mother being Ada, daughter of colonel the honorable E. B. Wilbraham. His paternal grandfather, don Michael Angelo Caetani duca di Sermoneta, principe di Teano, etc., etc. (1804-82) was a well-known Dante scholar and an intimate friend of Longfellow who thus writes of him in a letter to George W. Greene, under date, Rome, 1869:

"The most sympathetic and cultivated man I have found here is the duca di Sermoneta; about my age, but totally blind. He can repeat the Divina Commedia from beginning to end. We have long conferences together."

This duke's second wife was an Englishwoman: the honorable Harriet Ellis daughter of the sixth lord Howard de Walden.

And, finally, the first cousin of Longfellow's duke, don Francisco Caetani, married, in 1860, the famous prima donna Maria Piccolomini who may thus be reckoned, Breton fashion, grand-aunt-by-marriage to our young composer don Roffredo.

Don Roffredo's connections with Anglo-Saxondom may, then, be summed up under four heads, to wit:

1. His mother was English.
2. His step-grandmother was English.
3. His paternal grandfather was a friend and correspondent of Longfellow.
4. His grand-aunt-by-marriage (Breton fashion) was Maria Piccolomini-Artemas Ward's "Picklehominy" who created such a furor among the operagoers of England and America in the 1850's.

Piccolomini, herself, was not without ancestral connection with America; she was a descendant of Cortez the Conqueror of Mexico.

(To such persons as are unfamiliar with the term "Breton fashion" it may be explained that in Brittany a parent's cousin-german is commonly referred to as uncle or aunt; thus the great engineer de Lesseps was known to the empress Eugénie as uncle, he being first-cousin to the contessa di Montijo the empress's mother.)

STANISLAS KENELM D'AUBUSSON (Genealoger).

4 Howland street, Boston, Jan. 31.

157

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK,

OVERTURE, "In Italy," op. 49.
(First time.)

D'ALBERT,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in E major, (in one movement) No. 2, op. 12.
(First time.)

WEBER,

RONDO BRILLIANT, "Invitation to the Dance."
(Orchestrated by HECTOR BERLIOZ.)

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, SYMPHONIC SUITE, "Scheherazade," op. 35.
(After "The Thousand Nights and a Night.")

- I. The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.
  - II. The Story of the Kalandar Prince.
  - III. The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
  - IV. Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to pieces against a Rock surmounted by a bronze warrior.
- Conclusion.

Soloist:

Mr. EUGEN d'ALBERT.

The Pianoforte is a Knabe.

Trans. Feb. 6, 1905
Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

At the fourteenth Symphony concert Mr. Eugen d'Albert made his reappearance in Boston after an absence of many years. This was the programme:

Goldmark: Overture, "In Italy," Op. 49. (First time.)
D'Albert: Concerto for Pianoforte, in E major (in one movement), No. 2, Op. 12. (First time.)
Weber: Rondo Brilliant, "Invitation to the Dance." (Orchestrated by Hector Berlioz.)
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," Op. 35. (After "The Thousand Nights and a Night.")

Although it looked amazingly promising on paper, the programme of the last Symphony concert proved somewhat dull. There was the new overture by Goldmark, of course, which was bound to stir the interest of all music lovers, for who can forget the splendors of "Sakuntala" and of the "Queen of Sheba"? But now Goldmark is already an old man, and there are few musicians like Verdi who write better at eighty years than at forty. In his last work, furthermore, Goldmark deserted the gorgeous East, which his genius once held in fee, to dally with Italy. Like most Northerners, when he came to be Italian he became merely trivial. In his overture there is much rich coloring, a wealth of beautiful sounds, but the florid imagination that made remarkable the earlier works of Goldmark is distressingly lacking. Perhaps it would be the kindlier part to refrain from producing the compositions of musicians past their prime.

As for the second novelty of the concert, Mr. d'Albert's concerto, it caused bitter regrets that its composer preferred playing it to a Beethoven concerto, which he can present in greater manner than any other living pianist. The piece by Mr. d'Albert is of inexplicable meaning, speaking both musically and dramatically. There are no themes to be discovered in a single hearing, the various episodes bear no apparent relation to one another, there is no striking beauty of orchestration. In the place of these requisites of a musical composition there is but a succession of surges of sound, frantic climaxes not worked up to nor descended from, mere furious outbursts. Had any other pianist than the composer played the solo part, the effect of the work is not to be imagined. With Mr. d'Albert at the pianoforte, however, there was a massiveness about the concerto, a brutal exhibition of passion, that worked impressively upon the audience. Mr. d'Albert displayed great brilliancy. Beyond this statement it is impossible to go in considering his playing until he has come before an audience with something really to play. He was much applauded.

And then there was the "Invitation to the Dance," which was listened to with somewhat more of amusement than of delight. Since dance music, fortunately, is regarded as permissible at a symphony concert, why not play from Delibes' ballets, or even a Strauss waltz? If the Weber piece was chosen for old sake's sake, perhaps the "Battle of Prague," orchestrated by a man, would give as much pleasure.

By far the best of the concert came at the last, when Mr. Gerlicke gave a very brilliant and sympathetic performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's charming suite "Scheherazade." This work wears well. With its brilliancy of orchestration in nowise dimmed its rare imaginative qualities seem more remarkable than ever before. This surely is the best type of programme music, for, although there is no very close following of the titles of the various movements, the work as a whole, beside charming by its spontaneously attractive melodies and by its sparkling scoring, has the power to set one at once a-thinking of the "Arabian Nights," that book which, in one's youth, enchanted by its very mysteriousness, with its dervishes, calendars, veiled ladies, magnificent underground abodes and mendicants, which last it proved disappointing to learn were plain beggars. But beggars in Bagdad must have been different! All the charm of that queer world is contained in the Russian's suite. Unlike Berlioz, in his "Fantastic Symphony," Rimsky-Korsakoff has found, for his Scheherazade theme, which appears in all four movements and, at the close, in most poetic wise, a motive that lingers in the memory. It will be a disappointment if we do not soon hear this delightful composition again.

Miss Marie Nichols will be the soloist this week. The programme is as follows: Mozart, Overture, to "Marriage of Figaro;" Bruch, Serenade for violin and orchestra (first time); Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; César Franck, Symphony in D minor.
R. R. G.

THE SYMPHONY'S 14TH CONCERT

Eugen d'Albert Makes His Reappearance with His Own Concert No. 2, a Concerto Made Expressly to Suit the Pianist.

GOLDMARK'S NEW OVERTURE AGREEABLE

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Version of "The Arabian Nights" Constantly Picturesque, Highly Imaginative and Glowing.

Herald Feb. 5, 1905

The programme of the 14th Symphony concert given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "In Italy".....Goldmark
(First time.)
Piano concerto in E major, No. 2.....d'Albert
(First time.)
"Invitation to the Dance".....Weber-Berlioz
Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade".....
Rimsky-Korsakoff

Goldmark's new overture, which was produced at Vienna a year ago last month, is an excellent work for a popular concert. It will not enlarge his fame, for it is far below the overtures to "Sakuntala," "Prometheus," "Sappho," in imagination and in workmanship. Italy is something more than a matter of tainbourline, 12-8 tempo and duets in thirds. There is a suggestion of the old Goldmark in the second section of the slow episode, but the suggestion is in the expression of the thought than in the thought itself, which is feeble, as though coming from a tired or empty brain. There are pretty effects here and there, and they are chiefly effects of color or of rhythm, but there is little or no spontaneity in the gayety, and the nobler sensuousness of Italian life is not even hinted at. The overture might be compared to a second-rate stage curtain, with peasants dancing in the foreground, a cavalier and his love conversing sentimentally on a fallen marble column, and Vesuvius in the distance. Let us forget this overture and remember the composer of "Sakuntala," and the prelude, the ballet music and the temple scene from "The Queen of Sheba," in which there is true imagination as well as impressive or gorgeous orchestration.

Mr. d'Albert has not visited Boston since 1892. He first came here with Sarasate, and he was in his storm and stress period. His admirers then spoke of his right hand as the paw of a lion, but to calmer souls it resembled more closely the blow of a pile driver. He was as a young giant rejoicing in his strength. Force and fire and speed were his distinguishing characteristics, and in the fury of his performance the composer too often suffered with the audience. Even then there was the flame of genius burning brightly amid the smoke and devastation.

This was in 1899. When he came the second time he had more repose and his playing was the more authoritative. He gave a memorable performance with the Symphony orchestra of Beethoven's concerto in E flat, a performance distinguished by nobility and grandeur as well as by brilliance.

Some regret that he did not play such a work last night. Mr. d'Albert, perhaps wearied with the laurels of the virtuoso, became demented with the mania of composing things. Since the production of "The Ruby" in 1893 he has written six operas that have been performed, one that is soon to be performed, and much music of a less ambitious nature. The concerto he played last night was composed in the summer of 1892. It is interesting while it is being played by such a pianist. The hearer is pleased with the themes, he is stirred by the rhythmic swing, the sonorous orchestral waves, the demoniacal intensity of the pianist. When it is all over, and the pianist has made his bow and the final wreath has been handed up, there is chiefly the remembrance of a task performed with a dashing display of indisputable muscularity. There is also a grateful remembrance of the opening measures for the piano in the slow section of the work, which were played with such quiet and dignified breadth that they impressed at the time and thereafter.

As Mr. d'Albert will play in a chamber concert tomorrow night, and as he will give recitals here, a more detailed examination of his art may be deferred. It is enough to say that in spite of his devotion to composition he may still be ranked among the leading pianists.

It was a pleasure to hear Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite again. The music is constantly picturesque, it is at times highly imaginative. There are some, we are told, who think the wondrous "Thousand Nights and a Night" only foolish tales, even with the improving and educational notes of Sir Richard F. Burton. It is not likely that such persons will find enjoyment in this Russian music. What to them is Scheherazade or Sindbad, or the three shaven and one-eyed Kalandars, or the loadstone mountain crowned with the warrior on his steed of yellow copper?

Others perhaps are disconcerted because the composer, an accomplished contrapuntist, here prefers to make his effects solely by melodic, harmonic, and rhythmic transformations. These movements of the suite are glowing pictures. Each tale vaguely suggested by the programme which serves as preface is bathed and steeped in oriental atmosphere, whether it be that of cradling or angry sea, blazing sun, the voluptuous perfumes of the harem, or the bazaar with the crowd listening to the wild stranger. And Scheherazade with her haunting theme evokes and dismisses the scenes with their actors. Could not Mr. Gericke be persuaded to let us hear the same composer's "Spanish Caprice" which led Tschaiakowsky to write to Rimsky-Korsakoff: "You can consider yourself the greatest contemporary master"; or the "Fairy Tale," which lately delighted Paris?

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Feb 6 1905

Goldmark, Overture, "In Italy," op. 49.

(First time.)

D'Albert, Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2.

Soloist, Eugen D'Albert.

Weber, "Invitation to the Dance".

Rimsky-Korsakoff, Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," op. 25.

Goldmark may soon earn the title of The Last of the Melodists, for he is almost the only one among the great composers of the present who writes very tunefully. Yet he contrives to express sufficient passion and emotion in spite of his melodies. There were sharp contrasts in his overture, the slow episode making an excellent foil against the hurly-burly which preceded and followed it. The confusion of festivity was in the work also; not in the graphic style of Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude, but rather in the frenzied manner of Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine." This was especially noticeable in the furious ending.

The form of the work was quite clear—also an unusual thing in modern composition. The overture was finely performed, Mr. Gericke's reading being brilliant and effective and the orchestra seconding his intentions perfectly.

Mr. D'Albert, or Mr. MacAlbert, as a British reviewer (determined that he should not renounce his Scottish origin), recently called him, has gained in breadth and nobility of performance since his previous appearances in Boston. As he is a Beethoven specialist we would have preferred to have heard him in the fourth or fifth concerto, but his own concerto was an interesting work nevertheless. Its 4 movements are continuous, but are sufficiently well-marked to be easily followed. At the beginning the composition has some of the brusquerie of the "Flying Dutchman" overture, against which its slow movement becomes doubly attractive.

This latter was the most poetic and best part of the whole work. The Scherzo (or what corresponded to it) had not very much to say for itself, but the finale roared forth its power in "King Cambyse's vein," making a strong climax in which the pianist was able to display his mastery of chord work, double octaves, and all kinds of wrist and fore-arm bravura in most effective fashion.

Without descending to any meretricious effects the climax was worked up in a manner that would appeal to musical and non-musical auditors alike, and the artist-composer reaped his reward in many recalls and a laurel wreath as large as himself. The tribute was deserved by the playing and by the composition, for there was much good development in the work even if it may not take rank with the masterpieces. We shall await Mr. D'Albert's appearance tonight, in chamber music, with much interest.

That delightful dialogue in music, the "Invitation to the Dance," charmed everybody. Berlioz has scored it most daintily and effectively. "Can you honor me with the next waltz, Mademoiselle?" asks the violoncello. "Oh, Monsieur, I am charmed to give it to you," responds the woodwind. Then they glide through the measures of what has been denounced as "hug-gling set to music." Sorrowfully the violoncello takes leave of his partner when the dance is done.

He has bidden her "Good Bye" and gone to the door, when he comes back for just one more final word. And that absolutely extraneous coda tripped up a number of auditors, as usual, who began to applaud before the young man made his "positively last appearance." We found the waltz a trifle rigid. It would gain by giving it more of a 6-4 effect.

The Russians have captured—a Boston audience, reviewers and all! The engagement began with a bombardment of full orchestra, under cover of which the woodwind advanced on the right. The violins, led by Gen. Hess, now made a brilliant sortie on the left flank of the main body. It was a magnificent charge; at one time Gen. Hess was quite alone, but his cavalry soon rallied around him. A furious volley of kettle-drums followed, while Gen. Gericke brought up the trombone reserves and the remaining brasses. At this the entire audience—including some very big guns—surrendered.

In all seriousness we believe that, in music, the Russians are upon the right path, while France and Germany are struggling in the brambles. Here is a work that presents all the modern development of orchestral tone-coloring, yet is quite intelligible; that gives rich harmonization, yet presents recognizable melodies, even folk-music. In short, a composition that unites the best of the old and the new. We need a modern Bach today, who shall reconcile 2 schools that at present are turning their backs on each other. Russia is the country where the composers are attempting to do this.

The suite had many obligato passages, some of which amounted to good-sized and important solos. Mr. Hess played the violin obligati very finely, and we must also record the charm of the oboe work by M. Longy. The Oriental flavor was splendidly attained, especially in the Scheherazade passages. Every point of modern orchestration was represented, even to muted trumpets. The Oriental festival of the finale was of exceptional brilliancy.

The telling of these stories in musical form has an advantage over the literary original; it is not necessary to expurgate it in its cis-Atlantic presentation. Yet we would not have objected to an occasional "cetera desunt" in the 2d movement. The story of the Kalandar Prince was rather long. We fancy that if it were made thus prolix to the Sultan Schahriah, that potentate would have shortened the tale by a few sentences, and the narrator by a few inches.

Louis C. Elson.

MUSICAL MATTERS

D'Albert Plays at the Symphony Concert.

Cecilia Club, Symphony Quartet,
Ysaye and Other Events.

Announcement of the Grand Opera Season.

Globe Feb 5 1905

The famous pianist and composer, Eugen d'Albert, who has been a stranger to this country for a dozen years, made his reappearance here at last week's Symphony concert, playing his own E major piano concerto. Goldmark's overture, "In Italy," given here for the first time, opened the program, which also contained Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" and "Scheherazade." Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "The Piano Concerto" is practically in one movement, the divisions are so slight, and is evidently written to display the more vigorous features of his artistic powers, for nearly all the sections are thickly strewn with forte and fortissimo passages in four-finger chords. The great fervor shown by the artist plainly indicated the general tone of the big composition and his performance, although a little uneven in spots, gave the impression of a vitality which expressed perfectly the ideas of the writer by the art of the performer. He indulged in strong tonal contrasts, the piano part in some of the lighter passages being hardly audible above the orchestra; but in the many exceedingly brilliant portions of the work the splendid qualities of the artist were shown in glowing colors. Mr d'Albert was received with great enthusiasm and was recalled to the stage many times. At his recital in a few weeks it is to be hoped that he will include some of Beethoven's works, in which the pianist is said to excel as an interpreter.

The Goldmark overture, "In Italy," heard for the first time, is a charmingly brilliant piece and characteristic of the composer's fondness for novel effects in which the instruments of percussion are liberally used. It is one of those light, joyous, rollicking works which please the ear and keeps one in good humor, and it was played with great spirit and dash by the orchestra. The odd crescendos were exquisite bits of tonal quaintness and deserve special mention.

The orchestra gave d'Albert perfect support in the piano concerto and Weber's rondo, "Invitation to the Dance," also went with a swing that was almost irresistible to those who indulge in the mazy. Sinbad's journey and other stories, according to the musical ideas of the Russian composer. Rimsky-Korsakoff, were illustrated in the usual skilful manner and being familiar, call for no detailed comment.

This week's program will have for soloist the young violinist, Miss Marie Nichols, who will be heard in Bruch's serenade for violin and orchestra. The remaining selections will be Mozart's overture, "Marriage of Figaro"; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Richard Strauss and Cesar Franck's D-minor symphony.

D'ALBERT PLAYS AT THE SYMPHONY

Little Giant of the Keys Interprets
His Works With Massive Brilliancy and Effect.

Journal Feb 6 1905

Two novelties were offered at the fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, each fine and highly interesting in its especial way. The new Goldmark overture, "In Italy," first on the program, was charming for its frank simplicity of melody and treatment. But two main themes are there, one bustling, sunny, suggestive of the free, out-of-door life of the Italian populace; the other gravely sweet and spiced with the romance of warm-breathed night.

Little Bits of Color.

Each is treated with delightfully clear and unhackneyed orchestration, with an occasional bit of the color that made the composer of the "Sakuntala" and "The Queen of Sheba" a man of greatness. If this overture is neither profound nor highly poetic, it is at least gaily beautiful and satisfying. It was played with sparkling virtuosity.

The other work new to Boston was D'Albert's pianoforte concerto in E major, played by the composer himself. Thirteen years have elapsed since this little giant of the keys has been heard here. Time has played tricks with his hair, which has receded from his forehead and vanished from another point, but otherwise he seems no older. And he plays with all the massive brilliancy of old, with even more astonishing shading and with the same swing that carries the sympathetic listener off his feet.

What he now does in the more delicate phases of virtuosity must be found out later, for the concerto of Saturday night gave no test of that sort of thing. It is big with sound, almost pompous in character, yet never blatant, never merely empty phrasing. D'Albert had something to say, and he said it as a giant might exult in his strength.

Audience Deceived.

Of the Berlioz transcription of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" it is only necessary to observe that it is not so interesting nor so beautifully colored as that of Weingartner. It is amusing to find that even a Symphony audience is deceived by the well-known pause just before the final slow measures and that the usual applause broke in at the wrong time.

A highly effective performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's wonderful tonal story, "Scheherazade," based upon portions of the "Arabian Nights," made a noble conclusion to a very interesting concert.

D'ALBERT, PIANIST, WINS LAURELS AT SYMPHONY.

Boston Transcript Feb 5 1905
Famous Artist and Composer
Plays a Work of His Own Brilliantly, Reappearing After an Absence of Thirteen Years

THREE FEATURES OF A NOTABLE CONCERT

By Kent Perkins.

Three special features made memorable the fourteenth Symphony Concert of this season, at Symphony Hall, last night—first, the reappearance of Eugen d'Albert, the famous pianist and composer; secondly, the performance by him of his own piano concerto, in E major, No. 2 op. 12, this being its first production in Boston, and lastly, the first performance here of Goldmark's overture, "In Italy."

Mr. d'Albert was welcomed with great warmth by the big audience. The people expected a treat from the concerto, and they were not disappointed. The piece is in one movement and is divided into four sections, separated only by slight pauses, and bound together by the continuity and identity of the principal themes. These are for the most part buoyant, jubilant, triumphant, and the whole work is the virile song of a man who is elated with the consciousness of strength and success, and is at all times sure of himself and his merit. The themes are worked out with beauty of melody and rich harmonic development, while the occasional lapses into sentiment are pleasing in contrast with the stronger appeal of the composition as a whole.

The composer-pianist played with vigor, brilliance and an ever-present manner of self-confidence that was in entire harmony with the triumphant note of the music. The orchestra assisted most ably in the interpretation of the work. At the close Mr. d'Albert was repeatedly called to the platform by continued applause and a laurel wreath was given to him.

The Goldmark overture, which had its initial performance in January, 1904, in Vienna, sang clearly and with varied beauty an imaginative Teuton's ideals of Italy—its romance, its art, its loveliness, its vivid and picturesque life, its struggle and its times of martial triumph. The wide range of imagery in the piece was vividly portrayed by the orchestra.

Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated by Hector Berlioz, was played with exquisite delicacy and delicious rhythm, and its story was so clearly told by the orchestra that the programme's explanation of the dancer's approach, and invitation, the lady's hesitation, his urging, her consent, the dance itself, the finale and her thanks was not needed for the most casual hearer's complete understanding of the scene.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade," Op. 35, based on the "Arabian Nights Tales," closed the programme, and was produced with the orchestra's utmost care and skill. It is in four parts: 1. The Sea and Sinbad's Ship; 2. The Story of the Kalandar Prince; 3. The Young Prince and the Young Princess; 4. Festival at Bagdad, the sea, the ship goes to pieces against a rock, surmounted by a bronze warrior: conclusion.

There are characteristic themes for the sea, Sinbad's ship, the Kalandar and the Prince and Princess, while through it all runs a delightful melody that belongs to Scheherazade. There is a wealth of Oriental imagery and romantic arabesques in the work, and vivid picturing of Bagdad, the ocean and the magnetic mountain that tears the ship to pieces, while bolts and nails clatter and ring against the mountain. All is expressed with melodic beauty and suggestive charm.

TWO FRIDAY SYMPHONY TICKETS

In Row X-12-13, are for sale for the remainder of the season for $25.00 each. Address E.D.S., Boston Transcript. (A)

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL SEATS, BALCONY

B-13-14-Right, are for sale. Price $26.00 for remainder of season. Address O.B.T., Boston Transcript. (A)

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS AA-20-21

For the balance of season, may be secured at $17.00 each by addressing C.O.H., Boston Transcript. (A)

SYMPHONY TICKETS

EVENING; two aisle seats, cost $65; will sell for $35.00. Address O.F.W., Boston Transcript (A)

165

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART,

OVERTURE to the Opera "The Marriage of Figaro."

BRUCH,

SERENADE in A minor for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA.
op. 75.

I. Andante con moto.

II. Allegro moderato, alla marcia.

III. Notturmo. Andante sostenuto.

IV. Allegro energico e vivace.

(First time.)

RICHARD STRAUSS,

TONE POEM, "Don Juan." op. 20. (after N. Lenau.)

CÉSAR FRANCK,

SYMPHONY in D minor.

I. Lento: Allegro non troppo.

II. Allegretto.

III. Allegro non troppo.

Soloist:

Miss MARIE NICHOLS.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART,

OVERTURE to the Opera "The Marriage of Figaro."

BRUCH,

SERENADE in A minor for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA.
op. 75.

I. Andante con moto.

II. Allegro moderato, alla marcia.

III. Notturmo. Andante sostenuto.

IV. Allegro energico e vivace.

(First time.)

RICHARD STRAUSS,

TONE POEM, "Don Juan." op. 20. (after N. Lenau.)

CÉSAR FRANCK,

SYMPHONY in D minor.

I. Lento: Allegro non troppo.

II. Allegretto.

III. Allegro non troppo.

Soloist:

Miss MARIE NICHOLS.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

Marie Nichols, the Famous Boston Violinist

SUPERB PLAYING OF SYMPHONY

For Its 15th Concert Famous Orchestra Performs Cesar Franck's Work in D Minor Impressively, with Exquisite Detail.

FRANCK CONTRASTED WITH HIS DISCIPLES

Miss Marie Nichols Plays the Violin Well in Bruch's Dull Serenade on Her First Appearance with the Orchestra.

Herald Feb. 12, 1905

The programme of the 15th Symphony concert given in Symphony Hall last night, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Serenade in A minor, for violin and orchestra.....Bruch
(First time.)

"Don Juan," tone poem (after Lenau).....R. Strauss Symphony in D minor.....C. Franck

They that believe in a symphony concert without the intrusion of a solo singer, violinist, pianist, cellist, might argue from the programme of last night. The symphony by Cesar Franck, or any symphony of like nobility and grandeur, should logically have come first, when the attention of the audience was undivided, before the distraction of an individual performance and the gossip of the intermission. But the performance of this symphony would have killed the effect of any soloist coming after. Given a solo performer, and the programme maker's task is doubly difficult; he is often obliged to arrange the programme with reference to the calibre of the soloist and the character of his selection. Yet the programme might thus have been arranged: Franck's symphony, intermission, Bruch's serenade, Strauss' "Don Juan," and this programme would have been long enough.

The feature of the concert was the eminently satisfactory and impressive performance of the symphony. Mr. Gericke's reading was sympathetic and masterful. The long lines of Franck's musical thought were not lost sight of in the care for the exquisite details; the polyphonic structure was clearly indicated, but not in the mere spirit of the professional analyst; the tonal gradations were observed with seeming spontaneity; the instrumental song was flowing and appealing; the orchestral forces were prepared and massed skillfully for irresistible effect. Never before has this symphony of Cesar Franck seemed so supremely beautiful in its tenderness, its pathetic entreaty, its glorious triumphant chant.

Listening to the performance one could not help reflecting on the inferiority of Franck's disciples, ingenious as some of them are. Compare this symphony, for instance, with that of d'Indy, played not long ago. The latter is a composition not to be mentioned without a tribute of respect to the workmanship displayed in it, but how labored are the effects, and what distressing anxiety there is in the continual attempt to avoid that which might be considered simple or conventional! These disciples speak, in a way, the language of Franck, but in a small, dry way. Their music lacks the intense humanity, the sweeping vision, the elemental force, the serene nobility of their master's. They are not to be blamed because they do not have his genius. They may justly incur the reproach, however, of an affected musical speech based on his natural and manly form of expression. The unpretentious, quiet courage, the sublime devoutness of Franck the man found expression in his music, and without his own consciousness. Much as we admire the earlier works of his disciple, d'Indy, heartily as we are in accord with his pure devotion to art and to artistic ideals, we find in his latest works a peculiar self-consciousness that may be fatal to their long life.

Mr. Gericke and the orchestra are also to be congratulated on the spirited and dramatic performance of "Don Juan," a work which, pleasing and thrilling on first hearing, has not lost in sensual pomp and pride through repetition. If there be such a thing as character portrayal in music without the aid of dramatic action or minute explanatory programme, Strauss has succeeded admirably in painting the hero of Lenau's poem.

Bruch's "Serenade" was composed in 1899, and it was first performed in public by Joseph Debroux at Berlin Nov. 30, 1901, when the composer conducted. Mr. Willy Hess played it at Cologne the next year. The performance last night was the first in Boston, and Miss Nichols made her first appearance with the Symphony orchestra. There was a rumor that this work was composed originally with the thought of Sarasate; that the "Serenade" was to have been dedicated to him; that he was not much pleased with the music and therefore was not the violinist who produced it; but Bruch in a letter which we have seen denies the truth of this report and states that he had already paid his tribute to the great Spanish violinist by his dedication to him of the second concerto and the "Scottish Fantasia."

The "Serenade" is in four movements. The first, an andante con moto, is suavely and mildly interesting in spots. The second movement, an allegro moderato alla marcia, is dry and dull. The following nocturne is pretty for a time, but its prettiness is without distinction, and the end is welcome. The finale, based on themes of Spanish character, is inconspicuous. The pleasantest feature is the manner in which the chief theme and mood of the first movement are introduced near the close.

It is much to be regretted that Miss Nichols chose such a drab and jejune composition for her first appearance with the orchestra. She is a young violinist of much more than ordinary talent and taste. Interesting in music that is uninteresting to the verge of discouragement, she succeeded in holding the attention of the audience and in winning its hearty applause by the modest display of her technical and musical accomplishments. With more experience she will undoubtedly develop a freer and broader style; she will get farther and farther away from New England and rejoice musically in frank expression of art and womanhood. Mr. Hess conducted the concerto with care.

FIFTEENTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Miss Marie Nichols, a young woman who has achieved an enviable reputation as a violinist, was the soloist at last week's Symphony concerts, playing the Bruch A minor serenade, for violin and orchestra, the first performance here. The complicated work is in four movements, the third and fourth parts being the more pleasing half of the group, the former because of the skill with which the solo score is written and the latter for the piquant character of the dance themes. Some portions of the orchestration in the first two movements appear thin and disjointed, as if the composer had merely sketched and not finished his work and although the solo instrument is admirably treated there is lacking the homogeneity displayed in the last two movements. Miss Nichols played with a skill and confidence which was very pleasing, and her interpretation as a whole merits warm praise.

She is very graceful in bowing, her fingering, single and in chords, is true and as deft as the phrases require, all her legato is smooth and flowing, and save the absence of masculine vigor in fortissimo work she was highly satisfactory and richly deserved the applause which greeted her efforts. The florid passages in the second movement were very skilfully executed. The almost continuous legato of the third part was notably sweet and appealing and the strongly accented dance themes of the finale, if they had been given with a trifle more abandon, would have been equal in merit with the two before mentioned. Following so quickly those giants of the violin, Kreisler and Ysaye, Miss Nichols' success was the more marked and vastly to her credit.

Concert Master Hess, who was familiar with the serenade, having played it at a concert in Cologne three years ago, conducted in place of Mr. Gericke. The orchestra acquitted itself well, providing efficient support for the soloist. Mr. Gericke led the other numbers, which were the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," and Cesar Franck's D minor symphony.

The Strauss selection was given with the requisite effects, the contrasts of the elaborate orchestration being observed with due care, but the Franck symphony is worthy of the greater commendation, this, to many minds, master-work showing the orchestra at its best. The familiar Mozart overture calls for no special comment.

The orchestra will be away this week. Next week's program will have for soloist Mr. Ernest Schelling, who will play the Liszt-Busoni "Spanish Rhapsody." The other numbers will be Sinding's suite in F major, first time here, and Brahms' C minor symphony.

MARIE NICHOLS AND WILLY HESS

Violinist and Conductor Please the Audience at the Fifteenth
Symphony Concert.

Journal ————— Feb 13/1905

The fifteenth Symphony concert was graced by the charming presence of Miss Marie Nichols, a violinist who has already won high favor here. She is a young woman of ability as well as a player of excellent technique, and she might have achieved a far greater effect had she played some better work than the Bruch serenade in A minor, which was heard here for the first time.

Mr. Willy Hess conducted for Miss Nichols' performance, and did it with care and comprehension. This innovation is said to be part of a plan, outlined some time ago, to relieve Mr. Gericke from a few of the less important works.

The purely orchestral part of the concert was of more than ordinary variety and beauty. Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" overture, that remarkable expression of pure musical gaiety, was played with consummate finish. Symphony Hall is still supreme in this sort of thing, no matter what may be said of the quality of our storm and stress.

Did anyone ever think Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" tone-poem abstruse, revolutionary and hard to comprehend? History says so, and memory indorses it. But now how clear, how fascinating, how thoroughly melodious the work appears. One more D'Indy symphony, and Strauss will seem to be a Mendelssohn. The vibrant, splendid work had a worthy performance, full of unwonted fire and emotion.

Another massive and extraordinary composition, but in totally different fashion, is the D minor symphony of Cesar Franck. Lofty in thought, artistic in expression, full to overflowing with the spontaneity of a rich musical nature, it holds spellbound all those who find in music something deeper than mere pleasant sound. And yet how lovely, how free from austerity it all is. If that last eloquent movement is to be taken as praise to man's maker it is worthy the subject, for no purer paen of exultation has ever been told in music. The playing matched the work, for it was superb.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

At the fifteenth Symphony concert Miss Marie Nichols made her first appearance as soloist, the programme being as follows: Mozart: Overture to the opera "The Marriage of Figaro." Bruch: Serenade in A minor for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 75. (First time.) Richard Strauss: Tone Poem, "Don Juan," Op. 20 (after N. Lenau). Cesar Franck: Symphony in D minor.

This concert, the fifteenth, was remarkable for a wealth of beautiful music offered, the pity of it being that there was somewhat too much of it. A work of the calibre of Cesar Franck's symphony can be properly listened to and appreciated only when the musical mind is fresh. On Saturday the symphony came so late in the evening that many persons withdrew before the last moment, which surely would not have happened had the great work been presented earlier in the evening. When this composition is to be played all else must give way before it, that it may be afforded the worthiest conditions of performance possible to be attained. For its like has not been written in many years. With each hearing the symphony sounds more beautiful than before, a mighty product of a great genius. Its performance on Saturday was one of wonderful sympathy and appreciation. Dwelling lovingly on each individual phrase, that the audience might enjoy its exquisite beauty of form and color, Mr. Gericke at the same time gave vent to the deep human emotion of the music, never allowing the minuteness of detail to smother the broad, fresh sweep of the work as a whole. The symphony, indeed, can only be compared to a play of Shakspeare, in its combination of mighty strength of human feeling and in its amazing fancy of imagery. In thus appreciating so keenly the beauty of the parts and the grandeur of the whole, Mr. Gericke gave the composition a reading such as it has never before enjoyed in Boston. To listen to such music so played is an experience that fully repays one for many vain visits to concert halls.

But, incidentally, why should a music-lover expect to hear a masterpiece grandly performed every time he runs to a concert? In the countless picture exhibitions that are held in Boston every season, how many really remarkable paintings are there brought to view in the course of a year? There is much admirable and interesting work, of course, but how many pictures are there that will be talked about and highly regarded in ten years' time? Of the grist of new novels that reach a reviewer's desk during the year, how many of them can be considered seriously as a genuinely artistic work of fiction? Read the reviews by competent literary critics and discover. And now, to turn to music, why should the public expect the conditions to be more favorable than in the other arts? Is it a simpler affair to dash off a masterly symphonic poem than to write a novel or paint a landscape? Or is it easier to play

Beethoven's E-flat concerto as Mr. d'Albert has proved it can be played, if proof were necessary, than to portray the character of Juliet on the stage? Precisely at this moment there are few novelists turning out works that make one forget "Diana of the Crossways." Painters are not common who are likely to make Degas uneasy as to his laurels. As to the stage, there is not much offered today that causes thrills of delight in the hearts of experienced playgoers. But in music there would seem to be a different standard. Let the music managers set before the public the poorer works of Beethoven, sonatas, quartets, symphonies alike, let them be well or ill performed, the public and the press must display frantic enthusiasm, or the cry of pessimism is raised. Young composers present their works of indifferent value, and if they are not extolled the question is at once raised, "Why? You can't expect Beethoven!" A young singer with a pleasant voice twitters through an aria that Mme. Sembrich would devote two years to learning. But the singer must not be condemned, for she is young.

It is, in very truth, hard to be enthusiastic over the average programme and performance that is offered to concertgoers. But let one hear a production of Cesar Franck's D-minor symphony such as that of last Saturday, and enthusiasm will run riot.

The playing of Strauss' "Don Juan" was no less beautiful, in its more robust way. The tone poem wears well, perhaps better than will some of the later creations, when Strauss had become more "individual." Be this as it may, in "Don Juan" we have pages of passionate music glowing at a white heat, succeeded by measures that painfully express the end of everything, the taste of ashes in the mouth. Although the character of Lenau's Don Juan is portrayed as plastically as it is possible for music to portray character, this poem would work a potent spell were it without a name. It is possible that here and in "Tod und Verklärung" Richard Strauss is at his best and greatest. The performance was invigoratingly dramatic and intense.

In contrast with this magnificent poem the memory of Bruch's new serenade is but shadowy. While Miss Nichols is to be commended for trying to bring forward something new, she cannot be felicitated on the success of her attempt. The serenade is very dull music, ill-sounding in the two quick movements, sentimental and tiresome in the introduction and the nocturne. The greater Miss Nichols's ability, therefore, since, with such poor material, she could make her way with the audience. Miss Nichols is indeed a violinist of much charm. She plays with a pure and sweet, if rather small tone, with delightful phrasing, with a very sweet sentiment, and, in technical passages, with considerable brilliancy. In listening to Miss Nichols one has constantly the feeling that she could play more emotionally if she chose. Evidently of a nature not cold, Miss Nichols has only to overcome a slight degree of self-consciousness to become an artist of high rank. Already, in both technique and musicianliness, she stands well above the other young violinists we have heard here in recent years.

This week there will be no concert. On Saturday, the 25th, this will be the programme, Mr. Ernest Schelling, soloist: Sinding, Suite in F major (first time); Liszt-Busoni, Spanish Rhapsody; Brahms, Symphony No. 1, in C minor.

Jan. 13, 1905.

R. R. G.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

adw PROGRAMME. Feb 13 1905
Mozart—Overture to "Marriage of Figaro."
Bruch—Serenade for Violin and Orchestra.
(First time.)—Miss Marie Nichols.
Richard Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Cesar Franck—Symphony in D minor.

There was a great deal of novelty in the concert of Saturday, and it was in some respects the most interesting concert of the season. It began, however, in the conservative, classical vein, with Mozart's concise little sonata-allegro, the "Marriage of Figaro" overture, which was given with much spirit.

Then came a new work, a new violinist and a new conductor. Of these the last shall be first. Prof. Hess, at the recent Ysaye concert, showed clearly that he is a conductor of much ability. His beat is decisive and intelligible, his reading is musicianly, and he does not yield to any extravagance of gesture or excess of individualization. Mr. Gericke did well to commit the direction of the Bruch Serenade to him.

Bruch has won a front rank among composers for violin and orchestra by his G minor concerto. A little less great, but still an important work is his Scotch Fantasia for the same combination. His 2d and 3d violin concertos show a decided falling-off, and we fear that this Serenade must also be classed with his second-rate compositions. We have heard the 2 excellent works above mentioned superbly given in Boston in very recent days, and the contrast shrivels up the Serenade. Of course, we remember that the Serenade is less ambitious than the concerto, and generally more mellifluous than the Suite. But just this sweetness, which was characteristic of the instrumental "Serenata" of the 18th century, is very cloying to the auditor of the 20th. We change and music changes with us!

We have become accustomed to Bruch as a musical Tyrtaeus; his "Arminius," "Fair Ellen," "Flery Cross," "Frithjof," his 2 violin works first mentioned, are all expressive of the muse militant. We have come to expect even his slumber songs and serenades to have the clangor of arms. Wherefore we were uneasy under his more saccharine spell.

Besides this, we have had such great violinists here recently that a good, intelligent player, like Miss Nichols, is handicapped. She played correctly, with good intonation, with tenderness, but no better than a half-dozen of the violinists who sat behind her could have done. She was recalled 3 times at the end of the prolix work. When Mr. Hess resumed his seat as concert-meister, after directing the work, the applause burst forth loudly again, but he modestly declined noticing it, while the soloist came out and bowed once more!

Strauss' "Don Juan," after this "linked sweetness long drawn out," was like brandy after vanilla soda. It was brilliantly played, although we would much rather have heard "Till Eulenspiegel," which was originally announced. But the more one hears Strauss' later tone-poems the more one is impressed with the absolute surety with which he makes his effects and works up his climaxes.

When he wants melody he is able to invent it, too, as witness the beautiful love-theme upon the oboe, which was exquisitely played. The violin obbligato was also effectively given.

Richard Strauss commits an error in his programme music by not giving complete details of his meaning. There ought to be no halfway confidences in this field; either an instrumental work is "absolute music" and appeals only to the emotions, or it represents some definite objects or events. In the latter case (since the tonal language is far less definite than words) it is best for the composer to state just what he means, or there is a likelihood of even the most careful reviewers dilating with the wrong emotion.

The powerful figure of the 4 horns in unison, for example, was mistaken for a picture of noble heroism by many analysts, and it certainly conveys that impression. But no! Strauss intended it for a portrayal of the half-drunken Don Juan plunging onward in his mad career:—

So long as youth lives on with pulse afire,
On to the chase! To conquests new aspire!

In the same manner it would be dangerous to speculate on the gigantic "Sinfonia Domestica." Some of the outbursts might typify the hero hurling a flat-iron at his spouse and her coming back at him with a rolling-pin, or they might mean a honeymoon at Niagara Falls, or half-a-dozen other widely separated ideas. There are only 2 roads possible with such music: a full and explicit explanation of the composer's intention, or a judgment of the work as pure music without any ulterior meaning whatever. To give merely an indicative title, or a poem or motto at the beginning, is to invite the imagination of the auditor into pitfalls and errors.

The glory of the concert, the triumph of Mr. Gericke and of the orchestra, was in the performance of the last number. Never have we heard a work by Cesar Franck so superbly given as the symphony was at this concert.

Cesar Franck is sometimes called "the French Schumann," and so he is, in the sense that he broke the fetters of the young Gallic composers and opened up greater freedom of expression for them. But in such a work as this symphony we recognize a French Brahms; a man who combined intellect with emotion, with a preponderance of the former, just as the German symphonist did.

The work is an apotheosis of figure development. At the very first there comes a figure of 3 notes, which is nothing more nor less than the "Fate-motif" of Wagner's trilogy with its last interval expanded into a fourth. Franck does not once achieve the richness of Wagner's harmonization of this remarkable figure, but he develops it in a manner that is masterly nevertheless. By contrary motion, by contraction, by expansion, by diminution, by rhythmic change, by every device known to the composer this figure interweaves itself not only through the first movement but into the finale. Against this there is developed, with the greatest effect, a longer figure of 12 notes, resolute and with bold skips of sixths and sevenths.

The slow movement is perhaps less mighty than the opening allegro, but the finale is yet greater. Beethoven, in his 9th symphony, inaugurated the plan of bringing back figures from preceding movements in the finale. Brahms, carrying this idea further, made the finale of his C minor symphony (which we are to have in the next concert) a grand epitome of the entire work. Thus also, does Franck make of his last movement a culmination and an interweaving of all the important thoughts of his entire symphony.

Of course this is intellectual in a high degree; of course it must be studied or at least heard often before the gigantic scheme can be comprehended; but once acquired it will be appreciated and loved just as the subtleties of Bach or Brahms are loved by those who have penetrated beneath the veil. This is the language that the pupils of Franck are striving for and cannot reach. They give ugliness and dryness where their master achieves power and loftiness.

They might notice, and take it to heart, that in this great work Franck does not jump into different rhythms every few measures, that he does not think it necessary to have 3 or 4 different rhythms going on simultaneously, in short that he remains intelligible in the midst of subtlety and that his complexity unravels into beauty.

And if any are inclined to deny the powers of Mr. Gericke we would recommend a hearing of his work in this symphony. No conductor in the world could have surpassed the results he achieved.

Louis C. Elson.

CESAR FRANK

IS IN THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

The Composer's Birth and Early Musical Education at Liege—His Brilliant Successes at the Paris Conservatory—A Glance at Some of His Principal Works and at the Man Himself

Trans.

Feb. 8, 1905.

In front of the church, where César Frank was organist for a quarter of a century, work has been going on for some time to prepare for the inauguration of his statue, which took place a short time ago. The church is Ste. Clotilde. The inauguration was followed by the interpretation of his religious works in the church. All the distinguished organists of Paris had asked to be allowed to take some part in the ceremony, either to perform on the organ or to direct the choirs. It was a most beautiful and imposing ceremony. Around the statue could be seen his pupils, his friends and his admirers, through the efforts of whom the statue was dedicated to his noble memory.

The French Society of Concerts have given his name the first place on their programmes to honor him, thus showing their admiration for the great master. Monsieur Chevillard opened his season by giving the Symphony in D minor and Mr. Colonne gave his first concert, composed entirely of César Frank's works. He repeated the symphony in D minor, Variations Symphoniques for piano and orchestra, the Poem of Psyche, and the third act of "Hulda." César Frank's compositions have been written about many times, and all musicians know them, but the commemoration seems to give one a good opportunity to consider him and the ensemble of his life and his work.

César Frank was born in Liège in 1822. One must not lose sight of his origin, for although he passed almost all his life in France, and desired to belong to France by becoming naturalized, his art is united to France by the time and the surroundings in which it was written—by the influence it had, although, in certain phases of his art, the Belgian characteristics show themselves, and, therefore, we must see in César Frank, not a musician of pure French extraction, but, as is the case with several of the masters of the Renaissance, we must see in him a Franco-Flemish musician; resemblance which is not without honor, and which connects, although centuries back, a pretty glorious musical alliance.

He studied music at first at the Conservatory of Liège; then he became a pupil at the Paris Conservatory, where he had unusual success. At the competition for piano, he received the "first prize of honor," which appellation was created on purpose for him by an enthusiastic jury. For the Fugue competition, he received the first prize, which created great excitement among musicians, on account of the extraordinary merits of the piece, which had been the means to get it. César Frank seemed to have been destined to conquer all the official rewards, and the "Prix de Rome" was the next prize to win, when his father called him back to Belgium. He returned to Paris some years after, when he revealed himself to the Parisian public by a coup d'éclat. On Jan. 4, 1846, in the hall of the Paris Conservatory, a concert was given where his oratorio by the name of "Ruth" was performed. At that time the State owned the hall, and allowed certain musicians to use it, in order to have their works heard. The success of "Ruth" was phenomenal. It is an easy matter to realize how it was appreciated by the critics of the time, when they compared it to the then recent success of the "Desert," and asked for César Frank the half of the triumphal crown offered to Félicien David. What is rather surprising is, that neither the public nor the critics of that time made a mistake about the true qualities of an art then so new to them. The recitations, firm and full, not spoiled by any form of a commonplace character, were applauded; the nobility of his music was appreciated; its character, its dignity, without pride, its naïveté without triviality, its gravity, gentle and touching; its chaste serenity, its sincere sensibility; the soothing charm of its simplicity—all was enthusiastically applauded.

The young composer was hailed as one of the great hopes of modern art. The Journal des Debats says that Meyerbeer and Spontini, who were at the concert, gave at different times marks of the greatest approbation. The Duke of Montpensier sent for César Frank after the concert and congratulated him in the warmest terms. That was a triumph such as those which usually are the forerunners of great destinies. This young man, twenty-four years old, unknown the day before, had become in one minute the equal of great masters: future and glory were his! But, alas, he did not take advantage of his opportunity! After that superb success he kept by himself, isolated himself and quite disappeared. The critics and the public had requested a second edition of "Ruth," but in vain. It took place, but after an interval of twenty-six years, in 1872. During all that time he published but little; a few pieces for harmonium, a few melodies: that is all. This young musician upon whom Fortune had smiled at the début of his career, and who could depend upon the public's support for everything he would write, became silent. Strange inaction—extremely surprising from the fact that it stands almost without parallel. Many young artists fall back into obscurity after a first success, but it is because force and true creative power are wanting, or else they become oppressed by life itself. Not so with César Frank, for in his ripe and even in his old age he gave proof enough that with him the creative faculties and strength were not wanting; and life, although always hard for him, had never crushed him! His activity and his silence remain therefore a singular fact in the history of music. One single event survives in his quiet existence: in 1858 he was appointed organist at Ste. Clotilde, where he was destined to remain till his death. Then came the War of 1870, and after it that renaissance of French music in which he took part: Georges Bizet, Edward Lalo, Saint Saëns, Massenet. Was it others' renewed activity that stirred up César Frank? Perhaps it was. He joined the musicians at the head of whom he had been long ago by a precocious success, and returned to musical life as one returns to a beloved home after a long absence.

"Ruth," resurrected, had at last its second performance, and to the masterpiece of his youth César Frank added the works of his mature years. He stopped writing no more, and produced works which must be considered, as a whole, as the most important ones of our time: "Redemption," "Les Beatitudes," "La Symphonie," "Le Quintette," "Le Quatuor la Sonate." Life was hard for César Frank. He had to teach almost all day, and could give his compositions only rare hours of leisure. The public as a whole ignored him or misunderstood him. He, whom in his youth, so far behind him now that it seemed to him like another life, had had great success, was now destined to receive almost nothing but indifference or hostility. His art, serious and noble, bored the public. Rivals, unworthy of him, were successful. He remained obscure, notwithstanding his masterpieces. His love of music, however, was so strong and so disinterested, the kindness of his heart so simple, his character so loyal and so pure, that he never became soured, not even despondent by the mediocrity of his position: even the peace of his soul was never altered by his misfortunes. He never conceived a sentiment of envy towards his most fortunate rivals. To the end he led a life of austere labor, without knowing any other joy but that of creating beautiful works in retirement; that was sufficient for him. His face, placid and thoughtful, like that of some good old Artisan's of other days, never lost its expression of naïveté and of serenity. He met worries, deceptions, and misfortunes with a sweetness of spirit almost heroic; admired by all who came in contact with him. He was most indulgent for the music of others, and always found some excuse, even for the poorest modern compositions. The indulgence he had for others he never used for himself. He would never allow himself the least license, weakness or concessions he so willingly granted to others: such was the integrity of his character and of his life.

A prey to the injustice of the public, when the only griefs against him were his severity and his high ideals, it was hard to bear, for had he chosen, knowing better than anyone else the resources of his art, he could have come down to the public's level, and written to suit its taste; but nothing on earth could induce him to write a page, a line, not even a single measure, that was not the sincere expression of his innermost feelings, a realization as pure and as perfect as possible of what he conceived to be beauty, goodness, and truth. These principles of conduct he did not translate into phrases, but put into action without giving them a thought, so natural was it to him. He was sustained in his life's struggle by two admirable qualities: a faculty for illusion, which smoothed the hardship of his fate; his faith in music, so profound, so religious, that it became almost ecstasy; it was so universal that it extended to music in general, to his own, as well as that of the masters; he made no difference between his own ideas, if he thought them beautiful, and that of his beloved masters; or rather, let us say, that his ideas appeared to him, as independent of him, and they moved him, just as if they had come from someone else. There are many instances where these peculiar characteristics are revealed so naively! Two of them are personally known to one of the writer's intimate friends.

One day at the Cirque d'Hiver a concert had been given composed entirely of his works. It had been a failure: the hall was nearly empty; hardly any applause. After the concert a few of his faithful friends were waiting for him outside wondering what they would say to him when he came out. To their surprise he came to them radiant, a happy smile on his peaceful face, shook heartily all the hands extended to him and with that penetrating accent, which was his very own, said to his astonished followers: "What excellent execution; splendid audience, and what a welcome they gave me!" Through the illusion of the music by which he was surrounded, he had seen neither the empty seats, nor had he felt the cold reception he received from the audience. He had the rare enjoyment to hear his work performed, and, candidly, he imagined his own enjoyment to be felt by everyone else there. Another day a friend met him on a train; he was then at work on his symphony. He talked with his friend about his work and when he came to speak of the Andante, he expressed himself thus: "At that point, my dear child, a marvellous idea came to me, a heavenly idea, a truly angelic idea." No one would have thought of smiling, in listening to him, expressing himself thus, for there was no vanity in his language, and he did not think of himself in talking in such a way. The idea which had come to him had delighted him with its beauty, had penetrated him with emotion, ecstasy, faith. It was that faith and ecstasy he told about in his naïve, artless way. His life was filled with mediocre duties to the last in order to live, but when he retired within himself, then the spare time he had he employed always in creating noble works. To the end he was ignored and misunderstood by the public at large, remaining always the same, however, true to his ideas of righteousness and of serenity. When he died in 1890, a few musicians realized what his death meant! The French Government whom he had honored in choosing it as his own hardly realized the great loss which had befallen French music.

Whatever neglect César Frank endured during his life has been well made up, and time has taken his revenge. César Frank, almost unknown or obscurely celebrated, is glorious now. Death has made up the wrongs of Life.

EMÉLIE ALEXANDER MARIUS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Miss Marie Nichols, the Violinist, Makes First Appearance

Post. Feb. 12, 1905
Miss Marie Nichols, violinist, was the soloist at the Symphony concert last evening, and the programme was as follows:

Overture, "Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Serenade, for violin and orchestra.....Bruch
Tone poem, "Don Juan".....Strauss
Symphony in D minor.....Frank

The overture to Mozart's familiar opera, "The Marriage of Figaro," made an enjoyable first number, being finely played.

Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," the earliest of his series of orchestral tone poems that made him famous, becomes more intelligible with further acquaintance, and one enjoys the work now, when formerly much in it appeared vague and abnormal. Perhaps his later works will also become interesting as time goes on.

The "Don Juan" was given a highly finished interpretation, and was well received.

César Franck's symphony, heard a few years ago for the first time, is another work that grows upon the listener as the many pages of surpassing strength become more familiar.

Miss Nichols appeared at these concerts for the first time and made an exceptionally good impression. She played the Bruch Serenade for the first time in the United States, a work that is not particularly striking, judged by a first hearing. The solo part is subjective, and there are but few chances for brilliant displays of virtuosity, although it demands artistic qualities of a high order from the performer which the average audience would not fully appreciate.

Miss Nichols interpreted the work with much intelligence and refinement, with superb technique and beautiful tone, that made her performance one of great pleasure. She was much applauded and recalled.

Mr. Hess conducted the performance of the concerto admirably, and his first appearance at these concerts in this capacity was a decided success in every way.

There will be no rehearsal or concert this coming week.

One of the unhappiest men in New York the other day was a musical critic who is noted for his razor-edged wit. He heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra play Wagner's stormy "Flying Dutchman" in a way that reminded him of Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage." In the hurry of writing his criticism he forgot to put this in, and now he is in sackcloth and ashes. N.Y. Post Jan 22 1905

175

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SINDING,

EPISODES CHEVALERESQUES, SUITE in F
major for ORCHESTRA, op. 35.

- I. Tempo di marcia.
- II. Andante funebre.
- III. Finale. Allegro moderato.
(First time.)

SCHUMANN,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in A minor, op. 54.

- I. Allegro effettuofo.
- II. Intermezzo: Andantino graziofo.
- III. Allegro vivace.

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.

- I. Un poco foftenuto: Allegro.
- II. Andante foftenuto.
- III. Un poco allegretto e graziofo. L'effeffo tempo.
- IV. Adagio: Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

Soloift:

Mr. ERNEST SCHELLING.

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Hamlin.

ERNEST SCHELLING, PIANIST.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SINDING,

EPISODES CHEVALERESQUES, SUITE in F
major for ORCHESTRA, op. 35.

- I. Tempo di marcia.
- II. Andante funebre.
- III. Finale. Allegro moderato.
(First time.)

SCHUMANN,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in A minor, op. 54.

- I. Allegro effetuoso.
- II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso.
- III. Allegro vivace.

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.

- I. Un poco sostenuto: Allegro.
- II. Andante sostenuto.
- III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso. L'estesso tempo.
- IV. Adagio: Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

Soloist:

Mr. ERNEST SCHELLING.

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Hamlin.

ERNEST SCHELLING, PADEREWSKI PUPIL.

Mr. ERNEST SCHELLING, pianist, was born near Philadelphia about thirty years ago. His first teacher was his father, Dr. Felix Schelling. The boy at the age of five appeared in public to show his technical proficiency and his unusual sense of pitch. He entered the Paris Conservatory when he was nine years old, and continued his studies at Basle with Hans Huber. As a lad he played in London, Paris, and in cities of Germany, Switzerland, Sweden, and Denmark. Paderewski became interested in him, and taught him for some time. During the last four years Mr. Schelling has appeared as a virtuoso in cities of Europe and South America. He is court pianist to the Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. The list of his compositions includes a symphony, "Symphonic Legends" for orchestra, a fantasia for piano and orchestra, chamber music, and piano pieces.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adv- PROGRAMME. 46271905
Sinding—Episodes. Chevaleresques. Suite for Orchestra. Op. 35. (3 movements.)
Schumann—Concerto for Piano. A minor, Op. 54.
Soloist, Mr. Ernest Schelling.
Brahms—Symphony No. 1. C minor. Op. 68.

This was a fine programme, a presentation of some of the best phases of modern composition, without any puzzle-music of any kind. Sinding's Suite, given for the first time, was lofty and earnest, and presented many modern orchestral effects without attempting either the wild metaphysics or the ascetic ugliness of some of the 20th century music. It was not "programme-music," for it did not tell a definite tale, but it was a divine stimulant to the poetry and imagination lying dormant in each auditor; and this is one of the highest functions of instrumental music.

Although the orchestration of the work was very advanced, its form was clear, and there was beautiful melody in the Suite as well.

Some of the modern composers imagine that tune must be a weakening of musical composition, since in its primary elements a melody is usually merely a presentation of tonic, dominant and subdominant harmony. But these radicals forget that there are many other scale-forms besides our own major and minor, and that these are almost virgin soil to the latter-day composer.

Instead of telling a definite story Sinding presents 3 contrasted emotions around which each auditor is at liberty to wreath his own narrative. The first movement is a lofty march, suggesting the pomp and military splendor of knighthood; the second a funeral march and a lament; the last a dashing and courageous sort of finale.

There is enough of counterpoint in the work to make it interesting to the musician, but it is also comprehensible to the laity. The finale shows a falling-off from the power of the first 2 movements. The work was greatly applauded and is evidently popular music in its best sense.

Schumann's orchestration, and that of Brahms as well, suffered a little by comparison with that of the modern Norwegian. The thoughts of the 2 German composers are imperishable, and, in their field, unrivalled, but Schumann could not, and Brahms would not, use the modern orchestra in its full kaleidoscopic power.

The pianist of the concerto was warmly welcomed and much applauded. Mr. Schelling is an American, and we have not many natives who hold their own as composers and performers in Europe. It was a delight to bathe in the melodies of this romantic concerto. But we found far more of Florestan than of Eusebius in the interpretation of Mr. Schelling. Everything was performed with clearness and surety, the ensemble was always correct, but we missed the ineffable tenderness of Schumann,—his dreaminess and subtlety.

Nevertheless there was much to praise in the performance and we must hear the young artist in other schools before summing up his abilities. That these are worthy, however, is beyond any question. He was twice recalled at the conclusion of the concerto.

Then came a Brahms feast! The C minor symphony is a severe test for any but the initiated Brahmsites. Its first movement is a veritable jungle of development of themes. The man who says that he loves this movement on a first, or second, or third hearing, is deceiving himself or others. Its depth is not to be lightly fathomed. But, once understood it wears forever, like Bach's fugues.

The work grows easier of comprehension as it advances. The second and third movements are almost popular. But the crowning glory is in the finale; here we have a more modern Beethoven. It is built upon the lines of the finale of the ninth symphony, but without the screaming vocal effects. It is an epitome of the entire symphony, reproducing material from the 3 first movements, as the ninth symphony does. It has a popular melody as its core, as the Beethoven work has. But it achieves more than the older classic. Instead of a Dionysiac frenzy of joy its measures give the utmost loftiness. Its climax is as great as any in the entire symphonic repertoire.

Mr. Gericke achieved an absolute triumph in this movement. His reading was something to grow ecstatic over. The orchestra was at its best; all played commendably, although horns, flute and pizzicato strings call for a word of especial praise. We doubt if this finale could have been better played by any orchestra existing.

We wish that the D'Indy symphony could have been heard with this, as an object lesson, an awful example, an "abschreckendes Beispiel"! It was a delight to see that the audience appreciated the height attained, for the public, instead of rushing for coats, wraps and trolley cars, remained to give most hearty applause.

Louis C. Elson.

PERSONAL.

The Herald publishes today a portrait of Mr. Ernest Schelling, a pianist, who will play for the first time in Boston this season. He will play with the Symphony orchestra here and in other cities. A pupil of Paderewski, he has already appeared in public with success in Germany, France, Russia, England, and he is now in South America. He is in the early thirties, and he has been conspicuously before the public for some three or four years. Mr. Schelling has written a symphony, chamber music and piano pieces. He is said to be a pianist who is at the same time emotional and intellectual, one free from disturbing mannerisms, a master of technical difficulties.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The American pianist, Ernest Schelling, appeared as soloist at last week's Symphony concert, playing Schumann's A-minor concerto, Sinding's suite, "Knightly Adventures," and Brahms' C-minor symphony were the other numbers. The Sinding suite was played for the first time at these concerts, and but three of the four movements were given. Throughout the work there is a peculiar blending of precise rhythms with a sort of scampering accompaniment which gives a pleasingly unique touch to the composition suggesting the movement of mounted warriors and fitting the title of "Knightly Adventurers." The idea of marching is carried through each movement, and very skillfully, too, for the melodic combinations are very charming, love motives are mingled with chivalric episodes in the closing part, and the whole work seems to illustrate vividly the traditional accomplishments of the armored knights of old. The peculiar tross arpeggios of the opening movement immediately arrests attention, the various developments are full of odd twists in Sinding's orchestration, there is a wealth of beautiful harmonies for all the lighter instruments, and to the heavier ones the composer has given many undulating measures rich in melodic material. It is a work of grand proportions and specially interesting by reason of its marked originality in treatment.

The orchestra performed the suite in splendid style, the immense amount of staccato playing being perfect in time and crispness of execution. The brasses had plenty of work, and they did it with the usual harmony of phrasing and tonality, their parts in the second movement being specially good. The woodwinds deserve mention, too, for they work in the finale. The ensemble playing by all the string contingents revealed anew a unanimity and precision that seems to be about faultless.

Mr. Schelling's interpretation of the Schumann concerto was masterly. His finger dexterity is of the highest order, he plays with an air of authority that is very convincing, he does not make any fuss about his work either in fortissimo of the more delicate passages, and he evidently has all the difficulties of the keyboard under excellent control. The cadenza in the first movement was played with a deftness and clarity which was repeated in the closing movement, showing that Mr. Schelling was physically able to cope successfully with Brahms' lighter moods, even after the strenuous demands of the intervening intermezzo. In the second part the romantic style was carefully observed, the "dialogues" between the orchestra and piano were very charming in presentation and in the third movement the chord passages in fortissimo were executed with a technical ability of the highest order. The whole interpretation was a fine example of pianistic skill and the performer's reception was of the most demonstrative nature. The accompaniment by the orchestra left nothing to be desired and Mr. Gericke's men closed the program with a magnificent performance of Brahms' great C minor symphony.

SYMPHONY PLAYS SINDING'S SUITE

New and Disappointing Music Is Sombre, Austere and in Certain Ways Forbidding—Not Much
That Is Strong in It.

SCHELLING APPEARS FOR THE FIRST TIME

Plays in Frank, Straightforward Manner Rather Than with Finesse—Von Vecsey Gives Third and Last Recital Here.

Herald Feb. 26, 1905

The programme of the 16th Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

"Episodes Chevaleresques," suite, op. 35, Sinding
Concerto in A minor for piano, Schumann
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Brahms

The suite by Christian Sinding, the Norwegian, was played here for the first time, and the third of the four movements was omitted. The composer is known here chiefly by his symphony in D minor, played here six years ago, a piano quartet, a piano trio and a few piano pieces. The symphony, as we remember it, is an austere, granitic work, in certain ways forbidding, and much of the music, to those who would fain be lulled by mellifluous strains, is as downright ugliness. The sombreness is that which we have learned to associate, perhaps without good cause, with Norwegian scenery and music.

The scherzo is grim, and grimness is the pervading characteristic, for Sinding in this symphony is not a man of contrasts. He is an earnest Norwegian, well versed in the traditions and formulas, a man who speaks with his own voice; he is not content with his little parish; he screams his thoughts so that the world may hear, while Grieg, however charming his expression may be, is essentially a man satisfied with a narrow horizon and a quiet life, unlike Sinding, who is a radical by nature, with decided views on art, politics, economic questions, and a leaning toward Socialism. Such a one is the Sinding of the symphony.

The suite appeared first, we believe, as a piano composition for four hands, in 1898. Whether it was composed originally for piano or orchestra we do not know. There is no programme, there are no mottoes. The title, "Knightly Episodes," or "Knightly Adventures," is enough. The first movement, which is in the nature of a march, is striking at the opening, both in thematic structure and in orchestral dress, but there is little said after this opening. The trumpet solo is melodically conventional, and the invention throughout the movement, and in fact throughout the work, is not conspicuous. The funeral march of the second movement is a lamentation of the type that is immediately popular and soon forgotten. The old device of thematic repetition with strongly marked rhythm and a constant crescendo to a crashing climax works its customary effect. But neither here nor in the finale is there much that is truly strong or individual. The suite is far inferior to the symphony, though it will at one hearing win the applause which would be denied the more powerful and characteristic work.

Mr. Ernest Schelling played for the first time in Boston. He was born near Philadelphia—some say in Pennsylvania, others in New Jersey, and Mr. Schelling, we hear, is inclined in his belief toward the latter state. As a child he played in public, and then he studied in European cities and has for some years appeared with success as a virtuoso in Europe and in South America. He chose Busoni's arrangement of Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody," and the composition was announced for performance, but Mr. Schelling changed his mind and played Schumann's concerto. This latter work is music of an intimately romantic nature and is more effective in a small hall. There are some who go so far as to say that the concerto is for ladies only, a sneer to which we cannot say Amen; but it is not a concerto that favors a virtuoso in a great hall. Like Chopin's concerto in E minor, it should be brought close to the audience.

Mr. Schelling played in a frank, straightforward manner, rather than with finesse, and his performance was in black and white, not in colors. His interpretation was not to us romantic, nor was it any way engrossing. His technique was adequate; it was, indeed, fluent, and it was displayed with modesty and ease. He will give a recital this week, and there will then be a better opportunity to examine the precise nature of his artistry. Last evening he was apparently at his best in the first movement. He was heartily applauded by the audience.

The first symphony of Brahms, a work which has been both over-praised and unduly disparaged, with its tragically intense first movement and its triumphant close, was welcome to many. The orchestral performance throughout the evening was of a high order of excellence.

The programme of the 17th concert will be different from that announced on the music page of today's Herald. As changed, it will be as follows: A Faust overture, Wagner; Bach's transcription of a prelude, adagio and gavotte by Bach; Schubert's symphony in C major. Mr. Campanari, baritone, will sing an aria from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutti" and an air by Gluck.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra.

At the sixteenth symphony concert the soloist was Mr. Ernest Schelling, a young American pianist who made his first appearance in Boston. This was the programme: Trans. Feb. 27, 1905

Sinding: Episodes Chevaleresques, Suite in F major for Orchestra, Op. 35. (First time.)
Schumann: Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor, Op. 54.

Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.

The production of a novelty, in this case Sinding's suite called "Episodes Chevaleresques," was once more attended by ill-luck. No one seemed to care for the composition at all. From Sinding one expects a work of interest. The man has already proved himself a musician of a certain consequence, with a gift of melody, a grotesque sort of grim humor, fine skill in orchestration, and a distinct originality. Perhaps these "episodes" produced Saturday evening would prove more interesting than they did if they were furnished with a programme. As it was, they left the impression of three rather irrelevant movements in a not strikingly knightly vein. The first, a march, sets out stirringly with a theme that at once seizes the attention. But the interest does not hold. Pleasant music follows, there being an abundance of melody, all dressed out in charming orchestral array, only no bit of melody bears any very apparent relation to the next bit. Some of it, furthermore, in particular the solo for trumpet, is more commonplace than could be looked for from Sinding.

The second movement of the suite is funeral music, agreeable, to hear, but in no way noteworthy, and the third, a brilliant piece, again causes wonder as to the reason of the title "knightly." The composer, in short, would have done better to call his work simply a suite, or else to have written out a few words of guiding programme. As the composition now stands, it keeps one wondering just where in its somewhat vague measures deserve their title. Except for the last movement, the episodes apparently gave little pleasure.

It cannot be regarded as a wise policy for a pianist to come before a strange public with the Schumann concerto. Schumann, although he made use of the old term concerto, was far from disposed to write a piece through which a pianist might dash for the glorification of his prodigious technique, accompanied the while by full orchestra. On the contrary, Schumann antedated Mr. Converse by some sixty years in writing a poem for orchestra and pianoforte, or Vincent d'Indy in his symphony for pianoforte and orchestra. Brilliant piano players, of course, misunderstanding Schumann, have performed the concerto as distinctly in the solo vein, as though it were the Liszt E flat, but they have thereby ruined the effect of the work. And some artists have fittingly effaced themselves, notably Miss aus der Ohe—with a dishearteningly dull result. At this last performance of the concerto, Mr. Schelling had better luck than Miss aus der Ohe. Artist enough to recognize the pianist's place in Schumann's scheme, Mr. Schelling made no effort to put himself forward, nor was he yet so unduly modest as to make the pianoforte part seem insignificant. In fact, he made manifest a sense of proportion that showed a true artist. For the rest, it will be wiser to postpone comments on Mr. Schelling's pianoforte playing till he has appeared in recital. That he has an excellent technique and that he is thoroughly musical is clear. Qualities of romance and imagination he showed less distinctly. The orchestral accompanying of the concerto was exquisitely beautiful.

All the evening, indeed, the orchestra played superbly. One could have wished, however, to hear the great Brahms symphony earlier in the evening. There are people who do not admire Brahms. To bring home to them their strange lack of appreciation, they should be given opportunities to hear the great master's works under the most favorable conditions. Now even the most devoted worshippers of Brahms will admit that the first symphony is of heavier calibre than a Moszkowski suite—they would probably have expressed it as "profounder," but it comes to much the same thing. For the benefit, then, of those who love Brahms, and for the education of such persons as love him not, let a Brahms symphony, in especial the first, be presented early in the evening, before the ears and mind are exhausted with music.

At this week's concert Mr. Campanari is expected to sing. The programme of orchestral works will be as follows: Wagner, A Faust overture; Bach-Bachrich, prelude, adagio and gavotte; Schubert, symphony in C major.

R. R. G.

ERNEST SCHELLING SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Artist Who Has Spent Much Time Abroad Heard Here Saturday.

Journal Feb 27 1905
The 16th concert of the season by the Symphony Orchestra was given Saturday evening. The orchestral novelty of the program, the Sinding suite, "Episodes Chevaleresques," is not very likely to become much less of a novelty, for its claims to frequent place in orchestral lists are, to say the least, not compelling. The composition is brilliant rather than strong, and musical individuality is not especially conspicuous. The finale is the most impressive of the three movements that were played.

The soloist, Mr. Schelling, is a newcomer to the concert field of this city, for although he is an American, he has spent most of his time abroad since the days when he was a youthful phenomenon. His choice of the Schumann concerto in A minor for his debut was, in a sense, unfortunate.

its indisputable beauties demand closer relations between interpreter and audience that are possible in a great auditorium. Save for occasional passages, the piano is almost subordinated to the orchestra. Mr. Schelling demonstrated taste and technique, and further manifestation of the extent of his powers will be received with interest. The orchestra played the Brahms symphony with brilliancy and power, the last movement being especially strong in appeal by reason of the breadth of its interpretation and execution.

The program for this week's rehearsal and concert has been modified and now stands as follows: A Faust overture, Wagner; Bachrich's transcription of a prelude, adagio and gavotte by Bach; Schubert's symphony in C major. Mr. Campanari, barytone, will sing an aria from Mozart's "Così fan tutti" and an air by Gluck.

CHIVALRY OF HIGH IDEALS HEARD IN SYMPHONY.

Boston American
By Kent Perkins.

A program of remarkable distinction and elevation was splendidly played by the Symphony Orchestra last night at the sixteenth concert of the season at Symphony Hall. Both the music and the work of Mr. Gericke and the orchestra were received with warm manifestations of appreciation by the audience. The program was as follows:

Episodes Chevaleresques, Suite in F Major for Orchestra, op. 35.....Sinding
(1) Tempo di Marcia.
(2) Andante Funebre.
(3) Finale. Allegro Moderato.
(First time.)

Concerto for Pianoforte in A Minor, op. 54.....Schumann
(1) Allegro Effettuoso.
(2) Intermezzo, Andantino Grazioso.
(3) Allegro Vivace.
Symphony No. 1, in C Minor, op. 68.....Brahms
(1) Un Poco Sostenuto: Allegro.
(2) Andante Sostenuto.
(3) Un Poco Allegretto e Grazioso. L'estesso Tempo.
(4) Adagio: Allegro non Troppo, ma con
brio.

The main interest of the evening centered naturally in the first performance in Boston of the "Knightly Episodes" suite, composed by Christian Sinding, who was born at Kongsberg, Norway, in 1856, and is still flourishing at Christiania. The work is full of romantic and inspiring beauties and will bear many repetitions. Mr. Gericke and his players were in full sympathy with the spirit of high chivalry that permeates the composition, and they gave it an interpretation of appreciative feeling and power.

Chivalry, imbued with its most exalted ideals, marches upon the scene in the first movement. The Knights are on horseback; you hear the prancing steeds; you see the waving plumes on helmets with visors closed. They file through forests, dim and spectral, and across shining plains. There is grim business afoot, and the troop is off on adventures of high emprise. In the second movement there is a funeral march for dead heroes of the band, while in the finale there is a more glowing, joyous strain; the glittering tourney, with banners aloft on a field of cloth of gold; passionate love episodes, and a final burst of splendid triumph.

Ernest Schelling, who was born near Philadelphia about thirty years ago, and is now court pianist to the Duke of Mecklinburg-Schwerin, was the soloist. He played the glorious Schumann concerto with glowing spirit, deeply appreciative sympathy and rare brilliance of execution. His manner gives satisfying evidence of repose, refinement and abundant reserve force, together with pleasing lack of posing that enables one to listen for and find all the beauties of his music without being disturbed by the sight of gymnastic struggles or gyrations. May he have many imitators in this respect!

The Brahms Symphony, rightly called "heroic" by admiring critics, was played with noble spirit and the finest shading and was greeted with hearty applause.

At the seventeenth concert next Saturday evening the soloist will be Signor Campanari.

enthusiasm which engulfed the local musical public last year. It is to be hoped that before the present season's activities are over Mr. Gericke's example will be followed by other conductors. Last night the men from Boston gave a vivid and sonorous reading of Strauss's tonal version of Lennau's hero—an interpretation unusual for its breadth, virility and warmth of coloring.

Coming immediately after it, the new overture by Goldmark, "In the South" (played under Theodore Thomas in Chicago shortly before his death), sounded perfunctory and uninspired, though it is scored richly and contrived ingeniously, and has an undoubted, though somewhat hackneyed, effectiveness. Mr. Gericke read it with care and spirit. N. Y. Press Feb 17 1905

KE, Conductor.

NCERT.

FRANCK'S SPIRIT AT CONCERT

Press Feb 2-17
His D Minor Symphony Dominates the BER 26, AT 8, P. M.
Boston Orchestra's Concert.

Brooding over the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall was the spirit of Cesar Franck. Mr. Gericke had selected for his programme, besides the D minor symphony of Franck, Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan," a new overture by Goldmark, "In Italy," and Bruch's serenade for violin, played by Miss Marie Nichols. Despite the brilliant effectiveness of Strauss's glowing tone picture and the colorful picturesqueness of Goldmark's fantasy, the noble beauty and dignity of the Franck work dominated the mind. This symphony, composed sixteen years ago, and, if we are not mistaken, hitherto unperformed in New York, is a most lovable and delightful work. It has all of Franck's large simplicity, sincerity and essential fineness of substance. One feels in it, at times, an almost Beethoven-like nobility and seriousness of content, particularly in the second movement, despite the fact one comes upon surprising Wagnerian coincidences, as in the harmonization of the chromatic theme of the first movement and the "Mimi"-like suggestion in the second. The symphony was played admirably.

It is a pity Miss Nichols' choice lighted upon so uncommonly conventional and tedious a composition as the Bruch serenade. It is Bruch at his worst—stereotyped in idea, barren of thought or imagination. Miss Nichols lavished skill and feeling upon it. She played with commendable discretion and intelligence and with more than occasional beauty of tone. Her intonation was too frequently at fault, however, and her style lacked something of freedom and elasticity.

The performance of Strauss's tone poem was chiefly noteworthy in that it was the first orchestral work of the Munich revolutionary to be played in New York this season—a fact which indicates, doubtless, a reaction from the unbridled wave of Strauss mmme.

No. 1, in E flat major.
(time.)

for PIANOFORTE, in F. minor.

IC POEM, "Hunnenschlacht."

to "Sappho."

dist:

OMFIELD-ZEISLER.

SIG. CAMPANARI.

183

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 4, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

WAGNER,

A FAUST OVERTURE,

GLUCK,

RECITATIVE, "The Gods have foreshown me the future," and ARIA, "Foreboding Fear of Ill," from "Iphigenia in Tauris."
(First time at these concerts.)

BACH,

PRELUDE, ADAGIO and GAVOTTE, in Rondo form.
(Arranged for Strings by SIGISMUND BACHRICH.)

MOZART,

ARIA, "Turn your glances on him." from "Cosi fan tutte."
(First time at these concerts.)

SCHUBERT,

SYMPHONY in C major, No. 9.
I. Andante: Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Andante con molto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.

Soloist:

Mr. GIUSEPPE CAMPANARI.

SIG. CAM PANARI.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 4, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

WAGNER,

A FAUST OVERTURE,

GLUCK,

RECITATIVE, "The Gods have foreshown me the future," and ARIA, "Foreboding Fear of Ill," from "Iphigenia in Tauris."
(First time at these concerts.)

BACH,

PRELUDE, ADAGIO and GAVOTTE, in Rondo form.
(Arranged for Strings by SIGISMUND BACHRICH.)

MOZART,

ARIA, "Turn your glances on him." from "Cosi fan tutte."
(First time at these concerts.)

SCHUBERT,

SYMPHONY in C major, No. 9.
I. Andante: Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Andante con molto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.

Soloist:

MR. GIUSEPPE CAMPANARI.

184
Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

This was the programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, at which Mr. Giuseppe Campanari was the soloist:

Wagner: A Faust Overture.

Glück: Recitative, "The gods have foretold me the future," and Aria, "Foreboding Fear of Ill," from "Iphigenia in Tauris." (First time at these concerts.)

Bach: Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte, in Rondo form. (Arranged for strings by Sigismund Bachrich.)

Mozart: Aria, "Turn your glances on him," from "Così fan tutte." (First time at these concerts.)

Schubert: Symphony in C major, No. 9.

The feature of this admirable concert was the absolutely perfect performance of the great Schubert symphony, that work which, often times, seems great chiefly on account of its proportions; although Schumann spoke fervently of its "heavenly length," it is not always easy to accept his opinion as final. After last Saturday's performance, however, the beauty of which cannot be forgotten, one can only believe that if the work prove tiresome it is because it is not well read and executed, or because it is not properly placed on a programme. Even at this last concert one might have wished the symphony to come first, but, at all events, it had not been preceded by a long programme of heavy character.

The ever-recurring delight aroused by sympathetic performances of Schubert's most notable works would seem to prove once and for all that melody is the chief stay of music. A musical composition may be dramatic to the core, in its very essence quivering with emotion, as witness the most characteristic works of Tchaikovsky. Their very qualities of emotionalism make them grow old. And so with harmony. Many is the piece now written that enchants the connoisseur by the piquancy and originality of its harmonic progressions, without much else in its favor. Since harmony constantly changes its fashions, the unusual of today becoming the usual of tomorrow, what is to be the fate of a composition, that depends for its worth on original harmony alone? Brilliant orchestral color, too, will soon cease to be of avail, unless it be supported by other qualities, for nowadays every music student, apparently, can produce a score that glows with color, just as every conservatory pupil, at present, can develop a pianoforte technique that would have made Mozart stare.

And Schubert, who is not known to have had novel views on the subject of harmony and who was reproached with ignorance of counterpoint, was able to set music on paper that today delights the world. The man possessed the gift of melody to a degree almost unequalled before or since his time, and he likewise was blessed with a feeling for form second only to that of Mozart. A subtle sense of rhythm, too, was one of his most valuable assets. With such an equipment, why should he not write music to live, as indeed he has?

But music like Schubert's needs a perfect production, if it is to convey its entire message. In the C major symphony, on Saturday, Mr. Gericke did a piece of conducting of which he must surely feel proud, and by which Boston must feel itself honored. With such perfection of detail that each little solo or duet was an exquisite delight, with a fineness of rhythm no less than entrancing, and with an understanding of the color scheme of the score that made Schubert seem as much a master of color effects as Debussy of the twentieth century, Mr. Gericke at the same time read the work with a breadth that possessed infinite grandeur. It was a wonderfully poetic, noble interpretation of a noble poem, and as such it will be long remembered.

185

The remainder of the concert demands few words. The familiar pieces by Bach, in their orchestral garb, gave much pleasure, especially the gavotte, which so tickled the audience that they were quite determined to have it over again. Mr. Gericke, on the other hand, equally determined not to break the admirable rule of Symphony concerts in regard to encores, motioned to the orchestra to rise in acknowledgement, a proceeding which had to be repeated. In these days of lukewarm enthusiasm such applause at a pianoforte recital would have meant at least three encores. The excitement was easy to understand, however, for the Bach pieces were indeed brilliantly played.

Mr. Campanari, to turn to the soloist, was not happy in his selections. The noble measures from Glück's "Iphigenia" mean little when wrested from their surroundings, and, furthermore, Mr. Campanari sang them as though he had learnt them especially for the concert. The gay comedy of Mozart, too, away from the stage, made comparatively little effect, although much applause was given Mr. Campanari's musicianly, artistic singing. As an interpreter of Mozart Mr. Campanari has few superiors.

The soloist at the coming concert will be Mr. Kreisler. The programme is as follows: "Manfred" Symphony, after Byron's poem, Op. 58, Tchaikovsky; concerto for violin, Brahms; overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven.

R. R. G.

FINE PLAYING BY SYMPHONY

Three Well Known Works Given—

Wagner's "Faust" Overture Is Interpreted with Impressive Dramatic Force.

CAMPANARI SINGS UNFAMILIAR AIRS

Mr. Kreisler Gives His Last Violin
Recital—Hearers Marvel at Wonderful Technique of the Musician—Music Notes.

Herald ———— March 5, 1905

The programme of the 17th Symphony concert given last evening in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

A "Faust" overture.....Wagner
Recitative and Air of Thoas from "Iphigenia in Aulis".....Gluck
Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte.....Bach-Bachrich
Aria from "Cosi fan tutte".....Mozart
Symphony in C major.....Schubert

The orchestral numbers were finely played. The overture by Wagner was interpreted with impressive dramatic force, with true intensity. How the original score, composed in 1839-40, compares with the present version (1854-55) we have at present no means of knowing. Wagner himself said that he had rewritten the instrumentation throughout, made many changes, given more importance to the middle section. It is the one purely orchestral work by him that leads the hearer to think that Wagner might have been a great composer without any reference to the opera house, a great composer in symphonic form.

As remodelled, there are suggestions of the influence of Liszt, and, strange to say, there are passages that might have been written, as far as the mood is concerned, by Schumann, who, however, could not have woven the orchestral dress. It would be interesting to hear the two versions in the same concert, just as it would be interesting to hear the "Polonia," "Columbus" and "Rule Britannia" overtures of Wagner, dated respectively 1835, 1836 and 1836-37, which preceded immediately the "Faust."

The Herald spoke a month or so ago of a performance of the three in a concert at London early in the year. It is a singular fact that whereas Wagner in his younger days was a good deal of a sensualist—he played the part with indisputable success for many years thereafter—and was deliberately and aggressively sensual in his opera founded on "Measure for Measure," there is in the "Faust" overture hardly a trace of the peculiar and glowing sensuousness that plays a dominating part in his important stage works. Whatever passion there is in the passing musical thought of womanhood, as typified by Gretchen, is cerebral. The struggles here depicted are mental, and the hero is the baffled and despairing philosopher.

The transcription of Bach's violin music was performed with such verve that the applause was unusually hearty and long continued. It was the applause that rewards a favorite virtuoso, and, as The Herald has often hinted, this orchestra is always the true virtuoso assisted now and then by some singer, pianist, violinist. Mr. Gericke called upon the players to acknowledge the applause and twice were they compelled to rise and bow. The same tribute might justly have been paid the wind players after the second movement of the symphony. Such beauty of tone, such phrasing and such accuracy of ensemble are seldom heard in any European orchestra. Perhaps we are all too much accustomed to the uncommon skill and musicianship of the various choirs in this band of players.

The symphony was read and played with marked taste and gusto, and the music, as always when heard under such conditions, made its way straight to the heart of the hearer. When this work, with its sustained gush of melody, its infinite wealth of beauty, seems too long, then it is the fault of the conductor or of the players. As it was performed last evening, no one would have had the symphony shorter. The audience in such a performance shares the intoxication of the composer, the divine drunkenness that comes from drinking deep of beauty, the drunkenness of Nature rejoicing in a perfect day.

Mr. Campanari sang two arias of widely contrasted character which depend, however, for effect on the dramatic situation, on what has preceded and on what is anticipated. In the theatre the noble strains of Gluck, strains charged with bodement, follow immediately the lament of Iphigenia, the priestess, and of the attendants exiled with her. The goddess saved her, yet the fates are not yet satisfied. The strangers will arrive, and Thoas the king will fall a victim to one of them. The solemn stage scene and the awful atmosphere prepare the hearer for Thoas' confession of dread.

But put the King of Tauris in concert dress and let him suddenly begin his recitative, and what is Thoas to the audience, or it to Thoas? So, too, the unfamiliar aria of Mozart demands imperatively the comic situation, the sight of the lovers now disguised tempting the fidelity of their sweethearts. The aria needs not only the scene, the presence of the women, but the action of the comedian, the gestures, the pose, the dramatic exaggeration. Put Leporello with his famous song on the concert stage without the mocked Donna Elvira and the long roll that contains the names of Don Juan's abandoned loves and the effect is gone. So with this aria. When sung in concert it is merely a song, a song cast in the Mozartian mould; the music is no longer hypocritically sentimental, ironically descriptive, malicious in spirit.

This is too often the fate of the operatic artist when he appears in concert. It is a pleasure to hear Mr. Campanari's voice, to note his free delivery, his vocal animation. We remembered the dramatic force and finesse of his Ford in "Falstaff," the part in which he attained a truly dramatic height, and while he sang this air from "Cosi fan tutte" we could not help thinking how admirably he might say the words and interpret the spirit of this fine instance of Mozart's dramatic power in a stage representation of a delightful work.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. March 6, 1905

Wagner—A Faust Overture.

Gluck—Recitative, "The Gods have foreshown me the future," and Aria, "Foreboding Fear of Ill," from Iphigenia in Tauris.—(First time at these concerts.)

Mr. G. Campanari.

Bach—Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte, in Rondo form.—(Arranged for Strings by Sigismund Bachrich.)

Mozart—Aria, "Turn your glances on him," from "Cosi fan tutte."—(First time at these concerts.)

Mr. G. Campanari.

Schubert—Symphony in C major, No. 9.

The "Faust Overture" by Wagner wears well. It grows better with repeated hearings, and much that was unclear becomes beautiful or dramatic with familiarity. The Faust that is here pictured is a profoundly dissatisfied gentleman, somewhat like the pessimistic Don Juan that Richard Strauss has introduced to the concert-room. The overture was very finely interpreted.

"Coming events cast their shadows before." The concerts given by the symphony orchestra last night and Saturday intimated the fact that an opera troupe was somewhere in the vicinity, or at least that an operatic season was in the air. At the present concert the operatic star, Giuseppe Campanari, was the artist. His selections were not well chosen. In his first number he evidently desired to leave the modern emotional school which has been his "metier" in these concerts for some years.

Instead of the Prologue from "Pagliacci" we had one of the tremendously majestic Gluck numbers, in which our favorite baritone seemed like a cat in a strange garret. There was effort apparent and even an occasional aberration from true intonation. Mr. Campanari was better in the Mozart aria, but even this did not display him at his very best, although he was twice recalled at its close. Mr. Hess, who is henceforth to conduct all the solo numbers, led the orchestra with excellent effect, in both the Mozart and Gluck selections.

It is astonishing how much people are digging out of Bach in these latter-days! Gounod set the fashion by exhuming an "Ave Maria" out of the first prelude; lesser composers have brought to light romances and reveries that were buried in the other preludes of the "Well-tempered Clavichord" (whose temper must be sorely tried by some of them); Liszt has discovered great fortissimo displays of double octaves and heavy chords, in some of the other fugues and preludes; the famous Chaconne has been served with various kinds of sauce piquante; and at this concert we had some of the violin solos made into a fine display piece for the string orchestra.

The discoverers are quite right! There are more things in Bach's music than are dreamt of in our philosophy. It would be easy to make an Irish folk-song out of the Fugue in F major ("Well-tempered Clavichord," Book 2, No. 11,) and Jensen's romantic "Murmuring Breeze" is but a rhythmic change from Bach's "My heart ever faithful."

The 3 numbers of the little Suite were splendidly played, the first violins doing what was practically solo work.

In the finale Bach discarded the Musette (bagpipe) Trio which he often employed in Gavottes and used, instead, the old Rondo form, in which one chief theme is served over and over again, with layers of counter themes between. Padre Martini's famous Gavotte (originally called "Les Moutons") has this antiquated form. It requires an especially attractive chief theme to make it bearable, and this it possessed in the Gavotte.

It may seem incredible, but Bach in this arrangement made the hit of the concert and aroused such a furore that Mr. Gericke, after bowing and bowing again, caused his orchestra to rise and bow, which they were forced to do twice, and even after this it seemed as if the public had determined to force an encore.

Then came another feast for those old fogies who believe that music should not be all ugliness and noise, in the shape of Schubert's C major symphony. One might wonder at such a work being performed nowadays! In the first place it has melodies, real tunes, which, of course, have no business in a musical work. Then also it has beauty! Instead of stunning his audience with dissonances Schubert actually proceeds to charm them. One would actually imagine that the composer believed it to be right to please his auditors.

Another fearful defect was that the work was symmetrical and shapely; it had a tangible form that was as definite as the architecture of the Parthenon. Of course it is ludicrous to suppose that emotion can be expressed without casting all form to the winds. Poor Beethoven tried to do this by preserving symmetry in his Sonata Pathetique and Sonata Appassionata, but every modern knows how much better emotional power is expressed by D'Indy or Loeffler or even some of our resident cacophonists.

The chief defect of the work was that it did not deliver any puzzles for the auditor to riddle out. When every one had braced himself for a severe task, for a strenuous mental labor, this puerile work caused the brows to unbend, the scowls to disappear, and it actually rested and refreshed the public! We need not repeat, we trust, that this is not the purpose of music; the highest function of the modern art is to perplex, to puzzle, to make the auditor work, and, if possible, to make him miserable. This symphony does none of these things, therefore one may hope that it will be laid upon the shelf from which Schumann and Mendelssohn never should have rescued it.

Dvorak once wrote that he considered

Schubert's genius to be best displayed in his orchestral and instrumental works. One almost agreed with this radical statement after hearing the excellence of the interpretation of this symphony. The horn played nobly in the opening introduction, and the trombones made much of their phrases in the coda—the first really characteristic trombone passage that was ever written in a symphony. The wood-wind were exquisite in the second movement and in the subordinate theme of the first. The orchestra gave those mighty figures of 4 strokes each (perhaps Schubert borrowed this idea from Beethoven's violin concerto) with magnificent power. The concert therefore came to an end in a blaze of glory. Louis C. Elson.

Gluck AT THE SYMPHONY. Mar. 5 1905

Giuseppe Campanari, the popular baritone, appeared as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, singing a recitative and aria from Gluck's opera, "Iphigenia in Tauris," and an aria from Mozart's unfamiliar opera, "Cosi fan Tutte." Wagner's "Faust" overture, Bachrich's arrangement of three movements from the E major and A minor violin concertos by Bach and Schubert's C major symphony completed the program. The Bachrich arrangement for string orchestra was a novelty which proved to be the feature of the concert and its performance doubtless would have pleased Kreisler greatly, for he played the E major violin concerto at a concert here recently and the work of the orchestra was an example of ensemble playing such as is not often heard except in organizations of this standard. The three parts, prelude, adagio and gavotte, are in rondo form, and to have each contingent perform its part with a unanimity of tone production seemingly like one instrument was a notable achievement, even for Mr. Gericke's men. The precision of execution, the attack and delicate shadings throughout the suite were all very skilfully managed and the spontaneous enthusiasm of the audience which each movement evoked was indisputable evidence of deep appreciation of an exceptionally artistic performance.

Our tried and true Campanari was in his usual excellent form, and the favorite baritone sang with his accustomed success. The Gluck excerpt calls for no special comment. The Mozart aria was delivered in the delicious buffo style of his Figaro, and it is almost needless to say that his second contribution found much greater favor with his auditors than did the more somber air by Gluck.

Wagner's "Faust" overture received a masterly interpretation, the tragic import of the story so vividly transcribed in musical form being given due effectiveness by the orchestra. The heavier contingents were admirably proportioned in their relative ensemble work, the basses not being too loud or harsh for the strings in fortissimo passages. The whole performance was in the proper spirit, dignified and impressive.

The four movements of Schubert's noble symphony were played in the usual style—a grand and sympathetic exposition of one of the greatest works of a musical genius.

Fritz Kreisler will be this week's soloist, playing Brahms' violin concerto, Tchaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, will complete the program.

The Herald Mar. 5 1905
The programme of the 17th Symphony concert given last evening in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

A "Faust" overture.....Wagner
Recitative and Air of Thoas from "Iphigenia in Aulis".....Gluck
Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte.....Bach-Bachrich
Aria from "Cosi fan tutte".....Mozart
Symphony in C major.....Schubert

The orchestral numbers were finely played. The overture by Wagner was interpreted with impressive dramatic force, with true intensity. How the original score, composed in 1839-40, compares with the present version (1854-55) we have at present no means of knowing. Wagner himself said that he had rewritten the instrumentation throughout, made many changes, given more importance to the middle section. It is the one purely orchestral work by him that leads the hearer to think that Wagner might have been a great composer without any reference to the opera house, a great composer in symphonic form.

As remodelled, there are suggestions of the influence of Liszt, and, strange to say, there are passages that might have been written, as far as the mood is concerned, by Schumann, who, however, could not have woven the orchestral dress. It would be interesting to hear the two versions in the same concert, just as it would be interesting to hear the "Polonia," "Columbus" and "Rule Britannia" overtures of Wagner, dated respectively 1835, 1836 and 1836-37, which preceded immediately the "Faust."

The Herald spoke a month or so ago of a performance of the three in a concert at London early in the year. It is a singular fact that whereas Wagner in his younger days was a good deal of a sensualist—he played the part with indisputable success for many years thereafter—and was deliberately and aggressively sensual in his opera founded on "Measure for Measure," there is in the "Faust" overture hardly a trace of the peculiar and glowing sensuousness that plays a dominating part in his important stage works. Whatever passion there is in the passing musical thought of womanhood, as typified by Gretchen, is cerebral. The struggles here depicted are mental, and the hero is the baffled and despairing philosopher.

The transcription of Bach's violin music was performed with such verve that the applause was unusually hearty and long continued. It was the applause that rewards a favorite virtuoso, and, as The Herald has often hinted, this orchestra is always the true virtuoso assisted now and then by some singer, pianist, violinist. Mr. Gericke called upon the players to acknowledge the applause and twice were they compelled to rise and bow. The same tribute might justly have been paid the wind players after the second movement of the symphony. Such beauty of tone, such phrasing and such accuracy of ensemble are seldom heard in any European orchestra. Perhaps we are all too much accustomed to the uncommon skill and musicianship of the various choirs in this band of players.

The symphony was read and played with marked taste and gusto, and the music, as always when heard under such conditions, made its way straight to the heart of the hearer. When this work, with its sustained gush of melody, its infinite wealth of beauty, seems too long, then it is the fault of the conductor or of the players. As it was performed last evening, no one would have had the symphony shorter. The audience in such a performance shares the intoxication of the composer, the divine drunkenness that comes from drinking deep of beauty, the drunkenness of Nature rejoicing in a perfect day.

Mr. Campanari sang two arias of widely contrasted character which depend, however, for effect on the dramatic situation, on what has preceded and on what is anticipated. In the theatre the noble strains of Gluck, strains charged with bodement, follow immediately the lament of Iphigenia, the priestess, and of the attendants exiled with her. The goddess saved her, yet the fates are not yet satisfied. The strangers will arrive, and Thoas the king will fall a victim to one of them. The solemn stage scene and the awful atmosphere prepare the hearer for Thoas' confession of dread.

But put the King of Taurica in concert dress and let him suddenly begin his recitative, and what is Thoas to the audience, or it to Thoas? So, too, the unfamiliar aria of Mozart demands imperatively the comic situation, the sight of the lovers now disguised tempting the fidelity of their sweethearts. The aria needs not only the scene, the presence of the women, but the action of the comedian, the gestures, the pose, the dramatic exaggeration. Put Leporello with his famous song on the concert stage without the mocked Donna Elvira and the long roll that contains the names of Don Juan's abandoned loves and the effect is gone. So with this aria. When sung in concert it is merely a song, a song cast in the Mozartian mould; the music is no longer hypocritically sentimental, ironically descriptive, malicious in spirit.

This is too often the fate of the operatic artist when he appears in concert. It is a pleasure to hear Mr. Campanari's voice, to note his free delivery, his vocal animation. We remembered the dramatic force and finesse of his Ford in "Falstaff," the part in which he attained a truly dramatic height, and while he sang this air from "Cosi fan tutte" we could not help thinking how admirably he might say the words and interpret the spirit of this fine instance of Mozart's dramatic power in a stage representation of a delightful work.

WELL BALANCED SYMPHONY CONCERT

Although Minus Novelty, It Charmed Heart as Well as Ear.

Journal Mar. 6 1905

The seventeenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was a fine example of a well-balanced, interesting musical recital. Though without novelties and lacking any highly-colored or dissonant "tour de force" of the ultra-moderns, it said its message with beautiful clarity, and charmed the heart as well as the ear.

Wagner was there, yet not the Wagner of the intense and tremendous music-dramas. His early "Faust" overture is almost classic in form as compared with his later expression, and it shows the genius of the man in purely orchestral writing.

The Bach transcriptions aroused the audience to a very unusual and probably quite unexpected pitch of enthusiasm. At the end of the familiar gavotte in E major a tremendous salvo of applause burst forth, so long and hearty that the players twice rose in a body to acknowledge it.

Mr. Campanari is always a welcome figure on our platforms, and it is pleasant to find that his noble voice is yet as fresh and melodious as ever.

The ever-lovely Schubert symphony in C major was the benediction, and a very impressive one it was. Rarely has it been played, even by our own orchestra, with such superb poetry and abso-

CAMPANARI THE SOLOIST

Orchestra Concert Includes Two Symphony Numbers by the Celebrated Baritone

Post Mar. 5 1905

The 17th concert of the season was given by the Symphony Orchestra last evening, with Mr. Giuseppe Campanari as the soloist. The programme was as follows:

A "Faust" overture.....Wagner
Recitative and Aria.....Gluck
Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte.....Bach
Symphony No. 7.....Schubert

The overture, so different from Wagner's usual style, so lacking in something usually associated with the works of Wagner, was very well given, but not received with much enthusiasm.

As the soloist, Mr. Campanari was accorded the hearty reception to which he has been accustomed in Boston since the days when he first left the ranks of the Symphony players to sing in opera. He was in excellent voice last evening—his round, full, melodious tones filling the hall apparently without the slightest effort on his part. He gave two numbers, the first a recitative, "The Gods Have Foreseen Me the Future," and aria, "Foreboding Fears of Ill," from "Iphigenia in Tauris," both by Gluck, and the second Mozart's "Turn Your Glance on Him," from "Cosi fan Tutte." Mr. Campanari was forced after the second number to bow his acknowledgments several times to long continued applause.

The symphony, by Schubert, in C major, is very fine, especially the first movement, but, as a whole, it seems just a little long drawn out and a bit monotonous as well. There was nothing in the programme, however, that showed so well Gericke's marvellously perfect control over the body of splendid musicians under his direction.

Mr. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at the next rehearsal and concert.

190

191

SYMPHONY HALL
Sunday Evening, March 5, <sup>1905</sup> at 8 o'clock

Concert in aid of its
PENSION FUND

BY THE
Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

Wagner Programme

Assisting Artists

Mme. GADSKI
Mr. THEODORE VAN YORX
AND A SMALL CHORUS

INTRODUCTION, ACT I., "LOHENGRIN"

FIRST PART OF ACT III., "LOHENGRIN"

ENTR'ACTE, DANCE OF APPRENTICES, PROCESSION OF THE MASTERSINGERS, AND HOMAGE TO HANS SACHS, FROM "THE MASTERSINGERS OF NUREMBERG," ACT III.

SECOND PART OF ACT I., "DIE WALKÜRE"

"TRISTAN AND ISOLDE," INTRODUCTION AND LOVE-DEATH

MME. GADSKI

THE MASON & HAMLIN LISZT ORGAN USED

CONCERT GIVEN FOR PENSION FUND

Symphony Orchestra Gives Wagner Programme

Post — Mon 6 1905
At Symphony Hall last evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, M. Gericke, conductor, and Mme. Gadski, soprano, and Mr. Theodore Van Yorx, tenor, assisting, gave a concert in aid of its pension fund.

It was an all-Wagner programme, but went outside of the stock Wagner concert numbers, and gave long excerpts from two of the music dramas. The Lohengrin prelude was followed by the entire first scene of the last act, with Mme. Gadski as Elsa and Mr. Van Yorx as Lohengrin, the bridal chorus being sung by a small chorus off the stage.

Four excerpts from "Die Meistersinger," the entr'acte, dance of apprentices, the procession of the mastersingers and the homage to Hans Sachs, were played by the orchestra alone.

With Mme. Gadski as Sieglinde and Mr. Van Yorx as Siegmund, the last part of the first act of "Die Walkure" was given, and the programme was completed by the orchestral prelude and Isolde's love death from "Tristan und Isolde," Mme. Gadski singing Isolde.

Mr. Gericke is not a fervid interpreter of the Wagner scores, but his wonderful command over his players, the splendid instrumental work of the band, and the perfect technic of the performance make up for any lack of temperament.

Mme. Gadski's greatness in the Wagner roles is everywhere conceded, and even in concert, her Elsa, Sieglinde and Isolde were dramatic to a degree. In the Lohengrin and Walkure numbers she sang without a score, and was able to interpret the music with all attention to dramatic effect. She was in splendid voice, and her work was enthusiastically applauded.

Mr. Van Yorx is a lyric tenor, with a voice of splendid quality, good range and considerable power. But he is not a Wagner tenor, and with the additional handicap of being obliged to sing from the score, fell short of a really forceful reading.

Yet, strangely enough, his Siegmund was far better than his Lohengrin. He gave the Spring Song with splendid intelligence, and even the difficult sword music was not without dramatic power.

There was a large and appreciative audience and the pension fund must have realized a good, round sum.

THE PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Our symphony orchestra gives to Boston better orchestral music than can be heard in any other city of the United States. Its members are cut off from such benefits as accrue to those who are members of the Musicians' Union. It is therefore the duty of every musical Bostonian to see to it that the pension fund, the chief guarantee of the permanency of the organization, does not languish. The large audience present yesterday proved that our public are not insensible to the charms of such a beneficence when combined with a fine concert.

The concert was a "Wagner programme," and gave some interpretations of the master's works that the opera company will have hard work to equal during the coming week. Madame Gadski and Mr. Theo. Van Yorx were the soloists, and the programme culminated with the "Love-death" from "Tristan and Isolde," in which Mme. Gadski sang the part of Isolde with that nobility and power which she always manages to impart to such passionate scenes.

One may alter the old Latin proverb into "De beneficentia nil nisi bonum," for we may speak nothing but good of a beneficent concert such as this. But were the strictest judgment applied the concert would still merit only laudation. It was a most enjoyable occasion with the added zest of helping a worthy cause.

The orchestra has never given a more interesting, a more brilliantly performed Wagner concert.

The 3d act of "Lohengrin" was given with a small chorus to sing the "Bridal Chorus," and the 1st act of "Die Walkure" from the monologue of Siegmund (before the hearth) to the end.

Mme. Gadski was in her best voice, and Mr. van Yorx again surprised us by his surety in the most trying numbers. It is seldom that one hears the tenor part of a Wagnerian opera sung with such musical security and perfect intonation.

The audience was very enthusiastic, especially after the Sieglinde music and the Isolde number, and the enthusiasm was deserved; it was a triumph for solo artists, for Mr. Gericke and for our orchestra.

Adv - Mon 6 1905 Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall: Pension Fund Concert

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund was given in Symphony Hall yesterday evening, before an audience moderately large in size, very brilliant in appearance, and demonstratively enthusiastic. With the assistance of Mme. Gadski, Mr. Theodore van Yorx and a small chorus, the following programme of Wagner excerpts was presented:

Introduction, Act I., "Lohengrin."
First Part of Act III., "Lohengrin."
Entr'acte, Dance of Apprentices, Procession of the Mastersingers, and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Act. III.
Second Part of Act I., "Die Walkure."
"Tristan and Isolde," Introduction and Love-Death.

Mme. Gadski.

Although it is a constant irritation to Bostonians that, despite their musical culture, they are forced to hear their Wagner in concert hall, or, if they have good luck, massed in one week at the opera, they may thank their stars that they are given the opportunity of listening to Wagner readings such as those offered last night at Symphony Hall. The high repute of Mr. Gericke in Vienna as an operatic conductor is well known here, and so often as Mr. Gericke places on his programme an excerpt from an opera, Wagner in particular, one longs to hear him conduct the entire work in the theatre. To comment on yesterday's programme in detail would take an undue amount of time, but, none the less, one cannot pass the occasion by without remarking on the poetical, finely felt reading of the "Lohengrin" prelude, and on the majesty and strength of the Homage to Hans Sachs, not to mention the humorous fun of the Apprentices' Dance. Mr. Gericke is manifestly a Wagnerian conductor of poetry, dramatic warmth and authority such as we are not accustomed to in America, since the visit of Mr. Mottl was all too short. We are not likely to be fortunate enough to hear Mr. Gericke conduct an opera: it would be the more agreeable, therefore, if, once in a way, he would include Wagner excerpts in symphony concert programmes. The prospect of hearing the third act of "Siegfried" well sung at a symphony concert would pack Symphony Hall to the very doors.

In addition to the animated and brilliant playing by the orchestra, there was beautiful singing from Mme. Gadski. In her best voice, she sang the dramatic measures of Sieglinde quite as carefully and nicely as she did the music of Mozart's Countess one year ago, and with superb effect. Her rehearsal of the story of the sword was thrilling. Mr. van Yorx, while not an opera singer, did well with his task, in Siegmund's Love Song, presenting a beautiful example of lyrical singing that again might serve as an object lesson to most heroic tenors. The whole concert, in fact, was so enjoyable that one can only wish it may be an earnest of other concerts to come. Wed. 6. 1905 R. R. G.

WAGNER'S POWER TO CHARM ALL POTENT

Splendid Audience, Both in Size and Quality, Hears Symphony's Pension Fund Concert.

Journal — Mon 6 1905

The power of Richard Wagner, first to draw people together, and then to charm and excite and satisfy them by his music, was well exemplified at Symphony Hall last night, when a splendid audience, both in size and quality, listened to the concert in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra.

The program was Wagnerian throughout, including selections from "Lohengrin," "Die Meistersinger," "Die Walkure" and "Tristan und Isolde." Mr. Gericke conducted, and the soloists were Johanna Gadski and Theodore Van Yorx.

Gericke's Fine Surprises.

Rarely has better purely orchestral interpretation of Wagner's music been heard in this city. Mr. Gericke himself, as if shaking off his regular Symphony conservatism, displayed more fire, more genuine emotionalism than he has yet vouchsafed to Boston.

To say nothing of the exquisite beauty of the "Lohengrin" prelude—for that was to be expected—he gave such a reading and the orchestra gave such a performance of the "Meistersinger" dance, procession and homage to Sachs as one might travel this or any other country and not match.

No Rivals to Be Feared.

And the orchestral background of the "Walkure" excerpt was extraordinary for its clearness of tints and sonorous beauty of tone. When it plays as it did last night, this orchestra of ours needs fear no rival whatever.

The "Lohengrin" dialogue of the third act between Elsa and the knight of the swan, sung by Mme. Gadski and Mr. Van Yorx, does not lend itself well to concert. It is very long, it loses from absence of stage effects and the music is not of sufficient variety to hold the attention.

Nor were either of the singers at their best in it. Gadski's voice showed occasional worn spots, while Van Yorx seemed ill at ease and was not always true to pitch.

They Appear to Advantage.

The magnificent scene in the first act of "Die Walkure," where Siegmund and Sieglinde plan the escape from Hunding, was on a far nobler plane, and both artists appeared to better advantage. Gadski's thorough knowledge of the role was evident, and she was vocally fine and inspiring. Mr. Van Yorx regained confidence and sang with ease, purity and dramatic strength. He made the "spring song" both manly and musical, and in other ways acquitted himself like an artist. Gadski's singing of the "Tristan" love-death was full of emotion and was musically noble as well.

CONCERT AIDS PENSION FUND

Symphony Orchestra Presents Wagner Programme to Large Audience with Mme. Gadski and Mr. Van Yorx as Soloists.

PECUNIARY SUCCESS FOR WORTHY CAUSE

Fine Performance as a Whole, and Soloists Deservedly Acclaimed—Tenth Sunday Chamber Concert in Chickering Hall.

Herald — Dec. 6, 1905

The second concert this season in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony orchestra was given last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gericke conducted, and Mme. Johanna Gadski, soprano, Mr. Theodore van Yorx, tenor, and a small chorus assisted. The programme was made up wholly of excerpts from operas by Wagner and was as follows: Prelude to "Lohengrin"; first part of the third act of "Lohengrin" (entr'acte, bridal chorus and duet); entr'acte, dance of apprentices, procession of the mastersingers and homage to Hans Sachs from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; second part of act I of "The Valkyrie"; prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde."

This concert was of a more festal character than the preceding one of the season. The programme was more absorbing, the orchestra played with greater enthusiasm, the audience was larger; more brilliant and more responsive. The soloists were warmly applauded; the purely orchestral selections met with almost equal favor. It is a pleasure to add that the pecuniary results were gratifying.

The benefit of the fund and of the concerts given in aid of this fund is not solely to the orchestra itself. Inasmuch as the association for a charitable object brings the members themselves into a closer union and in a large measure aids in maintaining the pride of membership, the subscribers to the concert and the general public gain thereby. Music lovers should aid this fund generously if only from selfish motives.

Even if there had been no thought last evening of contributing to a worthy cause, the character of the concert itself would have given much pleasure. Mr. Ernest Newman remarked not long ago that Wagner was more and more known in England and better appreciated by concert performances than by the comparatively few and expensive performances of the music-dramas themselves. In Boston of late we have had comparatively little of Wagner either in theatre or in concert hall. It is true that "Parsifal" has had due attention paid it, but, with the exception of this work, there have been few wholly adequate performances of "The Mastersingers," the "Ring" and "Tristan," or even of the minor operas. There was one memorable performance last season, that of "Siegfried" as conducted by Mr. Mottl, and reports from New York lead one to anticipate the coming performance of "The Mastersingers" with more than ordinary pleasure. But the music of Wagner is not judiciously distributed throughout the year; there is the short opera season, with here and there a Wagnerian performance, or there is a Wagner concert. To quote the old saw, it's either a feast or a famine. No sane person demands that Wagner should monopolize the stage either in theatre or in concert hall, but it is fair to infer from the interest and enjoyment shown last evening that the Symphony audience and general concert-goers would welcome Wagnerian excerpts on other occasions and in concerts of a miscellaneous programme.

The performance, as we have intimated, was excellent, and often inspiring. Mme. Gadski is well known here as a singer who appreciates the fact that Wagner's music may be sung as well as screamed, and she is able by reason of her voice and artistry to sing with marked effect, where others are impotently violent. Mr. Van Yorx enlarged his reputation in this city. Mr. Gericke and the orchestra may well be congratulated on the success, artistic and pecuniary, of the concert.

Music and Politics.

A Letter to The Musical Courier Discussing Some Musical Conditions in Boston.

Boston, December 15, 1904.

To The Musical Courier: Dec 28 1904

THAT the article relating to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which you printed last December, under the title of "That Ox," was not relished by Mr. Gericke and the backer of the orchestra, Mr. Higginson, was clearly shown by the virtual discharge of a certain 'cellist, who only retained his place by giving his "word of honor" to Mr. Gericke that he had nothing to do with the article in question. In order that the musical public of the country may thoroughly understand the conditions as they have existed in the Boston Orchestra and still exist, it will be necessary to apply the probe deeper and to speak still more plainly than before. It will be shown that, instead of the "lofty ideals" and "artistic aims" with which Mr. Higginson and the members of his orchestra are supposed to be imbued, it is after all a matter of business, and the "almighty dollar" "rules the roost."

Let us turn our attention at first to the way Mr. Higginson treats his men. Many are familiar with his arbitrary treatment of Mr. Paur, and one can readily suppose that the "rank and file" would have still less courtesy shown them. The member or members to be discharged are not notified in advance of such intention, but, even after the regular season is ended, are not even then told and given a chance to look for another place. The victim himself is generally the last one to learn that he is "out," and in many cases not till he is told by some other member, or goes to the office expecting to sign a new contract. Another instance of mean, petty "politics" was the treatment of Mr. Tucker and Mr. Paur by Mr. Higginson some years ago, when Mr. Tucker undertook to manage some concerts in People's Church, and engaged Mr. Paur to conduct an orchestral concert.

Mr. Paur was to bring part of his men from New York, the balance to be engaged in Boston. Many Symphony men were engaged, and no objection was raised till almost up to the date of the concert, when they were given to understand that Mr. Higginson had forbidden them to play, thus putting Mr. Tucker "in a hole," as he had to engage in consequence a lot of men from New York at a heavy expense.

Of course it was not good business policy to allow Mr. Paur at the time to show what he could do while Mr. Gericke was "at the helm" in Boston.

This may be all right, but how about art and high artistic ideals? That, Mr. Editor, has to take second place

They Appear to Advantage.

The magnificent scene in the first act of "Die Walkure," where Siegmund and Sieglinde plan the escape from Hunding, was on a far nobler plane, and both artists appeared to better advantage. Gadski's thorough knowledge of the role was evident, and she was vocally fine and inspiring. Mr. Van Yorx regained confidence and sang with ease, purity and dramatic strength. He made the "spring song" both manly and musical, and in other ways acquitted himself like an artist. Gadski's singing of the "Tristan" love-death was full of emotion and was musically noble as well.

CONCERT AIDS PENSION FUND

Symphony Orchestra Presents Wagner Programme to Large Audience with Mme. Gadski and Mr. Van Yorx as Soloists.

PECUNIARY SUCCESS FOR WORTHY CAUSE

Fine Performance as a Whole, and Soloists Deservedly Acclaimed—Tenth Sunday Chamber Concert in Chickering Hall.

Herald ————— Dec. 6, 1905

The second concert this season in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony orchestra was given last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gericke conducted, and Mme. Johanna Gadski, soprano, Mr. Theodore van Yorx, tenor, and a small chorus assisted. The programme was made up wholly of excerpts from operas by Wagner and was as follows: Prelude to "Lohengrin"; first part of the third act of "Lohengrin" (entr'acte, bridal chorus and duet); entr'acte, dance of apprentices, procession of the mastersingers and homage to Hans Sachs from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; second part of act I of "The Valkyrie"; prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde."

This concert was of a more festal character than the preceding one of the season. The programme was more absorbing, the orchestra played with greater enthusiasm, the audience was larger, more brilliant and more responsive. The soloists were warmly applauded; the purely orchestral selections met with almost equal favor. It is a pleasure to add that the pecuniary results were gratifying.

The benefit of the fund and of the concerts given in aid of this fund is not solely to the orchestra itself. Inasmuch as the association for a charitable object brings the members themselves into a closer union and in a large measure aids in maintaining the pride of membership, the subscribers to the concert and the general public gain thereby. Music lovers should aid this fund generously if only from selfish motives.

Even if there had been no thought last evening of contributing to a worthy cause, the character of the concert itself would have given much pleasure. Mr. Ernest Newman remarked not long ago that Wagner was more and more known in England and better appreciated by concert performances than by the comparatively few and expensive performances of the music-dramas themselves. In Boston of late we have had comparatively little of Wagner either in theatre or in concert hall. It is true that "Parsifal" has had due attention paid it, but, with the exception of this work, there have been few wholly adequate performances of "The Mastersingers," the "Ring" and "Tristan," or even of the minor operas. There was one memorable performance last season, that of "Siegfried" as conducted by Mr. Mottl, and reports from New York lead one to anticipate the coming performance of "The Mastersingers" with more than ordinary pleasure. But the music of Wagner is not judiciously distributed throughout the year; there is the short opera season, with here and there a Wagnerian performance, or there is a Wagner concert. To quote the old saw, it's either a feast or a famine. No sane person demands that Wagner should monopolize the stage either in theatre or in concert hall, but it is fair to infer from the interest and enjoyment shown last evening that the Symphony audience and general concert-goers would welcome Wagnerian excerpts on other occasions and in concerts of a miscellaneous programme.

The performance, as we have intimated, was excellent, and often inspiring. Mme. Gadski is well known here as a singer who appreciates the fact that Wagner's music may be sung as well as screamed, and she is able by reason of her voice and artistry to sing with marked effect, where others are impotently violent. Mr. Van Yorx enlarged his reputation in this city. Mr. Gericke and the orchestra may well be congratulated on the success, artistic and pecuniary, of the concert.

Music and Politics.

A Letter to The Musical Courier Discussing Some Musical Conditions in Boston.

Boston, December 15, 1904.

To The Musical Courier: Dec 28 1904

HAT the article relating to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which you printed last December, under the title of "That Ox," was not relished by Mr. Gericke and the backer of the orchestra, Mr. Higginson, was clearly shown by the virtual discharge of a certain 'cellist, who only retained his place by giving his "word of honor" to Mr. Gericke that he had nothing to do with the article in question. In order that the musical public of the country may thoroughly understand the conditions as they have existed in the Boston Orchestra and still exist, it will be necessary to apply the probe deeper and to speak still more plainly than before. It will be shown that, instead of the "lofty ideals" and "artistic aims" with which Mr. Higginson and the members of his orchestra are supposed to be imbued, it is after all a matter of business, and the "almighty dollar" "rules the roost."

Let us turn our attention at first to the way Mr. Higginson treats his men. Many are familiar with his arbitrary treatment of Mr. Paur, and one can readily suppose that the "rank and file" would have still less courtesy shown them. The member or members to be discharged are not notified in advance of such intention, but, even after the regular season is ended, are not even then told and given a chance to look for another place. The victim himself is generally the last one to learn that he is "out," and in many cases not till he is told by some other member, or goes to the office expecting to sign a new contract. Another instance of mean, petty "politics" was the treatment of Mr. Tucker and Mr. Paur by Mr. Higginson some years ago, when Mr. Tucker undertook to manage some concerts in People's Church, and engaged Mr. Paur to conduct an orchestral concert.

Mr. Paur was to bring part of his men from New York, the balance to be engaged in Boston. Many Symphony men were engaged, and no objection was raised till almost up to the date of the concert, when they were given to understand that Mr. Higginson had forbidden them to play, thus putting Mr. Tucker "in a hole," as he had to engage in consequence a lot of men from New York at a heavy expense.

Of course it was not good business policy to allow Mr. Paur at the time to show what he could do while Mr. Gericke was "at the helm" in Boston.

This may be all right, but how about art and high artistic ideals? That, Mr. Editor, has to take second place here when it comes to business.

1916

Many in the orchestra are glad that the reign of a certain person, closely related to Mr. Kneisel, has come to an end, as in the past he has given himself all the airs and graces of a ward politician, and assumed to dictate to the rank and file and extra men in many ways that were, to say the least, extremely arbitrary. He was a shining example of "graft," and to such an extent that in very desperation members took things into their own hands and complained to Mr. Higginson.

The party who now has charge of the outside business of the orchestra has also been known to have fine business qualifications.

It may be interesting to learn that there are two classes in the orchestra that have been dubbed "prima donnas" and "deck hands." The former, a class that act as though they were of a higher order of beings than the balance of the members; and the other, the unfortunate local musicians that are engaged from time to time to play extra parts, and are supposed to be always at the beck and call of the orchestra at $6 per concert and $2 or $3 per rehearsal, and only draw that half the time, or less.

The same management that squanders thousands of dollars on inferior foreign musicians will haggle for hours over a $5 note with a local man, who, as he is a local man, is supposed, no matter what his talent, to play for any price offered.

The story is told about an extra Melba matinee during the time of Paur, when Music Hall was packed to the doors, at which a second violin was offered $3 for the concert, and a bass clarinet $5, and a "fight" had to be made to get more.

Today there is a local 'cellist in the orchestra, a young man of talent who has spent years of study abroad, but he was only allowed to enter the ranks after the season had been in progress some weeks, and by reason of the failure of an imported player to appear, and even then he was only paid $30 per week, when all the other 'cellists got $35.

It is reported that Mr. Higginson was very angry with the Kneisel Quartet for resigning from the orchestra, on the ground that they did not give him "notice" enough. But they gave just as much "notice" as he ever gives anyone, and a good deal more than he usually gives. He evidently did not like the "taste of his own medicine."

Some of the orchestra additions lately are very singular, to say the least. What is the "pull" that keeps a certain first bassoon in the orchestra? This season the third bassoon was obliged to play the first part in the fourth symphony of Beethoven.

Why, again, is a youth of twenty years imported and given the place as first clarinet in such a noted orchestra, and given an opportunity to learn orchestra routine and draw $50 a week while so doing?

Is it true that breathing the air of the Paris boulevards makes a man an artist musician?

1917
Of course, we do not now expect Mr. Hale, our noted critic, who is usually so caustic and severe, to tell the truth about the very management that pays him, it is said, a goodly sum per week to compile the programs of the concerts.

Is not independent criticism out of the question under such circumstances?

How he would have made "mince meat" of Mr. Arbos last year, or Mr. Grisez this season, had they been unlucky enough to have appeared in Boston without the prestige of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to support them!

In his criticism of both of them we have the spectacle of Mr. Hale making excuses for their shortcomings.

The question is often asked: Do any of the critics attached to the great Boston newspapers really dare to write the truth? Why do they allow misstatements to appear all the time?

The first flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has almost as great a talent in musical politics as in flute playing. He gets his brother to come to Boston, also a flutist, and secures him an engagement at the Somerset Hotel at $15 per week, till such time as he can "pull wires" enough to make a place for him in the orchestra, which he succeeded in doing at the end of the season by having a local man left out. The latter, C. K. North, an artist of high rank, good enough to travel for several seasons with Melba, playing her obligatos, is discharged, and on his writing a note to Mr. Gericke, to ascertain, if possible, the reason, was told that his work was entirely satisfactory, but that he (Mr. Gericke) was obliged to make a place for the brother of the first flutist. It would be very interesting to know what was the influence that obliged Mr. Gericke to discharge an artist, about whom no fault could be found in any way, either personally or musically, to make room for a stranger because he had a brother who wanted him engaged?

How can there be a proper esprit de corps when such injustice is practiced? The singular part of the affair is that the orchestra has such a reputation for such methods that Mr. North actually expected just such treatment, as well as the orchestra in general.

This same flutist, as soon as he had succeeded in placing his brother, had to go to France on a "vacation," and tried to secure his full salary (but without success) while absent, which he passed at a summer resort in France, it is said, playing in an orchestra.

The following season he "discovered" that he could not remain longer in the orchestra without extra pay, and must leave. The "bluff" is said to have been successful, and he is now one of the "prima donnas" at, it is said, $65 per week.

Last season there was a vacancy in the first violins, for which several local men applied and played for Mr. Gericke, hoping to be accepted; but about the commencement of the season a young man who had married a Boston lady and was here on a visit heard of the vacancy, and, "wise in his day and generation," armed himself with a letter from a society lady, and was accepted at once and given a much higher salary than most of the first violins. He was announced this season as soloist at a concert, and at the rehearsal of his solo his playing was so mediocre that Mr. Gericke would not allow him to appear, and the announcement was made that he was ill, and Mr. Hess, the new concert master, would play in his place. By the way, Mr. Hess is said to draw a salary of $6,000 per season, which is almost twice what Mr. Kneisel had. While Mr. Hess is an excellent artist, and is very satisfactory in the place, it is a question whether any violinist in an orchestra is worth almost three times as much as the solo woodwind players. In the European orchestras the solo clarinet, flute and oboe are paid almost as much as the solo violin, and this is as it should be. Such an artist as Mr. Longy is far more difficult to replace than Mr. Hess, Mr. Kneisel, or any other concert master.

198

Several local musicians have, it is true, been taken into the orchestra the past few years, but the fact that two of them, a trumpeter and a clarinetist, had letters to Mr. Gericke from prominent society ladies was well known and commented on. The reputation that both had as artists would not have gained them a hearing, much less an engagements, without such society influence.

As I have before written you, society, which is really most unmusical, has been led to think that all members of the Symphony Orchestra must be artists and all outsiders necessarily inferior, not knowing that there are quite a number of "weak members," notably in the second violins.

Fierce competition exists in Boston in the orchestral business, and for that Mr. Higginson, by his system of importing musicians, is primarily to blame. Let us go back a few months and invite Mr. Higginson to take a stroll some evening in the Back Bay. In the Hotel Vendome he will find Mr. Hoffmann or Mr. Strube, with other members of his orchestra, making an "honest dollar." At the Lenox he will find Mr. Mahn, at the Somerset Mr. Fritzsche, and so on in other places. Only recently the Copley Square Hotel advertised a Thanksgiving dinner with "music by Symphony players," and last week the Hotel Victoria announced in the society column of the Boston Herald that "on account of the absence of the Symphony Orchestra on their trip, a combination of violin, harp and 'cello will play during the dinner hours."

This is from the "sublime to the ridiculous," and it must be highly pleasing to Mr. Higginson to learn that his artists are so engaged. He has at the present time almost 100 men engaged, of whom about eighty have been imported under contract, and, as I have before remarked, are paid much higher salaries than the local men whose places they take. The same men soon commence to play outside engagements at current rates, or lower, but never higher, to add to the fixed income already assured them. Is it any wonder that the general public fails to see why it should be called on to support a "pension fund" for a body of men, mostly foreign, who have been getting the "cream" of the general business for many years, as well as the salary paid them by Mr. Higginson, and by unfair competition in some cases have lowered the rates paid in many departments of orchestral work?

199

Is it any wonder that at least two of the so called "pension fund" concerts have been given at a loss? Cannot Mr. Higginson see the "handwriting on the wall" in the decreased interest in the orchestra as indicated by the sales this and last season, and in the lack of attendance at the "pension fund" concerts?

Has the American born musician, citizen and taxpayer no moral claim on Mr. Higginson, or is he forever to be a "stranger within the gates"?

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, as now conducted, crushes all ambitions. Let us look at the method in France or Germany when a vacancy occurs in an orchestra. To begin with, the fact of the place being vacant is advertised, and artists are invited to a trial before a committee for the position, and, other things being equal, members of their own nationality have the preference. Here it is the reverse, as a rule. Then, again, abroad one has a chance to advance, if talented, from a second part to a first, or, in other words, one has a future; but here the method is just the opposite, the custom being to put the artist from a first part to the second, and to bring in a newcomer as the first, who, in many cases, does not know the orchestral repertory, and in others is of only moderate ability, and the entire orchestra must rehearse for his benefit. The imported artist comes here with a contract in his pocket, bringing in his instruments free of duty, but the local man must pay a duty of 45 per cent. on the same instruments when he buys them, and then he is practically barred out from the most desirable orchestral business. Mr. Higginson is said to be a Republican and protectionist, but he evidently is a believer in "free trade" in musicians. His attitude toward the American Federation of Musicians has caused much comment recently, but that matter, not being the subject of this article, will not be discussed. SUBSCRIBER.

||

Seymour was at the Boston Symphony concert of last Saturday and has drawn his impression of Schelling on page 26. Asked what he thought was the most remarkable thing about Schelling's performance, Seymour replied: "His eyes and his walk." Seymour is not musical.

201

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 11, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

"MANFRED" SYMPHONY, op. 58, after Byron's
Dramatic Poem.

I. Manfred's Wanderings and Despair.

Lento lugubre.
Moderato con moto.
Andante.

Andante con duolo.

II. The Fairy of the Alps.

Vivace con spirito.

Trio: L'istesso tempo.

III. Pastorale. Andante con moto.

IV. The Palace of Arimanes; Invocation to Astarte;

Manfred's Death.

Allegro con fuoco.
Andante con duolo.
Tempo primo.
Largo.

BRAHMS,

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in D minor, op. 77.

I. Adagio non troppo.

II. Adagio.

III. Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to "Leonore" No. 3, op. 72.

Soloist:

Mr. FRITZ KREISLER.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 11, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |               |  |
|---------------|--|
| TSCHAIKOWSKY, | "MANFRED" SYMPHONY, op. 58, after Byron's Dramatic Poem.   |
|               | I. Manfred's Wanderings and Despair.Lento lugubre.Moderato con moto.Andante.Andante con duolo.                               |
|               | II. The Fairy of the Alps.Vivace con spirito.Trio: L'istesso tempo.  |
|               | III. Pastorale. Andante con moto.  |
|               | IV. The Palace of Arimanes; Invocation to Astarte;Manfred's Death.Allegro con fuoco.Andante con duolo.Tempo primo.Largo. |
| BRAHMS,       | CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in D minor, op. 77.   |
|               | I. Adagio non troppo.II. Adagio.III. Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.  |
| BEETHOVEN,    | OVERTURE to "Leonore" No. 3, op. 72.   |

Soloist:

Mr. FRITZ KREISLER.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

(Copyright by Gessford.)
FRITZ KREISLER.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

adv PROGRAMME. Nov 13/1905
Tchaikowsky—"Manfred" symphony.
Brahms—Concerto for violin.
Mr. Fritz Kreisler, soloist.
Beethoven—Leonore overture, No. 3.

The reviewer tried the experiment of ubiquity on Saturday and found that the art of being in two places at the same time is remarkably convenient during the opera season. It was a pleasant contrast to hear Mr. Gericke's conservative orchestral balance after Mr. Hertz's instrumental fury of the past week, and the poetic fervor of Tchaikowsky and the classical purity of Brahms had redoubled power after the blatant "Huguenots" or the mentally unbalanced "Lucta."

The "Manfred" symphony is one of Tchaikowsky's strong works. It could not be otherwise when the composer himself was a species of torture Manfred, although without any Astarte. In this symphony Tchaikowsky makes as many innovations of instrumentation as Richard Strauss does in his most modern orchestration. Everything that can be imported into the orchestra, from bells and gong to organ, is present.

Yet the weakest orchestral master, Schumann, has written a "Manfred" that throws this heavily-scored pessimist in the shade. Schumann's "Manfred" overture gives the dignity which one associates with Byron's hero, but Tchaikowsky makes him frenzied, shrieking, groaning, roaring: This Manfred is not the man who said "Grief should be the instructor of the wise," and who found knowledge in sorrow.

Very beautiful is Tchaikowsky's second movement, the appearance of the fairy of the Alps in the rainbow underneath the waterfall; it is iridescent in every measure. But here again the poetry of Schumann overtops the graphically of the Russian. In the scene in the hall of Ahrimanes also one may prefer the Schumann dignity of treatment. Nevertheless, if we put Schumann's masterpiece out of mind, this symphony may stand as a work of genius. Perhaps the chief accusation that can be brought is that Tchaikowsky wrote rather from inner feelings than from a full comprehension of Byron's play.

In one point both composers missed the Byronic idea. The poet pictured Manfred as standing far apart from religion, and he emphasizes this in the contrast between the pious Abbot and the dying hero. Schumann, however, dragged in a very skilful and ugly double canon "Requiem" by the heels, at this point, and Tchaikowsky brings in the organ, to suggest the rites of the church, at the end. Both are about as much in place as an "Ave Maria" in a synagogue. Whether there are such good contrapuntists in Hades as the fugal work of the finale suggests is a point that we leave for theologians to determine.

As the symphony was given less than a year ago, and was fully reviewed at that time, it is unnecessary to give much detail at present, but we may be allowed to grow enthusiastic over the performance. Familiarity with the work discloses new beauties, and a composition of such greatness deserves to be heard once a season. There was great enthusiasm manifested by the audience, so that, after bowing a couple of times, Mr. Gericke caused his orchestra to rise and bow their acknowledgments.

Mr. Kreisler also won a triumph by his solo work. He has been doing great deeds in the violin field, in his recent recitals, and this was a fitting culmination. When the list of violin masters is made it is very possible that Kreisler may be a species of Abou Ben Adhem and find his name heading all the rest. We did not hear the finale of the concerto, nor the Beethoven overture. Our apology for this sin of omission may be found in the fact that Wagner's greatest opera was being given on the same evening.

Louis C. Elson.

"MANFRED" BY SYMPHONY.

Concert Was One of Most Interesting and Impressive of the Season—

Kreisler Praised.

Herald Nov. 12, 1905
The programme of the 18th Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

"Manfred" symphony.....Tchaikowsky
Concerto in D major for violin.....Brahms
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven

It is not too much to say that this concert was not only one of the most interesting and impressive of the season; it was one of the noblest exhibitions of orchestral and virtuoso skill that have been given in the series for some years. The programme was well arranged. The performance was continuously engrossing.

Tchaikowsky's "Manfred" is now familiar to the Symphony audiences. We learn from the composer's correspondence how hard he found the task imposed on him by his friend Balakireff, how often he was tempted to put it aside. He wrote to Mrs. von Meck: "The work is so difficult and complicated that I myself am for the time being a Manfred." The hearer is often tempted to find Tchaikowsky of the tortured soul in this dramatic symphony, Tchaikowsky in Manfred's garb. He himself was doubtful about the future of this composition: "My 'Manfred' will be played once or twice, and then it will disappear; outside of a handful who go to the symphony concerts, no one will happen to hear it. It is only the opera that brings us nearer to the people." There was opera in Boston last week; but how often were dramatic operatic effects as striking as those worked by certain pages of this symphony, effects the more poignant because they were without the addition and also the distraction of scene and situation and human beings playing to the eye?

The symphony has its weak spots, no doubt, and it would be easy to say this or that about them; but when all has been said, it is the work of a great man. It is not the equal of Tchaikowsky's fifth symphony, which is to us his masterpiece, a work of higher and more sustained imaginative light than the now more popular "Pathetic"; nor is it to be classed with the "Romeo and Juliet" fantasia. But the best portions of it are very human and of tragic intensity. Mr. Gericke's reading was unusually dramatic and stirring, and the orchestral performance was one to be remembered. This may also be said of the performance of Beethoven's overture.

Mr. Kreisler's playing of Brahms' concerto is to be placed by the side of his performance of Beethoven's concerto four years ago, and there is no higher praise. Whoever wished before this concert that Mr. Kreisler had chosen another work forgot immediately his disappointment or his prejudice. The violinist's artistic individuality and his rare gifts and attainments vitalized and glorified the music that to some is for the most part dull and inert.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Kreisler the Symphony Concert Soloist.

Mr Tucker's Concert Today—Kneisel Quartet.

Recitals and Minor Events of Interest.

Globe Nov 12 1905

Mr Fritz Kreisler, the Austrian violinist, was the soloist at the Symphony concert last evening. Mr Kreisler has made himself very favorably known in Boston since he first appeared here in December, 1900, yet his performance last evening added materially to the respect and esteem in which he is held by local musicians and Symphony audiences. For the violinist showed more force, vigor and breadth than even his admirers have heretofore credited him with, and he also demonstrated an even greater facility of execution.

His solo was that composition which presents such variety of opportunity for pure violin virtuosity—Brahms' concerto in D major. To those who have heard Mr Kreisler play before, his interpretation of this master work for the solo violin carried the conviction that never had they shown just appreciation of the marvelous capabilities of this young artist. To those who had never heard the modest, unassuming musician before, his work was amazing. None could gainsay him worthy to interpret this masterpiece of technical exaction dedicated to and first performed by the great Joachim.

Mr Kreisler played the first movement with the delicacy of sentiment that he has led his hearers to expect, but in the coda he rose to the extreme virility demanded of the soloist. As he played the unaccompanied cadenza the accuracy and brilliancy of fingering and the marvelous bowing effects brought both audience and members of the orchestra forward in their chairs in rapt attention. As he paused at the close none was more demonstrative in applause than Willy Hess, who conducted, and the men of the orchestra.

The second movement, the adagio, showed Mr Kreisler once more to be a finished artist in phrasing and exquisite tone shading, and the emotional passages were played with dignity and charm. But, of course, the opportunity for the virtuoso is the finale. With bars of double-stopping, demanding accuracy of fingering, brilliant runs and florid arpeggios, the closing movement is the test of the technical skill of the artist. In this movement every exaction of the composer was fulfilled with consummate art.

Mr Kreisler's dexterity, the precision of his fingering and the breadth and vigor of his bowing were shown in his playing of the vivid passages of the finale of the concerto.

With fine self-control, yet the violinist is not lacking in enthusiasm, and even in these days of acquaintance with many masters of the violin there is that element in Mr Kreisler's playing of the difficult Brahms concerto that has made him distinctive among his fellow artists. His performance merited the pronounced approval which insisted upon his reappearance three times after he retired at the end of his solo. Commendation is due Mr Hess for his direction of the orchestral parts of the concerto.

The orchestra, under the direction of Mr Gericke, played the Tchaikowsky symphony "Manfred," which was given once during last season. Mr Gericke's reading of this work of the Russian composer is with a palpably high and sympathetic purpose.

There is little to be added to the praise of the presentation of this composition which previous performances have merited. The tone coloring of the last part of the first movement, depicting Manfred's wanderings and despair, was especially inspiring, and the orchestra, notably the strings, was extremely impressive in the largo, the finale of the symphony.

As the concluding number the orchestra played Beethoven's overture to "Leonore" No. 3. The overture was in distinct contrast to the symphony and the Brahms concerto, and the buoyant as well as the pathetic emotions were represented with the usual versatility. In the impetuous passages the work of the strings was especially brilliant.

There will be no concert this week as the orchestra will be absent on tour.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL SEATS
G. 30-31 may be secured for $28.00 each by addressing T. F. V., Boston Transcript. (A)

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

Many people must have been attracted by "Die Meistersinger" last Saturday evening, or there could not have been so comparatively slender an audience at the eighteenth Symphony concert, one of the most interesting of the season. Mr. Fritz Kreisler played, and this was the programme:

Tchaikovsky: "Manfred" Symphony, Op. 58, after Byron's Dramatic Poem.
Brahms: Concerto for Violin, in D minor, Op. 77.
Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72.

To find oneself in a minority regarding a musical composition of great consequence is not an agreeable position. When all the world, seemingly, finds itself stirred to the soul by Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" symphony, the emotional measures of which rack most people's hearts, it is not pleasant to sit by cold and unmoved, wondering what ails one. Since the most competent judges the world over, in Europe and America alike, hold the hearing of "Manfred" a musical experience, it is by no means pleasant to find oneself listening attentively in a vain effort to discover the grandeur claimed for the work, all ready to be moved but remaining ever unmoved. It must be admitted that to some people the "Manfred" symphony seems hopelessly dull, bombastic, consciously emotional, lacking in beauty, and not genuinely dramatic. Exception must be made, naturally, to the superb moment at the end of the first movement, when the "Manfred" theme is thundered out by full orchestra, as well as to some of the delicate descriptive music of the scherzo by the waterfall, and to the pretty music of the pastorale. As for the orgy of the finale, is it much else than a not too strong imitation of Berlioz? Not to admire "Manfred" makes one feel as crude in taste as it would if one did not, today, fancy Maeterlinck, but the fact remains that to some persons at least the symphony seems to be chiefly a case of nerves set to music and orchestrated. Detached from a body, nerves have but a short lease of life. How is it possible to compare for an instant "Manfred" with the fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky, or with the Pathetic Symphony? And yet, many do so. Mr. Gericke, at all events, did his best to galvanize the nerves into life; his reading of the symphony was very great.

So was Mr. Kreisler's playing of the Brahms concerto. Although one might have wished Mr. Kreisler had chosen to play something else, after hearing his performance one can only be grateful to him for setting a standard for this concerto which all musicians must live up to or else be held hopelessly wanting. Not only did Mr. Kreisler play with all the warmth of style which one would expect from him, and also with his own ripe musicianliness, but he gave the concerto a charm, he made it agreeable to hear. The Brahms concerto from him was a musical event.

This week there will be no symphony concert. Here is the programme for March 25, when Mr. C. Rubner will be the soloist:

Mozart, Symphony in D major, No. 38 (K. 505); Grieg, Concerto for Pianoforte; Rimsky-Korsakoff, Tableau Musical, "Sadko" (first time); Richard Strauss, Introduction to Act II, "Guntram." R. R. G.
Trans. Mdr. 13. 1905

NOTABLE CONCERT BY THE SYMPHONY

Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" and Fritz Kreisler Combine to Make It Memorable.

Journal Mdr. 13. 1905

The eighteenth concert of the Symphony season at Symphony Hall Saturday night was made the most notable of the series by the performance of Tchaikowsky's "Manfred" and appearance of Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist. Tchaikowsky considered his work in "Manfred" his masterpiece, yet it is not included in the list of symphonies from his pen, being classed as program or descriptive music. It was first performed in this country in 1886, under Theodore Thomas, and its first reading in Boston was under Mr. Gericke, April 27, 1901.

It is the gloomy, moody, yet intensely dramatic setting to Byron's poem of the name, and might be termed a marvel in orchestral coloring, groupings of rare daring frequently being resorted to in picturing scenes of the story. Every resource of the orchestra is called into play, and Mr. Gericke, who was in an extremely gracious mood, was lavish in liberality, encouraging the superb brass choir to unexpected effort.

Whole Band Inspired.

Mr. Gericke's enthusiasm inspired the band as they have been inspired but seldom, and while the characteristic refinement of tone was not sacrificed one iota, the four f's were overwhelmingly powerful illustrations of what this great orchestra has tucked away up its sleeve, so to speak, ready for the call. Seemingly technical impossibilities of score are as nothing to Mr. Gericke's men and no better testimony of their superiority in the instrumental world could be desired than Saturday night's performance.

The second movement, "The Fairy of the Alps," marvelous in color and rhythm, is, as the program states, most ingenious in kaleidoscopic effects. The whole is of vast musical beauty, a most picturesque presentment of the natural and fantastic world, and given an inspired reading. A most enthusiastic reception caused Mr. Gericke to divide honors with the men, the whole orchestra rising and acknowledging the applause.

Kreisler, the Artist.

Mr. Kreisler played Brahms' D major concerto, an orthodox work for violin and orchestra. His performances are familiar to the Boston concertgoer, but Saturday night, with the advantage of a superb band behind him, into whose hands the accompaniment could be safely intrusted, he appeared to the greatest advantage.

He is the artist throughout, and the technical demands in double-stopping, florid running passages and arpeggios were performed with the authority of a master. His original cadenza in the first movement was a marvel of skill. Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, closed the program.

BOSTON BAND HAS TO BOW AFTER PLAYING 'MANFRED'

Tschalkowsky Symphony Stirs

Audience in Carn

KREISLER IN A BR

Plays Concerto with F

Orchestra. Under H

Almost Perfect S

N. J. Press

One of the most enthusiastic the season greeted Mr. C. Boston Symphony Orchestra evening concert in Carnegie. After Tschalkowsky's 10 symphony, the conductor was front repeatedly. Mr. Gerl oned to his men to rise, a of virtuosos stood up the with bravos.

It was not Tschalkowsky beautiful as it is in moment greatest pleasure of the eve violin concerto, played by with Hess, the concert Gericke's place at the co proved the real climax of t exceptionally noble and b sition had an inspired p seemed those who say they this work must have been beliefs last night. Kreisler sweep, intensity and emot hardly has equaled before t playing at the same time h nical mastery in the racking composer had piled up.

Kreisler's success was due no doubt, to the almost per had from the incomparable tra under the inspiring lead Hess. Mr. Hess proved him ductor's stand, a man of expe ity and fine sensibility. He admirably in hand, defined c by gesture his demands, and infused into their playing an added zest and enthusiasm. Tschalkowsky's symphony, which is a free musical interpretation of Byron's "Manfred," is acclaimed by some as one of the composer's greatest productions. It certainly is in length, for it occupies close to an hour. To our way of thinking there are few works of the Russian which bear so clearly the marks of labor and want of true inspiration. There is much to arouse admiration in the workmanship, and certain portions of the first movement—"Manfred's Wanderings and Despair"—and the last, which illustrates his visit to the palace of Arimanes, his invocation to Astarte and his death, reach moving climaxes. But on the whole the musical effects are on the surface.

Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, ended the programme. At the Boston Orchestra's last concert of the season, to-morrow afternoon, the programme will comprise Wagner's "Faust" overture; Bach's Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte in Rondo Form, arranged for strings by Sigismund Bachrich; Liszt's piano concerto, No. 1, in E flat major, and Brahms's Symphony, No. 1, in C minor, opus 68. Ernest Schelling will be the soloist.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Debut of Ernest Schelling.

AT the last Boston Symphony matinee of this season, Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, March 18, the chief attraction was the New York debut of Ernest Schelling, a pupil of Paderewski, and a pianist of renown in the musical cities of Europe.

Schelling chose the Liszt concerto in E flat as the medium for his debut, and he played it con amore. The influence of Paderewski was very apparent in Schelling's incisive attack, in his excellent pedaling, and in his predilection for warm and varied tone colors. He avoids dynamic extremes, a propensity which enables him to play forte without pounding and pianissimo without drooling. Schelling's finger technic is unusually fleet and crisp, and in the chord and octave passages, if he showed less precision than in the rapid runs and cadenzas, at least he did not use them as the media for brawn display, but kept them well within the musical picture. Age does not seem to wither or custom to stale the infinite charm of the Liszt E flat concerto, except when some players use it as an athletic field and convert their fists into 16 pound hammers. Fortunately, Schelling represents a much higher musical type, and his performance never savors of the merely mechanical. In the slow movement (or section) of the concerto he revealed a poetical conception and a mellow, rich tone, which he used with real art. The finale proved Schelling possessed of temperament, and he encompassed a brilliant and convincing climax. Altogether, this newcomer is a most welcome addition to the few pianists of the season, and displayed such exceptional qualities as promised well for his recital appearances here, which, according to report, are to be made very soon. Schelling was received with enthusiasm, and recalled so many times that an encore became imperative, but was not given.

The orchestra played Wagner's "Faust" overture in clean cut but unromantic fashion. This work does not improve with age, as some Wagnerians are beginning to admit. Three Bach excerpts (in the Bachrich arrangement) and Brahms' C minor symphony ended the program. The afternoon was excessively hot, and one listener remarked aptly after the Brahms symphony, "That is winter music." Leader Gericke seemed to think so, too, for he gave the work a winter reading, heavy, labored and cold.

The Thursday evening concert, on March 16, will linger in the memory because of the magnificent performance of Fritz Kreisler, who played Brahms' violin concerto like a master, and easily carried off the chief honors of the evening. Kreisler has played many times here this winter, and he has always played well, but there was something about his performance of the Brhams concerto which made the work and the reading seem almost transcendental. Kreisler was a tower of strength in the mighty first movement, a poet in the lovely andante and an impassioned son of the Puszta in the fiery Tsigane finale. He has never played with more breadth and authority, or "sung" with more soulful and melting tone than last Thursday. In the cadenza (Kreisler's own) his technic reached the highest flights of virtuosity. No wonder that the audience rose at the player and showered him with its most demonstrative plaudits. Better violin playing than that of Kreisler will not soon be heard in New York, if ever. Willy Hess, the concertmaster, led the orchestral accompaniment and achieved a fine piece of work. It would not have been a bad idea if he had continued and led the rest of the program, which consisted of Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, in the familiar stilted interpretation of Gericke, and the "Manfred" symphony, by Tschalkowsky, which was conducted by the orchestra, and made a splendid impression. The players took the bit in their teeth, figuratively speaking, and ran away from the director, with the best results imaginable. For once the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was vital, human and without a semblance of marionette mechanism.

Among the most interested auditors when Kreisler played were Mr. and Mrs. Paderewski.

Soloist:

Mme. FANNIE BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.

CHESTRA.

stor.

T 8, P. M.

major.

, in F. minor.

ienschlacht."

Kreisler, the Artist.

Mr. Kreisler played Brahms' D major concerto, an orthodox work for violin and orchestra. His performances are familiar to the Boston concertgoer, but Saturday night, with the advantage of a superb band behind him, into whose hands the accompaniment could be safely intrusted, he appeared to the greatest advantage.

He is the artist throughout, and the technical demands in double-stopping, florid running passages and arpeggios were performed with the authority of a master. His original cadenza in the first movement was a marvel of skill. Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, closed the program.

BOSTON BAND HAS TO BOW AFTER PLAYING 'MANFRED'

Tschaikowsky Symphony Stirs Audience in Carnegie Hall.

KREISLER IN A BRAHMS WORK

Plays Concerto with Fine Sweep, and Orchestra, Under Hess, Lends Almost Perfect Support.

N. J. Press — Mar 17 1905

One of the most enthusiastic audiences of the season greeted Mr. Gericke and his Boston Symphony Orchestra at their last evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night. After Tschaikowsky's long "Manfred" symphony the conductor was called to the front repeatedly. Mr. Gericke finally beckoned to his men to rise, and as that body of virtuosos stood up the house resounded with bravos.

It was not Tschaikowsky's tone poem, beautiful as it is in moments, that gave the greatest pleasure of the evening. Brahms's violin concerto, played by Fritz Kreisler, with Hess, the concert master, in Mr. Gericke's place at the conductor's desk, proved the real climax of the concert. This exceptionally noble and beautiful composition had an inspired performance. It seemed those who say they are unmoved by this work must have been shaken in their beliefs last night. Kreisler played with a sweep, intensity and emotional depth he hardly has equaled before this season, displaying at the same time his amazing technical mastery in the racking difficulties the composer had piled up.

Kreisler's success was due in great part, no doubt, to the almost perfect support he had from the incomparable Boston Orchestra under the inspiring leadership of Willy Hess. Mr. Hess proved himself, at the conductor's stand, a man of experience, authority and fine sensibility. He kept his men admirably in hand, defined clearly to them by gesture his demands, and infused into their playing an added zest and enthusiasm.

Tschaikowsky's symphony, which is a free musical interpretation of Byron's "Manfred," is acclaimed by some as one of the composer's greatest productions. It certainly is in length, for it occupies close to an hour. To our way of thinking there are few works of the Russian which bear so clearly the marks of labor and want of true inspiration. There is much to arouse admiration in the workmanship, and certain portions of the first movement—"Manfred's Wanderings and Despair"—and the last, which illustrates his visit to the palace of Arimanes, his invocation to Astarte and his death, reach moving climaxes. But on the whole the musical effects are on the surface.

Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, ended the programme. At the Boston Orchestra's last concert of the season, tomorrow afternoon, the programme will comprise Wagner's "Faust" overture; Bach's Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte in Rondo Form, arranged for strings by Sigismund Bachrich; Liszt's piano concerto, No. 1, in E flat major, and Brahms's Symphony, No. 1, in C minor, opus 68. Ernest Schelling will be the soloist.

PRESS NOTICES. 'S.

Reading, Duluth, St. Paul.

Here are some notices:

It was like coming in from son, we say too much about her the with which heaven has blessed the soared triumphantly, gloriously, tel- chorus, which was the gem of the and ran:

w lost in the distance, le- emed as she listened, u- beseeching, imploring, u- uld not extinguish. n- ng and she took the high B at c- rio and chorus at the end, with ic d God, and His faith shall not e in ensemble not to be forgotten e favor of Reading's music lovers 2 r parts. She sang with much 1 rle the music was particularly strength and power of her voice, eably, rang out remarkably clear

— rteen numbers at Steinway Hall ne Matinee Musicale, completely as a wonderful voice, rich, warm, perfect intonation and a sympathy deep.

rm and a fascinating little way when beginning to sing which fellowship to each individual. which the soft qualities of her d she sang each number straight ho understand music and to those e" and was frequently paid the ational, but she had sung only a ew that the glorious jewel song s of feeling, its light and shade, e became imperative, but was not given.

The orchestra played Wagner's "Faust" overture in clean cut but unromantic fashion. This work does not improve with age, as some Wagnerians are beginning to admit. Three Bach excerpts (in the Bachrich arrangement) and Brahms' C minor symphony ended the program. The afternoon was excessively hot, and one listener remarked aptly after the Brahms symphony, "That is winter music." Leader Gericke seemed to think so, too, for he gave the work a winter reading, heavy, labored and cold.

The Thursday evening concert, on March 16, will linger in the memory because of the magnificent performance of Fritz Kreisler, who played Brahms' violin concerto like a master, and easily carried off the chief honors of the evening. Kreisler has played many times here this winter, and he has always played well, but there was something about his performance of the Brhams concerto which made the work and the reading seem almost transcendental. Kreisler was a tower of strength in the mighty first movement, a poet in the lovely andante and an impassioned son of the Puzta in the fiery Tsigane finale. He has never played with more breadth and authority, or "sung" with more soulful and melting tone than last Thursday. In the cadenza (Kreisler's own) his technic reached the highest flights of virtuosity. No wonder that the audience rose at the player and showered him with its most demonstrative plaudits. Better violin playing than that of Kreisler will not soon be heard in New York, if ever. Willy Hess, the concertmaster, led the orchestral accompaniment and achieved a fine piece of work. It would not have been a bad idea if he had continued and led the rest of the program, which consisted of Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, in the familiar stilted interpretation of Gericke, and the "Manfred" symphony, by Tschaikowsky, which was conducted by the orchestra, and made a splendid impression. The players took the bit in their teeth, figuratively speaking, and ran away from the director, with the best results imaginable. For once the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was vital, human and without a semblance of marionette mechanism.

Among the most interested auditors when Kreisler played were Mr. and Mrs. Paderewski.

Soloist:

Mme. FANNIE BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.

CHESTRA.

tor.

T 8, P. M.

major.

, in F. minor.

enschlacht."

208

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 25, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART,

SYMPHONY in D major, "without minuet," (K. 504)

I. Adagio: Allegro.

II. Andante.

III. Finale: Presto.

GRIEG,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in A minor, op. 16.

I. Allegro molto moderato.

II. Adagio.

III. Allegro moderato molto e marcato.

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF,

"SADKO." a Musical Picture, op. 5.
(First time.)

RICHARD STRAUSS,

INTRODUCTION to Act II. of the opera "Guntram"

Soloist:

Mr. CORNELIUS RUEBNER.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

209

"SADKO" PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Herald ———— Nov. 26.

Rimsky-Koraykoff's Musical Picture,
a Pretty Fancy, Highly Colored,
Is Given for the First Time in Boston.

ORCHESTRA TOO LARGE TO PLAY IT PROPERLY

Cornelius Ruebner, Pianist of the Occasion, Plays Grieg's Romantic Concerto Unromantically and Uninterestingly.

The programme of the 19th Symphony concert given last evening in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gerlicke conductor, was as follows:

Symphony in D major (K. 504).....Mozart
Piano concerto in A minor.....Grieg
"Sadko," a musical picture. Rimsky-Korsakoff
Prelude to Act II of "Guntram"....R. Strauss

However well this little symphony of Mozart may be played as regards eu-phony, proportion, general finesse—and it was played exceedingly well last night—the work is nevertheless ineffective in Symphony Hall. It would undoubtedly be a pleasure to hear it, and works of a like nature, performed by a small but carefully chosen band of players in a hall no larger than, say, Chickering. Then the old music would have more than a historical interest. It is true that large orchestras were assembled occasionally in Mozart's period for special occasions—orchestras of 200, and even of 400, were not wholly unknown in Vienna—but these conditions were rare, chiefly in aid of a pension fund for musicians. The orchestra of the opera house in Prague, where this symphony was probably first performed, included only six violins, two violas and two basses. No doubt other strings were added for concert purposes, but the symphony was designed for a small orchestra in a comparatively small room.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko" was played here for the first time, and we have been unable to find any record of a previous performance in this country.
It is one of the composer's earliest works. Written about 1867, it was played in Germany as early as 1876. The composer revised it in 1891. When it was performed in Vienna, at a time when Rubinstein was held to be the great

Russian composer, the only one worthy of consideration, good Dr. Hanslick wrote a violent article against it. He found bombs and nihilism and the general upheaval of society, law and order in this little piece, which now seems to us all fanciful and pretty.

A composer of rare gifts once said to us that he was born hating Weber;
Hanslick was born for the purpose of hating programme music in general and Russian programme music in particular.
"Sadko" is by no means a great or imposing work. Rimsky-Korsakoff himself does not probably take it so seriously; but the music is fanciful, highly colored, characteristic, a picturesque illustration of an old legend of Novgorod.

The work is simply a picture; the thematic contents are in themselves of slight value, there is little or no attempt at any development; the picture is impressionistic. The piece was played in the appropriately fanciful spirit and Sadko thrown overboard, and Sadko playing on his gusli, that the Sea King and his guests bidden to the wedding might dance, and the roar of the thereby excited Ocean, the bridegroom of the Sea King's daughter, were all brought vividly before the sympathetic hearer. It is not unlikely that any one who finds "The Thousand Nights and a Night" a bore, and legends of any country foolishness will wonder why this musical picture "Sadko" was produced here at all after so many years.
The music last night gave pleasure to many and Mr. Gerlicke was obliged to bow his acknowledgments.

The piano concerto by Grieg is still one of the concertos worth playing and hearing, for, unlike some of Grieg's music, it has more than a parochial interest and it has breadth and haunting sensuousness. It should be played in a most romantic spirit, often as though it were an improvisation. Mr. Cornelius Ruebner, who made his first appearance in Boston, is now at the head of the music department of Columbia University. Is it possible that he was chosen as the pianist of last night's concert ex-officio? Mr. Ruebner was at the head of a music school in Karlsruhe before he was called to Columbia; he taught the piano and he composed music. He may be a prudent pedagogue; his music is no doubt written in approved orthodox fashion, but he is not the man to play Grieg's concerto. His technic was evidently acquired in the black walnut period of the art, and it is now warped and cracked.

A technic that is not always fully adequate may be sometimes forgiven when there is a fine exhibition of aesthetic feeling or of a prevailing poetic spirit.
Mr. Ruebner's interpretation was inherently unromantic, matter of fact, prosaically uninteresting. Seldom have we heard such an uninspired and jejune performance of a beautiful and imaginative work. Mr. Ruebner was courteously welcomed and applauded.

A. Hale

TWO FRIDAY SYMPHONY TICKETS

In Row G, 30, 31, may be secured for $30.00 each. Address S.P.W., Boston Transcript.

(A)

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL SEATS—EE 20-31

Are for sale for the season. Price $21.00 each.
Please address R.M.J., Boston Transcript.

(A)

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The nineteenth symphony concert took place last Saturday evening, the soloist being Mr. Cornelius Ruebner, and this the programme:

Mozart: Symphony in D major, "without minuet" (K. 504).
Grieg: Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 16.
Rimsky-Korsakoff: "Sadko," a Musical Picture, Op. 5. (First time.)
Richard Strauss: Introduction to Act II. of the opera "Guntram."

The leading feature of the concert was the exquisite and brilliant performance of the Mozart symphony, a work which, in the hearing, proves none the less delightful because it lacks a minuet; three movements of Mozart or Haydn at a sitting are quite enough. Although every lover of Mozart must wish that his orchestral works might be heard in Jordan Hall played by a small, well-balanced orchestra, the last few performances of Mozart symphonies from Mr. Gericke has conclusively proved that these works, if treated with sufficient care, can sound exceedingly well even in Symphony Hall. On Saturday evening there were few harsh noises in the course of the D major symphony, but, on the contrary, a lively play of charming tone color, a wealth of most delicate phrasing, and also inspiring animation. The hearty applause that greeted the finale of the symphony showed that people are not tired of Mozart when they hear his music played as well as is possible even under not the most favorable circumstances. To hear this same symphony from Mr. Gericke and a chosen band in Jordan Hall or Chickering Hall would be an event of consequence. By the way, are there not musical people in plenty who would buy tickets to hear a concert of Mozart music in Jordan Hall, or Chickering Hall, the programme to include the never-performed finale to "Don Giovanni"?

The second feature of Saturday's concert was the first performance in Boston, and probably in America, of Rimsky-Korsakoff's musical picture "Sadko." This composition, it appears, was written as early as in 1867, although it was revised by the composer in 1891. It is a musical illustration of the old Russian tale of Sadko, a noted player on the gusli, a musical instrument once popular in Russia. This musician, while on a voyage, is becalmed on the high seas; to propitiate the Sea King, he is thrown overboard by his fellow-passengers. Sinking into the depths of the sea, he comes upon a merry revel, for the Sea King is marrying his daughter to the Ocean. To make the guests more contented, Sadko plays upon his gusli, to the sounds of which all the Sea-world dance, more and more wildly, the waves becoming ever stormier and stormier. Sadko breaks the strings of his instrument; the dancing comes to an end, and the sea grows still and dark.

One reading this legend with the memory of "The Thousand and One Nights" suite ringing in his ears, expects more from the musical picture "Sadko" than he finds in it. Despite its comparatively recent revision, "Sadko" remains the work of an untried hand, infinitely less skilful than that which wrought the brilliant "Scheherazade." Taking it for what it is, however, the piece played the other night is attractive music, an example of rather more naive programme music than we often hear—the composer, apparently, having attempted actually to suggest material conditions and happenings, instead of the thoughts and feelings inspired by them. In the main, he surely met with success, for in his music one can follow closely the course of the story of Sadko. Although Rimsky-Korsakoff's picture of a becalmed sea is neither so strongly felt nor so cleverly expressed as Mendelssohn's in the overture "Meerstille und glückliche Fahrt," on the whole his setting of the story is both imaginative and picturesque, the orgy of the dancing guests being especially well done. If far from great, the work is so agreeable that one must wonder at its not having been produced in America before now, since agreeable music is not too plenty. The performance was admirable.

Mr. Ruebner, the head of the music department at Columbia University, did wrong to attempt to play the Grieg concerto, a work of singular charm, beauty and romance, which, while not of extraordinary technical difficulty, yet demands an interpreter of fine feeling for color, of poetry and of romantic disposition. In his place Mr. Ruebner is probably very well, but his place is distinctly not that of soloist at a symphony concert.

The programme for Saturday's concert will be as follows, the soloist being Mr. Karl Barleben; Tragic Overture, Brahms; Concerto for violin, Tchaikovsky; Italian Serenade (first time), Hugo Wolf; Symphony in E minor, Hans Huber.

R. R. G.

"SADKO" HEARD FOR THE FIRST TIME

Ruebner's Performance of Grieg's Concerto Lacking—Band Too Big for Symphony.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was wide in its variety and full of genuine interest. From Mozart to Richard Strauss is an enormous gulf, filled up in this case by Grieg and Rimsky-Korsakoff. Thus we had early German and late German, Norwegian and Russian flavors in one large musical dish, and the total result was appetizing.

The pure and fragrant Mozart symphony in D major, like most other small gems, needs a smaller casket than that afforded by Symphony Hall. Expanding it merely distorts its true meaning, and, although the performance was appreciative and fine, its effect was not great.

Grieg's Lofty Genius.

There are those who believe that Grieg is merely a maker of sadly sweet Scandinavian tunes, that "Peer Gynt" is his highest achievement, and that all that he has done will soon fade from the world. A rehearing of his larger forms of composition does not bear them out. To say nothing of his exquisitely fascinating quartet for strings, his A minor pianoforte concerto gives evidence of Grieg's lofty genius, and proves that he is not destined to immediate extinction at any rate. It is full of haunting themes, backed by a gloriously colored orchestration; it is spontaneous and it is well rounded, if not always well joined together, in its beauty.

Mr. Cornelius Ruebner, who played the pianoforte part, is a Dane with German polish, and he is now at the head of the department of music at Columbia. As a Scandinavian, he might have been expected to interpret the Grieg music with feeling and poetic charm. He exhibited no romanticism, however. His playing was hard and dry, nor were the mere technical demands it made always met by him.

Orchestra Wanting.

It was a mediocre performance, and the orchestral portion, led by Mr. Hess, was often boisterous and unimaginative.

Although Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone poem, "Sadko," nearly forty years old, it had its first Boston performance last Saturday evening. One can imagine the howls of anguish it must have called forth from the German classicists of its day. It is program music, pure and simple, depicting the submarine experiences of a celebrated gusli player and his reception by the sea king.

Tempestuous Ending.

It is very effective, beautiful and stormy by turns, the final catastrophe, being a tremendous outburst of brass, drums, cymbals and gongs. The whole was played magnificently.

After this bit of strenuousity, Richard Strauss' introduction to act II. of "Guntram" sounded quite orthodox and melodious. It is, in fact, a somewhat conventional thing, yet scored with that richness that marks Strauss as the greatest master of orchestration of his day.

SATURDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS—
S 25-23, and 1st balcony A 32-33 centre for sale; price $22 each. Address W. L. T., Boston Transcript. (A)

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Exceptional location and price; aisle, left balcony; evening. Address S.A.V., Boston Transcript. (A)

MUSICAL MATTERS

Echoes of Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

Interesting Program for the Recital by Paderewski.

Events of the Week and Personal Gossip.

Globe Nov 26 1905

Cornelius Ruebner, the piano soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, is at the head of the department of music at Columbia college, New York, and is the successor of Edward A. MacDowell to that position. Mr. Ruebner played the solo part of Grieg's A minor piano concerto, the other numbers on the program being Mozart's D major symphony, "Sadko," a musical picture by Rimsky-Korsakoff, given for the first time here, and the introduction to the opera "Guntram," by R. Strauss. The Grieg concerto is not very familiar to concert patrons, for it does not offer the pianist many opportunities to shine in solo work, the orchestration being so abundant in passages for the heavier instruments and so vigorous in tone in two or the movements that the piano part has but little prominence, except in the adagio, where there are many brilliant bits of melody.

A peculiar phase of the work are the repetitions of phrases given to the orchestra and piano, or vice versa, which doubtless is the reason why the concerto has been termed by some musicians and critics as "patchwork." It does not show Grieg at his best, although there is a mass of splendid material skilfully handled by the composer. Mr. Ruebner played his part admirably, like a sincere and earnest artist, but there was little chance to judge of his full equipment of ability through his chosen medium. His style of work is very pleasing, he is unaffected in manner and certainly he played the fortissimo passages with splendid vigor and celerity. All the florid fingering of the second movement and the finale, when it could be heard above the orchestra, was distinct, smooth and of beautiful quality. The tremendous climax to the closing movement prevented any appreciation of his skill in arpeggios and chord passages, for the piano was almost inaudible. Mr Ruebner was received with great favor.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff picture, "Sadko," which was played for the first time here, is a hurly-burly of tonal effects, weird, fantastic and vigorous as a rule, with a charming Slav dance theme running through the movement up to the climax, which is a mournful and delicate melody fading away into pianissimo. The orchestra gave the Grieg accompaniment in excellent style and in the "Sadko" the barbaric melody and dance were played with the necessary dash and abandon, the strings deserving special praise for their ensemble work.

Mozart's symphony, aside from the somewhat antiquated form of the opening movement, proved thoroughly enjoyable. Very daintily was the second part in exploitation and the rondo of the closing movement was executed with exquisite grace of expression. The Strauss number was given with good effect.

This week's program will be as follows: "Tragic" overture, Brahms; concerto for violin, Tchaikowsky; "Italian Serenade," first time here, Hugo Wolf and Hans Huber's E minor symphony. Karl Barleben will be the soloist.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

The programme of the 19th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall this afternoon, Mr. Gericke, conductor, will include a symphony in D major by Mozart, composed in Prague and without a minuet; Grieg's familiar but always interesting piano concerto—the piano part will be played by Mr. Cornelius Ruebner, a Dane by birth, but of German descent, and now at the head of the music department of Columbia University; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," a musical picture, and the introduction to act 2 of Richard Strauss' "Guntram."

"Sadko" will be performed here for the first time, and we are inclined to think for the first time in America. It is programme music, illustrative of an old folk legend of Novgorod. Sadko, a famous gusli player, become rich, voyages to Asia for the sake of merchandise. The ship on its return home is becalmed, and lots are drawn as to who will be a propitiatory offering to the sea king. Sadko is chosen by fate and thrown overboard with his gusli. He sinks to the palace of the king of the sea, who is celebrating the marriage of his daughter to the ocean. The king commands Sadko to play on his gusli. The music sets them all dancing, and the sea rises and roars, till ships go down. Then Sadko breaks the strings of his gusli, and there is again a calm. The work is one of Rimsky-Korsakoff's earliest, but he revised it in 1892. The prelude to act two of "Guntram" is of a festival nature.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Nov 27 1905

Mozart—Symphony in D major, No. 38 (K. 505.)
Grieg—Concerto for Pianoforte.

Soloist: Mr. Cornelius Ruebner.

Rimsky-Korsakoff—Tableau Musical, "Sadko."
(First time.)

Richard Strauss—Introduction to Act II., "Guntram."

We were glad to see the Mozart symphony receive enthusiastic and long-continued applause. The public seem to mark, in a very significant manner, their appreciation of the clear-cut, intelligible, classical music, which some reviewer would persuade us should be laid altogether upon the shelf. Yet it must be confessed that some parts of Mozart's symphonies have faded greatly. Haydn's works in this form (if we except Mozart's G minor and "Jupiter" symphonies) wear better, probably because he does not attempt to become heroic or heavily dramatic.

It is in the attempts at dramatic power that Mozart's symphonies become tame to modern ears, firstly because we are accustomed to cyclones and cataclysms in this direction at present, and secondly because Mozart's effects were never intended for a Symphony Hall. If the orchestra were heard in Jordan Hall the effect of the finale of the symphony of this concert might become impressive.

Once upon a time the sforzando effects, the bursts of kettledrums, and trumpets, and the secondary seventh chords, which appear in this symphony, must have been regarded as excessively powerful, but we use as ponderous effects as these in modern lullabies and slumber songs!

There was some good flute work in the finale, which is rather astonishing, for Mozart did not like the flute—in spite of his having written a concerto for harp and flute. Even in the "Magic Flute" there is but little flute-playing.

Columbia College runs to pianists. After having had a solo pianist, Mr. MacDowell, as head of its musical department for some years, it now has another in Mr. Cornelius Ruebner. This latter gentleman played steadily and sturdily through the Grieg concerto, succeeding in the heroic touches and failing in the subtler and more tender ones. He made no errors except that of appearing in this subtle and romantic concerto. In the finale his power and earnestness won the audience, and he was recalled 3 times.

The concerto is a work that wears well. If only Strauss and especially D'Indy had the thematic wealth of Grieg they would be the recognized masters of the present. The concerto, for all its touches of Norwegian melancholy, is a bold and masculine work and might well be called "the Heroic concerto."

"Sadko" is a kind of Russian Jonah, who was thrown overboard by his shipmates and, instead of wasting his time in the solitude of a whale's stomach, became the chief guest at a submarine "Solree Musical" given by the Muscovite Neptune. His playing upon his lyre (and Russian lyres are well known in diplomatic circles) caused the sea to become tempestuous and sank many ships.

"Il brisa et engloutit les valsseaux," says the score, and Sadko does as much damage to the Russian fleet as Togo himself. Then he breaks the strings of his instrument and the sea becomes calm again. But what eventually becomes of Sadko we do not know, although he returns home safely in the composer's opera of the same name.

It is a fairly large score, of about the orchestral force of the finale of Beethoven's 9th symphony, minus voices and contrabassoon, and plus a harp. The picture of a flat sea is not as dramatic as that given by the despised Mendelssohn, with a smaller orchestra. Matters become more interesting when the companions of Sadko throw him overboard into the middle of the "Tannhauser" overture! He sinks at once in Wagner's sea of tone and begins his lute-playing quite a la Beckmesser, developing, however, into a Peer Gyntian vein.

There is some interesting figure development in the work, and in the midst of all the exciting picture the composer is intelligible and often melodic.

Strauss' "Guntram" prelude was a good dessert to the musical meal. It is a graphic picture of a festival, without in any degree suggesting the various festivities which Wagner has created. It begins with a very striking bit of melody which has something of mediaeval character in its measures. In his prelude to the first act of "Guntram" Strauss was not so fortunate in escaping the spell of Wagner, for there are some clear reminiscences of "Lohengrin" to be found in that number; but in this second prelude he manages to steer clear of anything like imitation and the portrayal of triumph and of pompous merry-making was both striking and original. The work, which is intensely modern, was dedicated to his parents, by the composer. We wonder what his father, who was one of the most conservative of German musicians, thought of it! Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS, EE 8, 9

FOR SALE at $18.50 each, by addressing B.T.J., Boston Transcript. (A)

TWO SATURDAY EVENING SYMPHONY SEATS IN FIRST ROW, FIRST BALCONY, CENTRE, are for sale at $20 each. Address N. D. O., Boston Transcript. (A)

SEATS JJ, 24, 25 FOR THE FRIDAY SYMPHONIES are for sale for the season, price $24 each. Please address J. H. V., Boston Transcript. (A)

216

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 1, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS,

TRAGIC OVERTURE, op. 81.

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in D major, op. 35.

I. Allegro moderato.

II. Canzonetta.

III. Allegro vivacissimo.

HUGO WOLF,

ITALIAN SERENADE for SMALL ORCHESTRA.
(First time.)

HANS HUBER,

SYMPHONY No. 2, in E minor, op. 115.

I. Allegro con fuoco.

II. Allegro con fuoco non troppo.

III. Adagio ma non troppo.

IV. Finale: "Metamorphoses suggested by pictures by Büchlin."

Soloist:

Mr. KARL BARLEBEN.

118

Mr. KARL BARLEBEN, violinist, was born at Bremen, Germany, in 1866. He at first studied painting, but in his nineteenth year he turned toward music, and was a pupil at the Leipsic Conservatory from 1886 to 1889, where his violin teacher was Brodsky. He has been concert-master at Hanover, leader of a string quartet, and a teacher at the Conservatory at Barmen-Elberfeld. He has been associated with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for several years. In 1901-1903 he travelled as a virtuoso in Europe, and played in Berlin, St. Petersburg, Hanover, Brunswick, Leipsic, Hamburg, and other cities.

20TH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Second Performance of Huber's Symphony Is Given—Programme of High Order. Harold

The programme of the 20th Symphony concert, given in Symphony Hall last evening, Mr. Gerlicke, conductor, was as follows:

Tragic overture.....Brahms
Violin concerto in D major.....Tschalkowsky
Italian serenade.....Hugo Wolf
(First time.)

Symphony in E minor, No. 2.....Huber

The orchestral performance was of a high order. The overture by Brahms is a noble work. It is not, perhaps, so profoundly tragic in its sentiment as Mr. Chadwick's "Melpomene," in the expression of bodement, in the suggestion of the tale of Pelops' line or of Maeterlinck's old man by the fireside; but the mood is well established and there is a certain lofty serenity in the musical portraiture of sorrow that is more effective than the furlous and discordant woe of ultra-modern composers who put their trust in whole batteries of pulsatile instruments; just as there is more true tragic feeling in the simple music of Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" suite than in Taneieff's prologue to the tale of Orestes.

One may well wonder today at the extraordinary judgment passed by Edward Hanslick on Tschalkowsky's violin concerto when it was first performed in Vienna, as one may wonder that the writer included it in a bound volume of his feuilletons. The judgment was so violently, so absurdly unjust. "Music that stinks in the ear." The work is not one of Tschalkowsky's best, but it is an eminently sincere composition, one without trickery and applause traps. The first movement is soberly planned; the canzonetta has a distinctive charm in its folk-song melancholy; and the finale is characteristically Russian in its dance tunes with sadness in the hearts of the dancers, in the endless and oriental repetition of a phrase.

Mr. Barleben played the concerto in a highly creditable manner. His reading was thoughtfully musical; there was a poetic spirit in his interpretation of the canzonetta. In the finale there might have been more abandon and appropriate coarseness. For the elemental coarseness of a great man is not to be ignored, not to be sandpapered.

The Italian serenade of the unfortunate Hugo Wolf was produced here in the form of a string quartet early in the season by the Knelsels, and it was repeated at their last concert. The orchestral version performed here last night was the original, but this has been revised by Max Reger. It would be interesting to know just what Reger did to it. In spite of delightful effects of color, the work leaves the impression that it was thought out originally for the piano. Wolf's "Penthesila" is a proof that he was not a great orchestral colorist; that he did not write fluently for the orchestra. Mr. Ferir played the solo viola with rare beauty of tone; but the quartet version on the whole seems the more effective.

219

Huber's "Boecklin" symphony has been played here before. It is a sound and carefully made composition without any marked display of imagination, and the one quality of any work that attempts to be a translation into music of specific pictures by a painter or endeavors to fix by music the painter's characteristics in the mind of a hearer should surely be imagination. Huber's task was a wellnigh impossible one. In the first place he had to reckon with the fact that many in the audience might not be familiar with the pictures that suggested music to him. In the second place, he that writes such music should have as much imagination as the painter. Huber is an orthodox, well-trained musician; but he is not a Boecklin.

SYMPHONY PLAYS MOST ARTISTICALLY

Journal
Several Selections Heard Here Formerly Are Given in a Decidedly Notable Manner.

The twentieth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was a well-balanced presentation of music that made many and varied appeals to the listener. It was marked, also, by as fine and artistic playing as we have had this year, all things considered.

Brahms' "Tragic Overture," the first

Mr. KARL BARLEBEN, violinist, was born at Bremen, Germany, in 1866. He at first studied painting, but in his nineteenth year he turned toward music, and was a pupil at the Leipsic Conservatory from 1886 to 1889, where his violin teacher was Brodsky. He has been concert-master at Hanover, leader of a string quartet, and a teacher at the Conservatory at Barmen-Elberfeld. He has been associated with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for several years. In 1901-1903 he travelled as a virtuoso in Europe, and played in Berlin, St. Petersburg, Hanover, Brunswick, Leipsic, Hamburg, and other cities.

20TH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Second Performance of Huber's Symphony Is Given—Programme of High Order. Harold

The programme of the 20th Symphony concert, given in Symphony Hall last evening, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Tragic overture.....Brahms
Violin concerto in D major.....Tschalkowsky
Italian serenade.....Hugo Wolf
(First time.)

Symphony in E minor, No. 2.....Huber

The orchestral performance was of a high order. The overture by Brahms is a noble work. It is not, perhaps, so profoundly tragic in its sentiment as Mr. Chadwick's "Melpomene," in the expression of bodement, in the suggestion of the tale of Pelops' line or of Maeterlinck's old man by the fireside; but the mood is well established and there is a certain lofty serenity in the musical portraiture of sorrow that is more effective than the furious and discordant woe of ultra-modern composers who put their trust in whole batteries of pulsatile instruments; just as there is more true tragic feeling in the simple music of Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" suite than in Taneieff's prologue to the tale of Orestes.

One may well wonder today at the extraordinary judgment passed by Edward Hanslick on Tschalkowsky's violin concerto when it was first performed in Vienna, as one may wonder that the writer included it in a bound volume of his feuilletons. The judgment was so violently, so absurdly unjust. "Music that stinks in the ear." The work is not one of Tschalkowsky's best, but it is an eminently sincere composition, one without trickery and applause traps. The first movement is soberly planned; the canzonetta has a distinctive charm in its folk-song melancholy; and the finale is characteristically Russian in its dance tunes with sadness in the hearts of the dancers, in the endless and oriental repetition of a phrase.

Mr. Barleben played the concerto in a highly creditable manner. His reading was thoughtfully musical; there was a poetic spirit in his interpretation of the canzonetta. In the finale there might have been more abandon and appropriate coarseness. For the elemental coarseness of a great man is not to be ignored, not to be sand-papery.

The Italian serenade of the unfortunate Hugo Wolf was produced here in the form of a string quartet early in the season by the Kneiseis, and it was repeated at their last concert. The orchestral version performed here last night was the original, but this has been revised by Max Reger. It would be interesting to know just what Reger did to it. In spite of delightful effects of color, the work leaves the impression that it was thought out originally for the piano. Wolf's "Penthisela" is a proof that he was not a great orchestral colorist; that he did not write fluently for the orchestra. Mr. Ferir played the solo viola with rare beauty of tone; but the quartet version on the whole seems the more effective.

Huber's "Boecklin" symphony has been played here before. It is a sound and carefully made composition without any marked display of imagination, and the one quality of any work that attempts to be a translation into music of specific pictures by a painter or endeavors to fix by music the painter's characteristics in the mind of a hearer should surely be imagination. Huber's task was a wellnigh impossible one. In the first place he had to reckon with the fact that many in the audience might not be familiar with the pictures that suggested music to him. In the second place, he that writes such music should have as much imagination as the painter. Huber is an orthodox, well-trained musician; but he is not a Boecklin.

SYMPHONY PLAYS MOST ARTISTICALLY

Several Selections Heard Here Formerly Are Given in a Decidedly Notable Manner. Toward

The twentieth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was a well-balanced presentation of music that made many and varied appeals to the listener. It was marked, also, by as fine and artistic playing as we have had this year, all things considered.

Brahms' "Tragic Overture," the first

work on the program, wears admirably and bears its name more honorably with each successive hearing. With no onslaughts of noise, it yet impresses its somber suggestiveness by its inherent nobility of gloom.

Mr. Barleben, one of the second violins of the orchestra, played Tschalkowsky's violin concerto in D major, and did it admirably as well as modestly. This work, which Brodsky made so boisterous, if not savage, in the Tremont Theater some twelve years ago, calls for a more fiery style, in its last movement at least, than Mr. Barleben possesses, but otherwise his performance of it was altogether fine.

Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade," heard here several times as a quartet for strings, was given in its original orchestral form, with revisions by Reger. It is a fascinating bit of tone color in any form, but on the whole it appears to be of greater charm in its smaller shape. Mr. Ferir's playing of the viola solo passages was noteworthy.

The Huber symphony attempting to draw in tone a composer's impressions of the pictures of Boecklin is an honest, clean-cut musical work which sounds well as absolute music, but scarcely suggests the highly imaginative paintings of the artist, or paintings of any artist, for that matter. It is well nigh impossible to transfer a particular set of emotions from the canvas to the clef. Huber, at all events, could not do it. His work, therefore, may as well be judged without reference to Boecklin.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

Here is the programme of the twentieth symphony concert, of which the soloist was Mr. Karl Barleben, on Saturday evening last, in Symphony Hall.

Brahms: Tragic Overture, Op. 81.

Tschalkovsky: Concerto for Violin, in D major, Op. 35.

Hugo Wolf: Italian Serenade for Small Orchestra.

(First time.)

Hans Huber: Symphony No. 2, in E minor, Op. 115.

The air was heavy in Symphony Hall after the Paderewski recital, and the concert proved rather dull—probably a case of cause and effect, since the programme of the concert was interesting enough and the performance was brilliant. But, whatever the cause, the fact remains that enthusiasm, aroused by the splendid reading of the Brahms tragic overture, steadily declined throughout the evening, which was a long one, with a symphony at the end which might better have appeared at the beginning.

It is questionable, indeed, if the symphony need have reappeared at all. Huber admired Böcklin's peculiar pictures to such an extent that he wrote a symphony inspired by certain of them. The work may quite likely be of interest to such people as are familiar with Böcklin's art. But, here in Boston, how many of us have had opportunity to become familiar with Böcklin's pictures? In a window on Boylston street there have lately been exhibited several prints after Böcklin, but of the audience Saturday night few people can possibly be well acquainted with the painter's original works. If Huber had been a man of sufficient calibre to write a symphony in itself beautiful and imaginative, one could listen to it very well without a knowledge of the pictures that brought him inspiration, as Liszt's "Todtentanz" is effective for persons who have not had the good fortune to visit Pisa, or who, if they have, paid slight attention to the Orcagna frescoes. Huber, however, is not a man of powerful genius, and his symphony proves more pretentious than interesting.

The novelty of the concert, Hugo Wolf's "Italian Serenade," was only a semi-novelty, the Kneisel Quartet having played the piece twice this winter in a version made by the composer for string quartet, the first time with tremendous success, the second time with less. Charming and pretty as the composition is, on a second hearing it showed itself less noteworthy than one had thought, and now, in orchestral garb, it seems of still less account. Oddly enough, the serenade for orchestra and the serenade for string quartet sound little alike, the latter being gay and lively, the former, while much more like a serenade, sounding labored and incoherent. Although exquisitely played, the orchestral version made but little effect, whereas the quartet arrangement excited enthusiasm.

There was also the Tschalkovsky violin concerto, played by Mr. Karl Barleben, a member of the orchestra who has not before appeared here in the capacity of soloist. Evidently a player of ability, with a pleasant tone, the power to play better in tune than most violinists, an excellent technique, and thorough musicianliness, Mr. Barleben would have shown more sagacity had he chosen a concerto by Viextemps than the Tschalkovsky work, since he is far from possessing the temperament by the display of which this concerto can alone be made effective. Mr. Barleben was happiest in the slow movement, playing it very artistically indeed. He was warmly applauded. The programme for Saturday's concert is as follows: Smetana, Overture, "The Kiss" (first time). Handel, Concerto Grosso, No. 12, for two solo violins, solo violoncello and string orchestra. Saint-Saëns, Symphonie Poem, "The Youth of Hercules." Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"; first performance, April 7, 1803, in Vienna. Apr. 3, 1905 R. R. G.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adm. Apr. 4, 1905 PROGRAMME.

Brahms.....Tragic Overture
Tschalkowsky.....Concerto for Violin
Soloist, Mr. Karl Barleben.

Hugo Wolf.....Italian Serenade (first time)
Hans Huber.....Symphony in E minor

It was a very earnest concert from first to last, each selection requiring some musical intelligence on the part of the auditor; there was not a single number on the programme that could fairly be called popular or entirely easy of comprehension. The Brahms overture loses nothing of its dignity by repeated hearing. It received a perfect performance.

Mr. Barleben made a decided success with Tschalkowsky's violin concerto. He was not entirely equal in performance, but his broad bowing in the G string work, which is so prominent in the finale, was very finely done, and the harmonics of the same movement were very pure and full-toned. The double-stopping of the first movement and the sympathetic quality of tone in the second movement are also to be chronicled with praise. Once in a while one desired more power and even more brutality, for this work has its savage touches.

It was just these fierce Muscovite effects that set the critics so thoroughly against the concerto in its early days—this and the malevolence of Hanslick. Spite of some uninspired passages in the first of the concerto, it has the true spirit of the Russian folk-music, which gives it a peculiar force. Its flavor might not please a musical Chesterfield any more than the writings of Maxime Gorky would.

Tschalkowsky makes less of the orchestra in this concerto than is his wont, but all that there was in the score was well brought out by Mr. Hess, our "concerto-conductor." There is a strong element of contrast between the elegant lace-handkerchief grief of the slow movement and the utterly woe-begone misery of the finale. Your true Muscovite makes no halfway work with dejection. The audience seemed to appreciate both the work and its interpretation, and Mr. Barleben was recalled over and over again with great enthusiasm.

Wolf's "Italian Serenade" is more effective in its orchestral version than as a string quartette. It has been introduced to Boston by the Kneisel Quartette in the latter guise. As a quartette it largely resolves itself into a violin solo with accompaniment, but in the orchestral score it has prominent passages for viola, violoncello and other instruments. It is light and melodic and contains many suggestions of bird carols and dance rhythms. It is a charming gossamer web with sufficient vagueness and suggestion to place it in the modern school of impressionism. It is not without its bizarre touches. It is rather subjective than objective music; it does not clearly picture scenes of Italian life, but it causes the auditor to dream of them.

Hans Huber's pictorial symphony grows greatly upon a second hearing. It has the merit of working steadily up to a climax, its last movement being by far its greatest. It has been so recently performed that we need not tell its story again, merely reminding the reader that this is the work that celebrates the Swiss painter Boecklin, and its movements are inspired by different works of that artist. It is a good example of the correlation of the arts.

Poetry inspires music, why should painting not do so as well? Last evolved his "Todtentanz" and his "Battle of the Huns" from paintings; Paine wreathed 2 pictures of the Isles of Shoals, by Appleton Brown, into "An Island Fantasy"; Boecklin himself has been set to music, outside of this symphony, by Weingartner. Nevertheless this is the only time that an entire picture gallery has been portrayed in tones.

Many are the inspirations of music, yet the variation form of composition seems most prone to seek unusual stimuli. Handel set a blacksmith to variations (although we do not guarantee the authenticity of this party). Rameau varied a clucking hen, Strauss gave the phases of Don Quixote's career in variations, Elgar made a number of his friends stand sponsor to a set of variations, and here we have a sort of Art-club finale in the same form.

Such variations as those of Strauss, Elgar and Huber are upon the border line between variation and development, and show an interesting new path which the modern may take in musical form. In the present symphony these variations were not only beautiful in themselves, but served to display the technique of several instruments in "obligati."

The flute, clarinette, harp, first violin (solo), all had their opportunity, and the result was a display of virtuosity that one does not often obtain in an orchestral work.

The symphony is worth hearing again soon. It is one of the great compositions of the modern repertoire, and it is not the less great because it avoids eccentricities. The use of the organ in the finale added a peculiar majesty and power to that movement.

Louis C. Elson.

ITALIEN, op 45.

ist:

SCHMEDES.

ble to appear, and Professor Hess has Violin, in G minor, by Max Bruch.

222

Symphony Hall.

---

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

---

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, AT 8, P. M.

---

Programme.

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY in F major, No. 3.

---

MOZART,

ARIA.

HUGO WOLF,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Penthesilea."
(First time.)

WAGNER,

CLOSING SCENE from "Die Götterdämmerung."

---

Soloist:

Mme. GADSKI.

224

225

Symphony Hall.

---

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

---

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 8, AT 8, P. M.

---

Programme.

Beethoven
~~SMETANA,~~

Leonora No. 3
OVERTURE to the Opera, "The Kiss."
(First time.)

HANDEL,

CONCERTO GROSSO, No. 12, in B minor.
Largo. — Allegro, Larghetto e piano, Largo, Allegro.

SAINT-SAËNS,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Youth of Hercules."
No. 4, op. 50.

---

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica."
op. 55.
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo; Allegro vivace. Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
(First performance, April 7, 1805, in Vienna.)

"EROICA" GIVEN ON CENTENARY

That and "Leonore" No. 3 Overture
Given at 21st Symphony Concert as Tribute to Beethoven—Anniversary Really Fell in December.

"EROICA" SEEMS LONG, AS COMPOSER FEARED

Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 and Saint-Saens' "Youth of Hercules" Are Other Numbers of Programme.

Herald — Apr. 9, 1905

The programme of the 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr.
Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Leonore" No. 3.....Beethoven
Concerto Grosso No. 12, in B minor.....Handel
"The Youth of Hercules".....Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 3, E flat major, "Eroica".....Beethoven

The programme was suddenly changed, possibly as a tribute to Beethoven, whose "Eroica" symphony was first performed in Vienna, April 7, 1805. The overture, "Leonore" No. 3, was substituted for the overture to Smetana's opera "The Kiss," which had been announced.

The "Eroica" was first performed 100 years ago on April 7, according to the authoritative biographers of Beethoven and according to evidence contemporaneous with the performance. Yet Austrian journals this season have spoken of March 7 as the date of the concert, and this date was observed by the Royal orchestra of Dresden at its symphony concert. As a matter of fact the very first performance was at a private concert at Prince Lobkowitz's some time in December of 1804, when the composer conducted and came to grief in the second half of the first allegro, so that a fresh start was necessary. And what were the criticisms at the first public performance? Beethoven again conducted, and some one shouted from the gallery: "I'd give another kreutzer if they would stop." Some said the work would gain if it were shortened, if there were more "light, clearness, unity"; others found it a mixture of "the excellent, the grotesque, the tiresome." The fast friends of the composer hailed it as a masterpiece.

Beethoven himself must have had misgivings about the length of the work,
for he wrote this note in the score:
"Since this symphony is longer than an ordinary symphony, it should be performed at the beginning rather than at the end of a concert, either after an overture or an aria, or after a concerto.
If it be performed too late, there is the danger that it will not produce on the audience, whose attention will be already wearied by preceding pieces, the effect which the composer purposed in his own mind to attain." Alas, little or no attention is paid to this request today, and it must be confessed that after an hour of listening to music good, bad or indifferent, wherever or whenever the symphony is played, it does seem too long, even when the performance is most admirable.

The commentators have been busy with the work, but, in spite of their most ingenious labor, they have been unable to lessen the grandeur or chip the beauty of its pages. One fanatical worshipper of the composer found in the fugued passage of the first movement the entrance of the 19th century. Wagner insisted that the word "heroic" refers, not to any particular hero, not to Napoleon, whom Beethoven undoubtedly had in mind when he was composing the symphony, but to the full-fledged man in whom are all the purely human feelings. That mad wag, von Bülow, solemnly rededicated the symphony to Bismarck. The commentators imagine vain things, they chatter and write and have their little day. They pass away and their words are forgotten or are preserved for the wonder or the amusement of generations after them; the work itself remains, nor do 100 years tarnish or belittle it. Certain formulas, as formulas, may seem old-fashioned,
but they are still vitalized by the weight of the thought cast in the bygone mold.
This is music that is the expression of that which is unutterable in speech.
Still is the plaintive second theme of the first movement charged with in-effable yearning. Still in the rich treatment of the musical thoughts is seen the working of a titanic yet very human mind.

It has been asked, and not so irreverently as might appear, why masterpieces are such a bore. These questioners would lump "King Lear," "Paradise Lost," "The Divine Comedy," the "Eroica" and the Ninth together. The question is as a recoil from the feeling of being overmastered, almost crushed.
They that would have the indisputably great musical works performed in and out of season, they that would have them as dally and necessary food, would work quicker and more enduring injury to them than the longest flight of time.

Handel's concerto is interesting, chiefly by reason of the beautiful largetto, an air that is both tender and solemn. It is doubtful whether he himself took the allegros seriously. It is recorded of him that he once answered a flatterer, a man like Chrysander, who applied the doctrine of plenary inspiration to every bit of Handel's enormous musical baggage, by saying the orchestral concerto or suite to which the flatterer had reference was poor stuff, written in haste, to serve some passing and inconsiderable occasion. These allegros often remind one of the operation of sawing wood; there is the same impression of perfunctory work and of monotonous expression.

Saint-Saens' symphonic poem gave much pleasure, although the end for once seemed ineffective, thin where it should overwhelm by its majestic breadth. When it was first produced certain Parisian critics denied the possibility of painting in tones a mental conflict and a mental decision—abstract matters, as a choice between virtue and pleasure. It may be said of the music that Pleasure as portrayed by Saint-Saëns is more radiant and enchanting than Virtue, so that the choice of Hercules is the more to be commended; but the musician and the idle lover of music will find keener pleasure in the representation of Pleasure, both in dress and in thought.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Echoes of Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

globe — Apr. 9, 1905
The 21st Symphony program was purely orchestral, opening with the first performance here of the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Kiss," followed by Handel's "Concerto Grosso," No. 12; Saint-Saëns' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. At the rear of the platform was suspended a gigantic wreath of laurel bearing the name of the composer and the years 1805-1905, in commemoration of the first performance of the "Eroica" in Vienna, April 7, 1805, just 100 years prior to last Friday's rehearsal in Symphony hall. The great work was finely read by Mr. Gericke and although there is considerable uninteresting material in the first and closing movements, the audience gave every indication that the splendidly sympathetic interpretation made the "Eroica" the real feature of the program.

The funeral march, with its appealing and sonorous background of the heavier instruments, was given with a dignity and grandeur of exposition that was effective in every way, thoroughly typifying in music the solemnity of the composer's ideas. Equally artistic was the playing of the scherzo, the lighter contrasting figures of this movement showing the string and wood wind contingents at their best. These movements coming in sequence displayed the resources of the orchestra to great advantage by giving prominence to each section in various ways. The finale calls for no special mention save perhaps in the climax, which was very brilliantly played.

The Smetana overture is a charmingly melodic bit illustrating a superstition about a kiss which a maiden refuses to her widower lover before they are married. He makes light of the belief, but finally, after a season of remorse, waits for the kiss till the day of the wedding. The various episodes were depicted by the orchestra in a pleasing manner, as was to be expected, for there is little in the work which offered any difficulties in execution. In connection with these two composers may be mentioned the sad coincidence that when Beethoven wrote the "Eroica" he began to show signs of deafness, and Smetana was similarly afflicted when he wrote "The Kiss." Handel's 12th "Concerto Grosso," severe in structure and mainly interesting to experts and musical students, was played in proper form, Messrs Hess, Adamowski and Kressalt, who were the soloists, being easily adequate to all requirements. Saint-Saëns' symphonic poem was delightfully interpreted, the flowing melodies given by the harp, wood winds and violins being deserving of special mention for their beauty and harmony of phrasing and tonal colorings.

At this week's rehearsal and concert Ellison Van Hoose will be the soloist. The program will open with Hadley's symphony, "The Four Seasons," played for the first time in Boston. The other numbers will include Massenet's "Grise-lidis" and "Lohengrin's Legend," sung by Mr. Van Hoose; Brahms' Haydn variations and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Fest-Klänge."

SYMPHONY PLAYS MOSTLY BEETHOVEN

Twenty-First Concert Presents the All-Embracing Spirit of the Great Master.

Journal — Apr. 10, 1905
The twenty-first Symphony concert was in a way a Beethoven memorial. It was 100 years ago, within a single day, that the great "Eroica" symphony had its first public performance in Vienna. On Saturday night a vast audience rejoiced to hear the old masterpiece again.

So all-embracing was the Beethoven spirit that the "Leonore N. 3" overture took the place that had been assigned to Smetana's "Kiss" overture, which was rather a pity, for we do not get brand-new Smetana pieces very often, while "Leonore" overtures of three sorts we have with us always.

The "big concerto" of Handel's is an adequate musical exemplar of the frog who tried to expand himself into an ox. Played in a salon, with a small band of strings, the work would be pleasing enough as a type of the courtly old snuff-box, lace-and-velvet style. It does not, to be sure, burst like the frog, but it seems perilously swollen.

Saint-Saëns' "Youth of Hercules" was once upon a time considered very turbulent and hot-blooded, especially in its strong finale. But whether time is dulling the former effect or the playing was tamer than usual, the fact is that it seemed unimpressive.

The "Eroica," which Beethoven expressly stated ought to be placed at the beginning of a concert on account of its length, came last, as usual. Truly, its colossal proportions almost overweighed the average listener. Great as it is, rich in thought, splendid in expression, immensely human, touching and noble, its bulk tells against it.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

For some unexplained reason, the programme of the twenty-first symphony concert was changed, Beethoven's overture to Leonore, No. 3, being played in place of Smetana's overture to the opera "The Kiss." Since April 7, 1905, is a Beethoven anniversary, the "Eroica" symphony having been produced for the first time on April 7, 1805, at Vienna, the performance of a Beethoven overture was not at all out of character. This was the programme of the concert:

Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.
Handel: Concerto Grosso, No. 12, in B minor.
Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem, "The Youth of Hercules," No. 4, Op. 50.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55. (First performance, April 7, 1805, in Vienna.)

Despite its undue length and its lack of novelties, the concert of Saturday was one to give extreme pleasure, not only from the programme, but also from the remarkable brilliancy of the performance. The Leonore overture in particular, despite its composer's adherence to the sonata form, seemed as dramatic and moving as the most formless symphonic poem a modern could imagine—and it goes without saying, vastly more poetical. Musical idioms, after all, amount to little. Given Beethoven, with his inexhaustible fund of big ideas and with his dramatic sense, the sonata form could not prove too cramping for him to produce a work that, even today, makes a potent appeal to all intelligent and sensitive listeners, emotionally no less than musically and aesthetically. In the case of a composer of slight imagination and power, on the other hand, the broadest license of form and the utmost skill in orchestration will not enable him to write music that one cares to hear more than once to gratify one's curiosity.

And as with the overture, so, after one hundred years, is it with the "Eroica" symphony. If, like any other masterpiece, it be not heard too often, this symphony cannot fail to impress all hearers by its amazing beauty of melody, form and color, as well as by its intellectual and emotional strength and grandeur. It matters little what hero Beethoven had in mind when writing the work; its contents are unmistakably heroic. That its beauty may never be dimmed by undue familiarity, it might be wise to reserve performances of the "Eroica" symphony for festal or memorial occasions, which its presence would always ennoble. In this connection, by the way, Beethoven's recommendation may be reproduced here: "Since this symphony is longer than an ordinary symphony, it should be performed at the beginning rather than at the end of a concert, either after an overture or an aria, or after a concerto. If it be performed too late, there is danger that it will not produce on the audience, whose attention will be already wearied by preceding pieces, the effect which the composer purposed in his own mind to attain"—a very present danger indeed, which it is of interest to learn that Beethoven recognized. Although a Beethoven symphony is not as formidable now as it would have been a century ago, it is not a waltz from the "Fledermaus." The least of Beethoven's symphonies can be the more heartily enjoyed when the ears and mind are fresh, and the case is not different with other symphonies of length and serious import. On Saturday, it must be recorded, the "Eroica" was played lovingly and brilliantly, with impressive results.

After the Beethoven works, the Handel concerto for strings seemed to give most pleasure, particularly the exquisite movement defined as "Larghetto e piano." In the face of the decree from New York that recently has refused Handel a place among the greatest of composers, it is easy to agree with Mr. Runciman that Handel has surpassed all composers of all times in the attainment of beauty in melodies. This larghetto would surely bear testimony to the truth of the London critic's theory. As for the quick movements of the concerto, old-fashioned they undeniably are, but, none the less, would it be hard to claim that they are wanting in a certain dignity or in a bustling good humor that marks them as Handel's own, far superior to anything else of the kind that was written at the same period. The superb playing of the concerto by the string band aroused enthusiasm.

And then there was Saint-Saëns' symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," in which there is depicted the hero's mental struggle as to whether he shall choose to follow Virtue or Pleasure through life. Musicians, it would seem from their writings find virtue unattractive. As examples, compare the holy Elizabeth of Wagner with his Venus, his righteous Fricka with the sinning Sieglinde, or even Elsa with the impetuous and wicked Ortrud. Why did Wilhelm Meister prefer the plaintive Mignon to the sprightly Philine? And who can blame Don José for finding Michaela less engaging than Carmen? To judge by their works, musicians cannot fancy virtue. Saint-Saëns, therefore, is a man to be set apart, for in his symphonic poem of Hercules he has certainly conceived the way of virtue to lie in pleasant places, expressed by graceful, charming music, whereas the orgies typical of pleasure are but feebly and unenticingly suggested. To be frank, this music of Saint-Saëns, notwithstanding its sonority and its perfection of technique, sounds more old-fashioned than the concerto grosso of Handel.

Mr. Ellison Van Hoose will be the soloist at this week's concert. Here is the programme: Hadley, Symphony No. 2, "The Four Seasons" (first time in Boston); Massenet, aria, "Griseldis"; Brahms, Haydn Variations; Wagner, Lohengrin's Legend; Liszt, Symphonic Poem, No. 7, "Fest-Klänge." Apr. 10, 1905 R. R. G.

230

BEETHOVEN FESTAL NIGHT ENJOYED AT SYMPHONY.

Apr. 9, 1905
By Kent Perkins.

It was a "Beethoven night" at Symphony Hall last evening. The programme announced in advance for the twenty-first concert of the season contained as its chief feature the colossal "Eroica" symphony, with a note to the effect that the great work was first performed in Vienna on April 7, 1805, one hundred years ago.

To this centennial performance of Beethoven's symphonic masterpiece, which was based on Napoleon as the hero of the nations, there was added at the eleventh hour the Leonore Overture No. 3.

This was made the first number of the programme, replacing the overture to Friederick Smetana's opera, "The Kiss," which was to have its first performance by the Symphony Orchestra. Thus both by quality and quantity did Beethoven completely dominate and overshadow the rest of the programme.

The other numbers were Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 in B minor and Saint Saens's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules." They were grandly performed and were heard with keen pleasure even though they were submerged in the Beethoven flood.

The orchestra never played with more earnestness and enthusiasm than it did in the "Leonore" overture. The musicians entered into the interpretation of its sweeping and splendid beauties with a fire and an emotional intensity that were electrical in their effect, and the final strains were followed with an outburst of applause that was so spontaneous and prolonged that Mr. Gericke was visibly surprised. He had to acknowledge the plaudits repeatedly before quiet was restored.

The "Heroic" symphony also was received with enthusiasm, but it would have been more thoroughly enjoyed and appreciated and would have been played with a greater force and vividness if it had been given at the beginning instead of the end of the evening, so that both audience and musicians could have approached it with entire freshness of spirit, rather than with minds and muscles already touched with more or less weariness.

A great laurel wreath, appropriately dated and labelled with the composer's name, was placed at the back of the stage, and aided in giving a Beethoven festival note to the occasion.

At the twenty-second concert, next Saturday night, the soloist will be Ellison Van Hoose.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 1, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS,	TRAGIC OVERTURE.
TSCHAIKOWSKY,	CONCERTO for VIOLIN.
HUGO WOLF,	ITALIAN SERENADE. (First time.)
HANS HUBER,	SYMPHONY in E minor.

Soloist:

Mr. KARL BARLEBEN.

gramme: Hadley, Symphony No. 2, "The Four Seasons" (first time in Boston); Massenet, aria, "Griselidis"; Brahms, Haydn Variations; Wagner, Lohengrin's Legend; Liszt, Symphonic Poem, No. 7, "Fest-Klänge." Apr. 10, 1905 R. R. G.

BEETHOVEN FESTAL NIGHT ENJOYED AT SYMPHONY.

*Below
American* By Kent Perkins. Apr. 9, 1905

It was a "Beethoven night" at Symphony Hall last evening. The programme announced in advance for the twenty-first concert of the season contained as its chief feature the colossal "Eroica" symphony, with a note to the effect that the great work was first performed in Vienna on April 7, 1805, one hundred years ago.

To this centennial performance of Beethoven's symphonic masterpiece, which was based on Napoleon as the hero of the nations, there was added at the eleventh hour the Leonore Overture No. 3.

This was made the first number of the programme, replacing the overture to Friederick Smetana's opera, "The Kiss," which was to have its first performance by the Symphony Orchestra. Thus both by quality and quantity did Beethoven completely dominate and overshadow the rest of the programme.

The other numbers were Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 in B minor and Saint Saens's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules." They were grandly performed and were heard with keen pleasure even though they were submerged in the Beethoven flood.

The orchestra never played with more earnestness and enthusiasm than it did in the "Leonore" overture. The musicians entered into the interpretation of its sweeping and splendid beauties with a fire and an emotional intensity that were electrical in their effect, and the final strains were followed with an outburst of applause that was so spontaneous and prolonged that Mr. Gericke was visibly surprised. He had to acknowledge the plaudits repeatedly before quiet was restored.

The "Heroic" symphony also was received with enthusiasm, but it would have been more thoroughly enjoyed and appreciated and would have been played with a greater force and vividness if it had been given at the beginning instead of the end of the evening, so that both audience and musicians could have approached it with entire freshness of spirit, rather than with minds and muscles already touched with more or less weariness.

A great laurel wreath, appropriately dated and labelled with the composer's name, was placed at the back of the stage, and aided in giving a Beethoven festival note to the occasion.

At the twenty-second concert, next Saturday night, the soloist will be Ellison Van Hoose.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 1, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS,	TRAGIC OVERTURE.
TSCHAIKOWSKY,	CONCERTO for VIOLIN.
HUGO WOLF,	ITALIAN SERENADE. (First time.)
HANS HUBER,	SYMPHONY in E minor.

Soloist:

Mr. KARL BARLEBEN.

MR. ELLISON VAN HOOSE

233

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 15, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HADLEY,

SYMPHONY No. 2, "The Four Seasons." F minor,
op. 30

I. WINTER: Moderato maestoso.

II. SPRING: Allegro con moto.

III. SUMMER: Andante.

IV. AUTUMN: Andante con moto.
(First time.)

MASSENET,

AIR OF ALAIN, "Open, ye Gates of Paradise." from the Opera "Griselda."

BRAHMS,

VARIATIONS on a theme of JOSEF HAYDN, op. 56A

WAGNER,

LOHENGRIN'S NARRATIVE, from the Opera
"Lohengrin," Act III, Scene 3.

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 7, "Fest-Klänge."

Soloist:

Mr. ELLISON VAN HOOSE.

MR. ELLISON VAN HOOSE

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 15, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HADLEY,

SYMPHONY No. 2, "The Four Seasons," F minor,
op. 30

- I. WINTER: Moderato maestoso.
- II. SPRING: Allegro con moto.
- III. SUMMER: Andante.
- IV. AUTUMN: Andante con moto.
(First time.)

MASSENET,

AIR OF ALAIN, "Open, ye Gates of Paradise,"
from the Opera "Griselda."

BRAHMS,

VARIATIONS on a theme of JOSEF HAYDN, op. 56A

WAGNER,

LOHENGRIN'S NARRATIVE, from the Opera
"Lohengrin," Act III, Scene 3.

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 7, "Fest-Klänge."

Soloist:

Mr. ELLISON VAN HOOSE.

—There are but two more rehearsals and concerts this season by the Symphony orchestra, and the interest in them seems not to have abated in the least. Friday was a beautiful day, adding another to the exceptionally long list of pleasant afternoons, and the hall was completely filled with an enthusiastic audience. Mr Gericke was slightly indisposed and Mr Hess conducted. Mr Henry K. Hadley's symphony was the first number on the program and the first time it has been heard in Boston. Mr Hadley was born in Somerville, but makes his home in New York city and at present he is in Egypt. This symphony took the prize for the best orchestral work in two competitions decided in 1901, one established by Paderewski, the other by the New England conservatory of music in Boston. A brother of the composer, Mr Arthur Hadley, a violoncellist, is a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra. His father, who was present at the rehearsal Friday, was the first teacher of his gifted son in music. The symphony met with warm recognition. Mr Ellison Van Hoose, tenor singer, was the soloist. He has been heard several times in Boston and he confirmed the good impression he has made heretofore. There were some pretty spring costumes worn, the day was so sunny and bright. A few in the audience were Mr and Mrs Charles P. Curtis, Mrs George B. Shattuck, Mrs George Mumford, Mrs H. H. Fay, in black cloth with toque of violets; Mrs James Jackson, Miss Juliette Higginson, in a dark violet cloth suit and hat with a lighter shade of plumes; Mr James P. Stearns, Dr and Mrs Hall Curtis, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mrs Nathan Matthews, in black, the bodice of chiffon over white, and hat of violet velvet with violet plumes; Miss Hannah Stevenson, Miss Mary Vaughan, Miss Priscilla Stackpole, Mrs J. Harleston Parker, in black cloth and black hat with red roses; Mrs William Ames, in crushed strawberry crepe de chine, accordion plaited, and hat with plumes shading to pink; Miss Estelle Kimball, in black cloth, with Irish lace collar and cuffs and black hat with white ostrich plumes; Mrs Charles Gibson, Mrs Henry Howe, Miss Nathalie Matthews, Mrs Robert Boit, Mrs Saltonstall (Lena Stevenson), in dark green cloth and black hat with lighter shade of green plumes; Mrs John L. Gardner, in black crepe de chine, fur cape, and violets; Miss Dorothy Quincy, Mrs Rantoul, Mr Frank Sturgis, Mrs Frederic Thayer, Mrs Harry Hooper, Mrs Gay, Mrs Frederic B. Carpenter, Miss MacNichol, Miss Abby Manning, Miss Katherine Foote, Miss Olivia Thorndike, Mrs Robert S. Bradley, Mrs William G. Preston, Mrs Samuel Cabot and Mrs Albert W. Nickerson. Paderewski is to be the soloist this week, and will play the F minor concerto by Chopin. Paderewski will also play Sunday evening, April 30, at the Pension fund concert, in Symphony hall.

Close April 16 1905

HADLEY SYMPHONY, AMERICAN WORK, MAKES A HIT.

Boston American
By Kent Peckins.

Owing to a slight illness that has no serious features whatever, Mr. Gericke was unable to conduct the season's twenty-second concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall last night. His place was taken acceptably by Professor Hess.

The feature of the evening was the first performance by the orchestra of Henry K. Hadley's Symphony No. 2, "The Four Seasons," in F minor. Mr. Hadley, who was born in Somerville in 1871, but now makes his home in New York, has won an enviable reputation both in America and abroad by his compositions. "The Four Seasons" took two first prizes in 1901, and has been performed in New York, Chicago and Pittsburg.

It was performed with fine spirit and appreciation last night and the beautifully portrayed moods of Winter, Spring, Summer and Autumn were nobly expressed by the orchestra. The work is full of original musical thought, which is developed with high skill and artistic elaboration.

The most impressive portions are "Summer," with its suggestion of mystery and night and the piquant interweaving of an Indian love song, and "Autumn" containing a remarkably powerful theme expressing the pathos of destiny through which flutters a delightful tone picture of falling leaves. The symphony was received with warm approval by the large audience present.

The soloist of the evening was Ellison Van Hoose, tenor. He sang the air of Alain, "Open, Ye Gates of Paradise," from Massenet's opera, "Griselda," with fine intensity of feeling and in the main in good voice. He also sang Lohengrin's narrative from Wagner's "Lohengrin."

The orchestra played variations by Brahms on a theme by Haydn, and Liszt's symphonic poem No. 7, "Fest Klänge."

The twenty-third concert will take place next Saturday night with Paderewski as the soloist. The public rehearsal will be held on Thursday afternoon, because the regular day falls on Good Friday.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The 23d Symphony program began with the first performance in this city of the "Four Seasons" symphony, the work of the young American composer, Mr Henry K. Hadley, which, in 1901, was awarded two first prizes in competitions established by the N. E. conservatory of Music and Mr Paderewski. Mr Ellison Van Hoose was the soloist in vocal selections from Massenet's "Griselda" and Wagner's "Lohengrin." Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Fest Klänge," were the other numbers. Mr Hadley, who is a Somerville boy and well known hereabouts, has written a dignified and ambitious work which shows that he has clear ideas regarding musical expression and color, excellent knowledge of instrumentation and an originality in some of the combinations which emphasize his right to rank high as a composer of serious works.

The title, "The Four Seasons," is explanatory of the four movements of the symphony, which are called "Winter," "Spring," "Summer" and "Autumn." The influence of other composers is shown in the composition, but the suggestions are not unduly prominent and the "pictures" find apt illustrations in forms in which Mr Hadley's creative abilities are to be acknowledged.

"Winter" shows the desolation, austerity and wildness of that season of the year. "Spring," the most delightful of the four parts, is a cleverly orchestrated scherzo in which elves dance and romp in the moonlight. In "Summer" is heard the Indian love song, then a touch of the mystic, in which the full orchestration is impressively employed at first and finally fades away into pianissimo. "Autumn" has a very pretty idea in staccato figures by the violins, suggesting falling leaves, a hunting theme and a sad refrain which closes the movement with a motif symbolizing destiny. Throughout the work the contrasts are managed quite smoothly, and although some of the thematic material is familiar in treatment the symphony is effective, very interesting as a whole, scholarly and a credit to American music.

The turbulence of the first part was given with good results and the charming "Spring" melodies, mainly voiced by the flute, went as trippingly and daintily as its elfin atmosphere suggested. In the "Summer" movement there was much to enjoy in the splendid work of the wood winds, in the fortissimo passages by the whole orchestra and in the closing measures in pianissimo by the harp and lighter strings against a sustained background by the other instruments. The features of the last movement were the charming staccato reiteration by the strings in unison and the hunting music in which the horns were heard to good advantage.

Mr Van Hoose, tenor, sang with his usual skill of expression and sweetness of tone, being specially pleasing in the "Griselda" aria, which was somewhat better suited to his vocal style than was the excerpt from "Lohengrin." The orchestra played the Brahms variations well enough and showed its ability to compass easily the harmonic difficulties of a selection that isn't particularly interesting. The Liszt "Festival Echoes," with its gradations from the pomp of a ceremonial to those of holiday festivities, was interpreted admirably. Mr Hess conducted in place of Mr Gericke, who was ill.

This week's rehearsal will take place Thursday afternoon and Paderewski will be the soloist. The program will be as follows: Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage"; Chopin's F minor concerto for piano; Gustav Strube's symphonic poem, "Longing," and Sgambati's D major symphony. Close April 16 1905

PLAYS HADLEY'S NEW SYMPHONY

Journal April 7 05
Boston's Famous Orchestra Presents "The Four Seasons," by Well-Known Composer.

ITS FIRST READING HERE

Music Is Not Poor, but Suffers Harm by Its Program Attachment.

The especial novelty of the twenty-second Symphony concert was Mr. Henry K. Hadley's large work, "The Four Seasons." New York, Chicago, even Pittsburg, have heard the symphony long before this; Boston comes nearly last, spite of the fact that Mr. Hadley is, theoretically at least, a local composer. Yet there is perhaps no harm in conservatism, and no need of rushing to perform a new thing simply because it is American. We can put it down as a general proposition that Mr. Gericke will give us the "novelties" worth while in due season, if they hold their own for any length of time elsewhere.

This symphony of Mr. Hadley's is avowedly an attempt to depict either the physical attributes or the mental moods suggested by the various changes of nature's year. He desires us to feel "how dead the vegetable kingdom lies" in winter; the "quickening life from the earth's heart" in spring; a lake surrounded by mountains and an Indian love song in summer, and the "death of the leaves" in the autumn. No easy task, surely, for even a great tone-painter; certainly accomplished very feebly by Mr. Hadley.

Music Is Not Poor.

Not that the music is really poor or ineffective—some of it has beauty and charm and strength—but that it is absolutely hurt by its program attachment. We do not hear anything that in the least suggests a "symbol of Destiny," nor does the staccato figure of the last movement paint a picture of falling leaves. Why will a composer of ability so handicap himself with an audience?

For taken as absolute music the symphony has many merits. It is nowhere trivial or bad; it shows refined and artistic workmanship, although not great originality. For instance, the "spring" movement is a curious mixture of themes from Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture and his "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and there are other men dimly suggested in other places.

The "summer" movement is by far the best and most individual, with its calm loveliness and its exquisite melody of the Indian lovesong. Mr. Hess, who conducted the entire concert owing to Mr. Gericke's illness, read the work sympathetically and with great care.

Has Manly Sincerity.

Ellison Van Hoose was the soloist, giving first Massenet's rather flabby "Open, Ye Gates of Paradise," and later Lohengrin's narrative. He sang excellently and with more manly sincerity than when he was heard here with Melba earlier in the season.

Brahms' agile variations on Haydn's beautiful "St. Anthony" air were greatly enjoyed, for, barring a little too much haste in the expounding of the air itself in both the first and last movements, with a consequent loss of clarity, they were played splendidly. And in hearing them there is always the amused conjecture as to what old "Papa" Haydn himself would say could he but hear how his simple theme was tossed about by Brahms.

Liszt's "Fest-Klänge" sounded exceedingly worthless and thin. It is a conspicuous example of the art of saying little in long musical sentences.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

The orchestral pieces to be played at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Symphony Hall this afternoon, will be Hadley's Symphony No. 2, "The Four Seasons"; Brahms' variations on a theme of Haydn, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Fest-Klänge." Mr. Hadley's symphony took two prizes in October, 1901, one in a competition established by the New England Conservatory of Music, the other in a competition instituted by Mr. Paderewski.

The symphony has been played in New York, Chicago and Pittsburg, but this will be the first performance in Boston, although the composer is practically a Bostonian—he was born in Somerville in 1871, and received his musical education here before he went to Vienna. The symphony is thus arranged: Winter, a moderato maestoso; spring, a scherzo; summer, an andante supposed to be a description of "a midnight scene on a lake surrounded by mountains; and autumn, with the sounds of the hunt and the death of the leaves.

Mr. Ellison Van Hoose will sing Alain's air in the prologue to Massenet's opera, "Griselda," and Lohengrin's narrative.

The public rehearsal of next week will be on Thursday instead of Friday afternoon. The programme will include pieces by Mendelssohn and Sgambati; a new work by Gustav Strube, "Longing," for viola solo and orchestra; and Chopin's concerto No. 2, in F minor (Mr. Paderewski, pianist).

—There are but two more rehearsals and concerts this season by the Symphony orchestra, and the interest in them seems not to have abated in the least. Friday was a beautiful day, adding another to the exceptionally long list of pleasant afternoons, and the hall was completely filled with an enthusiastic audience. Mr. Gericke was slightly indisposed and Mr. Hess conducted. Mr. Henry K. Hadley's symphony was the first number on the program and the first time it has been heard in Boston. Mr. Hadley was born in Somerville, but makes his home in New York city and at present he is in Egypt. This symphony took the prize for the best orchestral work in two competitions decided in 1901, one established by Paderewski, the other by the New England conservatory of music in Boston. A brother of the composer, Mr. Arthur Hadley, a violoncellist, is a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra. His father, who was present at the rehearsal Friday, was the first teacher of his gifted son in music. The symphony met with warm recognition. Mr. Ellison Van Hoose, tenor singer, was the soloist. He has been heard several times in Boston and he confirmed the good impression he has made heretofore. Paderewski is to be the soloist this week, and will play the F minor concerto by Chopin. Paderewski will also play Sunday evening, April 30, at the Pension fund concert, in Symphony hall. Globe Apr. 16, 1905.

Mr. ELLISON VAN HOOSE, tenor, was born at Murfreesboro, Tenn., August 18, 1869. He studied singing in New York for five years with Perry Averill; he has also studied with Bouhy of Paris, Wood of London, Emil Fischer, and Isadore Luckstone. He was known chiefly as a choir singer until 1897, when he joined the Damrosch-Ellis Opera Company. He was also with the Ellis Opera Company of 1898-99, and sang in this city. His first appearance in opera was at Philadelphia, December 11, 1897, as Walther in "Tannhäuser." Mr. Van Hoose sang in orchestral concerts at London in 1898 and 1899. His first appearance here at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was on November 2, 1901, when he sang with Milka Ternina in excerpts from "Tannhäuser" and "Die Götterdämmerung," and he also sang the Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger." Mr. Van Hoose has for two seasons been a member of Mme. Melba's concert company. He sang at Ceeilia concerts, "Damnation of Faust," December 2, 1903, "The Dream of Gerontius," January 26, 1904; and his last appearances here were in concert with Mme. Melba, December 10, 1904, and with Miss Parkina, December 18, 1904.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Transl

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

Mr. Gericke not being well, the twenty-second public rehearsal and concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra were conducted by Mr. Willy Hess. The soloist was Mr. Ellison Van Hoose, tenor, and this was the programme:

Hadley: Symphony No. 2, "The Four Seasons." F minor, Op. 30.

Massenet: Air of Alain, "Open, ye Gates of Paradise," from the Opera "Griselda."

Brahms: Variations on a theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56A.

Wagner: Lohengrin's Narrative, from the Opera "Lohengrin," Act III, Scene 3.

Liszt: Symphonic Poem, No. 7, "Fest-Klänge."

The chief feature of the concert was the production, for the first time in Boston, of Mr. Henry K. Hadley's symphony, "The Four Seasons," which, in the autumn of 1901, secured two prizes for orchestral compositions, one offered by Mr. Paderewski, the other by the New England Conservatory of Music. The work has already been played in New York, Chicago and Pittsburg, and last year Mr. Lang was prepared to bring it out at one of the Chickering Orchestral Concerts, but was prevented.

The symphony by Mr. Hadley was a comfort to hear, inasmuch as it is neither painfully academic, as though written with a view to gaining the approval of a dry old professor of a German conservatory, nor yet far-fetched and unnatural, like the work of some young composers who have been led to imitate the peculiar idioms of modern French writers. Mr. Hadley's composition, on the contrary, is entirely frank and simple, comprehensible, melodious and yet modern in spirit. Above all else, it has the merit of actually saying something, in place of toying with a series of formulas; its composer is clearly a man of musical ideas.

Although the symphony is furnished with a somewhat elaborate programme, it appears that the programme was imagined rather by Mr. Krehbiel than by Mr. Hadley. Be this as it may, the titles of the four movements, Winter, Spring, Summer, Autumn, answer every purpose, without further indications of the composer's meaning. The first movement, Winter, considered as programme music, seems the least picturesque of the four. As absolute music, on the other hand, it can be called a remarkably well-written movement, of stormy, passionate character, with a first theme that commands attention. The picture of spring, in the form of a scherzo, is delightful, conceived and executed with an admirable lightness of touch. And still more attractive is the summer episode, a musical picture, according to Mr. Krehbiel, of a mountain lake under the full moon, with an Indian love song, etc. The programme is scarcely necessary. Without it, Mr. Hadley's impression of summer is imaginative and suggestive, with a wealth of sensuous melody most beautifully orchestrated. As for the finale, it is a weak illustration of Mr. Krehbiel's programme, but, in itself, it is a poetical and tenderly felt sketch of the autumn mood which is rife when the leaves fall and all the world is brown. The first episode, developed at length, is pervaded with a spirit of gentle melancholy, interrupted only by a charming hunting scene, and then resumed, to be continued to a quiet close. This ending is unusual for that of a symphony, but how, logically, could a movement termed "Autumn" end other than quietly? Mr. Hadley is indeed to be con-

of the last movement paint a picture of falling leaves. Why will a composer of ability so handicap himself with an audience?

For taken as absolute music the symphony has many merits. It is nowhere trivial or bad; it shows refined and artistic workmanship, although not great originality. For instance, the "spring" movement is a curious mixture of themes from Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture and his "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and there are other men dimly suggested in other places.

The "summer" movement is by far the best and most individual, with its calm loveliness and its exquisite melody of the Indian lovesong. Mr. Hess, who conducted the entire concert owing to Mr. Gericke's illness, read the work sympathetically and with great care.

Has Manly Sincerity.

Ellison Van Hoose was the soloist, giving first Massenet's rather flabby "Open, Ye Gates of Paradise," and later Lohengrin's narrative. He sang excellently and with more manly sincerity than when he was heard here with Melba earlier in the season.

Brahms' agile variations on Haydn's beautiful "St. Anthony" air were greatly enjoyed, for, barring a little too much haste in the expounding of the air itself in both the first and last movements, with a consequent loss of clarity, they were played splendidly. And in hearing them there is always the amused conjecture as to what old "Papa" Haydn himself would say could he but hear how his simple theme was tossed about by Brahms.

Liszt's "Fest-Klänge" sounded exceedingly worthless and thin. It is a conspicuous example of the art of saying little in long musical sentences.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

The orchestral pieces to be played at the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Symphony Hall this afternoon, will be Hadley's Symphony No. 2, "The Four Seasons"; Brahms' variations on a theme of Haydn, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Fest-Klänge." Mr. Hadley's symphony took two prizes in October, 1901, one in a competition established by the New England Conservatory of Music, the other in a competition instituted by Mr. Paderewski.

The symphony has been played in New York, Chicago and Pittsburg, but this will be the first performance in Boston, although the composer is practically a Bostonian—he was born in Somerville in 1871, and received his musical education here before he went to Vienna. The symphony is thus arranged: Winter, a moderato maestoso; spring, a scherzo; summer, an andante supposed to be a description of "a midnight scene on a lake surrounded by mountains; and autumn, with the sounds of the hunt and the death of the leaves.

Mr. Ellison Van Hoose will sing Alain's air in the prologue to Massenet's opera, "Griselda," and Lohengrin's narrative.

The public rehearsal of next week will be on Thursday instead of Friday afternoon. The programme will include pieces by Mendelssohn and Sgambati; a new work by Gustav Strube, "Longing," for viola solo and orchestra; and Chopin's concerto No. 2, in F minor (Mr. Paderewski, pianist).

—There are but two more rehearsals and concerts this season by the Symphony orchestra, and the interest in them seems not to have abated in the least. Friday was a beautiful day, adding another to the exceptionally long list of pleasant afternoons, and the hall was completely filled with an enthusiastic audience. Mr. Gericke was slightly indisposed and Mr. Hess conducted. Mr. Henry K. Hadley's symphony was the first number on the program and the first time it has been heard in Boston. Mr. Hadley was born in Somerville, but makes his home in New York city and at present he is in Egypt. This symphony took the prize for the best orchestral work in two competitions decided in 1901, one established by Paderewski, the other by the New England conservatory of music in Boston. A brother of the composer, Mr. Arthur Hadley, a violoncellist, is a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra. His father, who was present at the rehearsal Friday, was the first teacher of his gifted son in music. The symphony met with warm recognition. Mr. Ellison Van Hoose, tenor singer, was the soloist. He has been heard several times in Boston and he confirmed the good impression he has made heretofore. Paderewski is to be the soloist this week, and will play the F minor concerto by Chopin. Paderewski will also play Sunday evening, April 30, at the Pension fund concert, in Symphony hall.  Globe Apr. 16. 1905.

Mr. ELLISON VAN HOOSE, tenor, was born at Murfreesboro, Tenn., August 18, 1869. He studied singing in New York for five years with Perry Averill; he has also studied with Bouhy of Paris, Wood of London, Emil Fischer, and Isadore Luckstone. He was known chiefly as a choir singer until 1897, when he joined the Damrosch-Ellis Opera Company. He was also with the Ellis Opera Company of 1898-99, and sang in this city. His first appearance in opera was at Philadelphia, December 11, 1897, as Walther in "Tannhäuser." Mr. Van Hoose sang in orchestral concerts at London in 1898 and 1899. His first appearance here at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was on November 2, 1901, when he sang with Milka Ternina in excerpts from "Tannhäuser" and "Die Götterdämmerung," and he also sang the Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger." Mr. Van Hoose has for two seasons been a member of Mme. Melba's concert company. He sang at Ceeilia concerts, "Damnation of Faust," December 2, 1903, "The Dream of Gerontius," January 26, 1904; and his last appearances here were in concert with Mme. Melba, December 10, 1904, and with Miss Parkina, December 18, 1904.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Transl

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

Mr. Gericke not being well, the twenty-second public rehearsal and concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra were conducted by Mr. Willy Hess. The soloist was Mr. Ellison Van Hoose, tenor, and this was the programme:

Hadley: Symphony No. 2, "The Four Seasons." F minor, Op. 30.
Massenet: Air of Alain, "Open, ye Gates of Paradise," from the Opera "Griselda."
Brahms: Variations on a theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56A.
Wagner: Lohengrin's Narrative, from the Opera "Lohengrin," Act III, Scene 3.
Liszt: Symphonic Poem, No. 7, "Fest-Klänge."

The chief feature of the concert was the production, for the first time in Boston, of Mr. Henry K. Hadley's symphony, "The Four Seasons," which, in the autumn of 1901, secured two prizes for orchestral compositions, one offered by Mr. Paderewski, the other by the New England Conservatory of Music. The work has already been played in New York, Chicago and Pittsburg, and last year Mr. Lang was prepared to bring it out at one of the Chickering Orchestral Concerts, but was prevented.

The symphony by Mr. Hadley was a comfort to hear, inasmuch as it is neither painfully academic, as though written with a view to gaining the approval of a dry old professor of a German conservatory, nor yet far-fetched and unnatural, like the work of some young composers who have been led to imitate the peculiar idioms of modern French writers. Mr. Hadley's composition, on the contrary, is entirely frank and simple, comprehensible, melodious and yet modern in spirit. Above all else, it has the merit of actually saying something, in place of toying with a series of formulas; its composer is clearly a man of musical ideas.

Although the symphony is furnished with a somewhat elaborate programme, it appears that the programme was imagined rather by Mr. Krehbiel than by Mr. Hadley. Be this as it may, the titles of the four movements, Winter, Spring, Summer, Autumn, answer every purpose, without further indications of the composer's meaning. The first movement, Winter, considered as programme music, seems the least picturesque of the four. As absolute music, on the other hand, it can be called a remarkably well-written movement, of stormy, passionate character, with a first theme that commands attention. The picture of spring, in the form of a scherzo, is delightful, conceived and executed with an admirable lightness of touch. And still more attractive is the summer episode, a musical picture, according to Mr. Krehbiel, of a mountain lake under the full moon, with an Indian love song, etc. The programme is scarcely necessary. Without it, Mr. Hadley's impression of summer is imaginative and suggestive, with a wealth of sensuous melody most beautifully orchestrated. As for the finale, it is a weak illustration of Mr. Krehbiel's programme, but, in itself, it is a poetical and tenderly felt sketch of the autumn mood which is ripe when the leaves fall and all the world is brown. The first episode, developed at length, is pervaded with a spirit of gentle melancholy, interrupted only by a charming hunting scene, and then resumed, to be continued to a quiet close. This ending is unusual for that of a symphony, but how, logically, could a movement termed "Autumn" end other than quietly? Mr. Hadley is indeed to be congratulated on his symphony, not only on what he has accomplished, but also on what he has refrained from attempting. His composition most assuredly shows technical skill, a certain gift of poetry, and, above all, the rare disposition to write simply and naturally, without a violent effort to avoid the commonplace at whatever cost. The symphony, which was very heartily applauded, deserves to be heard again in Boston.

Since Mr. Gericke was absent and Mr. Hess was conducting works not prepared by himself, it is not proper to comment on the concert further than to say that all the compositions went smoothly and nicely. Mr. Van Hoose, in grand voice, sang the pretty aria from Massenet's "Grisélidis" very beautifully, with tasteful phrasing, with admirable tonal quality, and with genuine warmth. The excerpt from "Lohengrin" he also sang well, although not so well as the French piece. He was applauded cordially.

At the coming concert Mr. Paderewski will play, and this will be the programme: Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn; concerto for piano-forte, No. 2, in F minor, Chopin; symphonic poem, "Longing," Gustav Strube; Symphony No. 1, in D major, Sgambati.

R. R. G.

HADLEY'S FRANK SYMPHONY HEARD

It Is Feature of the 22d Symphony Concert—Mr. Hess Conducts Owing to Slight Indisposition of Mr. Gericke.

DE PACHMANN PLAYS A FAREWELL RECITAL

Is at His Best and Revels in His Wondrous Art as Does the Immense Audience—Has to Add Pieces to Programme.

The programme of the 22d Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in "The Four Seasons" . . . Hadley

Alain's Air from the opera "Griselda" . . . Massenet
Variations on a Theme by Haydn . . . Brahms
Lohengrin's Narrative from "Lohengrin" . . . Wagner
Symphonic Poem, "Fest-Klaenge" . . . Liszt

The feature of the concert was the production of Mr. Hadley's symphony, which took two prizes in 1901, one offered in competition by Mr. Paderewski, the other by the New England Conservatory of Music. The symphony has been played by the leading orchestras of New York, Chicago and Pittsburgh. Mr. Lang purposed to produce it here last season at a Chickering concert; and now in 1905 it is heard at last in Boston. It would be a pleasure to discuss the work at length, but the pressure on the columns of The Herald of today forbids anything more than a note.

Mr. Hadley is a believer in programme music, but he himself has not written an elaborate argument of the whole work. The first two movements, "Winter" and "Spring," are portrayals of moods, and the poetic mottoes added by Mr. Krebbs probably serve as well as any others that might be taken from an anthology. The third and fourth movements admit of a more detailed programme, but the music would make its way without any allusion to "midnight scene on a lake surrounded by mountains" or to "the falling of thousands of leaves in a forest."

The musical thoughts are frank in themselves, and they are not tortured in the expression. At its best the work has pleasing buoyancy and enthusiasm. The scherzo "Spring" is delightfully fresh throughout, and there are poetic passages in "Summer." The opening of "Winter" has distinctive force, though the movement as a whole is not on so high a plane as that of the two that follow. The finale is the weakest in its structure; nor is the chief theme one that we should associate naturally with "destiny." The symphony is scored effectively, at times brilliantly, and it may be said that it is interesting as absolute music, without any reference to a programme. The movements in turn were heartily applauded, and the applause was an expression of honest enjoyment; it was not merely perfunctory or complimentary. This must suffice for the present. We hope to refer to the symphony next Sunday.

Mr. Van Hoose sang Alain's air from Massenet's "Griselda" for the first time at these concerts. He was in excellent voice, and the voice itself again had the beautiful quality which characterized it when he first came before the Boston public. There was a period after his return from Paris when he seemed to have gained in brilliance at the expense of tonal richness. The air is in Massenet's later style—that is, there is his well known formula of passionate expression—but the passion is a semblance without true sensuousness or fire. Yet, as sung by Mr. Van Hoose, the air is an effective concert piece.

Mr. Hess conducted with success the concerts of Friday and last night, in consequence of Mr. Gericke's slight indisposition. In the aria by Massenet the orchestra overpowered the singer at times; but was the instrumentation that of Massenet? It did not have his characteristic stamp.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Apr 17 1905
Hadley...Symphony No. 2, "The Four Seasons." (First time in Boston)
Massenet... "Grisélidis" Mr. Ellison Van Hoose.
Brahms...Haydn Variations
Wagner...Lohengrin's Legend Mr. Van Hoose.
Liszt...Symphonic Poem, No. 7, "Fest-Klaenge"

Mr. Gericke was slightly indisposed and Mr. Hess conducted this concert. He won much applause and his work deserves commendation. He did not make as much out of the Brahms variations as Mr. Gericke could have done, but he certainly gave every ounce of effect to the "Fest-Klaenge," with which the concert ended. He also was most conscientious in the direction of Mr. Hadley's symphony.

This new symphony has won 2 musical prizes, and is one of the few important American works in the large orchestral form. It is not an equal work, but it contains points of much beauty and some very interesting development. Of course a large orchestra is used; larger than one finds in any of the Brahms symphonies, larger even than that used by Beethoven in his 9th symphony, but not as tremendous as Van Der Stucken uses in "Radcliffe" or "Pax Triumphans." It is a clean-cut work in classical form.

Its first movement, entitled "Winter," is an easily followed sonata-allegro, with a bold and fiery development section. In this latter division there is effective syncopation, evil-toned muted horns, and many other points that prove it to have been a very hard winter. There is a clear return of themes with changed orchestration which is very effective.

Although bearing a title, this movement cannot be called "programme-music," for it gives a portrayal of moods rather than of objects; it is, as Beethoven once said of a similar movement: "Mehr ein Bild der Empfindungen als Malerei." It might picture King Lear, or a Roosevelt oration, or anything else that is strenuous. The second movement is entitled "Spring." We generally look with suspicion on spring chickens, spring medicines and spring symphonies, but this dainty Scherzo bears minute scrutiny. It is the most graceful and most effective part of the symphony. Was it Tennyson who wrote:—

In the spring the dove is burnished;
Every zephyr is a good wind.
In the spring composer's fancies
Lightly turn to thoughts of woodwind.

Of course there are pipings and flutings, tinklings of Glockenspiel and other touches of light happiness, and the movement is not too long.

In the third movement ("Summer") the composer is definitely launched in picture-painting, and bids us think of a mountain lake at midnight. Cowen did this sort of water romance better, in his Scandinavian symphony, in the movement called "On the Fjord"; but Mr. Hadley has some beautiful points, too, especially in his chief figure, which is an Indian theme, whether aboriginal or not we do not know,—nor care—since it is attractive and works up well.

There is a gradual falling-off in power after the first 2 movements of the work, and the finale is comparatively weak. The composition lacks a true climax, the falling of the leaves (its title is "Autumn") is not very characteristic, and the hunting episode is but a platitude. It may be worth Mr. Hadley's while, some day, to write a stronger finale to this symphony. It is certainly a sterling work and deserves an effective finale. It is a matter of felicitation that our young American composer has not tried to out-Wagner Wagner, or to invent new dissonances, or to give a musical puzzle-picture, as some modern composers with fewer ideas than he are constantly doing.

Mr. Van Hoose was in excellent voice, and made a fine effect in Alain's aria from "Griselda," his notes even in highest register, both chest and demi-falsetto, were perfectly intoned and excellent in quality. He was at his best in Massenet's aria, and was also commendable in the "Lohengrin" number, although a little more of massive power might have been demanded at the climax of the latter. He was recalled twice, with much heartiness.

The Brahms variations were a good intellectual exercise, but not of a character to arouse enthusiasm. We doubt if Mr. Hess brought out all that was in the work. But in the last number the new conductor shone resplendent. It is by no means the best of Liszt's symphonic poems, this picture of festivity, for in it Liszt becomes a diluted Wagner. He has built a magnificent portico to a peasant's hut; the lofty phrases that seem to herald mighty deeds, dissolve into dance steps.

The "Pops"

Next Monday evening, May 1, the "Pops" begin their twentieth season, fifteen years in Music Hall and the fifth summer in Symphony Hall. Mr. T. Adamowski will again conduct for his seventh season, four years from 1891 to 1894 and the third year of his present régime. Mr. Adamowski will conduct for four weeks only, with the rest of the season to be divided between Mr. Max Zach, who has served seven years, and Mr. Gustav Strube, whose term as conductor covers five years.

Everything will be conducted on the same general plan which has made these concerts so successful for the past nineteen years, with a slight modification in the scale of prices which will be as follows: Admission to the second balcony and to unreserved tables on the floor, twenty-five cents; the entire first balcony reserved at fifty cents, and seats at reserved tables on the floor seventy-five cents, as usual. The programme for the opening night, for which the tickets are now on sale at Symphony Hall, follows:

March, "Black Bess" . . . . . Strube
Overture, "Mignon" . . . . . A. Thomas
Ballet Music, "Queen of Sheba" . . . . . Goldmark Violoncello solo, Mr. Josef Keller.
Waltz, "España" . . . . . Waldteufel
Selection, "Babes in Toyland" . . . . . Herbert
Overture, "Fledermaus" . . . . . J. Strauss
Serenade ("Les Contes d'Hoffmann") . . . . . Offenbach
Overture, "1812" . . . . . Tchaikowski
Overture, "Rienzi" . . . . . Wagner
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" . . . . . Vollstedt
Selection, "Sho-Gun" . . . . . Luders
(First time.)
March, "Vienna Dude" . . . . . von Blon

MR. PADEREWSKI,
PHOTO COPYRIGHT, 1900, BY THEO. C. MARCEAU

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 22, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN

OVERTURE, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage." op. 27.

CHOPIN,

CONCERTO No. 2, in F minor, for PIANOFORTE and
ORCHESTRA, op. 21.

GUSTAV STRUBE,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Longing." for VIOLA and
ORCHESTRA.
(First performance.)
Viola. Mr. E. FERIR.

César Franck . . . . .

Symphony in D minor

I. Lento; Allegro non troppo.

II. Allegretto.

III. Allegro non troppo.

By request

Soloist:

Mr. IGNACE PADEREWSKI.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

MR. PADEREWSKI,
PHOTO COPYRIGHT, 1900, BY THEO. C. MARCEAU

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 22, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN

OVERTURE "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage." op. 27.

CHOPIN,

CONCERTO No. 2, in F minor, for PIANOFORTE and
ORCHESTRA, op. 21.

GUSTAV STRUBE,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Longing." for VIOLA and
ORCHESTRA.
(First performance.)
Viola, Mr. E. FERIR.

César Franck . . . . . Symphony in D minor
I. Lento; Allegro non troppo. By request
II. Allegretto.
III. Allegro non troppo.

Soloist:

MR. IGNACE PADEREWSKI

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

PADEREWSKI WON BIG SYMPHONY TRIUMPH.

Great Polish Pianist Greeted with Tornadoes of Applause, and He Was Forced to Break
All Traditions with Encores

PLAYED BEAUTIFUL
CHOPIN CONCERTO

*Boston
American*

By Kent Perkins.

It was Paderewski night at Symphony Hall last evening at the twenty-third concert for this season of the Symphony Orchestra. The Polish pianist of the tawny mane was the soloist of the evening. He played with such transcendent power and beauty; he was greeted with such whirlwinds of applause and accomplished such a startling innovation by responding to encores at a Symphony concert, that the occasion will be long remembered by the immense audience present.

The rest of the programme besides Paderewski's number was one of the best of the season in many respects, but so keen was the eagerness to hear the pianist and so profound was the impression he made that the other selections were in large measure overshadowed.

Paderewski's programme number was Chopin's Concerto No. 2, in F minor, for piano and orchestra.

The wide variety in this work, the strength, brilliance and immense difficulties of the allegro and rondo movements, the lyric beauty and delicacy of the adagio gave the pianist every opportunity to display his wonderful art to the full and he seized all his chances with avidity.

He did not hammer the piano, as his more severe critics have been justified in charging him with doing at times.

He played with admirable restraint throughout, and yet with the utmost intensity of emotional feeling. He was in closest touch with the orchestra and the players were in warmest sympathy with him, so that together they brought out every lightest shade of expression and each strong climax with the highest effect of ensemble art.

Great as was the impression made by Paderewski through the extraordinary ease with which he played the most baffling and difficult passages—he apparently had a finger for every key and at times seemed to be using them all at once with perfect tone and absolute precision—he yet won the highest admiration by the wonderful, heart-moving loveliness and tenderness of the song that he made the strings sing in the adagio movement.

The people simply would not be content with only one number from Paderewski. The applause, of a strength and volume wholly unlike the usual Symphony concert plaudits, was so intense and persistent that the artist finally ceased bowing and went to the piano. He played twice, and each time the tornado-like tribute of hand-clapping greeted him.

Paderewski will be heard with the Symphony Orchestra again a week from tonight, when he takes part in the concert under the direction of the orchestra's Pension Fund Committee. That will be his last appearance in Boston for many seasons and a great demonstration is naturally expected.

The program last night, aside from the Chopin concerto, was as follows:

Mendelssohn, overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," Op. 27; Strube, symphonic poem, "Longing," for viola and orchestra (first performance), viola, Mr. E. Ferir; Cesar Franck, symphony in D minor, by request.

The Mendelssohn overture, which is based on two short sea poems by Goethe, was exquisitely played by the orchestra, and was greatly admired.

The symphonic poem, "Longing," was composed by Gustav Strube, one of the first violins of the Symphony organization, and it was heard for the first time. Mr. Strube conducted, and was warmly greeted. Mr. Ferir, also of the orchestra, played the viola. The piece was suggested by a poem entitled "Longing," by William Lyman Johnson, of Boston, and expresses the yearning for peace and rest of a troubled soul at night after the heat and struggles of the day.

The work is original, appropriate in atmosphere and characterized by much beauty of theme and harmony and still in development. Mr. Ferir played with warm appreciation, sympathy and appealing beauty of tone.

The Cesar Franck Symphony was played on Feb. 11 of this year and was heard again with pleasure.

PADEREWSKI IS MUCH AS OF OLD

Journal

Twenty-Third Symphony Concert

Interesting and Great Pianist

Resembles DePachmann.

The twenty-third Symphony concert was interesting from its wide variety of musical entertainment, and from the easy fashion in which Paderewski trod on tradition and turned his part of the affair into a recital. In that he followed in the footsteps of another eminent pianist, Vladimir de Pachmann, who scandalized the old guard in ancient Music Hall some years ago by interpreting applause as a demand for an encore piece and sitting down and giving it.

It was pleasant to note that Paderewski played in far more artistic and sincere style on this occasion than at his recent recital here. In both movements of the Chopin F minor concerto there was an abundance of beautiful tone without sickly sentimentality, and bravura without blacksmithian attacks on the keyboard. There were delicacy of shading, clean-cut and pearly apogees and a general harking back to the Paderewski of old.

Plays Chopin in Encore.

For the encore pieces that the audience seemed to demand he played the Chopin etude in E major, the waltz in C sharp minor and the Schubert-Liszt arrangement of "The Erl-King." In none of these was artistry so well maintained as in the concerto.

Strube's new work, the symphonic poem entitled "Longing," in which the viola expresses the prevailing thought against a rather mysterious orchestral background, was heard with profound respect for the composer's increased technical powers, and a moderate degree of interest in his peculiar inspiration. In the beginning there was an extreme resemblance to Debussy, but that wore off as the poem progressed.

Viola Is Monotonous.

There was something of monotony in the voice of the viola part, but just as it began to seem a trifle wearisome, redemption came in the shape of a full orchestral ending of great breadth and elegance. Altogether the piece is a credit to our local output of music. Ferir played the viola part with fine tone and perfect sentiment.

The Mendelssohn sea-picture, "Calm at Sea and Prosperous Voyage," still interests by its exquisite refinement of orchestration and melody rather than any inherently briny suggestion. It is the music of gentle reflection, of optimism and joy. Long may it yet be felt worth while.

Although the Cesar Franck symphony was played only last February at these concerts, its repetition was most welcome, for it is truly a noble work, and Gericke gave it a superb performance. It may well be classed as one of the trio of great symphonies of the past twenty years, the others being the Tchaikovsky "Pathétique" and Dvorak's "From the New World."

PLAY STRUBE'S NEW SYMPHONY

Harvard

Symphony Orchestra, for Its 23d Concert, Produces His "Longing," for Viola and Orchestra, with Wonderful Effect.

THE AUDIENCE WILDLY
APPLAUDS PADEREWSKI

He Plays the Concerto and Several Encore Pieces Like the Paderewski of Earlier Years, but Still Has Mannerisms.

The programme of the 23d Symphony concert in Symphony Hall last night, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage".....Mendelssohn
Symphonic Poem, "Longing," for viola and orchestra.....Strube
(First time.)
Concerto in F minor, No. 2, for piano.....Chopin
Symphony in D.....Franck
(By request.)

This concert was one of unusual interest to the hearer in search of varied entertainment. There was a familiar and easily understood overture by Mendelssohn; there was a new symphonic poem by Mr. Strube which displayed the rare artistry of Mr. Ferir as well as the talent of the composer; Mr. Paderewski played a concerto by Chopin and then turned a symphony concert into a piano recital for a while; and there was the impressive and noble symphony of Cesar Franck. Thus there were exhibitions of personality and of art.

Mendelssohn's musical portraiture of a dead calm at sea is still expressive even to those who have heard the music of Rimsky-Korsakoff, who knew the ocean as a professional, not as an English channel amateur. It is the painting of the prosperous voyage that now seems hopelessly old-fashioned, fit to be classed with "Moonlight on the Hudson" and other "musical sketches."

In the Russian's "Scheherazade" and "Sadko," there is the sea, with the sight and the sound and the foam of it. In Mendelssohn's music there is the return of a Nantasket boat, on time, with whooping friends on the wharf and a suggestion of the rush to the street cars. There is more of the thought of the sea in the same composer's "Hebrides" overture, which makes no such a direct challenge to attention. Still, the first section, the sea calm, is worthy of the composer, who, after the worst has been said in praise or in blame, remains a charming landscapist, if not a marine painter of indisputable power.

Mr. Strube's symphonic poem, "Longing," was composed early this year. It was suggested by a poem in free verse by Mr. William Lyman Johnson of this city, and according to the poet's short analysis of the work, the music should remind one of "redolent nightfall, filled with peace and night-sounds. The solo viola expresses the longing for the peace and hope that merciful mothering night brings to him who is tired of 'the clamor, din and gossip of the day' and all that the struggle for existence suggests." There is the longing, to quote from Mr. Johnson's poem, for

"The holy and heartresting peace
Of moonlight on a field of lilies,
And Jesus walking in their midst."

Without any knowledge of the poem the music would still be poetic, and the mere title "Longing" would furnish a clew. With a knowledge of the poem the music is illustrative as well as poetic. The Herald earlier in the season deplored the fact that Mr. Strube, a musician of true talent and versatility, had fallen into the way of using a musical speech that did not seem natural to him. This symphonic poem is free from the reproach. The music is here the natural, inevitable expression of spontaneous thought, and this thought is continuous, not merely episodic.

To use a phrase that has been sadly staled, this music came from the composer's heart, not merely from the brain, and, although in the expression there is a free use of ultra-modern harmonies and orchestral devices, there is not for a moment any suggestion of experimentation, nor is the composer discovered as one wishing to make the bourgeois sit up. The thought is not frittered away in the telling, and technical ingenuity is used only to point the musical message.

Mr. Strube has profited by the inventions of d'Indy and Debussy et al, and their superior refinements of instrumentation, but he has made them his own, so that they do not interrupt as orchestral or harmonic quotations what he himself has to say. The symphonic poem is, on the whole, the clearest, sanest, most truly emotional and imaginative of Mr. Strube's later works. He conducted, and he was indeed fortunate in his interpreters. Mr. Ferir played with wonderfully beautiful tone and the finest feeling; the men of the orchestra were in full sympathy with their colleague.

The Herald commented at some length on certain injurious mannerisms that marred sadly the performance of Mr. Paderewski at his recital. It is a pleasure to say that in his performance of the concerto last evening he was for the most part the Paderewski of earlier years, sympathetic, emotional, brilliant, hypnotic. Whether Chopin himself would know this concerto as it is orchestrated and played today by any distinguished pianist is a question that need not be discussed at this moment; it is not easy to imagine Chopin playing in any huge modern concert hall. Mr. Paderewski's performance abounded in tonal contrasts and in haunting cantabile; it was apparently spontaneous and yet cunningly prepared and finished. In the performance of the second movement the pianist reached his height.

The wildly applauding audience insisted on encore pieces. Mr. Gericke, who has so often forbidden these additions to a programme, yielded, and Mr. Paderewski played an etude by Chopin (E major), the waltz in C sharp minor by the same composer and the arrangement of Schubert's Erl King. In the etude there was a tendency to sentimentalize. The performance of the waltz was mannered in the extreme, and the liberties in rhythm were extravagant and ineffective. The performance of the Erl King was thunderously undistinguished.

The performance of the orchestra was of the highest order. Frank's great symphony was played not long ago with such effect that the request for a repetition was not surprising. All in all, a concert to be remembre.

THE "POPS."

It seems hardly possible that it is 20 years since, in 1885, the idea to supplement the Symphony season with a series of summer concerts of light and attractive music was established, to be in vogue every succeeding season save one. The length of these seasons varied considerably in the earlier years, and the concerts were even prolonged throughout the summer, but of late they have been confined to the months of May and June. The 20th season of the perennial "Pops" opens on Monday, May 1, and continues for nine weeks, closing on Saturday, July 1. The orchestra of 50 musicians will be selected, as usual, from the ranks of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and everything will be conducted, as usual, with the single exception of a slight modification in the scale of prices which will be as follows: General admission to the unreserved tables on the floor and the second balcony, 25 cents; the entire first balcony reserved at 50 cents, and seats at reserved floor tables 75 cents. There will be the usual number of special nights, including the 1000th concert, on Monday evening, May 15, which will be featured by a selected programme and other interesting attractions. Tickets go on sale for the opening night, Monday, May 1, tomorrow morning at Symphony Hall.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The Symphony concert of Saturday evening was in many ways a notable event, the occasion being distinguished by the production of a new work of consequence, by the repetition of César Franck's noble symphony, and by the presence of Mr. Paderewski, as soloist. This was the programme:

Mendelssohn: Overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," Op. 27.

Strube: Symphonic Poem, "Longing," for Viola and Orchestra.

(First performance.)

Viola, Mr. E. Ferir.

Chopin: Concerto No. 2, in F minor, for Piano-forte and Orchestra, Op. 21.

César Franck: Symphony in D minor.

(By request.)

Mr. Strube's orchestral poem "Longing" was inspired by some verses of Mr. William Lyman Johnson, one stanza of which should be quoted:

Give me the twilight-calm and rest,
When fading day has hushed its crimson fires;
Give me the twilight-calm and peace,
That quiets my intolerable hope and longing.
Give me the peace when purple-priested eve
Hushes, with incensed benediction,
The clamor, din and gossip of the day,
And gathering dews come like a mist of slumber
Upon the fevered forehead of the staring day.
Give me the holy and heart-resting peace
Of moonlight on a field of lilies,
And Jesus walking in their midst.

Mr. Strube's music sympathetically suggests the spirit of the poem. Written in the idiom of modern French composers, it none the less seems natural and facile, free from the sense of effort that surrounds the attempts of most non-Gallic writers, who try to be like Debussy and Vincent d'Indy. Mr. Strube, on the contrary, has made this style his own. He remains individual, however, for, above all else, he is sincere, and sincerity is bound always to result in individuality. This latest composition of Mr. Strube's has more in its favor than a manifest sincerity; it is also genuinely poetic. In its pages there is expressed a strong feeling for the quiet and mystery of night. As programme music this piece by Mr. Strube is highly successful; without more of a programme than the mere title, it would still make an appeal, for it is melodious, imaginative, beautiful in color and atmospheric. The exquisite use of the viola makes one wonder that this instrument should be so neglected for solo work. The viola part was very beautifully played by Mr. Ferir, a rare artist, and the orchestra, under the composer's direction, gave a very beautiful performance of the new poem. Both composer and performers were heartily applauded.

And then came Mr. Paderewski, who played the Chopin F minor concerto wonderfully, as only he himself can play, when he chooses to take sufficient pains. With only very occasional blemishes of harsh tone, Mr. Paderewski's performance will long be remembered as standard-setting in pianoforte playing, so rhythmical was it, so remarkable for song, so varied in color, so warmly emotional and so poetic. After the concerto the applause would come to no end, and at last Mr. Paderewski sat himself down to the instrument and played, before he was allowed to leave, three encores—a Chopin study, the Chopin C-sharp minor waltz and a version of the "Erl King." In these solo pieces Mr. Paderewski's art was of a less exalted quality than was that shown in the concerto, over-sentimentality and distorted rhythm coming to the fore. The "Erl King," however, was effective.

All musical people must have been pleased with the opportunity to hear the César Franck symphony again, before they had had time to forget its wondrous beauties. If the symphony seemed, two months ago, almost more beautiful than one has a right to expect of the product of a merely mortal brain, last Saturday it seemed a hundred fold greater than it did before. With such music it is necessary to become thoroughly acquainted, if not familiar, and the quickest way to acquaintance lies through two successive performances with a short interval between them. The reading of the symphony on Saturday, in sympathy, in finesse and in lofty grandeur, surpassed anything Mr. Gericke has done here this season. Both for his splendid performance and for his wise move in bringing out the symphony once more is he to be warmly thanked and congratulated.

At the coming concert, the last of the season, there is to be another repetition, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" coming to a second hearing this season. The programme will be as follows: Schumann, Symphony No. 2, in C major; Guy-Ropartz, Fantasy in D major, first time; Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Don Juan," by request; Wagner, Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger."

R. R. G.

—Symphony rehearsals and concerts are drawing to a close, and this week will finish the course, which has been most successful and, it is hoped, profitable to its generous benefactor. Thursday afternoon, when the rehearsal was given, rather than on Friday, as is customary, the day was glorious and the atmosphere balmy and pleasant. The house was completely sold out and hundreds more would have been glad of tickets, and it seemed a pity, such being the case, that there were many empty seats on the floor, held of course by subscribers who were away and had failed to make any disposition of their tickets before leaving. Mr. Paderewski was the soloist and he played the beautiful F minor concerto by Chopin. There was a tumult of applause at the close and he was recalled again and again so persistently that, contrary to all Mr. Gericke's established rules with regard to encores, Mr. Paderewski played a nocturne by Chopin and one other number. After that he was recalled a number of times. There has rarely been so much enthusiasm in a Boston audience before. Mme Paderewski, who was with a friend, appeared extremely gratified, and well she may have been. She is a brunette, with bright coloring, and was simply dressed in black, with a toque of black and white wings.

SUNDAY, APRIL 23, 1905.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The appearance of Paderewski at the Symphony concert was marked by scenes of enthusiasm on the part of the auditors exceeding that shown at any previous time this season. The program comprised Chopin's second pianoforte concerto, with Paderewski as soloist; Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage"; Strube's symphonic poem, "Longing," for viola and orchestra, E. Fevir soloist, and Cesar Franck's D minor symphony. Mr Strube's work was dedicated to Mr Fevir and was suggested by a poem by Mr William Lyman Johnson of this city. The music expresses the calm and rest of the twilight hours and night-fall, free from the din and clamor of the day. The flowing legato melodies given to the viola are very sweet and significant in their suggestions of the poetic subject, and the orchestral background is splendidly outlined and developed by the composer, whose skill in instrumentation is so well and favorably known to concert patrons. Mr Fevir played the viola part with great delicacy and beauty of tone. Mr Strube conducted this number and at the close he and Mr Fevir were greeted with very hearty tributes of applause.

It is almost useless to criticize Paderewski's performance, for, to use a current phrase, "the audience fairly went wild" over him. At the close of his playing he was obliged to return again and again to the platform, and finally, to still the tumult, added encore numbers, an unusual thing at a Symphony concert, and more journeying to the stage midst applause which continued until Mr Gericke took up the baton preparatory to beginning the Franck symphony. There was no trace of the "pounding" with which Paderewski has been charged this season. On the contrary, the interpretation was of wonderful beauty, impeccable in execution and exquisite in finish and tonal coloring. A superb performance in which the orchestra deserves to share in praise, especially for the work in the second movement in which occurs the charming accompaniment by muted strings.

The Mendelssohn overture was as delightfully restful in a musical way as one would wish and the peculiar and somewhat startling features of the Franck symphony were brought out vividly by the orchestra, both pieces being up to the usual standard of execution. It is doubtful though if any number on the program received its fair share of appreciation, for Paderewski appeared to be the magnet, all else was but secondary.

The Symphony season will close this week with the following program: Schumann's second symphony, a fantasy in D-major by Guy-Ropartz, "Don Juan," symphonic poem by Richard Strauss and an excerpt from Wagner's opera "Die Meistersinger."

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The appearance of Paderewski at the Symphony concert was marked by scenes of enthusiasm on the part of the auditors exceeding that shown at any previous time this season. The program comprised Chopin's second pianoforte concerto, with Paderewski as soloist; Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage"; Strube's symphonic poem, "Longing," for viola and orchestra, E. Fevir soloist, and Cesar Franck's D minor symphony. Mr Strube's work was dedicated to Mr Fevir and was suggested by a poem by Mr William Lyman Johnson of this city. The music expresses the calm and rest of the twilight hours and night-fall, free from the din and clamor of the day. The flowing legato melodies given to the viola are very sweet and significant in their suggestions of the poetic subject, and the orchestral background is splendidly outlined and developed by the composer, whose skill in instrumentation is so well and favorably known to concert patrons. Mr Fevir played the viola part with great delicacy and beauty of tone. Mr Strube conducted this number and at the close he and Mr Fevir were greeted with very hearty tributes of applause.

It is almost useless to criticize Paderewski's performance, for, to use a current phrase, "the audience fairly went wild" over him. At the close of his playing he was obliged to return again and again to the platform, and finally, to still the tumult, added encore numbers, an unusual thing at a Symphony concert, and more journeying to the stage midst applause which continued until Mr Gericke took up the baton preparatory to beginning the Franck symphony. There was no trace of the "pounding" with which Paderewski has been charged this season. On the contrary, the interpretation was of wonderful beauty, impeccable in execution and exquisite in finish and tonal coloring. A superb performance in which the orchestra deserves to share in praise, especially for the work in the second movement in which occurs the charming accompaniment by muted strings.

The Mendelssohn overture was as delightfully restful in a musical way as one would wish and the peculiar and somewhat startling features of the Franck symphony were brought out vividly by the orchestra, both pieces being up to the usual standard of execution. It is doubtful though if any number on the program received its fair share of appreciation, for Paderewski appeared to be the magnet, all else was but secondary.

The Symphony season will close this week with the following program: Schumann's second symphony, a fantasy in D-major by Guy-Ropartz, "Don Juan," symphonic poem by Richard Strauss, and an excerpt from Wagner's opera, "Die Meistersinger."

THE "POPS."

It seems hardly possible that it is 20 years since the idea to supplement the Symphony season with a series of summer concerts of light and attractive music was established, to be in vogue every succeeding season save one. The length of these seasons varied considerably in the earlier years and the concerts were even prolonged throughout the summer, but of late they have been confined to the months of May and June. The 20th season of the perennial

"Pops" opens Monday, May 1, and continues for nine weeks, closing Saturday, July 1.

The orchestra of 50 musicians will be selected as usual from the ranks of the Boston Symphony orchestra and everything will be conducted as usual with the single exception of a slight modification in the scale of prices, which will be as follows: General admission to the unreserved tables on the floor and the second balcony 25 cents; the entire first balcony reserved at 50 cents, and seats at reserved floor tables 75 cents.

There will be the usual number of special nights including the 1000th concert Monday evening, May 15, which will be featured by a selected program and other interesting attractions. Tickets go on sale for the opening night Monday, tomorrow morning at Symphony hall.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mendelssohn. Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage."
Strube. Symphonic Poem, "Longing," first time. Viola, Mr. E. Fevir.
Chopin. Concerto No. 2, for Pianoforte, in F Minor.
Soloist, Mr. Ignaz Paderewski.
Caesar Franck. Symphony in D Minor. By request.

The concert of last Saturday was passionate in character, even to the verge of strenuousness. Mendelssohn's overture, if not wildly turbulent, presented a voyage of some animation and spirit, with enough of drum and trumpet in its finale to make it suggest a triumphal entry by Rodzhestvensky into Kamranh Bay. The Strube number added its share of emotional and harmonic excitement, and if Chopin's tonal poetry was of a quieter nature, the insistent power of the final symphony brought a stirring close to the evening.

Mendelssohn's work suggests the inevitable comparison with his great "Hebrides" overture, and its wonderful rhythmic echo of the waves. Beside it the "Sea-Calm" seems faded and conventional, but the work is not without instrumental touches that must have been effective in their day. The sustained high notes on the violin still depict a solitude scarcely less impressive than that of Borodin's Steppes or the Campagna of Richard Strauss; and the prosperous voyage, though lacking the wind-machine and other accessories of modern realism, gave an adequate picture of fair weather and smooth sailing.

Mr. Gustave Strube's symphonic poem, like his previous works, showed him as a member of the ultra-modern school, and a seeker after strange harmonies. In this number, however, he did not allow the search after novelty to draw him away from the beautiful, and the composition contained many passages of effective charm. The orchestration, too, deserves praise for its mastery of delicate effects. Mr. Fevir's solo work was altogether commendable, and fully up to the high standard that his hearers always expect from him.

In discussing this work and its school, the reviewer may well hesitate before expressing any adverse opinion. Over a century ago, Benjamin Franklin, in his autobiography, lamented the discords that were creeping into music, and pleaded for the simpler style of his youth. Beethoven, in his day, was looked upon as a wild radical, and Wagner shared the same fate half a century later.

It may be that those men of today who seem merely ingenious harmony-jugglers will at some time be looked on as the pioneers of a future school. To the present writer, however, their work seems incoherent. The endless melodic recitative of Wagner is not the strongest point in his works, but it allowed him to develop the full richness of his harmonic effects. Now, however, the radicals go still further, and give us disjointed harmonies, and create a musical kaleidoscope of jumbled chords, apparently without any underlying plan.

It was natural that the lion's share of the evening's applause should be devoted to the great and only Paderewski. Once again he proved himself the incomparable artist that we have known of old, and the enthusiasm over his performance included shouts and handkerchief-wavings that seemed strange in the staid symphonic precincts. De Pachmann may at times equal him in emotional power, Busoni may sometimes surpass him in intellectual force, but he remains the broadest and most versatile of all the living pianists.

His rendering of the Chopin concerto was a delight from first note to last, and resulted in the forcing of an encore, in defiance of symphonic precedent. The beautiful E-major Etude and dainty C-sharp minor valse continued the Chopin mood, while the brilliant "Erl-King" transcription won further laurels. It is easy to predict that the coming pension fund concert, April 30, with Paderewski as soloist, will prove a complete success.

Franck's great symphony lost nothing in power and earnestness because of its repetition from a recent concert. It is massive in its solidity, possessing an enduring strength that his pupils have as yet failed to equal, in spite of their many efforts. Its themes are clear and well-marked, its development logical, its harmonies sane and unforced, and its interest well sustained until the final climax. It certainly proves that Franck must not be held responsible for the unclear work of some of his followers.

The next programme includes Schumann's second symphony, the "Don Juan" of Strauss, the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," and a Fantasia by Guy-Ropartz as the inevitable novelty.

Arthur Elson.

PADEREWSKI THE SOLOIST

Post-

Apr 23, 1905

Mr. Paderewski was the soloist at the Symphony concert last evening and the programme was as follows:

Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage".....Mendelssohn
Symphonic poem, "Longing".....Strube
Concerto for pianoforte No. 2.....Chopin
Symphony, D minor.....Franck

The novelty of the evening was Gustav Strube's symphonic poem, "Longing," for viola and orchestra, dedicated to E. Ferir, who played the solo instrument on this occasion. The work was suggested by William Lyman Johnson's poem and the performance last evening was the first.

Mr. Strube's thoughts in this latest effort are not quite so vague and meaningless as in some of his previous works, and the poem is pictured with considerable imaginative ideas which are very effectively scored. Mr. Ferir played the solo viola part admirably, and the work was well received. Whether it would gain in interest with another hearing may, however, be questioned.

Mendelssohn's early overture proved pleasing to the audience and it was superbly performed. The great symphony of Cesar Franck improves upon acquaintance, and it would have been even better appreciated if it had not come at the end of a concert already over-extended as to time.

Mr. Paderewski was naturally the "feature" for a large portion of the audience. In the Chopin F minor concerto he indulged in less pounding than at his recent recital, and for this relief one is truly grateful. The interpretation of this most poetic of concertos was at times admirable, with other moments that were marked by coarseness of tone and more or less exaggeration. The first movement proved the best on the average. The pianist received his usual ovations and the "extras" included the Chopin study in E, from Op. 10; the C sharp minor waltz, Op. 64, No. 2, and Liszt's transcription of Schubert's "Erl King." The Chopin numbers were enjoyable, but the last number was a piece of noise to "catch the gallery," as it were, but in no sense an artistic effort.

The last rehearsal and concert of the present season will be this coming week.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXIV. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

SATURDAY, APRIL 29, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN,

SYMPHONY No. 2, in C major, op. 61.

- I. Sostenuto assai: Allegro ma non troppo.
- II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio I, and Trio II.
- III. Adagio espressivo.
- IV. Allegro molto vivace.

GUY-ROPARTZ,

FANTASIA in D major, for ORCHESTRA.
(First time.)

RICHARD STRAUSS,

TONE-POEM, "Don Juan." (after N. Lenau) op. 20.
(By request.)

WAGNER,

PRELUDE to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

ard that his hearers always expect from him.

In discussing this work and its school, the reviewer may well hesitate before expressing any adverse opinion. Over a century ago, Benjamin Franklin, in his autobiography, lamented the discords that were creeping into music, and pleaded for the simpler style of his youth. Beethoven, in his day, was looked upon as a wild radical, and Wagner shared the same fate half a century later.

It may be that those men of today who seem merely ingenious harmony-jugglers will at some time be looked on as the pioneers of a future school. To the present writer, however, their work seems incoherent. The endless melodic recitative of Wagner is not the strongest point in his works, but it allowed him to develop the full richness of his harmonic effects. Now, however, the radicals go still further, and give us disjointed harmonies, and create a musical kaleidoscope of jumbled chords, apparently without any underlying plan.

It was natural that the lion's share of the evening's applause should be devoted to the great and only Paderewski. Once again he proved himself the incomparable artist that we have known of old, and the enthusiasm over his performance included shouts and handkerchief-wavings that seemed strange in the staid symphonic precincts. De Pachmann may at times equal him in emotional power, Busoni may sometimes surpass him in intellectual force, but he remains the broadest and most versatile of all the living pianists.

His rendering of the Chopin concerto was a delight from first note to last, and resulted in the forcing of an encore, in defiance of symphonic precedent. The beautiful E-major Etude and dainty C-sharp minor valse continued the Chopin mood, while the brilliant "Erl-King" transcription won further laurels. It is easy to predict that the coming pension fund concert, April 30, with Paderewski as soloist, will prove a complete success.

Franck's great symphony lost nothing in power and earnestness because of its repetition from a recent concert. It is massive in its solidity, possessing an enduring strength that his pupils have as yet failed to equal, in spite of their many efforts. Its themes are clear and well-marked, its development logical, its harmonies sane and unforced, and its interest well sustained until the final climax. It certainly proves that Franck must not be held responsible for the unclear work of some of his followers.

The next programme includes Schumann's second symphony, the "Don Juan" of Strauss, the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," and a Fantasia by Guy-Ropartz as the inevitable novelty.

Arthur Elson.

PADEREWSKI THE SOLOIST

Post-

Apr 23, 1905

Mr. Paderewski was the soloist at the Symphony concert last evening and the programme was as follows:

Overture, "Sea-Calm and Prosperous Voyage".....Mendelssohn
Symphonic poem, "Longing".....Strube
Concerto for pianoforte No. 2.....Chopin
Symphony, D minor.....Franck

The novelty of the evening was Gustav Strube's symphonic poem, "Longing," for viola and orchestra, dedicated to E. Ferir, who played the solo instrument on this occasion. The work was suggested by William Lyman Johnson's poem and the performance last evening was the first.

Mr. Strube's thoughts in this latest effort are not quite so vague and meaningless as in some of his previous works, and the poem is pictured with considerable imaginative ideas which are very effectively scored. Mr. Ferir played the solo viola part admirably, and the work was well received. Whether it would gain in interest with another hearing may, however, be questioned.

Mendelssohn's early overture proved pleasing to the audience and it was superbly performed. The great symphony of Cesar Franck improves upon acquaintance, and it would have been even better appreciated if it had not come at the end of a concert already over-extended as to time.

Mr. Paderewski was naturally the "feature" for a large portion of the audience. In the Chopin F minor concerto he indulged in less pounding than at his recent recital, and for this relief one is truly grateful. The interpretation of this most poetic of concertos was at times admirable, with other moments that were marked by coarseness of tone and more or less exaggeration. The first movement proved the best on the average. The pianist received his usual ovations and the "extras" included the Chopin study in E, from Op. 10; the C sharp minor waltz, Op. 64, No. 2, and Liszt's transcription of Schubert's "Erl King." The Chopin numbers were enjoyable, but the last number was a piece of noise to "catch the gallery," as it were, but in no sense an artistic effort.

The last rehearsal and concert of the present season will be this coming week.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1904-05.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXIV. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

SATURDAY, APRIL 29, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN,

SYMPHONY No. 2, in C major, op. 61.

I. Sostenuto assai: Allegro ma non troppo.

II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio I, and Trio II.

III. Adagio espressivo.

IV. Allegro molto vivace.

GUY-ROPARTZ,

FANTASIA in D major, for ORCHESTRA.

(First time.)

RICHARD STRAUSS,

TONE-POEM, "Don Juan." (after N. Lenau) op. 20.

(By request.)

WAGNER,

PRELUDE to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

SYMPHONY SEASON HAS BRILLIANT ENDING

Boston Post Oct 30, 05

The Symphony concert last evening marked the close of the 24th season. Although there was no soloist, the programme was unusually interesting. The numbers were as follows:

Symphony No. 2 in C.....Schumann
Fantasia in D for orchestra.....Guy Ropartz
Tone poem, "Don Juan".....Richard Strauss
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner

The conductor's desk was tastefully decorated, and Mr. Gericke received an ovation after each number, and a recall at the close of the concert.

Schumann's symphony received a noteworthy performance. One can scarcely recall a better one in several years. It is a general favorite, and by many considered the best of the four that Schumann contributed to the symphonic literature.

Guy Ropartz's orchestral fantasia was heard here for the first time. The composer is among the newer French school and has written in many forms, although few of his works have been heard in this country.

The fantasia is built upon themes found in folk music of Brittany. These are ingeniously elaborated, the instrumentation is admirable, and the work proved most enjoyable. It is hoped that it will receive another performance at these concerts next season.

Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," played earlier in the season, was repeated last evening by request. The performance was most brilliant, and was received with so much enthusiasm that the members of the orchestra rose in a body to acknowledge the appreciation of their efforts.

Symphony Hall.

Twenty-Fifth Season, 1905-1906.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

Opening Concert,

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 14, 1905.

SYMPHONY SEASON HAS BRILLIANT ENDING

Boston Post      Apr 30. 05

The Symphony concert last evening marked the close of the 24th season. Although there was no soloist, the programme was unusually interesting. The numbers were as follows:

Symphony No. 2 in C.....Schumann
Fantasia in D, for orchestra.....Guy Ropartz
Tone poem, "Don Juan".....Richard Strauss
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner

The conductor's desk was tastefully decorated, and Mr. Gericke received an ovation after each number, and a recall at the close of the concert.

Schumann's symphony received a noteworthy performance. One can scarcely recall a better one in several years. It is a general favorite, and by many considered the best of the four that Schumann contributed to the symphonic literature.

Guy Ropartz's orchestral fantasia was heard here for the first time. The composer is among the newer French school and has written in many forms, although few of his works have been heard in this country.

The fantasia is built upon themes found in folk music of Brittany. These are ingeniously elaborated, the instrumentation is admirable, and the work proved most enjoyable. It is hoped that it will receive another performance at these concerts next season.

Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," played earlier in the season, was repeated last evening by request. The performance was most brilliant, and was received with so much enthusiasm that the members of the orchestra rose in a body to acknowledge the appreciation of their efforts.

Symphony Hall.

Twenty-Fifth Season, 1905-1906.

The
Boston
Symphony
Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

Opening Concert,

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 14, 1905.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61. I. Sostenuato assai; Allegro ma non troppo. II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio I, and Trio II. III. Adagio espressivo. IV. Allegro molto vivace. Schumann
Fantasia in D major, for orchestra. Guy-Ropartz
(First Time.)
Tone-Poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau) op. 20. Richard Strauss
(By request.)
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" Wagner

A fine programme, although 3 works of the modern school, in succession, seemed like adding pepper to paprika. Mr. Gericke was received with enthusiasm and this enthusiasm extended all through the concert, and a few minutes beyond its close.

It was a pleasure to see that Schumann is not out-of-date with the public. The second symphony is not quite as great as the first or third, but it is a sane, romantic and melodious work. It was played gloriously. The violins in the scherzo played as if inspired, and in the finale, from the violin embroidery of the beginning to the kettle-drum syncopations of the coda, everything was nobly interpreted.

And the audience evidently appreciated the fact that there was electricity in the air, that the orchestra were in a state of exaltation, that it was a performance quite extraordinary, and they applauded almost without cessation.

But this was only the beginning. The novelty of the concert came after the intermission. Guy Ropartz is director of the conservatory at Nancy, and is, like D'Indy, a pupil of Cesar Franck. If "the evil that men do lives after them," it is pleasant to know that the good also continues; Franck did nothing but good, and France is reaping the harvest that he planted long ago, in the present "renaissance" of Gallic orchestral music.

The fantasia plunged "in medias res" at once, and began with a contra-bass passage that was both difficult and original. The work was modern, but not savagely so; it gave a degree of rhythmic complexity but did not seek for ugliness as a means of impressing the auditor. There is a 5-4 rhythm in the work that is as successful as the famous one in the Symphonie Pathétique.

There are powerful contrasts, and some highly-spiced bits of rustic revelry. In short this is one of the successful modern experiments; it is a piquant species of bitter-sweet that neither offends nor cloy the palate. We hope to hear the work again next season.

Not since Strauss himself directed in Symphony Hall has there been such a success made in Boston with one of his works. The interpretation of "Don Juan" cannot be exaggerated; it was simply superb. From the Glockenspiel up to the first violinist the orchestra was on its mettle, and

Mr. Gericke gave an abandon and fire to the work that suited it perfectly.

The famous figure of the trombones never had so much of dash and chivalry, and the strong contrast of the end, when all the glory has departed and only disgust remains, was something to remember forever. Twice was Mr. Gericke forced to bow his thanks for the applause, and twice also the orchestra arose to acknowledge the excitement they had evoked.

There was more enthusiasm than if this had been a "prima donna" or a "solo artist" concert. It was fitting that our orchestra should gather in its laurels at the end of the season without an assisting artist.

It was an experience to pass from Richard II. to Richard I., from Strauss to Wagner. It forced a comparison. In this comparison one could but find Wagner the superior in poetry of ideas. There is nothing in "Don Juan" that equals the power of the Prize Song, or the loftiness of the Mastersinger's theme. But, in the matter of orchestration, that which we once deemed the extreme of instrumental possibility has been surpassed! Verily this is the orchestral age, and Wagner and Berlioz were but its beginning!

At the end of this concert, which may be classed as one of the best ever heard in Boston, the applause was loud and long-continued, a final ovation and good-bye and thanks to Mr. Gericke.

And since "Farewell" would give us pain,
We'll change it to "Auf Wiederseh'n!"
Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The final symphony concert of this year having taken place, the season may be said fast to be reaching a close. So far as the Symphony Concerts are concerned, the close was a brilliant one, a fitting ending to a brilliant season. This was the programme:

Schumann: Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61.
Ropartz: Fantasia in D major, for Orchestra.

(First time.)

Richard Strauss: Tone-poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 20.

(By request.)

Wagner: Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The one novelty of the evening was very much a novelty, practically nothing by Ropartz having been performed in Boston heretofore, a song brought forward by Miss Lena Little being probably the only exception. And yet, in his own country, France, Ropartz is held in high repute, a pupil of Massenet and César Franck, the director of the conservatory at Nancy, a conductor of concerts, and a diligent composer. Although the fantasia produced Saturday night failed to exercise any very strong charm, it none the less made one recognize that Ropartz is a musician with whose works it would be worth while to become acquainted. The man's musical bent is far from common—in fact, it seems somewhat over-original and individual, almost to the point of being bizarre. The fantasia, for example, while based on two simple enough melodies of a Breton character, the second really beautiful, is developed in a distinctly odd way, with crashing climaxes that are not easily accounted for. Quiet episodes, too, appear in queer places. It all sounds well, however, Ropartz evidently being a man who understands writing for orchestra. The work would seem more intelligible were it labeled a symphonic poem and furnished with a guiding title. A fantasia, however, one does not expect to be so frequently violent. The work was most brilliantly played.

So was the Strauss poem, which everybody in the hall seemed delighted to hear again. People are clamoring for Strauss at present, and, on the whole, it may not be a bad thing for Boston that there are difficulties in the way of producing his latest creations, for, in their place, we are given repetitions of his earlier works, with which it is well that we should become closely familiar. When all is said and done, it is still questionable if Strauss's most recent compositions, such as the "Don Quixote" and, probably, the "Domestic" symphony are of such great worth as "Don Juan," "Death and Apotheosis," and "Till Eulenspiegel." Be this as it may, there is no harm done by our witnessing twice in a season the almost inconceivable passion of Don Juan, followed by that awful picture of vanity, all is vanity, which Tschalkowsky himself has never equalled in pignancy. Mr. Gericke read the work with superb warmth and authority, and the performance was so thoroughly appreciated and applauded that twice over the entire orchestra had to rise to bow in recognition. All the evening there was equally brilliant playing, the scherzo of the symphony being tossed off with delightful abandon and the "Meistersinger" prelude making one wish once more that we might some day have opportunity of hearing Mr. Gericke conduct a Wagner opera.

If this cannot be, however, we are fortunate in having Mr. Gericke to conduct our symphony concerts. Concertgoers, like all the rest of the world, are prone to take too much for granted, and, after hearing admirable performances one after another, people are very like to forget that an orchestra does not, of itself, keep up to a high pitch of excellence. The maintenance of a high standard of technical proficiency is the task of the conductor, a task of which Mr. Gericke acquits himself nobly. And it is not every day in the week that a conductor can be found of sufficient catholicity of taste to produce a poem by Richard Strauss as "Don Juan" was performed Saturday, and, the next week, the Schubert C major symphony as Mr. Gericke read it in the course of this season, or a Mozart symphony. In the way we have had one played this winter. To conduct twenty-four concerts in one city in one season, not to mention the countless concerts given abroad, with the warmth and spirit that is necessary if they are to prove interesting, is no bagatelle. We may be grateful that we have a musician so well fitted to the undertaking as is Mr. Gericke.

As for the programmes, it is probably impossible to arrange twenty-four that shall, even approximately, please all the world. Mr. Gericke, very likely, succeeds as well as would anybody else. Some people insist on new works all the time; others look doubtful if they are asked to listen to so recent a composer as Brahms. Perhaps Mr. Gericke steers a middle course as skillfully as is possible. Rarely, at all events, has there been a concert this season without some number of the programme being ticketed "for the first time." Although all these new works have not given extreme pleasure, some of them have been of great importance, like the d'Indy symphony, which we must hear in Boston if we would not be provincial. Some pieces, on the other hand, have been presented which might become for the present, at least, a part of the repertory: Faure's "Pelleas" suite, Mr. Converse's poem, "Night," Mr. Hadley's symphony. The d'Indy symphony, if not entirely attractive, ought certainly to be repeated. The repetition, by the way, of César Franck's symphony, and of Strauss's "Don Juan," has proved a pleasant and encouraging feature of a season notable for brilliant playing and for catholic programmes. Only in the matter of soloists could one wish for a finer standard.

R. R. G.

SYMPHONY CLOSES WITH CRESCENDO

Last Concert of Season Gives Pleasure Because No Soloist
Appears in Program.

The closing concert of the Symphony season had no soloist, but it was, none the less, enjoyable for that. Indeed, the true pleasure given by it, the enormous success won from the audience, the fine air of earnestness and "class" over everything suggested that we have had altogether too few purely orchestral concerts during the year and altogether too many fiddlers or pianists or singers, many of them mediocre in ability and uninspiring to a degree. Surely Mr. Gericke must have seen, from the hearty applause that was given him and his band for some of the most brilliant and effective playing of the whole year, that an evening minus a soloist is desired and appreciated. It is to be hoped that we can have more such next season.

The noble Schumann symphony No. 2 was very welcome, not only for its inherent grace, beauty and poetic charm, but for the performance, which was one of the finest the orchestra ever gave it. In particular, the scherzo went with enormous dash and virtuosity, although the exquisite adagio, in which Lenon appeared to advantage in the seat of the absent Mr. Longy, as first oboe, was admirably interpreted.

The music of Ropartz, director of the Conservatory of Nancy, is almost unknown in Boston, but if his Fantasia in D major, played here for the first time on Saturday night, is a fair sample of his work, we ought to have more. The piece is built up on themes of quaint charm and much beauty; the orchestration is clear and sonorous; the general impression that of eminent sanity without dullness. Ropartz has two symphonies already to his credit; one would not be amiss in the scheme for the coming year.

And again Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," after one performance this season! No one regretted it. The thing is a colossal piece of extraordinary musical imagination wrought out with superb technique, filled with the richest of color and firing the emotions at every point. Had Richard Strauss written but this one tone-poem, his rank among the great composers of the world would be secure.

After its glowing richness even the "Meistersinger" prelude sounded, for once, curiously calm and rather old-fashioned. This feeling disappeared as the work proceeded, but it is significant that anything by the man who made "Don Juan" possible—Richard Wagner—should in any way yield to the second Richard's tonal genius.

Thus endeth the twenty-fourth season of our great orchestra, a season that has been distinguished by a steady crescendo of interest and virtuosity to its close. Mr. Gericke has never shown so much fire and emotional strength as during its last quarter.

SYMPHONY BIDS ADIEU FOR SEASON

Twenty-Fourth Concert of 24th
Season Is Interesting, Though Only One Number Is New, Ropartz's Fantasia.

NO SOLOIST, BUT LOSS
IS NOT PERCEPTIBLE

Mr. Gericke Conducts in Vigorous
Fashion and Work of Orchestra
Is Brilliant—Audience Most Appreciative—Notes.

Herald — Apr. 30, 1905

The programme of the 24th and last concert of the 24th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in C major.....Schumann
Fantasia in D major.....Ropartz
(First time.)

Tone-poem, "Don Juan".....R. Strauss
(By request.)

Prelude to "The Mastersingers".....Wagner

This concert was one of unusual interest, although there was no soloist, and although the pieces, with the exception of Ropartz's fantasia, were familiar. With such a virtuoso orchestra, led as skilfully as it was last night, the absence of a soloist was not to be regretted. One may even go as far as certain ultra-modern Germans and regret that a solo singer or instrumental player is ever allowed to make personally the dominating feature of a symphony concert. A Frenchman said once in gentle protest against the part played by woman in the world that she disturbs the landscape. The same might be said of the soloist at any symphony concert.

The fantasia of Ropartz was played for the first time in America. This pupil of Cesar Franck, a man of various talents, now director of the Nancy Conservatory of Music, composed the fantasia in 1897. It is based on two themes of Breton character, and it was stated when the piece was first played in Paris in March, 1898, at a Colonne concert, that the themes were folk-tunes of Brittany. Ropartz, in his short analysis of the fantasia, does not say this. The first theme is a vigorous dance tune in 5-4 time. The second is of a more songful and melancholy nature, and the work is the development of this material in truly fantastic character. The piece would gain in effect if it were shorter. There is the suspicion of an anti-climax which might easily have been avoided. The second theme, which is in two sections, is inherently beautiful, and it is employed after the exposition with true poetic feeling as well as technical skill. There are conspicuously fine passages, and, with the reservation already made, the interest is maintained throughout.

It has been said that any pupil of the Paris Conservatory can orchestrate a commonplace piece so that it is plausible for the moment. Ropartz's orchestration deserves higher praise than this. While there are striking features in the instrumentation, they do not seem to be designed merely for the purpose of exciting admiration, but they are the natural expression of the thought. Nor is there in this music the austerity that characterizes the works of some of Franck's pupils, an austerity that is forbidding, if not sour; an austerity that is almost pretentious, as though in scorn of sensuousness, because the thoughts of the composer are naturally labored, involved, dry. Now that this fantasia has been played, it quickens the desire to hear one of Ropartz's two symphonies, and one of our choral societies might well consider a production of his "136th Psalm," which has been performed with great success in leading cities of Germany, as well as of France and Belgium.

A week ago Saturday the noble symphony of Cesar Franck, one of the few great symphonies since the death of Beethoven, was performed by request, although it had been played earlier in the season. Last night Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" was played for the second time this season, also by request. Such requests are significant and most welcome. It was not so long ago that both the symphony and the symphonic poem were as stumbling blocks to many—"to the Greeks foolishness." At the Lamoureux and the Colonne concerts a new piece of importance is played on two consecutive Sundays. The idea is an excellent one. It is an act of justice to the audience as well as to the composer.

Take Vincent d'Indy's symphony, for instance, which, whatever may be thought of it here, has been performed in European cities with uncommon success. It excited discussion there and here, and when there is no fierce discussion over an artistic work, when men are not ready to come to blows in the argument, when households are not divided, there is artistic stagnation. Grant that d'Indy's symphony was in certain respects a hard nut to crack. No one will deny that it contained passages of ineffable beauty and overwhelming power. Might not that which seemed strange or repulsive at one hearing reveal itself at a second hearing as worthy at least of still more earnest study and high respect? There was a time when the long night scene between Ortrud and Telramund was cut, for it was considered dull. Today it is held to be one of the most dramatic and truly Wagnerian scenes in "Lohengrin." When one thinks of the labor of preparing such a symphony as d'Indy's for performance, when one remembers the skill and sympathy shown by Mr. Gericke in the interpretation, the regret is keener that such a work is played only once, then left on the shelf till it is thought that the taste of the audience has been developed to such an extent that a performance after the lapse of two or three years may be advisable or at least safe.

As for "Don Juan" itself, it is one of Strauss' true masterpieces, to be classed with "Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel." In it Strauss does not attempt the impossible, nor does he suggest a huge joke on audiences, commentators and critics. There is no need even of the excerpts from Lenau's poem for warm appreciation; the title is enough. Whether your Don Juan is the rake-helly hero of the legend or an idealist constantly baffled in the attainment of his desire, the effect of the music is the same. There is the suggestion of Spanish pride and brilliance in the pursuit, the ardor of wooing, the clash of swords, the indomitable energy—and then the end of all sensualists, glorious or inglorious, a morose ending. The love apples are in the end but Dead sea fruit. A few lines from the bitter reflections of Casanova in his harmless, pitiable old age would have served Strauss as well as the soliloquies of Lenau's man. Or the refrain of Swinburne's "Ballad of Burdens"—"This is the end of every man's desire"—would have been still more appropriate.

Mr. Gericke may well be proud of the concert itself and of the warm appreciation so openly shown by the audience. He was heartily welcomed; the applause was a crescendo parallel with the constantly increasing brilliance of the performance. The scherzo in the symphony was played with uncommon spirit, and the adagio was sung with singular euphony and poetic feeling. He interpreted the fantasia in admirable fashion, and his reading and the orchestral performance of "Don Juan" were indeed superb. There remained the prelude to "The Mastersingers" and the deserved scene of recognition and gratitude. The orchestra was equally appreciated, and twice did it, at Mr. Gericke's request, arise and bow in acknowledgment after the "Don Juan."

Thus ended the 24th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, a season that had several uncommon features. But a review of this series of concerts will be included in the general review of the season which will be published in The Herald of next Sunday.

Last of the Season's
Symphony Concerts.

Postponement of the Pension
Fund Concert.

"The Pops" Begin Tomorrow
Night—Gossip.

Eglobe

Apr. 30, 1905

The 24th season of Symphony concerts closed last evening with the following program: Schumann's C-major symphony, a fantasia in D-major, for orchestra, by J. Guy Ropartz; "Don Juan," a tone poem by Richard Strauss, and the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersingers." A conservative offering, this, without soloists, and with one novelty, the Ropartz fantasia, which was played for the first time here. This latter work is built on two interrupted themes, the first a vigorous dance melody, and the second a tune more delicate in material. There seems to be but little connection between the two motifs, the orchestration of the different parts showing but little relation to each other; as if the composer had worked out separate ideas and then bridged a musical chasm as best he could. There are some moments of impressive orchestration in the heavier instruments, notably in the basses, in the opening measures and later in the brass contingent, but aside from an exhibition of considerable skill in handling the instruments the work contains little that is interesting. The orchestra acquitted itself well, the performance as a whole being up to the usual standard of the ensemble work of Mr Gericke's men.

The Schumann symphony went splendidly. The second movement, with its exquisite trilos, was given by the strings with perfect unison of rhythm, the beautiful cantabile quality of the third part was preserved throughout by each section of the orchestra, and in the finale the intricacies of the various passages, especially in the long coda, were played at smoothly as one could wish for.

"Don Juan," a typical Richard Strauss tone poem, was performed with all due regard to its required tonal vigor, and the "Meistersinger" prelude, which closed the program, was interpreted in the proper Wagnerian spirit. The audience was very liberal in its applause, and Mr Gericke was obliged to acknowledge many tributes of appreciation.

In the summary of the season's work the compilation in the program shows that 103 compositions were performed. The list was led by Wagner and Brahms, seven each; then came Dvorak with six, Mozart and Beethoven with five, Bruch, Schumann, R. Strauss and Tchaikowsky, four each.

Twenty works were performed for the first time here and 25 soloists have appeared, of which eight were pianists and six violinists. There were four changes from the announced programs, and Mr Hess conducted a few concerts when Mr Gericke was ill.

TRIBUTE TO GERICKE CLOSES SEASON AT SYMPHONY.

Final Concert Turned Into a Festal Occasion, Honors Being Awarded Both to the Leader and the Orchestra

By Kent Perkins.

A note of personal good will and a distinctly festal feeling characterized last night's Symphony concert, the twenty-fourth and last of the season. Leader Gericke's stand was decorated with green and white and when he appeared for the opening number he was welcomed with friendly and long-continued applause. Similar testimony of warm personal regard was given at the close of each number on the program, and after one specially popular selection the people would not be quieted till the orchestra had risen twice to acknowledge its share in the tribute of affection.

The pervading idea in the big audience plainly said: "We have passed a valuable and pleasant season together. We are grateful to you, Mr. Gericke, and to your splendid orchestra. We will not say good-bye, for we expect to meet you again in October. A delightful Summer to you!"

The programme was appropriate to the occasion. The opening and principal number, Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C major, had a thread of melancholy and regret running through it; its third movement, the adagio, breathed tenderness and warm affection; but its final rush of triumphant harmonies expressed fittingly the dominant feeling of the people and the forward look toward bright future.

A Fantasia in D Major, by J. Guy Ropartz, a young French composer, heard here for the first time and built on two themes that are melodies of Brittany, the first being a lively dance tune and the second a tender song, was a beautifully expressive tone picture of out-door life in that picturesque corner of France. There were hints of the Summer landscape in Brittany, of festal peasant scenes, of shimmering romance, of chivalric stateliness and of heroic action.

The music was vigorous and stirring, and the development of both the melodies and harmonies was original, striking and vivid. The orchestra played with its very best spirit and skill of expression.

Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," which was given earlier in the season, was repeated by request and was played with fine vigor and appreciation. It aroused notable enthusiasm, and the people applauded till the orchestra joined the leader in acknowledging the tribute.

The programme closed with Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which was given with an intensity of feeling and refinement of execution that Herr Corried and his opera orchestra might have heard with profit.

The opening concert of the twenty-fifth season will take place on October 14.

POPS AND PEOPLE TOGETHER AGAIN

First Night at Symphony Hall of 20th Season of Sprightly Concerts Attended in Large Numbers by Gay and Music-Loving.

Stirring strains from a Strube march, the Symphony orchestra, rustle of silken gowns, crackle of glistening shirt fronts, purr of foam and tinkle of glass, thin haze of smoke, appreciative attention, a spectacle of well-bred vivacity—the Pops!

May time brought the Pops to Symphony Hall once more. The opening of the 20th season was welcomed as cordially as ever. Old friends—Waldteufel Strube, Herbert, Strauss, Tchaikowski and Wagner—mingled pleasantly in the mauve and gold setting of Symphony Hall with a large assemblage of noteworthy people and the concomitant features of the Pops.

Fantastic musical comedy, dainty, entertaining and serious drama, dances, receptions, lectures—all give way at May time for the harmonious hobnobbing of "Black Bess," "Mignon," "Queen of Sheba," "Babes in Toyland," serenade from "Les Contes d'Hoffmann," and the "Sho-gun."

When Conductor Adamowski stepped upon his stand the tables were circled by many blithe parties. Clink of glass and soft swish suggested—suggested—Bohemia. Subdued laughter and low, modulated voices, quiet demeanor expressed Boston at a winter concert of the Symphony. Then thin spirals of smoke took you back to Bohemia.

Conductor Adamowski scanned his orchestra quietly, keenly. The conversation languished and the assemblage sat up expectantly. The baton gyrated gracefully, the violins answered with a rush of sound.

Strube scored effectually—musically. Then the sprightly music of "Mignon" pleasantly intruded. Eventually the spirited "España" of Waldteufels! And then, very logically, the Promenade!

Everybody went out to the spacious corridors and looked at everybody else smilingly and politely and bowed blithely to acquaintances and friends. Women told one another: "How splendid to have the 'Pops' with us once more!"

"How well the Symphony is playing!" "Mr. Adamowski conducts beautifully."

"There is so much charm in the atmosphere of the 'Pops'!"

Men remarked about the jolly old "Pops." "Nothing like them, you know."

Back among the tables and the spiral skeins of cigarette smoke to hear the pretty music of "Babes in Toyland." Then the soft, sweet, sensuous Offenbach serenade. Finally the refreshing "Vienna Dude" of Von Blau, something you had not heard before, something you'd like to hear again. Then exit—well pleased with the 1905 "Pops." Carriage!

"Yes, charming."

"So fortunate to have the Symphony orchestra for the Pops! And Mr. Adamowski!"

"Yes—and Mr. Ellis and Mr. Comee. How splendidly they manage these affairs!"

Well known people in the audience: Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. Timothee Adamowski, Miss Lena Little, Maj. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, Miss Barbara Higginson, Miss Juliet Higginson, Alexander Higginson, Otto Roth, William P. Blake, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Richmond, Rufus Wills Page, Mr. Alberta and party, Walter Dugan, Mr. and Mrs. F. O. North, William T. Reid, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Steinert, S. H. Hudson, Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mr. and Mrs. Otis Kimball, Miss Estelle Kimball, Richard Heard, Capt. and Mrs. Alline, Julian Chamberlin, Mr. and Mrs. McQuesten, J. A. Fox, Percy Houghton, Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Barron, Miss Ellen Todd, Dr. and Mrs. Foster Bush, Mr. and Mrs. Holman, Mr. and Mrs. Francis Hurtubis, Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. Denee, Mr. S. Parkman Shaw and son, Elbridge Fernald and party.

Symphony Hall: Pop Concert

Once more the Pop Concerts have begun, with even more magnificence than ever before. The opening last night, indeed, was grand. The hall, to begin with, was crowded, apparently all the tables on the floor being occupied, and both balconies were well filled. The spectacle was truly brilliant. Frequenters of the opera, which, it would seem, we are to have no more, complain that Boston women do not dress gayly for appearances in public. But these people are wrong. To see finely dressed ladies, one does not go to the opera, but to the Pops. On the whole, perhaps, the high-water mark was reached yesterday evening. Never before, surely, has there been such a display in Symphony Hall. And the men did not lag behind; tail coats were the rule rather than the exception. Among the gorgeous throng there was a goodly proportion of fine company. The occasion was grand.

Like everything else, of course, the opening had the defects of its qualities. Functions are not, it is usually held, entirely gay, and last night's entertainment might perhaps, under different circumstances, have been livelier. The programme, for instance, was adapted rather to please the tastes of the fine people assembled than to entertain such persons as might feel disposed to step into the hall for a few moments to take a glass of beer and listen to a waltz or two. There were three overtures played, those to "Mignon" and "Rienzi" and Tchaikowsky's "1812." There was also ballet music from Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba," and a charming serenade out of Offenbach's "Les Contes d'Hoffmann." In lighter vein were Mr. Strube's march "Black Bess," selections from "Babes in Toyland" and "The Sho-Gun," the overture to "Die Fledermaus," waltzes by Wald-teufel and Vollstedt and a march entitled "Vienna Dude." Perhaps Mr. Adamowski could not have arranged a programme better calculated to please all tastes, those of gentle and simple alike. But does not Mr. Adamowski overestimate the taste of the gentle? Although people in glad raiment were far more plenty last night than plain persons, the musical number that seemed to give most pleasure was the selection from "Babes in Toyland." Fine feathers will not create a taste for Tschalkowsky. For the greater contentment of all "classes," let the music be light. Yesterday, by the way, the programme was admirably played, for Mr. Adamowski is not only a musician of temperament and charm, but a conductor of authority. Both musically and socially, in short, the opening Pop was a notable success. R. R. G.

Trans. May 2, 1905

Pop Concerts

MONDAY, MAY 15, 1905.

1,000th Performance, Reminiscence Night.

PROGRAMME.

1. MARCH, "Hoch Habsburg" . . . . . Kral
2. OVERTURE, "William Tell" . . . . . Rossini
Solo Violoncello, Mr. JOSEF KELLER.
Played as No. 2 at first "Pop" Concert, July 11, 1885.
3. WALTZ, "Thousand and One Nights" . . . . . Strauss
4. OVERTURE, "Martha" . . . . . Flotow
5. SELECTION, "The Sphinx" . . . . . Thompson
6. { a. "LOIN DU BAL" . . . . . Gillet
  b. INTRODUCTION, Act III., "Lohengrin" . . . . . Wagner
7. LARGO . . . . . Handel
8. FAREWELL SYMPHONY . . . . . Haydn
9. SELECTION, "Babes in Toyland" . . . . . Herbert
10. WALTZ, "Grubenlichter" . . . . . Zeller
11. SELECTION, "Yankee Consul" . . . . . Robyn
12. MARCH, "Up the Street" . . . . . Morse

Hume Piano Used.

Large Audience in Symphony Hall Enjoys the 1000th "Pop" Concert

Every Number of Programme Applauded—"Farewell Symphony," Impressively Rendered, Creates Deep Sensation.

Herald May 16, 1905

Nearly 20 years ago musical Boston went to Music Hall with much eclat and listened delightedly to the first "Pop" concert; last night many people listened with equal delight to the 1000th "Pop" concert. Under Mr. Neuendorff, the orchestra, 20 years ago, gave selections from Strauss, Wagner, Suppe, Waldteufel, Lecocq and Reissiger; under Mr. Adamowski last night, the Symphony players rendered Strauss, Wagner, Waldteufel, Gillet, Handel and Haydn. Seven hundred and ninety-five concerts in old Music Hall and 205 in Symphony—high class concerts—the "Pops"! You told your guest that it was an institution thoroughly appreciated by Boston people.

The large audience last evening showed its liking for the "Pops," with much enthusiasm. Every number on the programme was applauded, and one very charming feature was given significant demonstration.

For the closing selection of part 2 the orchestra played the "Farewell Symphony." The hall was darkened; the stands were lighted by candles. From time to time a player blew out his candle and quietly withdrew. The orchestra dwindled to 20, then to 10, then to five—finally to only two. The strain wavered, softened and then expired. Then the last remaining violinists rose softly and tiptoed out in the semi-darkness. It was an effectively impressive bit of sentiment, and the recovery of the audience from the spell was marked by an enthusiastic tribute to the players—to the 1000th "Pop."

AT 1000TH "POP."

Many Old Favorites in Its Special Program.

Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" Given as a Feature.

Globe May 16, 1905

The 1000th "Pop" popped in spite of the fog last night, and was thoroughly enjoyed by a large audience, most of whom were old-timers, and there for the purpose of hearing old-time music—in a sense.

These concerts have now been in existence so long that people have "memories," and pieces like "Loin du Bal," Haendel's "Largo" from the regulem mass, the good old "William Tell" overture, and the introduction of the third act of "Lohengrin," Schumann's "Traumerel," or the "Derniere Sommeil d'une Vierge," mean to thousands a recollection of an evening spent perhaps across the table from a pair of eyes, with smoke and music, and even a phrase, or a look, that will never be separated again from the tune.

Of the 1000 concerts 795 were given in old Music hall, and 205 have been given in Symphony hall. There have been 10 conductors, beginning with Neuendorff, and counting Mullaly, Rietzel, Kneisel, Adamowski, Gruenberg, de Novellis, Max Zach, Leo Schultz and Gustav Strube. Only one halt has been made; in the summer of 1890 there were no concerts.

The program for the first "Pop" included the "Imperial" march by Resch, the overture to "William Tell," "Mon Reve," the Waldteufel waltz; selections from "The Little Duke," by Lecocq—who hears of "The Little Duke" today?—Suppe's overture "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna," "Reminiscences from Tannhauser," a "pizzicato polka" by Strauss, Ernest Scherz' arrangement of Bilse's music condensing a whole concert into one piece; "Die Felsenmuhle," a forgotten but pretty piece by Reissiger; the "Donau Lieder" waltzes of Strauss, favorites 20 years ago; a paraphrase of "Die Lorelei," and a galop, "Shooting Star," by Bial.

Of these only the "William Tell" overture was on last night's program. Indeed, so many of the old-time favorites crowded for recognition that the selection came to call for diplomacy. A fine program was finally arranged, with a most unusual feature. The Haydn "Farewell symphony" was played. At every music desk a small candle was lighted, as orchestras were lighted when the farewell symphony was written. All other lights on the stage were put out, and those in the auditorium were lowered. In semigloom the players departed one by one, each blowing out his candle as he left. The sentiment of it was prettily enforced, and the audience was mightily pleased when the last two violins departed, and Mr Adamowski, blowing out his own last twinkle, followed them.

Other pieces of the old-time concerts on the program were the good old "Hoch Hapsburg" march that has stirred so many a student gathering in Music hall, the Strauss "Thousand and One Nights" waltz, which apparently was chosen for its title; the overture to teufel and Vollstedt and a march entitled "Vienna Dude." Perhaps Mr. Adamowski could not have arranged a programme better calculated to please all tastes, those of gentle and simple alike. But does not Mr. Adamowski overestimate the taste of the gentle? Although people in glad raiment were far more plenty last night than plain persons, the musical number that seemed to give most pleasure was the selection from "Babes in Toyland." Fine feathers will not create a taste for Tschalkowsky. For the greater contentment of all "classes," let the music be light. Yesterday, by the way, the programme was admirably played, for Mr. Adamowski is not only a musician of temperament and charm, but a conductor of authority. Both musically and socially, in short, the opening Pop was a notable success. R. R. G.

Trans. May 2, 1905

Pop Concerts

MONDAY, MAY 15, 1905.

1,000th Performance, Reminiscence Night.

PROGRAMME.

- |   |          |
|---|----------|
| 1. MARCH, "Hoch Habsburg"   | Kral     |
| 2. OVERTURE, "William Tell"   | Rossini  |
| Solo Violoncello, Mr. JOSEF KELLER.Played as No. 2 at first "Pop" Concert, July 11, 1885. |          |
| 3. WALTZ, "Thousand and One Nights"   | Strauss  |
| 4. OVERTURE, "Martha"   | Flotow   |
| 5. SELECTION, "The Sphinx"  | Thompson |
| 6. { a. "LOIN DU BAL"   | Gillet   |
| { b. INTRODUCTION, Act III., "Lohengrin"  | Wagner   |
| 7. LARGO  | Handel   |
| 8. FAREWELL SYMPHONY  | Haydn    |
| 9. SELECTION, "Babes in Toyland"  | Herbert  |
| 10. WALTZ, "Grubenlichter"  | Zeller   |
| 11. SELECTION, "Yankee Consul"  | Robyn    |
| 12. MARCH, "Up the Street"  | Morse    |

Hume Piano Used.

Large Audience in Symphony Hall Enjoys the 1000th "Pop" Concert

Every Number of Programme Applauded—"Farewell Symphony," Impressively Rendered, Creates Deep Sensation.

Herald May 16, 1905

Nearly 20 years ago musical Boston went to Music Hall with much éclat and listened delightedly to the first "Pop" concert; last night many people listened with equal delight to the 1000th "Pop" concert. Under Mr. Neuendorff, the orchestra, 20 years ago, gave selections from Strauss, Wagner, Suppe, Waldteufel, Lecocq and Reissiger; under Mr. Adamowski last night, the Symphony players rendered Strauss, Wagner, Waldteufel, Gillet, Handel and Haydn. Seven hundred and ninety-five concerts in old Music Hall and 205 in Symphony—high class concerts—the "Pops"! You told your guest that it was an institution thoroughly appreciated by Boston people.

The large audience last evening showed its liking for the "Pops," with much enthusiasm. Every number on the programme was applauded, and one very charming feature was given significant demonstration.

For the closing selection of part 2 the orchestra played the "Farewell Symphony." The hall was darkened; the stands were lighted by candles. From time to time a player blew out his candle and quietly withdrew. The orchestra dwindled to 20, then to 10, then to five—finally to only two. The strain wavered, softened and then expired. Then the last remaining violinists rose softly and tiptoed out in the semi-darkness. It was an effectively impressive bit of sentiment, and the recovery of the audience from the spell was marked by an enthusiastic tribute to the players—to the 1000th "Pop."

AT 1000TH "POP."

Many Old Favorites in Its Special Program.

Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" Given as a Feature.

Globe

May 16, 1905

The 1000th "Pop" popped in spite of the fog last night, and was thoroughly enjoyed by a large audience, most of whom were old-timers, and there for the purpose of hearing old-time music—in a sense.

These concerts have now been in existence so long that people have "memories," and pieces like "Loin du Bal," Haendel's "Largo" from the requiem mass, the good old "William Tell" overture, and the introduction of the third act of "Lohengrin," Schumann's "Trauermerei," or the "Derniere Sommeil d'une Vierge," mean to thousands a recollection of an evening spent perhaps across the table from a pair of eyes, with smoke and music, and even a phrase, or a look, that will never be separated again from the tune.

Of the 1000 concerts 795 were given in old Music hall, and 205 have been given in Symphony hall. There have been 10 conductors, beginning with Neuendorff, and counting Mullaly, Rietzel, Kneisel, Adamowski, Gruenberg, de Novellis, Max Zach, Leo Schultz and Gustav Strube. Only one halt has been made; in the summer of 1890 there were no concerts.

The program for the first "Pop" included the "Imperial" march by Resch, the overture to "William Tell," "Mon Reve," the Waldteufel waltz; selections from "The Little Duke," by Lecocq—who hears of "The Little Duke" today?—Suppe's overture "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna," "Reminiscences from Tannhauser," a "pizzicato polka" by Strauss, Ernest Scherz' arrangement of Bilse's music condensing a whole concert into one piece; "Die Felsenmühle," a forgotten but pretty piece by Reissiger; the "Donau Lieder" waltzes of Strauss, favorites 20 years ago; a paraphrase of "Die Lorelei," and a galop, "Shooting Star," by Bial.

Of these only the "William Tell" overture was on last night's program. Indeed, so many of the old-time favorites crowded for recognition that the selection came to call for diplomacy. A fine program was finally arranged, with a most unusual feature. The Haydn "Farewell symphony" was played. At every music desk a small candle was lighted, as orchestras were lighted when the farewell symphony was written. All other lights on the stage were put out, and those in the auditorium were lowered. In semigloom the players departed one by one, each blowing out his candle as he left. The sentiment of it was prettily enforced, and the audience was mightily pleased when the last two violins departed, and Mr. Adamowski, blowing out his own last twinkle, followed them.

Other pieces of the old-time concerts on the program were the good old "Hoch Habsburg" march that has stirred so many a student gathering in Music hall, the Strauss "Thousand and One Nights" waltz, which apparently was chosen for its title; the overture to "Martha" selections from L. B. Thompson's "Pudding" opera, "The Sphinx"—Mr Thompson himself was in the audience—"Loin du Bal," the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," and the Haendel largo, without which, of course, the evening would have had almost no meaning. The final set of pieces were modern, in deference to new-comers, probably.

TEN HUNDREDTH "POP" CONCERT

Night of Reminiscences at Symphony Hall and Some Novelties.

Journal — May 16, 1905

It was a night of reminiscences at Symphony Hall last night, when for the 1000th time a "Pop" concert was given by the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And, indeed, it seemed a far cry that first tentative and experimental "Pop" of 1885 to the finished and accepted product of last night.

On the program last night the second number, the overture from William Tell, was also the second number upon that first "Pop" program twenty years ago. Among the other numbers many old-time favorites found places, and were given cordial greeting by the audience. The Harvard contingent was brought up standing by the selections from "The sphinx," the tuneful Hasty Pudding Club play of 1892, that in its time had an honored place upon the programs of the "Pop" concerts.

Among the best received of the number were the "Largo" of Handel, and Haydn's "Farewell Symphony," which ended the second section of the program. The lights in the hall were dimmed during the last number and through the orchestra were scattered tiny, flickering torches. Singly and in groups as the development of the theme progressed, the players blew out these lights, and with their instruments under their arms slowly left the stage. Slowly the orchestra dwindled until with the final bars of the melody only the leader, with a first and second violin, were left upon the stage.

Though it is twenty years since the first Pop was given, there are two veterans of the Music Hall service. George Hartshorn, head usher, and George Schad, doorkeeper of the Symphonies and cashier of the refreshment department of the "Pops," were both at the concert last night, looking down from the heights of thirty-six years and twenty-nine years, respectively, spent in and about the Symphony headquarters. Even the waiters now have honorable chevrons for long service. There are fourteen whose terms range from nineteen to five years, and for each five-year period Assistant Manager Fred R. Comee has furnished them with a silver stripe upon the sleeve.

Ten conductors have led the orchestra since its first dip into popular music. They include Ad Neuendorff, John C. Mullaly, Wilhelm Rietzel, Franz Kneisel, T. Adamowski, E. Gruenberg, A. de Novellis, Max Zach, Lee Schultz and Gustav Strube.

THE 1000TH "POP" CONCERT.

The management of the "Pop" concerts should be congratulated and take a justifiable pride in the fact that tomorrow evening will be the occasion of the 1000th concert of the series. The maintenance of the "Pops" during all these years shows that Managers Ellis and Comee, who have had charge of them throughout their history, thoroughly understand the wants of the Boston musical public. The concerts occupy a unique place in the musical events of this year, and have done not a little to add to the social enjoyment of residents and visitors. The orchestra that has been steadily employed at the "Pops" has always represented the best instrumental talent obtainable, and it is not surprising that foreigners who have heard these concerts for the first time so frequently express their surprise at the high standard of work done by the men of the orchestra as compared with that of the great European capitals. Conductor Adamowski has done not a little in maintaining the high standard of these concerts in recent years. Tomorrow evening the first waltz on the list will be that by Strauss, "A Thousand and One Nights," and among the popular numbers which justify the title "Reminiscence Night" are selections from "Robin Hood" and the "Sphinx." Gillet's "Loin du Bal," Handel's "Largo" and the march "Up the Street." These concerts will be continued this month and next.

WORKS PERFORMED AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS DURING THE SEASON OF 1904-1905.

Works marked with a double asterisk were performed for the first time in Boston. Works marked with an asterisk were performed for the first time at these concerts. Works marked with a dagger were performed for the first time anywhere. Artists marked with an asterisk appeared at these concerts for the first time. Artists marked with a double asterisk appeared for the first time in Boston. Artists marked with a dagger are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

	PAGE
ALBERT, EUGEN D': Pianoforte Concerto, No. 2, in E major, Op. 12. (EUGEN D' ALBERT.) February 4, 1905 . . . . .	900
BACH: Three Movements arranged for Orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke. October 29, 1904 . . . . .	151
Prelude, Adagio, and Gavotte, in Rondo Form (arranged for strings by Sigismund Bachrich). March 4, 1905 . . . . .	1126
Concerto in E major, No. 2, for Violin, with Accompaniment for Orchestra and Organ.* (EUGENE YSAYE.) December 3, 1904 . . . . .	436
BACHRICH. See Bach.
BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica." Op. 55. (Centenary performance) April 8, 1905 . . . . .	1392
Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Op. 60. October 22, 1904 . . . . .	69
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67. December 31, 1904 . . . . .	652
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72. March 11, 1905 . . . . .	1200
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72. April 8, 1905. Played at this last concert to pay greater tribute to Beethoven (centenary performance of his "Eroica"). Smetana's Overture to "The Kiss" was played at the public rehearsal, April 7, 1905.
BERLIOZ: Fantastic Symphony, No. 1, in C major, Op. 16A. January 28, 1905 . . . . .	843
Overture to "King Lear," Op. 4. December 3, 1904 . . . . .	413
See Weber.
BRAHMS: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68. February 25, 1905 . . . . .	1066
Symphony No. 3, in F major, Op. 90. Nov. 19, 1904 . . . . .	269
"Tragic" Overture, Op. 81. April 1, 1905 . . . . .	1297
Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56A. April 15, 1905 . . . . .	1449
Waltzes, Op. 39 (scored by Wilhelm Gericke). January 7, 1905 . . . . .	715
Concerto in B-flat major, No. 2, for Pianoforte, Op. 83. (RAFAEL JOSEFFY.) December 31, 1904 . . . . .	628
Concerto in D major, for Violin, Op. 77. (FRITZ KREISLER.) March 11, 1905 . . . . .	1194
BRUCH: Concerto in G minor, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 26. (WILLY HESS.) November 12, 1904 . . . . .	§
Concerto No. 2, in D minor, Op. 44. (EUGENE YSAYE.) December 3, 1904 . . . . .	444
Serenade for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 75. (MARIE NICHOLS.*) February 11, 1905 . . . . .	972
Penelope's Lament from "Odysseus," Op. 41. (MURIEL FOSTER.) January 7, 1905 . . . . .	713
CAETANI: Symphonic Prelude in A minor, No. 5, Op. 11. January 28, 1905 . . . . .	843

"Martha" selections from L. S. Thompson's "Pudding" opera, "The Sphinx"—Mr Thompson himself was in the audience—"Loin du Bal," the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," and the Haendel largo, without which, of course, the evening would have had almost no meaning. The final set of pieces were modern, in deference to new-comers, probably.

TEN HUNDREDTH "POP" CONCERT

Night of Reminiscences at Symphony Hall and Some Novelties.

Journal — May 16, 1905

It was a night of reminiscences at Symphony Hall last night, when for the 1000th time a "Pop" concert was given by the players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And, indeed, it seemed a far cry that first tentative and experimental "Pop" of 1885 to the finished and accepted product of last night.

On the program last night the second number, the overture from William Tell, was also the second number upon that first "Pop" program twenty years ago. Among the other numbers many old-time favorites found places, and were given cordial greeting by the audience. The Harvard contingent was brought up standing by the selections from "The sphinx," the tuneful Hasty Pudding Club play of 1892, that in its time had an honored place upon the programs of the "Pop" concerts.

Among the best received of the number were the "Largo" of Handel, and Haydn's "Farewell Symphony," which ended the second section of the program. The lights in the hall were dimmed during the last number and through the orchestra were scattered tiny, flickering torches. Singly and in groups as the development of the theme progressed, the players blew out these lights, and with their instruments under their arms slowly left the stage. Slowly the orchestra dwindled until with the final bars of the melody only the leader, with a first and second violin, were left upon the stage.

Though it is twenty years since the first Pop was given, there are two veterans of the Music Hall service. George Hartshorn, head usher, and George Schad, doorkeeper of the Symphonies and cashier of the refreshment department of the "Pops," were both at the concert last night, looking down from the heights of thirty-six years and twenty-nine years, respectively, spent in and about the Symphony headquarters. Even the waiters now have honorable chevrons for long service. There are fourteen whose terms range from nineteen to five years, and for each five-year period Assistant Manager Fred R. Comee has furnished them with a silver stripe upon the sleeve.

Ten conductors have led the orchestra since its first dip into popular music. They include Ad Neuendorff, John C. Mullaly, Wilhelm Rietzel, Franz Kneisel, T. Adamowski, E. Gruenberg, A. de Novellis, Max Zach, Lee Schultz and Gustav Strube.

THE 1000TH "POP" CONCERT.

The management of the "Pop" concerts should be congratulated and take a justifiable pride in the fact that tomorrow evening will be the occasion of the 1000th concert of the series. The maintenance of the "Pops" during all these years shows that Managers Ellis and Comee, who have had charge of them throughout their history, thoroughly understand the wants of the Boston musical public. The concerts occupy a unique place in the musical events of this year, and have done not a little to add to the social enjoyment of residents and visitors. The orchestra that has been steadily employed at the "Pops" has always represented the best instrumental talent obtainable, and it is not surprising that foreigners who have heard these concerts for the first time so frequently express their surprise at the high standard of work done by the men of the orchestra as compared with that of the great European capitals. Conductor Adamowski has done not a little in maintaining the high standard of these concerts in recent years. Tomorrow evening the first waltz on the list will be that by Strauss, "A Thousand and One Nights," and among the popular numbers which justify the title "Reminiscence Night" are selections from "Robin Hood" and the "Sphinx." Gillet's "Loin du Bal," Handel's "Largo" and the march "Up the Street." These concerts will be continued this month and next.

WORKS PERFORMED AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS DURING THE SEASON OF 1904-1905.

Works marked with a double asterisk were performed for the first time in Boston. Works marked with an asterisk were performed for the first time at these concerts. Works marked with a dagger were performed for the first time anywhere. Artists marked with an asterisk appeared at these concerts for the first time. Artists marked with a double asterisk appeared for the first time in Boston. Artists marked with a dagger are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

	PAGE
ALBERT, EUGEN D': Pianoforte Concerto, No. 2, in E major, Op. 12. (EUGEN D' ALBERT.) February 4, 1905 . . .	900
BACH: Three Movements arranged for Orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke. October 29, 1904 . . . . .	151
Prelude, Adagio, and Gavotte, in Rondo Form (arranged for strings by Sigismund Bachrich). March 4, 1905 . . .	1126
Concerto in E major, No. 2, for Violin, with Accompaniment for Orchestra and Organ.* (EUGENE YSAYE.) December 3, 1904 . . . . .	436
BACHRICH. See Bach.
BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica." Op. 55. (Centenary performance) April 8, 1905 . . .	1392
Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Op. 60. October 22, 1904 . . .	69
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67. December 31, 1904 . . .	652
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72. March 11, 1905 . . .	1200
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72. April 8, 1905. Played at this last concert to pay greater tribute to Beethoven (centenary performance of his "Eroica"). Smetana's Overture to "The Kiss" was played at the public rehearsal, April 7, 1905.
BERLIOZ: Fantastic Symphony, No. 1, in C major, Op. 16A. January 28, 1905 . . . . .	843
Overture to "King Lear," Op. 4. December 3, 1904 . . .	413
See Weber.
BRAHMS: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68. February 25, 1905 . . . . .	1066
Symphony No. 3, in F major, Op. 90. Nov. 19, 1904 . . .	269
"Tragic" Overture, Op. 81. April 1, 1905 . . . . .	1297
Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56A. April 15, 1905 . . . . .	1449
Waltzes, Op. 39 (scored by Wilhelm Gericke). January 7, 1905 . . . . .	715
Concerto in B-flat major, No. 2, for Pianoforte, Op. 83. (RAFAEL JOSEFFY.) December 31, 1904 . . . . .	628
Concerto in D major, for Violin, Op. 77. (FRITZ KREISLER.) March 11, 1905 . . . . .	1194
BRUCH: Concerto in G minor, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 26. (WILLY HESS.†) November 12, 1904 . . . . .	$
Concerto No. 2, in D minor, Op. 44. (EUGENE YSAYE.) December 3, 1904 . . . . .	444
Serenade for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 75. (MARIE NICHOLS.*) February 11, 1905 . . . . .	972
Penelope's Lament from "Odysseus," Op. 41. (MURIEL FOSTER.) January 7, 1905 . . . . .	713
CAETANI: Symphonic Prelude in A minor, No. 5, Op. 11. January 28, 1905 . . . . .	843

CHOPIN: Concerto No. 2, in F minor, Op. 21, for the Piano-forte and Orchestra. (VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN) October 29, 1904. (IGNAZ PADEREWSKI) April 22, 1905. 156, 1500
 CONVERSE: Two Poems, "Night" and "Day," for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 11.† (Pianoforte, HEINRICH GEBHARD.) January 21, 1905. 778

§No note was prepared for this concerto, for Mr. Hess played it at short notice in consequence of the sudden indisposition of Mr. Schmedes, who was announced to play Vieuxtemps's Concerto No. 4, in D minor.

CORNELIUS: Overture to the Opera, "The Barber of Bagdad." January 28, 1905. 825
 DEBUSSY: Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun."* December 31, 1904. 632
 DUKAS: Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."** October 22, 1904. 84
 DVOŘÁK: Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95. October 15, 1904. 33
 Suite in D major, Op. 39. October 15, 1904. 28
 Overture, "Othello," Op. 93. October 15, 1904. 12
 Overture, "Carnival," Op. 92. January 7, 1905. 725
 Alto Solo, "Inflamatus et Accensus,"* from the "Stabat Mater," Op. 58. (Mrs. LOUISE HOMER.) October 15, 1904. 25
 Quartet, "Quis est Homo,"* from the "Stabat Mater," Op. 58. (Mrs. GRACE B. WILLIAMS,* Mrs. LOUISE HOMER,* Mr. THEODORE VAN YORX,* Mr. L. B. MERRILL.*) October 15, 1904. 33
 ELGAR: "Sea Pictures," Nos. 2,** 4,** 5,** Op. 37, for Contralto and Orchestra. (MURIEL FOSTER.) January 7, 1905. 720
 ERLANGER, FRÉDÉRIC D': "Morte," Song with Pianoforte.** (CHARLES GILIBERT.) December 23, 1904. 588
 FAURÉ: "Pelleas and Melisande," Suite from Stage Music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, Op. 80.* December 17, 1904. 498
 FRANCK, CÉSAR: Symphony in D minor. February 11, 1905; April 29, 1905 (by request). 998, 1524
 GERICKE. See Bach and Brahms.
 GLUCK: Recitative, "The Gods have foreshewn me," and Aria, "Foreboding Fears of Ill,"* from "Iphigenia in Tauris." (GIUSEPPE CAMPANARI.) March 4, 1905. 1121
 GOLDMARK: Overture, "Sappho." November 26, 1904. 372
 Overture, "In Italy," Op. 49.** February 4, 1905. 893
 GRIEG: Concerto in A minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 16. (CORNELIUS RUEBNER.*) March 25, 1905. 1242
 HADLEY: Symphony No. 2, F minor, "The Four Seasons," Op. 30.** April 15, 1905. 1425
 HANDEL: Concerto Grosso, No. 12, in B minor. April 8, 1905. 1376
 HAYDN: Symphony in E-flat major (B. & H., No. 1). November 12, 1904. 197
 Symphony in G major, "Oxford." January 21, 1905. 757
 Aria, "With Eagerness the Husbandman,"* from "The Seasons." (CHARLES GILIBERT.) December 23, 1904. 560
 HENSELT: Concerto in F minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 16. (FANNY BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.) November 26, 1904. 354

HUBER: Symphony No. 2, E minor, "Böcklin," Op. 115. April 1, 1905. 1324
 INDY, VINCENT D': Symphony in B-flat major, No. 2, Op. 57.** January 7, 1905. 689
 JOACHIM: Hungarian Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 11. (MR. WILLY HESS.*†) October 22, 1904. 78
 LALO: Aubade from "Le Roi d'Ys," with Pianoforte. (CHARLES GILIBERT.) December 23, 1904. 589
 LISZT: Symphonic Poem No. 7, "Fest-Klänge." April 15, 1904. 1461
 Symphonic Poem No. 11, "The Battle of the Huns." November 26, 1904. 364
 Legend, "The Sermon of Saint Francis of Assisi to the Birds," orchestrated by Felix Mottl.** December 3, 1904. 440
 See SCHUBERT.
 MASSENET: Alain's Air, "Open, ye Gates of Paradise,"* from the Opera "Griselda." (ELLISON VAN HOOSE.) April 15, 1905. 1438
 MENDELSSOHN: Overture to "Camacho's Wedding," Op. 10. December 23, 1904. 553
 Overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage." April 22, 1905. 1485
 MOTTL. See Liszt.
 MOZART: Symphony in C major, No. 34 (K. 338). December 17, 1904. 485
 Symphony in D major (K. 504). March 25, 1905. 1233
 Overture to the Opera, "The Marriage of Figaro." February 11, 1905. 965 Recitative, "How Susanna delays," and Aria, "Flown Forever,"* from "The Marriage of Figaro." JOHANNA GADSKI.) November 19, 1904. 282
 "Turn your Glance on him,"* from "Così fan Tutte." (GIUSEPPE CAMPANARI.) March 4, 1905. 1128
 RACHMANINOFF: Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in F-sharp minor, Op. 1.** (CARLO BUONAMICI.) December 17, 1904. 494
 RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF: Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), Op. 35. February 4, 1905. 911
 "Sadko," a Musical Picture, Op. 5.** March 25, 1905. 1251
 ROPARTZ: Fantasia in D major.** April 29, 1905. 1556
 SAINT-SAËNS: Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major, Op. 2.** November 26, 1904. 341
 "The Youth of Hercules," Symphonic Poem No. 4, Op. 50. April 8, 1905. 1384
 SCHUBERT: Symphony in C major, No. 7. March 4, 1905. 1136
 Funeral March, orchestrated by Liszt (in memory of Theodore Thomas). January 7, 1905. 687
 SCHUMANN: Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61. April 29, 1905. 1549
 Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97. December 3, 1904. 450
 Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81. December 31, 1904. 621

Concerto in A minor, for Pianoforte, Op. 54. (ERNEST SCHELLING.)	February 25, 1905 . . . . .	1042
SINDING: Épisodes Chevaleresques, Suite in F major, for Orchestra, Op. 35 (Nos. I., II., IV.).	February 25, 1905 . . . . .	1033
SMETANA: Overture to the Opera, "The Kiss" (played only at the public rehearsal, April 7, 1905; Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3 was substituted at the concert, April 8)		1361
STRAUSS, RICHARD: Introduction to Act I. of "Guntram." November 12, 1904 . . . . .		222
Introduction to Act II. of "Guntram." March 25, 1905 . . . . .		1269
"Don Juan," Tone-poem (after Lenau), Op. 20. February 11, 1905; April 29, 1905 (by request) . . . . .		976, 1560
STRUBE: Symphonic Poem, "Longing," for Viola and Orchestra.† (Viola, EMILE FERIR.†) April 22, 1905 . . . . .		1490
SUK: Symphony in E major, Op. 14. October 29, 1904 . . . . .		164
TSCHAIKOWSKY: "Manfred" Symphony, Op. 58 (after Byron's Dramatic Poem). March 11, 1905 . . . . .		1169
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, Op. 74. December 23, 1904 . . . . .		564
Italian Caprice, Op. 45. November 12, 1904 . . . . .		227
Concerto in D major, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 35. (KARL BARLEBEN.*†) April 1, 1905 . . . . .		1300
VAN DER STUCKEN: Symphonic Festival Prologue, "Pax Triumphans," Op. 26. December 23, 1904 . . . . .		594
VOLKMANN: Concerto in A minor, for Violoncello and Orchestra, Op. 33. (RUDOLF KRASSELT.†) January 28, 1905 . . . . .		838
WAGNER: Overture to "Tannhäuser." October 22, 1904 . . . . .		93
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." December 17, 1904 . . . . .		514
A "Faust" Overture. March 4, 1905 . . . . .		1101
Prelude to "The Mastersingers." April 29, 1905 . . . . .		1569
Centennial March. January 21, 1905 . . . . .		783
Finale of "The Dusk of the Gods." (JOHANNA GADSKI.) November 19, 1904 . . . . .		306
Lohengrin's Narrative from "Lohengrin." (ELLISON VAN HOOSE.) April 15, 1905 . . . . .		1452
WEBER: Overture to "Oberon." October 29, 1904 . . . . .		133
"Invitation to the Dance" (orchestrated by Berlioz). February 4, 1905 . . . . .		904
WIENIAWSKI: Concerto No. 2, in D minor, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 22. (TIMOTHÉE ADAMOWSKI.†) January 21, 1905 . . . . .		777
WOLF, HUGO: Symphonic Poem, "Penthesilea" (after Kleist's Tragedy). November 19, 1904 . . . . .		287
Italian Serenade for Small Orchestra. April 1, 1905 . . . . .		1320

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON.

SYMPHONIES.

HADLEY: Symphony No. 2, F minor, "The Four Seasons," Op. 30. April 15, 1905.
D'INDY: Symphony in B-flat major, No. 2, Op. 57. January 7, 1905.
SAINT-SAËNS: Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major, Op. 2. November 26, 1904.

SUK: Symphony in E major, Op. 14. October 29, 1904 . . . . .	4
SYMPHONIC POEMS, ETC.
CONVERSE: Two Poems, "Night" and "Day," for Pianoforte (HEINRICH GEBHARD) and Orchestra, Op. 11.† January 21, 1905.	1
RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF: "Sadko," a Musical Picture, Op. 5. March 25, 1905.
ROPARTZ: Fantasia in D major. April 29, 1905.
STRUBE: Symphonic Poem, "Longing," for Viola (EMILE FERIR.†) and Orchestra.† April 22, 1905.
WOLF: "Penthesilea" (after Kleist's Tragedy). November 19, 1904 . . . . .	4
OVERTURES AND PRELUDES.
CAETANI: Symphonic Prelude in A minor, No. 5, Op. 11. January 28, 1905.
GOLDMARK: Overture, "In Italy," Op. 49. February 4, 1905.
SMETANA: Overture to the Opera, "The Kiss." Public rehearsal only, April 7, 1905.
VAN DER STUCKEN: Symphonic Festival Prologue, "Pax Triumphans," Op. 26. December 23, 1904 . . . . .	4
SUITES, VARIATIONS, ETC.
DUKAS: Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." October 22, 1904.
LISZT-MOTTI: Legend, "The Sermon of Saint Francis of Assisi to the Birds." December 3, 1904.
SINDING: "Épisodes Chevaleresques," Suite in F major, Op. 35 (Nos. I., II., IV.). February 25, 1905.
WOLF: Italian Serenade. April 1, 1905 . . . . .	4
CONCERTOS.
D'ALBERT: Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, in E major, Op. 12. (EUGEN D'ALBERT.) February 4, 1905.
BRUCH: Serenade in A minor for Violin (MARIE NICHOLS*) and Orchestra, Op. 75. February 11, 1905.	2
RACHMANINOFF: Concerto in F-sharp minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 1. (CARLO BUONAMICI.) December 17, 1904 . . . . .	1 20

SUMMARY.

D'ALBERT . . . . .	1	D'INDY . . . . .	1
BACH . . . . .	3	JOACHIM . . . . .	1
BEETHOVEN . . . . .	5	LALO . . . . .	1
BERLIOZ . . . . .	2	LISZT . . . . .	3
BRAHMS . . . . .	7	MASSENET . . . . .	1
BRUCH . . . . .	4	MENDELSSOHN . . . . .	2
CAETANI . . . . .	1	MOZART . . . . .	5
CHOPIN . . . . .	2	RACHMANINOFF . . . . .	1
CONVERSE . . . . .	1	RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF . . . . .	2
CORNELIUS . . . . .	1	ROPARTZ . . . . .	1
DEBUSSY . . . . .	1	SAINT-SAËNS . . . . .	2
DUKAS . . . . .	1	SCHUBERT . . . . .	2
DVOŘÁK . . . . .	6	SCHUMANN, R. . . . .	4
ELGAR . . . . .	1	SINDING . . . . .	1
D'ERLANGER . . . . .	1	SMETANA . . . . .	1
FAURÉ . . . . .	1	STRAUSS, R. . . . .	4
FRANCK . . . . .	2	STRUBE . . . . .	1
GLUCK . . . . .	1	SUK . . . . .	1
GOLDMARK . . . . .	2	TSCHAIKOWSKY . . . . .	4
GRIEG . . . . .	1	VAN DER STUCKEN . . . . .	1
HADLEY . . . . .	1	VOLKMANN . . . . .	1
HANDEL . . . . .	1	WAGNER . . . . .	7
HAYDN . . . . .	3	WEBER . . . . .	2
HENSELT . . . . .	1	WIENIAWSKI . . . . .	1
HUBER . . . . .	1	WOLF, HUGO . . . . .	2

103

SUMMARY BY WORKS.

I. SYMPHONIES.

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55.
Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Op. 60.
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67 . . . . .	3
BERLIOZ: Fantastic Symphony, in C major, No. 1, Op. 16A . . . . .	1
BRAHMS: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.
Symphony No. 3, in F major, Op. 90 . . . . .	2
DVOŘÁK: Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95 . . . . .	1
FRANCK: Symphony in D minor (twice) . . . . .	2
HADLEY: Symphony No. 2, F minor, "The Four Seasons," Op. 30 . . . . .	1
HAYDN: Symphony in E-flat major (B. & H., No. 1).
Symphony in G major, "Oxford" . . . . .	2
HUBER: Symphony No. 2, E minor, "Böcklin," Op. 115 . . . . .	1
D'INDY: Symphony No. 2, in B-flat major, Op. 57 . . . . .	1
MOZART: Symphony in C major (K. 338).
Symphony in D major (K. 504) . . . . .	2
SAINT-SAËNS: Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major, Op. 2 . . . . .	1
SCHUBERT: Symphony in C major, No. 7 . . . . .	1
SCHUMANN: Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61.

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish," Op. 97 . . . . .	2
SUK: Symphony in E major, Op. 14 . . . . .	1
TSCHAIKOWSKY: "Manfred" Symphony, Op. 58.
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, Op. 74 . . . . .	2
	23

II. SUITES.

BACH: Three movements, orchestrated by WILHELM GERICKE . . . . .	1
Prelude, Adagio, and Gavotte, orchestrated by BACHRICH . . . . .	1
DVOŘÁK: Suite in D major, Op. 39 . . . . .	1
FAURÉ: "Pelleas and Melisande," Suite from Stage Music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, Op. 80* . . . . .	1
HANDEL: Concerto Grosso, No. 12, in B minor . . . . .	1
RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF: "Scheherazade," Op. 35 . . . . .	1
SINDING: "Épisodes Chevaleresques," Suite in F major, Op. 35 (Nos. I., II., IV.)* . . . . .	1
	7

III. SYMPHONIC POEMS.

CONVERSE: "Night" and "Day," for Pianoforte (H. GEBHARD) and Orchestra, Op. 11† . . . . .	1
LISZT: "The Battle of the Huns." . . . .
"Fest-Klänge" . . . . .	2
RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF: "Sadko," Op. 5 . . . . .	1
SAINT-SAËNS: "The Youth of Hercules," Op. 50 . . . . .	1
STRAUSS, R.: "Don Juan," Op. 20 (twice) . . . . .	2
STRUBE: "Longing," for Viola (E. FERIR†) and Orchestra† . . . . .	1
WOLF, H.: "Penthesilea" (after Kleist's Tragedy) . . . . .	1
	9

IV. OVERTURES AND PRELUDES.

BEETHOVEN: Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72 (twice) . . . . .	2
BERLIOZ: To "King Lear," Op. 4 . . . . .	1
BRAHMS: "Tragic," Op. 81 . . . . .	1
CAETANI: Symphonic Prelude in A minor, No. 5, Op. 11 . . . . .	1
CORNELIUS: To "The Barber of Bagdad" . . . . .	1
DEBUSSY: Prelude to Mallarmé's "The Afternoon of a Faun"* . . . . .	1
DVOŘÁK: "Othello," Op. 93.
"Carnival," Op. 92 . . . . .	2
GOLDMARK: "Sappho," Op. 44.
"In Italy," Op. 49 . . . . .	2
MENDELSSOHN: To "Camacho's Wedding," Op. 10.
"Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage" . . . . .	2
MOZART: To "The Marriage of Figaro" . . . . .	1
SCHUMANN: To "Genoveva," Op. 81 . . . . .	1
SMETANA: To "The Kiss"* . . . . .	1
STRAUSS, R.: Introduction to Act I. of "Guntram."
Introduction to Act II. of "Guntram" . . . . .	2

VAN DER STUCKEN: Symphonic Festival Prologue, "Pax Tri- umphans," Op. 26 . . . . .	1
WAGNER: To "Tannhäuser." To "The Flying Dutchman" . . . . .	2
A "Faust" Overture. To "The Mastersingers" . . . . .	2
WEBER: To "Oberon" . . . . .	1
	—
	24

V. MISCELLANEOUS.

BRAHMS: Waltzes, Op. 39, orchestrated by W. GERICKE. Variations on a Theme of Haydn, Op. 56A . . . . .	2
DUKAS: Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" . . . . .	1
LISZT: Legend, "The Sermon of Saint Francis of Assisi to the Birds," orchestrated by FELIX MOTTL . . . . .	1
ROPARTZ: Fantasia in D major . . . . .	1
SCHUBERT: Funeral March, orchestrated by LISZT . . . . .	1
TSCHAIKOWSKY: Italian Caprice, Op. 45 . . . . .	1
WAGNER: Centennial March . . . . .	1
WEBER: "Invitation to the Dance," scored by BERLIOZ . . . . .	1
WOLF, H.: Italian Serenade . . . . .	1
	—
	10

VI. CONCERTOS AND INSTRUMENTAL SOLOS WITH ORCHESTRA.

D'ALBERT: Concerto in E major, No. 2, for Pianoforte, Op. 12. (EUGEN D'ALBERT) . . . . .	1
BACH: Concerto for Violin in E major, No. 2.* (EUGÈNE YSAYE) . . . . .	1
BRAHMS: Concerto in D major, for Violin, Op. 77. (FRITZ KREISLER.) Concerto in B-flat major, No. 2, for Pianoforte, Op. 83. (RAFAEL JOSEFFY) . . . . .	2
BRUCH: Concerto in G minor, for Violin, Op. 26. (WILLY HESS.†) Concerto No. 2, in D minor, Op. 44. (EUGÈNE YSAYE.) Serenade in A minor, Op. 75, for Violin. (MARIE NICHOLS*) . . . . .	3
CHOPIN: Concerto No. 2, in F minor, for the Pianoforte, Op. 21. (VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN, IGNAZ PADEREWSKI) . . . . .	2
GRIEG: Concerto in A minor, for Pianoforte, Op. 16. (CORNELIUS RUEBNER) . . . . .	1
HENSELT: Concerto in F minor, for Pianoforte, Op. 16. (FANNY BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER) . . . . .	1
JOACHIM: Hungarian Concerto for Violin, Op. 11. (WILLY HESS*†) . . . . .	1
RACHMANINOFF: Concerto in F-sharp minor, No. 1, Op. 1, for Pianoforte. (CARLO BUONAMICI) . . . . .	1

SCHUMANN: Concerto in A minor, for Pianoforte, Op. 54. (ER- NEST SCHELLING) . . . . .	1
TSCHAIKOWSKY: Concerto in D major for Violin, Op. 35. (KARL BARLEBEN*†) . . . . .	1
VOLKMANN: Concerto in A minor, Op. 33, for Violoncello. (RU- DOLF KRASSEL†) . . . . .	1
WIENIAWSKI: Concerto in D minor, No. 2, for Violin, Op. 22. (TIMOTHÉE ADAMOWSKI†) . . . . .	1
	—
	17

VII. VOCAL MUSIC: SCENES, ARIAS, ETC.

BRUCH: Penelope's Lament from Bruch's "Odysseus," Op. 26. (MURIEL FOSTER) . . . . .	1
DVOŘÁK: "Inflammatus,"* from "Stabat Mater," Op. 58. (LOUISE HOMER.) Quartet, "Quis est Homo," from "Stabat Mater." (GRACE B. WILLIAMS,* LOUISE HOMER,* THEODORE VAN YORX,* L. B. MERRILL*) . . . . .	2
ELGAR: "Sea Pictures," Nos. 2,* 4,* 5,* Op. 37. (MURIEL FOSTER) . . . . .	1
D'ERLANGER: "Morte." (CHARLES GILIBERT) . . . . .	1
GLUCK: Recitative and Aria, "Foreboding Fears of Ill,"* from "Iphigenia in Tauris." (GIUSEPPE CAMPANARI) . . . . .	1
HAYDN: "With Eagerness the Husbandman,"* from "The Sea- sons." (CHARLES GILIBERT) . . . . .	1
LALO: Aubade* from "Le Roi d'Ys." (CHARLES GILIBERT) . . . . .	1
MASSENET: Alain's Air, "Open, ye Gates of Paradise,"* from "Griselda." (ELLISON VAN HOOSE) . . . . .	1
MOZART: Recitative, "How Susanna delays!" and Aria, "Flown Forever," from "The Marriage of Figaro." (JOHANNA GADSKI.) "Turn your Glance on him,"* from "Così fan Tutte." (GIUSEPPE CAMPANARI) . . . . .	2
WAGNER: Finale of "The Dusk of the Gods." (JOHANNA GADSKI.) Lohengrin's Narrative from the Opera "Lohengrin." (EL- LISON VAN HOOSE) . . . . .	2
	—
	13

CHANGES IN PROGRAMME.

Vieuxtemps's Violin Concerto in D minor, No. 4, Op. 31, announced to be played on November 12, 1904, by Mr. Schmedes,† was not played; for notes see page 208. Mr. Hess† played in its stead Bruch's G minor Concerto, Op. 26.

Instead of Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Airs for Violin, announced for Decembre 3, 1904, Bruch's Concerto No. 2, in D minor, Op. 44, was played by Mr. Ysaye.

Beethoven's overture, "Leonore" No. 3, was substituted April 8, 1905, for Smetana's overture to "The Kiss," played on April 7, 1905.

Schubert's Funeral March, orchestrated by Liszt, was played at the beginning of the concert of January 7, 1905, as a tribute to the memory of Theodore Thomas.

THE FOLLOWING ARTISTS HAVE APPEARED THIS SEASON.

	PAGE
Mr. TIMOTHÉE ADAMOWSKI,† violinist. January 21, 1905. Wieniawski's Concerto in D minor, No. 2, Op. 22 . . .	755
Mr. EUGEN D'ALBERT, pianist. February 4, 1905. D'Albert's Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, in E major, Op. 12. (Sketch) . . .	895
Mr. KARL BARLEBEN,*† violinist. April 1, 1905. Tschaikowsky's Concerto in D major, Op. 35. (Sketch) . . .	1299
Mme. FANNY BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER, pianist. November 26, 1904. Henselt's Concerto in F minor, Op. 16. (Sketch) . . .	352
Mr. CARLO BUONAMICI, pianist. December 17, 1904. Rachmaninoff's Concerto in F-sharp minor, Op. 1. (Sketch) . . .	492
Mr. GIUSEPPE CAMPANARI, baritone. March 4, 1905. Recitative and Aria, "Foreboding Fears of Ill,"* from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Tauris"; "Turn your Glance on him," from "Così fan Tutte."* (Sketch) . . .	1121
Miss MURIEL FOSTER, contralto. January 7, 1905. Penelope's Lament, from "Odysseus," Op. 41; Elgar's "Sea Pictures," Nos. 2,* 4,* 5,* Op. 37. (Sketch) . . .	712
Mme. JOHANNA GADSKI, soprano. November 19, 1904. Recitative and Aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and Finale from "The Dusk of the Gods." (Sketch) . . .	276
Mr. CHARLES GILIBERT, baritone. December 23, 1904. Aria, "With Eagerness the Husbandman,"* from Haydn's "Seasons"; with Pianoforte, d'Erlanger's "Morte" and the Aubade from Lalo's "Roi d'Ys."* (Sketch) . . .	556
Mr. WILLY HESS,*† violinist. October 22, 1904, Joachim's Hungarian Concerto, Op. 11. (Sketch.) November 12, 1904, Bruch's Concerto No. 1, in G minor, Op. 26 . . .	76
Mrs. LOUISE HOMER,* contralto. October 15, 1904. Solo, "Inflammatus,"* from Dvořák's "Stabat Mater." Quartet, "Quis est Homo,"* from the same work . . .	3
Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY, pianist. December 31, 1904. Brahms's Concerto in B-flat major, No. 2, Op. 83. (Sketch) . . .	626
Mr. RUDOLF KRASSELT,† 'cellist. January 28, 1905. Volkmann's Concerto in A minor, for Violoncello, Op. 33 . . .	823
Mr. FRITZ KREISLER, violinist. March 11, 1905. Brahms's Concerto in D major, Op. 77. (Sketch) . . .	1193
Mr. L. B. MERRILL,* bass. October 15, 1905. Quartet, "Quis est Homo,"* from Dvořák's "Stabat Mater" . . .	3
Miss MARIE NICHOLS,* violinist. February 11, 1905. Bruch's Serenade in A minor, Op. 75. (Sketch) . . .	972
Mr. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN, pianist. October 29, 1904. Chopin's Concerto in F minor, Op. 21. (Sketch) . . .	154
Mr. IGNAZ PADEREWSKI, pianist. April 22, 1905. Chopin's Concerto in F minor, Op. 21. (Sketch) . . .	1496
Mr. CORNELIUS RUEBNER, pianist. March 25, 1905. Grieg's Concerto in A minor, Op. 16. (Sketch) . . .	1240
Mr. ERNEST SCHELLING, pianist. February 25, 1905. Schumann's Concerto in A minor, Op. 54. (Sketch) . . .	1042
Mr. ELLISON VAN HOOSE, tenor. April 15, 1905. Air of Alain, "Open, ye Gates of Paradise,"* from "Griselda"; Lohengrin's Narrative from "Lohengrin." (Sketch) . . .	1436

Mr. THEODORE VAN YORX,* tenor. October 15, 1904. Quartet, "Quis est Homo,"* from Dvořák's "Stabat Mater" . . .	3
Mrs. GRACE B. WILLIAMS,* soprano. October 15, 1904. Quartet, "Quis est Homo,"* from Dvořák's "Stabat Mater" . . .	3
Mr. EUGÈNE YSAYE, violinist. December 3, 1904. Bach's Concerto in E major, No. 2,* and Bruch's Concerto No. 2, in D minor, Op. 44. (Sketch) . . .	433

***

Sopranos: Mme. Gadski, Mrs. Williams* . . .	2
Contraltos: Miss Foster, Mrs. Homer* . . .	2
Tenors: Mr. Van Hoose, Mr. van Yorx* . . .	2
Baritones: Mr. Campanari, Mr. Gilibert . . .	2
Bass: Mr. Merrill* . . .	1
Pianists: Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Messrs. d'Albert, Buonamici, Joseffy, de Pachmann, Paderewski, Ruebner,* Schelling* . . .	8
Violinists: Miss Nichols,* Messrs. Adamowski,† Barleben,† Hess† (twice), Kreisler, Ysaye . . .	7
'Cellist: Mr. Krasselt . . .	1

25

***

Accompanist: Mr. Zach† for Mr. Gilibert.

***

Incidental Solos: Mr. E. Ferir,† viola: Strube's "Longing." Mr. Gebhard, pianist: Converse's "Day" and "Night."

***

Organist: Mr. Wallace Goodrich.

ENTR'ACTES.

	PAGE
BAUGHAN, E. A. "Maeterlinck and Music" . . .	509
BLACKBURN, VERNON: "The Absolute and Dramatic in Music," "Così fan Tutte" . . .	716
"Historical Recitals" . . .	1132
"Mozart and Beethoven" . . .	361
"North and South" . . .	1196
BRINTON, CHRISTIAN: "Böcklin" . . .	1322
FORD, RICHARD: "Certain Spanish Dances" . . .	1336
HALE, PHILIP: "Concerning Foreign Visitors" . . .	1051
"Debussy" . . .	1509
"Dvořák" . . .	641
"Dvořák's Music in Boston" . . .	5
"Handel at Oxford" . . .	42
"Hercules and Music" . . .	766
"King Lear and Music" . . .	1386
"Othello and Music" . . .	431
"Rimsky-Korsakoff" . . .	20
"Tschaikowsky in Rome" . . .	923
"Russian Opera" . . .	236
"Wagner and America" . . .	1258
	790

272

"Walt Whitman, Music Suggested by" . . . . .	782, 869
"Wolf, Hugo," . . . . .	292, 300
MARNOLD, JEAN: "César Franck" . . . . .	1001
NEWMAN, ERNEST: "Concerning Programme Music" . . . . .	989
RUNCIMAN, J. F.: "Booms in Musicians" . . . . .	1060

INDEX TO SUNDRY REFERENCES AND FOOTNOTES.

BIOGRAPHICAL: Albinoni, 437; Auer, 1310; Mrs. Austin, 146, 151; Balakireff, 924; Beck (tenor), 1456-1458; Bellamy, 757; Benucci, 1132; Berber, 439; Bertin, 418; Bilse, 229; Blanchard, 343; H. Blume, 553; Bonno, 485; Bouilly, 1208; Bousquet, 210; C. Brandt-Weber, 904; L. Bréval, 298; Brodsky, 1312; Brunforte, 440; C. Butt, 720; A. Campi, 654; Claudian Mamertus, 371; B. Cornelius, 828; Da Ponte, 965; G. David, 757; Debroux, 972; von Dinglestedt, 370; Ducis, 424; Duparc, 1384; J. Eder, 218; J. H. Elsner, 159; P. Erdmannsdörfer-Fichtner, 902; M. Erdmannsdörfer, 1171; I. Fassett, 25; Gaveaux, 1210; Gentili, 437; Gladkowska, 157; Görner, 159; Gregori, 437; Guiraud, 92; W. Heine, 793; J. P. Jackson, 980; Jacobus de Benedictis, 26; Jurgenson, 229; Dr. Kauffmann, 292; von Kaulbach, 366; Kilitzky, 654; Kotek, 228, 1300; Kowalski, 1514; W. Krüger, 210; Kurpinski, 159; Laschi, 284; Legrenzi, 437; Lekeu, 648; Lenau, 978; Letourneur, 420; E. Lie-Nissen, 1242; Maleden, 350; Mandyczewski, 1434; de Manzia, 437; Maréchal (tenor), 1440; Marxsen, 628; Mercy-Argenteau, 928; R. von Milde, 830; Anna Milder, 654; Marie Moke (Mme. Pleyel), 416; G. M. Monn, 485; Otten, 1551; Palschau, 1127; Pölchau, 1127; Delphine Potocka, 162; Marie Reccio, 860; M. Reger, 1320; J. P. Salomon, 202; Princess de Sayn-Wittgenstein, 364, 1464; H. Schmedes, 206; Schröder-Devrient, 100; Seghers, 341; Siviore, 366; Stamaty, 348; Anna Storace, 757; Taglietti, 437; Titchatschek, 98; Torelli, 437, 1382; Venantius Fortunatus, 371; Vieuxtemps in America, 217; Vivaldi, 437; Johanna Wagner, 101, 1103; W. J. Winch, 43; the Woods (Joseph and Mary Anne Paton), 136; Zelter, 439.

DANCES: Bohemian minuet, 30; Comparsas, 1056; Furiant, 32; Minuet, 1238; Ole, 1058; Polka, 29; Rowbotham on dances before Nero, 96; Siciliana, 153; Sou-sedska, 30; Tarantella, 233.

INSTRUMENTS: Cymbals (antique), 639; Drum (Winwood Reade and Rowbotham on it), 583; Gusli, 1253; Harp harmonics, 1182; Pifaro, 1321.

MUSICAL FORMS, ETC. Aubade, 592; Basso continuo, 439; Complainte, 621; Concerto, 437, 1381; Ripieno, 1382; Rondeau, 153; Sonatas by Frenchmen, 92; Sym-phony, the Italian theatre, 487.

SONGS AND HYMNS: "Auld Robin Morris," 449; "Pange Lingua," 371; "Scots wha hae," 449; "Stabat Mater," 26; "Yankee Doodle," 450.

THEATRE AND OPERA HOUSE: "Aglavaine and Selysette," 509; "Astarte" (Leroux), 1388; "Fervaal" (d'Indy), 1274; "Flying Dutchman" (Fitzball), 524; "La Folle Journée" (Beaumarchais), 967; "Genesis" (Weingartner), 227; "Ghiselle" (Franck), 1009; "Hulda" (Franck), 1009; "King Lear" in France, 422; "Man-fred" in playhouse and in music, 1190; "Penthesilea" (Kleist), 289; "Die Puppenfee" (Bayer), 838; "Les Travaux d'Hercule" (Terrasse), 1390; "Van-derdecken" (Fitzgerald and Wills), 526; "Zampa" (Hérold), 272.

LEGENDS: Amazons, 298; Flying Dutchman, 521; St. Francis of Assisi, 440; Gri-selda, 1446; Hercules, 1386; Magnetic mountains, 922; Penthesilea, 295; Sadko, 1254; Sappho, 372; Sindbad, 916; Tannhäuser (Gaston Paris), 106.

CRITICAL AND LITERARY: Antoine on "King Lear," 424; Baudelaire on "Tann-häuser," 95; Berlioz on Vieuxtemps, 210; Books on Bohemian music, 32; Bruneau on Debussy, 642; Burton on Amazons, 299; Chorley on certain Ger-man singers, 98-102; Francke (Kuno) on Kleist's "Penthesilea," 289; Gosse on Mallarmé, 634; Heine and the Flying Dutchman, 516; Legouvé on Berlioz, 856; Lucian's "Lie-fancier" (origin of story of the Sorcerer's Apprentice), 89; Lumley on Johanna Wagner, 104; Marnold on Rimsky-Korsakoff, 929, on César Franck, 1001; Pudor on Rimsky-Korsakoff, 929; Tschaiikowsky on Rimsky-Korsakoff, 932; White (Richard Grant) on Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Wood, 142.

MISCELLANEOUS: Bagdad, 919; Carnival, 725; The Cross in Latin poetry, 371; Ears that wag, 1390; Kalandars, 917; Music degrees at English universities, 762; Music illustrative of pictures, 1333; Silk of Cos, 1386; Trees that weep, 645; Wagner's three early overtures, 1104; White (R. G.) on "retiring" for "going to bed," 14.

ERRATA: 109, 869.

VOLUME 25

1905-1906

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY OF THE CITY OF BOSTON.

THE ALLEN A. BROWN COLLECTION.

★★M125.5.25

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. GERICKE

A prompt reply is earnestly requested, as it is intended that the name of every subscriber shall appear on a scroll to be presented to Mr. Gericke.

BOSTON, April 5, 1906.

IT is believed that many who have enjoyed the Symphony Concerts under the direction of Mr. Gericke would be glad to testify in some way their appreciation of him and of all that he has done for music in Boston during his residence among us.

¶ It is proposed, therefore, to present to him some appropriate expression of this feeling before his departure.

¶ To this end subscriptions, not exceeding Two Dollars each, are invited from those who may desire to share in this testimonial of esteem and affection.

¶ Contributions may be sent to Henry M. Rogers, No. 309 Beacon Street, Boston, who has been requested to act as Treasurer.

Mrs. LOUIS AGASSIZ.
Mr. & Mrs. S. R. ANTHONY.
Mr. & Mrs. THOMAS ALLEN.
Mrs. JOSEF ADAMOWSKI.
Mrs. T. ADAMOWSKI.

Mrs. OLE BULL.
Mr. & Mrs. ROBERT BRADLEE.
Mrs. JOSEPH BELL.
Dr. & Mrs. H. H. A. BEACH.
Mr. W. P. BLAKE.

Mr. & Mrs. F. E. CONVERSE.
Mr. & Mrs. RALPH ADAMS CRAM.
Mr. & Mrs. CHARLES P. CURTIS.
Mr. & Mrs. SAMUEL CARR.
Mr. & Mrs. EDWARD H. CLEMENT.
Miss EMMA CARY.
Mr. & Mrs. R. M. CUSHING.

Mr. & Mrs. RICHARD C. DIXEY.
Miss LOUISA DRESEL.
Mr. ELLIS L. DRESEL.
Mrs. F. GORDON DEXTER.

Pres. & Mrs. CHARLES W. ELIOT.
Dr. & Mrs. J. W. ELIOT.
Mr. & Mrs. ROBERT D. EVANS.
Mr. & Mrs. LOUIS C. ELSON.

Mr. & Mrs. ARTHUR FOOTE.
Prof. & Mrs. W. G. FARLOW.
Miss ELISE FAY.
Miss FRANCES THOMSON FRENCH.

Gov. & Mrs. CURTIS GUILD, Jr.
Mrs. JOHN L. GARDNER.
Mr. & Mrs. WALLACE GOODRICH.
Mr. HEINRICH GEBHARD.
Mr. I. M. GAUGENGIGL.
Mr. E. HOWARD GAY.
Mrs. H. H. GALLISON.
Mr. & Mrs. JOHN C. GRAY.

Mr. & Mrs. HENRY LEE HIGGINSON.
Mr. & Mrs. FRANCIS L. HIGGINSON.
Mr. & Mrs. E. B. HILL.
Mr. & Mrs. S. HENRY HOOPER.
Mr. & Mrs. ELIOT HUBBARD.

Mr. & Mrs. PHILIP HALE.
Mme. HOPEKIRK.
Miss HUNT.
Mrs. JULIA WARD HOWE.
Mrs. GEORGE HOWE.
Miss HIGGINSON.
Miss B. HIGGINSON.
Mrs. J. H. HECHT.
Mrs. RICHARD J. HALL.

Mr. CLAYTON JOHNS.
Miss SARAH ORNE JEWETT.
Mrs. PHOEBE A. P. JENKS.
Mrs. F. W. JONES.

Mr. & Mrs. B. J. LANG.
Miss MARGARET LANG.
Miss ALICE LONGFELLOW.
Mr. & Mrs. THATCHER LORING.
Miss M. C. LORING.
Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER.
Miss LENA LITTLE.
Mr. W. A. LOCKE.
Dr. & Mrs. S. W. LANGMAID.

Dr. & Mrs. SAMUEL J. MIXTER.
Mr. & Mrs. NATHAN MATTHEWS.
Dr. & Mrs. H. L. MORSE.
Mr. & Mrs. FRANK GAIR MACOMBER.
Miss F. P. MASON.
Mr. & Mrs. J. B. MILLET.
Mrs. E. C. MOORE.

Prof. CHARLES ELIOT NORTON.

Mr. & Mrs. HENRY PARKMAN.
Mr. & Mrs. F. E. PEABODY.
Mr. & Mrs. W. L. PARKER.
Mrs. JOHN C. PHILLIPS.
Mrs. ELLERTON PRATT

Mrs. EDWARD C. PICKERING.
Prof. J. K. PAINE.

Mr. & Mrs. JOSIAH QUINCY.

Mrs. WILLIAM BARTON ROGERS.
Miss CATHERINE RUSSELL.
Mr. & Mrs. HENRY M. ROGERS.
Mrs. M. S. RUSSELL.
Prof. & Mrs. THEODORE W. RICHARDS.
Prof. & Mrs. B. L. ROBINSON.
Prof. & Mrs. J. H. ROPES.

Mr. & Mrs. WINTHROP SARGENT.
Mrs. GEORGE R. SHAW.
Mr. & Mrs. OLIVER CROCKER STEVENS.
Mr. & Mrs. GEORGE H. STODDARD.
Mr. & Mrs. CHARLES S. SARGENT.

Prof. & Mrs. C. H. TOY.
Miss EDITH THAYER.
Mr. & Mrs. J. G. THORP.
Mr. & Mrs. S. LOTHROP THORNDIKE.
Mr. & Mrs. ALBERT THORNDIKE.
Miss MARY A. TAPPAN.

Mr. & Mrs. FREDERICK P. VINTON.

Mrs. ROGER WOLCOTT.
Mr. & Mrs. HENRY M. WHITNEY.
Dr. & Mrs. WILLIAM F. WHITNEY.
Mr. & Mrs. C. HOWARD WALKER.
Mr. & Mrs. ALEX F. WADSWORTH.
Dr. & Mrs. OLIVER F. WADSWORTH.
Mr. & Mrs. SAMUEL D. WARREN.
Mrs. ANDREW WEEKS.
Miss MARY MAY WINTHROP.
Mr. WILLIAM F. WINCH.
Miss MARY MAY WINSOR.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON

✻ 1905-1906 ✻

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS

COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

L. S. Spence.

Dec. 30	Dec. 23	Dec. 16	Dec. 2	Nov. 25	Nov. 18	Nov. 4	Oct. 28	Oct. 21	Oct. 14
10	9	8	7	6	5	4	3	2	1

SYMPHONY HALL
BOSTON
HUNTINGTON &
MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. WILHELM GERICKE
- CONDUCTOR -

CONCERTS:
SATURDAY EVENINGS AT 8 O'CLOCK
TWENTY-FIFTH SEASON, 1905-1906

Feb. 3	Feb. 10	Feb. 17	Feb. 24	Mar. 3	Mar. 10	Mar. 17	Mar. 24	Mar. 31	Apr. 7	Apr. 14	Apr. 21	Apr. 28
15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24	25	26	27

RIGHT

A

4

SECOND BALCONY

This ticket must be presented to the door-keeper at every performance. Persons neglecting to bring tickets will be admitted to the hall only by purchasing an evening ticket.

214 Boylston St.
Boston Mass

ADDRESS

Warren Davenport

NAME

The owner of this ticket will please write name and address on the lines below as an aid to its recovery in case of loss.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Index

Composer	Name of Work	Concert	Date of Performance
Bach J.S.	Pastorale from Christmas Oratorio	IX	Dec 23. 1905
	Suite for Orch. in D maj:	XX	Mar 31. 1906
	Toccata in F maj: for Organ Wallace Goodrich	XXII	Apr 14. "
	Prelude, Adagio in G major, arr. by Bachrichs	XXIV	Apr 28. "
Beethoven	Symphony No. 2. op 36	I	Oct 14. 05 + Jan 6. 06
	" " 3. " 55	III	" 28. 05
	" " 5 " 68	IX	Dec 23. 05 + Apr 28. 06
	" " 8 " 93	XIX	Mar 14. 06
	Over. "Dedication of the House" op 124 } George Henschel, Conductor }	Penn. Concert	Nov 26. 05
	" "Egmont" op 84.	XIV	Feb 3. 06
	" "Leonore No 3	Gen. Benefit	Apr 24. 06
	Concert Violin solo op 61 Willy Hess	XI	Jan 6. "
	Concerto P.F. for Orch. No. 5 op 73 Adele aus der Ohe	XII	Jan 20. 06
Berlioz H.	Excerpts from "Damnation of Faust"	San Fran. Fund	Apr 29. 06
Boche, Ernst	"Ulysses Departure & Shipwreck" op 6	XXIX	Mar 3. 06
Brahms J.	Symphony No 2 op 73	XI	Jan 6. 06
	" " 4 " 98	XX	Mar 31. "
Bucini F.B.	Comedy Overture op 38	VI	Nov 25. 05
	Gehamische Suite No. 2 op 34-A	XX	Mar 31. 06
Chausson E.	Symphony in B flat op 20	XII	Jan 20. 06
Coleridge-Taylor	Onaway! Awake Beloved! with orch. Ben. Davies	XXII	Apr 14. 06
Convers F.S.	Ballade op 72. "La Belle Dame sans merci" For Bar. & Orch David Bispham	XVII	Mar 3. 06

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The owner of this ticket will please write name and address on the lines below as an aid to its recovery in case of loss.

NAME
Warren Davenport

ADDRESS
*214 Boylston St.
Boston Mass*

This ticket must be presented to the door-keeper at every performance. Persons neglecting to bring tickets will be admitted to the hall only by purchasing an evening ticket.

Index

Composer	Name of Work	Concert	Date of Performance
Bach J.S.	Pastorale from Christmas Oratorio	IX	Dec 23. 1905
	Suite for Orch. in D maj:	XX	Mar 31. 1906
	Toccata in F maj: for Organ Wallace Goodrich	XXII	Apr 14. "
	Prelude, Adagio & Gavotte, arr. by Bachrich	XXIV	Apr 28. "
Beethoven	Symphony No. 2. op 36	I	Oct 14. 05 + XI Jan 6. 06
	" " 3. " 55	III	" 28. 05
	" " 5 " 68	IX	Dec 23. 05 + Apr 28. 06
	" " 8 " 93	XIX	Mar 14. 06
	Quint. "Dedication of the House" op 124 } George Henschel, Conductor	Penn. Concert	Nov 26. 05
	" "Egmont" op 84	XIV Geniches Benefit	Feb 3. 06
	" "Leonore No 3		Apr 24. 06
	Concert Violin solo op 61 Willy Hess	XI	Jan 6. "
	Concerto P.F. & Orch. No. 5 op 73 Adele aus der Ohe	XIF	Jan 20. 06
Berlioz H.	Excerpts from "Damnation of Faust"	San. Fran. Fund.	Apr 29. 06
Bach, Ernst	"Ulysses Departure & Shipwreck" op 6	XXIII	Mar 3. 06
Brahms J.	Symphony No 2 op 73	XI	Jan 6. 06
	" " 4 " 98	XX	Mar 31. "
Bucini F.B.	Comedy Overture op 38	VI	Nov 25. 05
	Gehamische Suite No. 2 op 34-A	XX	Mar 31. 06
Chausson E.	Symphony in B flat op 20	XII	Jan 20. 06
Coleridge-Taylor	Onaway! Awake Beloved! with orch. Ben. Davies	XXII	Apr 14. 06
Convers F.S.	Ballade op 72. "La Belle Dame sans merci" For Bar. & Orch David Bispham	XXVII	Mar 3. 06

TIGHT BINDING

Debussy C.	Prelude, 'The afternoon of a Faun' for orch.	XVIII	Feb 10. 1906
Dukas	'The Sorcerer's Apprentice' orch: V.D'Indy. Conductor	VII	Dec 2. 05
Dvorak A.	Symph. Poem: 'The Wood Dove' op 110 Overture 'Nature' op 91 Concert in B min. op 104 Cello + orch. Kernick Warnie	I IX III	Oct 14. 05 Dec 23 " Oct 28. "
Elgar Ed.	Concert over 'In the South' op 50.	X	Dec 30. 05
Fauré G.	'Pelleas et Melisande' Suite op 80 V.D'Indy. Conductor	VII	Dec 2. 05
Franch B.	Symphony in D min: 'Psyche and Cupid' from Psyche " " " " } " " Gardens of Cupid } " "	Gerick's Benefit VII XXI	Apr 24. 06 Dec 2. 05 Apr 7. 06
Glazunow A.	Symph. Pictorial 'The Kremlin' op 30	XIII	Jan 26. 06
Goldmark C.	Ouv. 'In the Spring' op 36 " 'Sakuntala' " 13 " " " " } " " Concerto V. orch op 28 Jacques Hoffmann	I XVIII Gerick's Benefit XXI	Oct 14. 05 Feb 10. 06 Apr 24. " Apr 7. "
Goldmark, Rubin	Ouv. to 'Hiawatha'	XI	Jan 6. 1906
Grieg Ed.	Concerto P.F. + orch. op 16 Mine Olga Samaroff	XXIII	Apr 21. 06
Handel	Ouv. to 'Tasso' for orch. 'Largo' for strings 'Oh had I but a Lyre' for harp Van Hissin de Moss	XXIX San Fran. Fund XX	Feb 24. 06 Apr 29. 06 Feb 31. 06

Haydn	Symphony B flat Dtt. No. 8 " D maj " " 2	VIII XV	Dec 16. 1905 Feb 10. 06
Humperdinck	A. Introd. 3 rd Act - 'Kings Children' B. 'Humoresque' "	VIII	Dec 16. 05
L'Indy V.	Symphony B flat No. 2. op 57 Istar: Symph. Var. op 42 V.D'Indy. Conductor Symph. on a Mountain Air op 25 P.F. + orch. Kernick Gebhard	VII " XV	Dec 2. 05 " " " Feb 10. 06
Jacqu. Dalarze	Concert V. orch. C min. op 50 Henri Marteau	XXIV	Feb 10. 06
Loeffler C.M.	'The Devil's Vengeance' op 9	VI	Nov 25. 05
Liszt F.	'A Faust Symphony' in C min: Symph. Poem No 2. 'Tasso' " " " 4 'Orpheus' Piano Concerto No 1. in E flat Rudolph Ganz Mine Olga Samaroff Piano Concerto No. 2. A maj Waldemar Lutschg Song 'The Conkey' with orch. Mad. Louise Homer	XXII VIII XII XIX San. Fran. Fund II I	Apr 14. 06 Dec 16. 05 Jan 20. 06 Feb 24. 06 Apr 29. 06 Oct 21. 05 Oct 14. 05
Mac Dowell Ent.	Two Symph Poem from 'Lancelot + Elaine'	XIV	Feb 24. 06
Mahler Gust	Symphony No 5 in C + min " " "	XIV XVI	Feb 3. 06 Feb 24. "
Mancinus	Air from 'Hans Heiling' with orch: David Bispham	XXVII	Feb 3. 06
Mendelssohn	Symphony in A min op 90 (Italian) Ouv. 'Calme Sea + Prosperous Voyage' " Fair Melusina op 32	XXIII XII XXIV	Apr 21. 06 Jan 20 " Feb 3. "

Composer	Work	Instrumentation	Date	Program	Notes	Date
Mendelssohn	Concerto V <sup>o</sup> + Orch. 464	XIII	Jan 27. 1906	Strawns, Rich:	Tone Poem "Death + Transfiguration" 423	Oct 21.05 - Apr 21.06
	Miss Marie Halle				" " "Don Juan" 420	Nov 26.05
Mozart	Symphony in G minor K 550	V	Nov 18.05		Tell Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks 428	Jan 6.06
	" C major Jupiter, K 551	XIII	Jan 27.06		Symph. Fantasia 416. "Aus Italien"	Mar 3.06
	Teene and Rendo "El Paso" Cosi fan Tutte	X	Dec 30.05	Tschaikowsky	Symphony No 4 in F minor 436	Oct 21.05
	"Mad Emma Sames				" " "6 Pathétique" 74	Nov 26.05
	"The Pangs of Hell" from The Magic Flute	IX	Mar 31.06		"Francesca da Rimini" orch. Fant. 432	Dec 30.05
	Mrs. Hiram de Moss				"Romeo + Juliet" Fant. f. orch.	Apr 28.06
Panic J. K.	Prelude to "The Birds of Airs Trophane"	V	Nov 18.05		Theme Var. from Suite 3. 455	Nov. 18.05
Rossini	Orw. "William Tell"	Jan. From Fund	Apr 29.06	Wagner R.	Orw. "Flying Dutchman"	Apr 29.06
Rubinstein A.	Concerto No 4 in D minor 470	XVI	Feb 24.06		" " "Tannhauser"	Apr 29.06
	P.F. orch: Ernest Hutchinson				"Bacchanale from Tannhauser"	Nov 26.05
Saint-Saens C.	Concerto Cello orch 433	XV	Feb 10.06		" " " "	Nov 4.05
	Miss Elva Rieggner				"March of Homage"	" 4 "
Schilling M.	Prelude 3 act. Pipers Holiday	XVI	Apr 7.06		"Vorspiel + Liebestod Tristan"	Apr 1.06
Schubert F.	Unfinished Symphony in B minor	III	Oct 28.05		"Mme Hiram de Moss }	Apr 1.06
	Symphony in C major No 7.	XVII	Mar 10.06		"Intro. + Prayer" Tannhauser }	Nov 4.05
	"Die Altmacht" with orch.	X	Dec 30.05		"Siegfried Parting from Brunnhilde" } Götter-	Apr 24.06
	"Mad. Emma Sames				" " "Death + Funeral March" } Dämmerung	" 14.06
Schumann R.	Symphony No 1. B flat 438	VI	Nov 25.05		"Closing Scene" "Dark of the Gods"	Apr 1.06
	" " 4 D minor 120	XXI	Apr 7.06		"Good Friday Spell" Parsifal	Apr 1.06
	Concerto P.F. orch. 454	XIV	Feb 3.06		"Grail Scene act 1."	Apr 1.06
	M. Harold Bauer				"Apollo Club"	Apr 1.06
Sinding, Ch.	Concerto V <sup>o</sup> orch 445	V	Nov 18.05		"Selection Siegfried + Dark of the Gods"	Apr 1.06
	Felix Winter nly				"Spinning Chorus" Thursday Evening Club	" 1. "
Smetana	Orw. to "Libussa"	II	Oct 21.05		"Scene + Aria" "Just God" from Ringi	Oct 14.05
Strube	Concerto V <sup>o</sup> orch. 7 <sup>o</sup> minor	IX	Dec 23.05		"Mme Louise Homer	Nov 4.05
	P. Adamowski				"Elizabeth's Greeting" from Tannhauser	" 4.05
					"Mine Gadski
					"Proze Song" from the "Meistranger"
					"Ellen von Hoese"
				Weber C. v.	Orw. to "Frischheit"	Feb 24.06
					" " "Euryanthe"	Apr 21.06

12
Weber Com. V.

Concert Piece in F min op 79
P. F. Tord. Alfred Reisenauer
Ora Through the Forest "Fräischütz"
Mr Ben Davies
Wie nahe mir der Schlummer
Mad. Gadoski

VIII

Dec 16. 05

XXII

Apr 14. 06

Gerike
Benefit

Apr 24. 06

Webber

Symphony in C min.

X

Dec 30. 05

Soloists

Piano

Aus der Ohe, Adele
Bauer, Harold
Ganz, Rudolf
Hutchison, Ernest
Luetichg, Waldemar
Reisenauer, Alfred
Tamaroff, Mme Olga
Gebhard, Heinrich
Adamowski, T.
Hale, Miss Marie
Heermann, Hugo
Hess, Prof. Willy
Hoffmann, Jacques
Manteau, Henri
Winternitz, Felix

Jan 20. 1906

Feb 3 "

Mar 4 "

Feb 24 "

Oct 21. 1905

Dec 16 "

Apr 21. 1906

Feb 10. "

Dec 23. 1905

Jan 27. 1906

Nov 25. 1905

Jan 6. 1906

Apr 7 "

Mar 10 "

Nov 18. 1905

Violinists

Violoncellists

Ruegger, Miss Elsa
Wurmke, Heinrich

Feb 16. 1906

Oct 18. 1905

Vocalists

Eames, Mad. Emma
Bispham, David
Davies, Mr Ben
Gadoski, Mad Johanna
Homer, Mad. Louise
Hassend de Moss, Mary
Hootle, Ellison Van

Dec 30. 1905

Mar 3. 1906

Apr 14 "

Nov 4. 1905

Oct 14. "

Mar 21. 1906

Nov 4. 1905

Organist

Goodrich, Wallace

13
April 14. 1906

Conductor

Wilhelm Gerike

Mr Willy Hess acted as

1st Conductor

And

Mr Vincent D'Indy conducted the 7th Concert of French music

Drawn by S. Ivanowski

THE LEADER

QUARTER CENTURY OF THE SYMPHONY

Review P. Hale Sept. 24, 1905
 Boston's Famous Orchestra
 Enters Upon Its Twenty-
 Fifth Season the Coming
 Month—Its High Ideals.

INFLUENCE HAS BEEN
 GREAT AND WIDESPREAD

Changes in Personnel This
 Year—Some of the Soloists
 —Programmes of Concerts
 —The Worcester Festival.

THE time has come for the annual announcement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts, and this year there is a special sentimental interest attached to it because the coming season will complete the first quarter century of the orchestra's existence. For the older patrons it is hardly possible to believe that since that first concert on Oct. 22, 1881, in the old Music Hall, a whole generation has been born and has grown to maturity, while for this new generation it is as difficult to believe that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not always been. Twenty-four years have made it an institution as firmly established in Boston life and Boston customs as the Bunker Hill monument, and, better still, so far as there can be certainty in life, the orchestra will continue to be what it has been in the past.

It is fair to say that in the history of Boston's orchestra is found practically the history of orchestral music in America. True, Boston had had its Harvard Musical Association and Germania orchestra, and New York had its Philharmonic Society and the occasional orchestras of Theodore Thomas, and while all these organizations did praiseworthy work under conditions that were never too favorable, it is due directly to the impetus given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the United and permanent orchestras and innumerable smaller ones.

Not can the credit due the orchestra be lessened by the assertion that the time was ripe in America for large orchestras. Those who remember the early days of the orchestra will recall the heartbreaking uphill fight that had to be made, first in Boston itself, and then, and for a much longer time, in New York, in Philadelphia, in Baltimore and in the dozen or more smaller cities where today merely an announcement of a concert is sufficient to fill the concert hall. The battle was a hard one, but a splendid victory was gained, not only through dogged persistence, but as much by the uncompromising adherence to the high ideals which have always animated the founder, the conductors and the members of the orchestra.

Its influence has not been limited to those cities where its concerts have been annual fixtures for so many years, although to its example directly may be traced the establishment of the comparatively young organizations of Philadelphia and Washington, and the constant unrest in New York because that city has no permanent orchestra of its own. The tours of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the West from 1896 to 1899 were the means of awakening a great music-loving public to the possibilities of orchestral music which finally resulted in the establishment of the fine permanent orchestras in Chicago, Cincinnati and Pittsburg, and the smaller and less ambitiously designed bands which are to be found in almost every considerable city in the country.

But the finest tribute to the work done by the Boston Symphony, finer, perhaps, than the splendidly loyal public which it has created in its home city, is that wherever it has played, no matter how increased the local supply of orchestral music may have been, and in those western cities where it has not played for a dozen years or more, the memory of its concerts is so keen that no year passes without requests from them for another tour.

It is in answer to these that this fall the orchestra will go "on the road" for the week of Oct. 2 and give concerts in Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland and Rochester. The financial success of all of these has been more than assured from the time of the first announcement, and since it became known that the orchestra was to make this trip, other cities in that part of the country have vainly tried to get dates. But the regular work of the season forbids a longer tour.

Changes in Personnel.

Each year, it seems, there must be some few changes in the personnel of the orchestra. In some cases members seek other fields of work, but more often the changes are due to the constant desire to strengthen the orchestra so that it will be impossible to detect a weak spot. This season will bring three new principal instrumentalists—Mr. Heinrich Warnke of Munich, the new principal cellist, who replaces Mr. Krasselt; Mr. Peter Sadony of Cologne, the new first bassoonist, and Mr. Max Hess of Munich, who will alternate with Mr. Hackebarth as first horn. All three musicians bring with them to this country enviable reputations. Mr. Warnke has for eight years been the principal

DRURY'S ILLUSTRATION
THE LEADER

QUARTER CENTURY OF THE SYMPHONY

Review P. Hale Sept. 24, 1905

Boston's Famous Orchestra
Enters Upon Its Twenty-
Fifth Season the Coming
Month—Its High Ideals.

INFLUENCE HAS BEEN
GREAT AND WIDESPREAD

Changes in Personnel This
Year—Some of the Soloists
—Programmes of Concerts
—The Worcester Festival.

THE time has come for the annual announcement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts, and this year there is a special sentimental interest attached to it because the coming season will complete the first quarter century of the orchestra's existence. For the older patrons it is hardly possible to believe that since that first concert on Oct. 22, 1881, in the old Music Hall, a whole generation has been born and has grown to maturity, while for this new generation it is as difficult to believe that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not always been. Twenty-four years have made it an institution as firmly established in Boston life and Boston customs as the Bunker Hill monument, and, better still, so far as there can be certainty in life, the orchestra will continue to be what it has been in the past.

It is fair to say that in the history of Boston's orchestra is found practically the history of orchestral music in America. True, Boston had had its Harvard Musical Association and Germania orchestra, and New York had its Philharmonic Society and the occasional orchestras of Theodore Thomas, and while all these organizations did praiseworthy work under conditions that were never too favorable, it is due directly to the impetus given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the United States can today boast the several large and permanent orchestras and innumerable smaller ones.

Nor can the credit due the orchestra be lessened by the assertion that the time was ripe in America for large orchestras. Those who remember the early days of the orchestra will recall the heartbreaking uphill fight that had to be made, first in Boston itself, and then, and for a much longer time, in New York, in Philadelphia, in Baltimore and in the dozen or more smaller cities where today merely an announcement of a concert is sufficient to fill the concert hall. The battle was a hard one, but a splendid victory was gained, not only through dogged persistence, but as much by the uncompromising adherence to the high ideals which have always animated the founder, the conductors and the members of the orchestra.

Its influence has not been limited to those cities where its concerts have been annual fixtures for so many years, although to its example directly may be traced the establishment of the comparatively young organizations of Philadelphia and Washington, and the constant unrest in New York because that city has no permanent orchestra of its own. The tours of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the West from 1886 to 1893 were the means of awakening a great music-loving public to the possibilities of orchestral music which finally resulted in the establishment of the fine permanent orchestras in Chicago, Cincinnati and Pittsburg, and the smaller and less ambitiously designed bands which are to be found in almost every considerable city in the country.

But the finest tribute to the work done by the Boston Symphony, finer, perhaps, than the splendidly loyal public which it has created in its home city, is that wherever it has played, no matter how increased the local supply of orchestral music may have been and in those western cities where it has not played for a dozen years or more, the memory of its concerts is so keen that no year passes without requests from them for another tour.

It is in answer to these that this fall the orchestra will go "on the road" for the week of Oct. 2 and give concerts in Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland and Rochester. The financial success of all of these has been more than assured from the time of the first announcement, and since it became known that the orchestra was to make this trip, other cities in that part of the country have vainly tried to get dates. But the regular work of the season forbids a longer tour.

Changes in Personnel.

Each year, it seems, there must be some few changes in the personnel of the orchestra. In some cases members seek other fields of work, but more often the changes are due to the constant desire to strengthen the orchestra so that it will be impossible to detect a weak spot. This season will bring three new principal instrumentalists—Mr. Heinrich Warnke of Munich, the new principal cellist, who replaces Mr. Krasselt; Mr. Peter Sadony of Cologne, the new first bassoonist, and Mr. Max Hess of Munich, who will alternate with Mr. Hackebarth as first horn. All three musicians bring with them to this country enviable reputations. Mr. Warnke has for eight years been the principal allo of the Kaim orchestra, and from that same organization comes Mr. Hess (who, by the way, is not a relative of Mr. Willy Hess). Mr. Sadony is called the best bassoon in Germany. For many years he has been the first bassoon in the Cologne orchestra, and during the same time he has been the teacher of the bassoon in the Cologne Conservatory.

Coming Programmes.

In the making of programmes and the choice of soloists lie the principal pitfalls which threaten every conductor and every management. The impossibility of satisfying everybody has been the common experience of all orchestras since orchestras were. And it seems as impossible to strike a golden mean. The rule seems to be that as many as there are patrons, so many are there opinions, and no opinions are clung to with such fanatical persistence as those which concern music in general and a particular orchestra in particular, especially when the patrons regard themselves as having a sort of proprietary right in it.

In the question of programmes the policy of the Boston Symphony orchestra has varied but little under its several conductors. In a nutshell it may thus be defined: "Plenty of the greater classics, with enough novelties to keep its patrons acquainted with the latest movements in music." Mr. Gericke has followed this policy, especially of late years, and he has made his programmes for the coming year with this in view.

It is true that the composition of orchestral works seems now to be at low ebb; nevertheless, some interesting works are written, and of these Mr. Gericke has chosen such as he thinks are the best, and in a sufficient number to lend to the season the desired variety. The most important new symphony will be Mahler's latest. This year, as in the past, the programmes will be selected so as to give a careful balance between the old and the new, that there may be that contrast which is necessary to maintain interest at its keenest point and yet that the great classics may be fully represented.

The programmes of the first four concerts will be as follows:

FIRST CONCERT.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 13.

Saturday evening, Oct. 14.

Goldmark—Overture, "In the Springs."

Aria.

Dvorak—"Die Waldtaube."

(First time.)

Aria.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 2 in D major.

Soloist to be announced.

SECOND CONCERT.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 20.

Saturday evening, Oct. 21.

Smetana—Overture, "Libussa."

(First time.)

Liszt—Concerto for pianoforte No. 2, in A major.

Richard Strauss—"Death and Transfiguration."

Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 4, in F minor.

Soloist, Mr. Lutschg.

THIRD CONCERT.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 27.

Saturday evening, Oct. 28.

Brahms—Academic overture.

Concerto for violoncello.

Elgar—(a) Chanson de Nuit.

(b) Chanson de Matin.

(First time.)

Liszt—A Faust Symphony.

Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.

FOURTH CONCERT.

Friday afternoon, Nov. 3.

Saturday evening, Nov. 4.

Wagner programme.

"Tannhaeuser," Bacchanale, and scene between Tannhaeuser and Venus from the first act (Paris version).

"Die Meistersinger," Walther's prize song.

"Die Goetterdaemmerung," Siegfried's Parting from Bruennhilde.

Siegfried's Death.

Funeral March.

Closing Scene.

Soloists, Mme. Johanna Gadski, Mr. Ellison

Van Hoose.

Some of the Soloists.

It is impossible at this time to give a complete list of the season's soloists, because two or three engagements have not yet been definitely closed.

First and foremost, although he cannot be called a soloist, is Mr. Vincent d'Indy, who will visit this country by special invitation and conduct the public rehearsal and concert of Dec. 1 and 2, and the concerts during the following week in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. This is a decided innovation in the general policy of the orchestra, which has been to have no conductors but the regular holder of the place; but the invitation has been made as a compliment to French composers whose works have so often found a place on the Symphony programmes.

Mr. d'Indy's name is familiar to all the patrons of the orchestra, for many of his works have been performed within the last three or four years and have excited keen interest among all classes of music lovers. He may be said to stand at the head of that school of composers known as the "younger Frenchmen," in distinction from Saint-Saens and his followers. A pupil of Cesar Franck, he, with his fellows, stands for modernity in music.

While, like all French composers, he has written more or less for the operatic stage, unlike them he has devoted the greater part of his time to instrumental music. He has written in all the various forms, large and small. But we shall speak at greater length about Mr. d'Indy next Sunday.

New names among the soloists are Waldemar Lutschg, pianist; Mme. Samarooff, pianist; Miss Marie Hall, violinist; Mr. Heinrich Warnke, cellist, and Mr. Rudolph Ganz, pianist. Others well known are Mr. Henri Marteau, violinist; Mr. Ben Davies, tenor; Mme. Emma Eames-Story; Mme. Gadsky and Mr. Ellison Van Hoose, together in a Wagner programme; Miss Olive Fremstadt, soprano; Mr. Alfred Reisenauer, pianist, who is making his second visit to America; Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, all of them pianists; Miss Elsa Ruegger, cellist; David Bispham, and from the orchestra, in addition to Mr. Warnke, Messrs. Willy Hess, Timothy Adamowski, Felix Winternitz and Jacques Hoffmann.

Miss Marie Hall, violinist, who will make her first appearance with the orchestra in Boston, is one of the musical sensations of the hour. She comes from that foreign house of violinists, the Prague Conservatory, where for two years she was the pupil of Svecik, the sponsor of Kubelik and other infant phenomena. She came of very poor parents in Bristol, Eng., and had the greatest difficulty in getting a musical education. She got some haphazard instruction from Mossel of Birmingham, Elgar and Wilhelmj who saw in her a great talent, and ultimately she won the new Wesley scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music, but this she was unable to take for lack of means to live in London. This fact attracted attention, and ultimately she was put under Kruse in London, with whom she remained two years. Then she went to Prague and qualified to work with Svecik. Two years with him, and she, in the fall of 1902, made her professional debut in Vienna. Since then her success has been extraordinary, even when compared with that of her fellow-pupil, Kubelik, and in England and on the continent she is reckoned one of the musical wonders of the world. She is 21 years old.

Three Pianists.

Mme. Samarooff played in Boston for the first time toward the end of last season at a concert of the Boston Symphony quartet, when she gave much pleasure in ensemble by the elegance, dash and taste of her performance. She is of German-Russian parentage, but is American by birth, and her maiden name was Hickenlooper. She has studied chiefly in Paris, and she entered the Paris Conservatory in 1895 as a pupil of Delaborde. Her concerts in London last season were unusually successful for one who went to that city a stranger.

Waldemar Lutschg, who comes for the first time, will make his American debut with the Boston Symphony orchestra in this city. He was born in St. Petersburg in 1877, where his father was an eminent artist and teacher. Although he betrayed great talent at an early age, he was not allowed to play in public until he was fully prepared for the ordeal. His first public performance, in St. Petersburg, in 1896, was most successful. His first appearance in Germany was made in Dresden on Nov. 10, 1898. His present home is Chicago.

Rudolph Ganz, another pianist who this year makes his first appearance with the orchestra, was born in Zurich in 1877 and made his first public appearance when he was 10 years old, not as a pianist, but as a cellist. Two years later he appeared as a pianist. His first real studies began when he was 16, with his uncle, Carl Eschmann-Dumur, and later with Ferruccio Busoni. His Berlin debut was in 1899, when he appeared with the Philharmonic orchestra as pianist and the composer of a symphony. In 1901 he succeeded Arthur Friedheim as teacher of piano in Chicago and since then has given numerous recitals with much success in the larger cities of the middle west.

Outside Boston.

The plans for the orchestra outside of Boston are rather more extensive than ever before. Its popularity has increased so rapidly, even in the last few years, after many had supposed that the limit had been reached, that the field of its activity in the East is constantly enlarging, and, while Boston is its home city, other cities have come to regard it to a certain extent as their own.

Including the Boston series and the preliminary trip to Canada and the middle West, 104 concerts have been scheduled. There will be the usual series of six in the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge—on Oct. 26, Nov. 30, Dec. 28, Feb. 1, March 8 and April 19. New York will have its five concerts and five Saturday matinees in Carnegie Hall, Brooklyn its five concerts and Baltimore its five. Owing to the very considerable inducements that have been offered there, the orchestra will this year resume its series of five concerts in Washington, and in order to do this the second series of five concerts in Philadelphia will be abandoned, only five being given in that city. Providence and Hartford will each have three concerts and Worcester will have two instead of the usual one. A single concert will be given in Buffalo (in addition to the one there next month), Poughkeepsie, Springfield, Albany, New Haven and Portland.

CANADIAN DEBUT OF THE SYMPHONY

MONTREAL, Que., Oct. 2, 1905. The Boston Symphony orchestra made its debut in Canada tonight under the most flattering auspices. A brilliant and fashionable audience packed the Victoria Rink and enthusiastically applauded every number. Mr. Willy Hess won an honest encore by his superb playing of the Spohr concerto, but the rigid rules against encores prevailed.

SYMPHONY'S WESTERN TRIP.

Signs of life are beginning to be seen around Symphony Hall. The members of the orchestra are returning to town from their summer haunts, and are making ready for the winter's work. This year the orchestra will be assembled much earlier than usual on account of the western trip, which will be made in the week of Oct. 2. Reports which have been received from the different cities which will be visited, Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland and Rochester are promising.

It is the first time in over 12 years that the orchestra is to go into Canada and west of the Alleghanies. The mere announcement that the orchestra is to make the short tour has brought requests for concerts from nearly all the larger cities and towns.

Mr. Gerlick is still in Seal Harbor. Prof. Hess, who spent the summer in Europe, has taken a house in the city. Prof. Hess will be the soloist on the tour. Harold Salt. 14. 1905

THE SYMPHONY SEASON

THE BEGINNING OF A NEW YEAR AT SYMPHONY HALL

Mr. Gericke's Fifth Year—New Soloists and New Players—Mr. Vincent d'Indy to Appear as Conductor—Novelties to Be Produced Trans. Sept. 23, 1903.

The Symphony Orchestra, with the coming season, ends the first quarter-century of its existence. Since the first memorable concert was given in the old Music Hall on Oct. 22, 1881, a whole generation of music-lovers has been born and educated in the way they should go by an institution that has done much to establish Boston's musical supremacy in America. So integral a part in the artistic economy of Boston and the great cities of the East has the orchestra become, that one is apt to forget in its present seasons of great prosperity that all days have not been fair with it. It was a long and discouraging uphill fight to gather a musical public able to appreciate it. And victory was won only by ceaseless toil, unwavering courage and a dogged perseverance in the maintenance of ideals. When the history of music in America for the last quarter-century has been written, it will be found that the greatest factor in its advancement has been the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its influence, direct and indirect, has been felt the length and breadth of the continent. Before it was established, Boston had had its Harvard Musical Association and its Germania Orchestra. New York had its Philharmonic Society, and for the rest of the country there were only the occasional concerts by the occasional orchestras organized by the late Theodore Thomas.

Today one finds permanent orchestras in Chicago, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and Washington, and even New York's conscience grows annually uneasy about the lack of such an orchestra in that city. Besides these great orchestras, every considerable city in the Union has its devoted band of forty or fifty men, professionals and amateurs, that are regarded as a nucleus of something greater to come in the future.

On the Boston Symphony Orchestra must rest the entire responsibility for this movement. Until it began its missionary work, the full meaning of orchestral music was hardly known in this country, and the mere mention of classical music was sufficient to empty a hall. It is a mistake to say that a large part of the success of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came because the public was ripe for such a movement. On the contrary, although the love of good music was latent, every inch of ground gained in those early years had to be fought for. It was not only the early success of the orchestra in Boston that gave an impetus to orchestral music in other parts of the country, by showing that a permanent orchestra of the highest class might be made successful, but it was the succession of concerts in other cities, the eight long tours through the Middle West, that brought home to the public the real necessity of such music and inspired them to undertake similar organizations.

This year no less than 104 concerts have already been scheduled, of which forty-eight (public rehearsals and evening concerts), will be given in Boston. In addition to the six concerts of the preliminary trip in the week beginning Oct. 2, in Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland and Rochester, ten concerts will be given in New York, five in Brooklyn, five in Philadelphia, five in Baltimore and five in Washington. Providence and Hartford will each have three, and Worcester two, while single concerts will be given in Buffalo (in addition to the concert there next month), Poughkeepsie, Springfield, Albany, New Haven and Portland. Cambridge will have its usual quota of six, in Sanders Theatre, on Oct. 26, Nov. 30, Dec. 28, Feb. 1, March 8 and April 19.

The Boston season will, as usual, consist of twenty-four concerts on consecutive Saturday evenings from Oct. 14 to April 28, omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 17 and March 17, and twenty-four public rehearsals on consecutive Friday afternoons (excepting Good Friday, April 13, which rehearsal is moved forward to Thursday), beginning Oct. 13, omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 16 and March 16. The regular auction sale of seats for the two series will be held at Symphony Hall at 10 A. M., on Monday, Oct. 2, Tuesday, Oct. 3, Thursday, Oct. 5, and Friday, Oct. 6.

Aside from the sentimental interest attached to it, a particularly attractive season is promised. Mr. Gericke, the last year of whose present engagement it is, promises an unusually interesting lot of novelties, and the list of soloists is unusually strong, even when compared with those of previous years. Some new musicians of high reputation have been added to the orchestra, and most important of all will be the presence as conductor at the concerts on Dec. 1 and 2 of M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer. This engagement is quite a radical departure in the policy of the orchestra, and may be traced to a desire to pay a sincere and deserved compliment to modern French musicians who have appeared so prominently on the Symphony programmes. While M. Saint-Saëns is the dean of French composers in point of service, M. d'Indy is decidedly the leader of the interesting group known as the "younger Frenchmen," although many of them are young only in the sense that nowadays no one grows old. M. d'Indy is a man of fifty-four, but reckoned as a French musician, he is a modern of moderns. He and his colleagues of the same school trace their artistic descent from César Franck, who was their teacher and mentor. It is they who are largely responsible for the revival of absolute music in France, as contrasted with operatic, and while all of them, including M. d'Indy, have written more or less for the stage, the major part of their time has been given to absolute music in all its forms, large and small. No less than seven of M. d'Indy's works have been performed at the Symphony concerts in the last five years, and his chamber music is rapidly attaining great popularity in this country. Undoubtedly his coming will be the musical event of the season.

Mr. Gericke is not yet ready to give out a list of the novelties to be performed this year. The choice of novelties for an orchestra like the Boston Symphony is one of the most difficult tasks set before a conductor. He is constantly besieged on one side by that large contingent which believes that novelties should have no place in a symphony programme, and that no work should be played until years have proved its value; and on the other by an equally large contingent which, if it does not believe that the chief function of a symphony orchestra be the trying of new music, thinks that a large part of its programmes should be given to things that are new. To find a golden mean between these two views in a time when musical composition seems to be at low tide makes trouble enough for a conductor without the other worries which constantly beset him. Mr. Gericke has been very successful in the past in this matter, and there is no reason to doubt that he will be as successful this year.

Neither is it possible to give a complete list of the season's soloists. In the matter of "sensations" the coming season, as compared with some in recent years, is likely to prove a bit disappointing. But one really sensational virtuoso new to America has been announced. This is the young English violinist, Marie Hall, who, from all accounts, has had a most astonishing career.

There is a story about this young artist that she began her career as a street musician, and was so discovered. This seems to be merely tradition. The facts seem to be that she comes of very poor English parents in Bristol. When she was a mere child, her talent was recognized by such men as Wilhelmj, Elgar and Mossel of Birmingham, all of whom gave her a few lessons from time to time. She first attracted general attention a few years ago, when she won a scholarship in the Royal Academy of Music, and was unable to take advantage of it, because she had not the money to live in London. Certain charitable men and women, convinced of her talent, gave her the means of studying with Professor Kruse of London for two years. Then she went to Svecik in Prague, the teacher of Kubelik, and two years later, in the fall of 1902, she made her professional début in Vienna. Her début in London came the following winter. Of her success in England and on the Continent there seems to be no question, and it is possible that she will be the feature of the coming musical season in America.

Two pianists new to the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Waldemar Lütschg and Rudolph Ganz. Waldemar Lütschg, who comes to America this season for the first time, will make his American début with the Symphony Orchestra in this city. He was born in St. Petersburg, where his father was an eminent artist and teacher. Although he showed talent at an early age, he was not allowed to play in public until he was fully prepared for the ordeal. His first public performance in St. Petersburg, in 1896, was most successful, and since that time he has been reckoned as one of the first pianists of Europe. His first appearance in Germany was made in Dresden on Nov. 10, 1898. Rudolph Ganz, another pianist who this year makes his first appearance with the orchestra, was born in Zurich in 1877 and made his first public appearance when he was ten years old, not as a pianist, but as a violoncellist. Two years later he appeared as a pianist. His first real studies began when he was sixteen, with his uncle, Carl Eschmann-Dumur, and later with Ferruccio Busoni. His Berlin début was in 1899 when he appeared with the Philharmonic Orchestra as pianist and the composer of a symphony. In 1901 he succeeded Arthur Friedheim as teacher of piano in Chicago, and since then has given numerous recitals in the larger cities of the middle West.

Heinrich Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the orchestra, will make his début as a soloist at one of the early concerts. Several of the soloists on the list have not been heard with the orchestra for a considerable time. Henri Marteau, the eminent violinist, is one, Ben Davies, the tenor, is another, and Mme. Emma Eames-Story and David Bispham others. Among the pianists are Harold Bauer, Adèle aus der Ohe, Mme. Samarooff, who made so deep an impression last season; Alfred Reisenauer, and Ernest Hutcheson. Among the singers are found Mme. Gadski and Ellison Van Hoose, who will appear together in a Wagner programme, and one or two others to be announced later. Elsa Ruegger, the 'cellist, is also announced, and from the ranks of the orchestra will come Professor Willy Hess, Timothée Adamowski, Felix Winternitz and Jacques Hoffmann.

Reference has already been made in the Transcript to the changes made in the orchestra. Mr. Warnke, the new first 'cello, takes the place of Mr. Krasselt. He brings from the Kalm Orchestra, in Munich, the highest of reputations. Mr. Peter Sadony comes from Cologne, where he has been with the Cologne Orchestra for many years, and during that time has been the teacher of the bassoon in the famous Cologne Conservatory. Mr. Max Hess, the new alternate first horn, comes, like Mr. Warnke, from the Kalm Orchestra of Munich.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts at Symphony Hall Tomorrow (Thursday) Morning at 10 O'clock, continuing through the day.

BY SPECIAL INVITATION

The Eminent French Composer

M. VINCENT D'INDY

Will Conduct the Concerts of December 1 and 2

Harold Soloists: Oct. 4, 1905

Mme. EMMA EAMES
Mme. JOHANNA CADSKI
Mme. LOUISE HOMER
Mr. BEN DAVIES
Mr. ELLISON VAN HOOSE
Mr. DAVID BISPHAM
Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe
Mme. OLGA SAMAROFF
Mr. Alfred Reisenauer
Mr. HAROLD BAUER
Mr. Waldemar Lutschg
Mr. RUDOLPH CANZ
Mr. Ernest Hutcheson
Miss MARIE HALL
Mr. HENRI MARTEAU
Professor WILLY HESS
Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI
Mr. FELIX WINTERNITZ
Mr. Jacques Hoffmann
Miss ELSA RUECCER
Mr. HEINRICH WARNKE

Auction sale of the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts Friday, Oct. 6.

The Symphony Season

Preparations are active at Symphony Hall for the extended tour to be made by the orchestra in the week of Oct. 2. The players are now returning from their summer vacations and engagements, for the date of first rehearsals has been moved forward considerably on account of the Western trip. There is every surety that the concerts to be given in Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland and Rochester will be among the most successful in the history of the orchestra, the preliminary announcements having aroused the keenest interest. As a matter of fact, if there were time, the orchestra could spend a month most profitably in the middle West, for requests for concerts from other points are very numerous and insistent. It seems as if the large supply of orchestral music that part of the country has had in recent years has only made it more anxious to hear Boston's great orchestra.

Mr. Gericke is still in Maine, but is expected back shortly, when full announcements of his plans for the coming season will be made. Professor Hess has been in town for some weeks, having brought his family from Germany and taken a house here. He will be the soloist on the Western tour. Trans. Sept. 14, 1905

The First Symphony Concert—Other Local

Trans. Announcements Oct. 7, 1905

Next Friday and Saturday our musical season begins, with the first rehearsal and the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra. It returns tomorrow from its tour of a few cities in Canada and the Middle West for the usual rehearsals next week. Meantime we at home have been buying our seats for the new series of concerts, and the financial results—the final test after all—shows that our interest in the band and its work and in the music that it plays is as keen as ever. In some respects Mr. Gericke seemed an abler and warmer conductor last year than he ever did before. There is no reason to expect less of him in the new season. No conductor and no orchestra in America so often makes the classics that they play seem alive again. One such is the symphony for the first programme—Beethoven's second. The concerts begin with Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," and for new music, there is one of the "tone poems" that Dvorak wrote in his last years, few of which have been played in America. "Die Waldtaube"—"The Forest Dove"—is the title. Louise Homer, the excellent alto of the Metropolitan Opera House, will be the singer. Her numbers are the page's familiar air from Wagner's "Rienzi" and Liszt's "Lorelei" in its orchestral setting.

NEW SYMPHONY OFFERINGS.

It is an interesting list of novelties which Mr. Gericke has selected for the coming season of the Boston symphony orchestra in this city. Fifteen of the works on the list are absolutely new to Boston—most of them absolutely new to America—and the sixteenth has never before been played at a symphony concert.

The list includes two symphonies. One is by Gustav Mahler, who shares with Richard Strauss the interest of musical connoisseurs on the continent. The director of the Imperial opera in Vienna and the conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts, he ranks as one of the very few great musical conductors of the world. It is only in comparatively recent years that he has turned his attention to composing, but in that time he has written many works (the symphony for the Boston season being his fifth) and has caused almost as great a discussion among the cognoscenti as Strauss. Many profess to find in him the greatest living composer. This symphony has never been played in America.

The other symphony is by a young Englishman, Amherst Webber, known to the American public chiefly through some of his very interesting songs. This symphony, which is new, will undoubtedly be listened to with greatest interest.

Another Englishman on the list is Sir Edward Elgar. He will be represented by a new overture entitled "In the South" and by two short pieces, entitled respectively "Chanson de Nuit" and "Chanson de Matin."

America will be represented by two men, both of them, to all intents and purposes Bostonians. Mr. John K. Paine's prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes will be played for the first time at these concerts. Frederick S. Converse, who was represented on last year's program, will this year have a ballade for baritone and orchestra.

Three novelties are by men no longer living, Smetana, whose overture to "Libussa" will be played; Dvorak, whose symphonic poem "Die Waldtaube" will have a first hearing here, and Cesar Franck, who will be represented by a work entitled "Psyche."

Other novelties will be a new symphonic poem by the Russian Glazounov entitled "Le Kremlin," a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe entitled "Odysseus Ausfahrt und Schiffbruch," an overture called "Lustspiel" and a suite called "Geharnischte," by Busoni; an overture by Max Schilling called "Der Pfeifertag," and an overture by Eugene d'Harcourt called "Le tasse."

The annual auction sale of seats for the season will open at Symphony hall tomorrow morning at 10, when the $12 seats for the 24 public rehearsals will be sold. Tuesday at the same hour the $7.50 seats for Friday afternoons will be placed on sale. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold beginning at 10 on Thursday, and the $7.50 seats at the same hour on Friday.  Globe Oct. 1, 1905

In the language of the slangy, the Symphony season this year bids fair to be a D'Indy.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The auction sale of seats for the Symphony concerts will be held on Oct. 2, 3, 4 and 5. On the first day the $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold, and on the second the $7.50 seats. On Thursday, the 4th, the $12 seats for the concerts will be auctioned off, and on Friday the $7.50 seats for the concerts. The usual rules will prevail. Bids will be accepted for seats in regular order only, and not for choice. No more than four seats will be sold on one bid. As usual there will be 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts. Superstition is braved in setting the first public rehearsal for Friday, Oct. 13. The first concert will be on the following night.

Few changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra since last year. Mr. Heinrich Warnke of Munich will take the place of Mr. Krasselt as principal 'cellist. There will also be a new first bassoon in Mr. Peter Sadony, and Mr. Hackebarth, the first horn, will have a colleague in Mr. Max Hess, who comes from Munich.

Mr. Warnke comes to this country with the highest recommendations, supported by a successful career. He is regarded as one of the leading 'cellists of Germany. For the past eight years he has been the principal 'cellist of the Kalm orchestra in Munich, and before that time he held similar positions in Baden Baden, Homburg and Hamburg. Within the last year he has been twice invited to become the principal 'cellist of the Berlin Philharmonic and once to take the same place in the Vienna Philharmonic. He is a pupil of Klengel and is about 40 years old. He was the first teacher of Mr. Krasselt.

Mr. Sadony, the new first bassoon, is regarded as a great acquisition. He comes from Cologne, where for many years he has been the first bassoon in that city and teacher of that instrument in the conservatory. He has the reputation of being the best bassoonist in Germany, and three years ago Hans Richter offered him great inducements to go to Manchester, Eng., where Richter is the conductor.

In engaging Mr. Max Hess, the new first horn, there is no intention on the part of the management to supplant Mr. Hackebarth, whose work with the orchestra is so highly and so justly valued. It is merely another step in the general policy to double the principal wind instruments. The orchestra has always been confronted with the possibility of something happening to Mr. Hackebarth, in which event it would be placed in a most embarrassing position. It was with this in view that Mr. Hess has been engaged. He is a young man, about 27, and most of his career has been spent in the Kalm orchestra. He brings with him a high reputation, and will doubtless be able to relieve Mr. Hackebarth of some of the burden of his work.

ist:

BARLEBEN.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Opening of Symphony Season This Week.

English Grand Opera Soon to Be Given at the Tremont.

Kneisel Quartet Concerts— Other Announcements.

Next Friday and Saturday bring the opening performances of the Symphony orchestra, and the serious musical season begins. The prospects for the coming winter are unusually bright. The auction sales of seats during the past week were the most successful in many years. The number of patrons who attended was very large, the bidding was always brisk, and the prices brought by the seats, both for the public rehearsals and the concerts, showed a substantial increase over those of last year. And yet the seats went in a fashion to allow all classes to secure places without making sacrifices. The orchestra seems to be more firmly established than ever in the affection and the esteem of the Boston musical public.

Boston is but an illustration of the favor in which the orchestra is held elsewhere. Every indication seems to point to a very increased patronage in New York, where the usual 10 concerts will be given. Not only has the number of renewals by last year's subscribers for both series been unusually large, but the number of inquiries which have been received indicate that in the matter of new subscribers all previous records will be broken. In Philadelphia, where only five concerts will be given instead of 10, crowded houses are already assured, and the same is true of Baltimore and Brooklyn. As for Washington, where a series of five concerts will be given for the first time in seven years, the New National theatre, where the concerts will be given, is almost sold out by subscription.

During the past week the orchestra has been giving concerts in Canada and the middle west with marked success.

financial as well as artistic, the tour having proved beyond peradventure that the musical people of those sections are more than eager to hear the band. Seventy-five men under Mr. Gericke were taken. They return this afternoon from Rochester where their sixth and last concert was given last evening.

It is interesting to note that the public rehearsal on next Friday afternoon will be the 1192d concert the orchestra has given in Boston since its organization in 1881. The soloist on this occasion and on Saturday evening will be Mme Louise Homer of the Conried metropolitan opera company. Mme Homer needs no introduction to Boston where for the past four or five years she has been one of the most popular singers that visit this city.

The program is as follows:

Overture, In the Spring.....Goldmark
Aria Gerechter Gott, from Rienzi.....Wagner
Die Waldbaue.....Dvorak
(First time).
Lorelei.....Liszt
Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Beethoven
Soloist, Mme Louise Homer.

BOSTON SYMPHONY QUARTET.

The Boston Symphony quartet enters on its second season with the brightest of prospects. The work done by this organization last year left an abiding impression, and the success made it certain that there was a large place for it to fill in the eastern musical season.

Instead of Mr. Krasselt, the cellist, will be Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the new principal cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He has made an enviable name in Europe as a chamber music player. The other members will be Messrs. Willy Hess, concert master of the Boston Symphony and leader of the quartet; Otto Roth, second violin, and E. Ferir, viola.

During the past summer, which he spent in Europe, Mr. Hess secured music that promises to be interesting. Among these works are a new string quartet by Sinding in A minor, op. 70; a quintet for strings and flute in D major by Jan Brandt Buys; a concert etude for string quartet, op. 5, by L. Sinigaglia; a piano quartet in C minor, by Gabriel Faure, and a sextet for strings in F minor, by Hans Koessler. Buys is a Dutchman, about 40 years old. He has written much choral music, and has taught in the conservatories of Cologne, Leipzig, Amsterdam and Rotterdam. Sinigaglia is a Russian of Italian parentage. A pupil of Max Bruch, he is between 35 and 40 years old, and has composed music in all forms, among other things a successful violin concerto. Koessler, a resident of Budapest, was the teacher of Dohnanyi. A set of orchestral variations by Koessler has been played here by the Symphony orchestra. Oct. 1905

Novelties for the Symphony Season

Those patrons of the Symphony Concerts who are on the lookout for new sensations in music are likely to have their taste gratified during the coming winter, since Mr. Gericke has chosen an unusually interesting series of novelties to be played during the season. Three of the composers are very familiar to the Boston public—Smetana, Dvorak and Franck—and any unknown works from their hands are certain of welcome.

The Smetana work is an overture to his opera "Libussa." So far as can be learned, it has never been played in America. The opera itself is unknown outside of Bohemia, where all of his works for the stage are performed from time to time. The overture is described as in the best style of the composer of "The Sold Bride." Dvorak is to be represented by a symphonic poem called "Die Waldbaue." This work is of comparatively recent date, and in that time has won a very considerable popularity in Continental music halls. It is practically new to America, as its only performances were at some rather obscure popular concerts in New York several summers ago. "Psyche," by César Franck, is a suite which shows this ordinarily serious composer in a most agreeable light.

Two symphonies new to Boston and new to America will be played. One is by Gustav Mahler, the fifth in his series, and the other is by a young Englishman, Amherst Webber. It is rather curious that so little of Mahler's work is known in this country, considering the amount of discussion he has caused. Mahler is one of the most interesting figures in modern music. As an operatic conductor there is probably no man living who is his equal, for he combines with the musicianly qualities necessary for such work an exceptional knowledge of the stage. He has been principal conductor and director of the Imperial Opera in Vienna, and as a concert conductor he stands high. He is now the conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts. His compositions have of late years been quite generally played in Europe. Some of them are stupendous in size, demanding a greater number of performers than even those of Strauss, and their intense modernity, while different from Strauss's has kept discussion continually active.

The other symphony, in E major, by Amherst Webber, has never been played in this country. Mr. Webber is known personally to many Americans through his association some years ago with the de Reszke brothers, whose secretary and accompanist he was. He is a man who gave up considerable prospects in order to pursue his musical studies and adopt music as a profession. Some very interesting songs are about all America knows of his music, but in England he is regarded as a musician of more than ordinary promise. Another Englishman on the list is Sir Edward Elgar. He will be represented by an overture new to America entitled "In the South," and by two shorter pieces entitled "Chanson de Nuit" and "Chanson de Matin."

Two American, and really Bostonian names are included, those of Professor Paine of Harvard University and Mr. Frederick S. Converse. Professor Paine's prelude to "The Frogs" of Aristophanes is not new to Boston, but has never been played at the Symphony concerts. Mr. Converse will be represented by a new ballade for baritone and orchestra.

Other novelties are a symphonic poem by the Russian, Glazounov, entitled "Le Kremlin"; a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe, entitled "Odysseus Ausfahrt und Schiffbruch"; two works by Busoni, a "Lustspiel" overture and "Geharnischte" suite; an overture by Max Schilling entitled "Der Pfeffertag"; and an overture by the Frenchman Eugene d'Harcourt called "Le Tasse."

Undoubtedly some very interesting novelties will be presented by M. Vincent d'Indy, for his programmes are expected to be entirely of modern French music.

The regular sale by auction for the series of twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts will open on Monday morning at ten o'clock, continuing on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday. Trans. Oct. 30, 1905

This week, for the first time, our Symphony Orchestra is making a short tour before it begins its regular concerts here. Sunday evening Mr. Gericke and seventy-five of the men left Boston for Montreal, and last night they gave the first concert there that the band has ever given in Canada. Tonight they are playing in Toronto, and tomorrow night in Buffalo. Thursday they go to Detroit, Friday to Cleveland, and Saturday to Rochester. Next Sunday they will be at home again. Willy Hess, the first violin, will be the soloist at each of the concerts. It is fifteen years, by the way, since the orchestra has travelled west of Albany. Trans. Oct. 3, 1905

—The sale of tickets for the rehearsals and concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra which begins tomorrow at Symphony hall, is the all-important event in the musical world, not only of Boston and of its suburbs, but of cities as far as Springfield and Worcester. The superlative excellence of this organization is recognized abroad as well as at home, and the splendid encomiums it receives in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore are well merited. At the earnest solicitation of Washington residents the concerts there are to be resumed. Mr. Gericke will continue as conductor, Mr. Hess as concert master and the places of some of the men who left last year have been filled with the best available talent in Europe, where Mr. Hess has been during the summer. Mme Homer will be the soloist at the first concert as she was last year. The orchestra numbers nearly 100 performers. ycobe Oct. 1, 1905

SYMPHONY SALE OF SEATS BEGINS

Only $12 Tickets for 24 Rehearsals
Sold Today—Tomorrow Come the $7.50 Seats.

Journal — Oct. 2, 1905

This morning begins the annual auction sale of seats for the season of Symphony concerts. The sale will take place in Symphony Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock. Only the $12 seats for the twenty-four public rehearsals will be sold today. Tomorrow the $7.50 seats will be sold. There will be no sale on Wednesday, but on Thursday the $12 seats for the twenty-four concerts will be sold and on Friday the $7.50.

Bids will be accepted for seats in the regular order only, and not for choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, else they will be immediately resold.

Last evening the orchestra, seventy-five strong, left for Montreal, where they give the first concert of the western tour tonight. They will travel in three Pullmans and carry one baggage car. Tomorrow night a concert will be given in Toronto, then come in order, Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland and Rochester. The prospects are very bright for "capacity" houses everywhere. A vast amount of interest has been aroused in the cities to be visited. The orchestra has never played in Canada and it is the first time in over twelve years they have played in the other cities.

The orchestra will return on next Sunday and rehearsals will at once begin for the Boston season, which opens Friday afternoon, Oct. 13. Mr. Gericke, of course, accompanies the orchestra as conductor and Professor Willy Hess will be the solo artist.

SEAT SALE FOR SYMPHONY.

Auction Will Begin This Morning—
Orchestra off for its

Herald — Oct. 2, 1905
Canadian Tour.

This morning the annual auction sale of seats for the season of Symphony concerts will begin. The sale will take place in Symphony Hall beginning at 10 o'clock. Only the $12 seats for the 24 public rehearsals will be sold today. Tomorrow the $7.50 seats will be sold. There will be no sale on Wednesday, but on Thursday the $12 seats for the 24 concerts will be sold, and on Friday the $7.50 seats.

Bids will be accepted for seats in the regular order only, and not for choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, else they will be immediately resold.

Last evening the orchestra, 75 strong, left for Montreal, where they give the first concert of the western tour tonight. Tomorrow night a concert will be given in Toronto, then come in order Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland and Rochester. The orchestra has never played in Canada, and it is the first time in over 12 years that they have played in the other cities.

The orchestra will return on next Sunday and rehearsals will at once begin for the Boston season, which will open on Friday afternoon, Oct. 13.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SALE

Auction of Seats for the Public Rehearsals Will Begin This Morning —Lively Bidding Predicted.

This morning begins the annual auction sale of seats for the season of Symphony concerts. The sale will take place in Symphony hall, beginning at 10 o'clock. Only the $12 seats for the 24 public rehearsals will be sold today. Tomorrow the $7.50 seats will be sold. There will be no sale on Wednesday, but on Thursday the $12 seats for the 24 concerts will be sold, and on Friday the $7.50.

Bids will be accepted for seats in the regular order only, and not for choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, else they will be immediately resold.

Last evening the orchestra left for Montreal where they give the first concert of the western tour tonight. They will travel in three Pullmans and carry one baggage car. Tomorrow night a concert will be given in Toronto, then come in order, Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland and Rochester. The prospects are very bright for "capacity" houses everywhere. A vast amount of interest has been aroused in the cities which are to be visited. The orchestra has never played in Canada and it is the first time in over 12 years that they have played in the other cities.

The orchestra will return on next Sunday and rehearsals will at once begin for the Boston season, which opens on Friday afternoon, Oct. 13. Mr. Gericke, of course, accompanies the orchestra as conductor, and Prof Willy Hess will be the solo artist.

HIGHEST PREMIUM $91

Auction Sale of Seats for the Rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Held
This Morning Trans. Oct. 2, 1905

A premium of $91 takes the record for the auction of seats for the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place, beginning at ten o'clock this morning. The people gathered in Symphony Hall at that time numbered more than marked the opening of the sales a year ago, it was noticed, and there were, as usual, more ladies by far than men in the throng.

Walter Jackson is again the auctioneer, just as he has been for several years. Today's sale was given over to disposal of the $12 seats for the series of Friday afternoon rehearsals. These included all the seats on the floor from row A to row JJ, both inclusive, as well as all of the side seats in the first balcony and those in the first four rows in the rear of this balcony. In all other parts of the hall the seats are $7.50. The first sale today, of seats 1 and 2 in the first row, showed a premium of $13.50 paid, and soon the sale was going on so briskly, led by a number of ticket brokers in the front row and elsewhere, that premiums became on the average much higher than those paid last year, to go back no further. There was a sale at $12, to be sure, but this was soon lost sight of in higher prices.

There was keen interest right along from the opening, but it was after three or four rows had been sold that the sale began to take on special activity and seats were disposed of quickly, with little hesitation on the part of auctioneer or buyers. In row C as high as $38 was paid, and in row D $47 was the top price, as against $28 in row B, for about the same location. Bids in E started at $10, with a first sale at $14, and after sales at $29 premium, the bids started at $20 and later at $25. The highest in this row, a favorite place, was $51, for centre end seats. Most of this row sold for above $30 premiums. In row F, beginning with a $17 bid, sales reached $37 as the highest point. While this row was on sale two ladies sitting a few rows back from the stage in the centre of the hall were keenly alive to the bids, for here was their choice of location. They were friends and together, yet the auctioneer could not have known this, evidently, for these two women bid against each other dollar by dollar, each raising the other's previous bid from $27 or $28 to $37, which they paid for their two seats. They went together to settle with Mr. Ellis for their purchase, all unconscious that they had paid far more than they need to have done, in all probability.

At about this stage of the sale, brokers frequently secured at a moderate premium, comparatively, the end single seat on the extreme left of the hall, and as a bid permitted taking four seats, they would then secure at the same cheap moderate premium the first three seats on the extreme right of the hall, in the following row. seats which, unless bought under these conditions, usually brought higher prices. In row G prices ranged from $23.50 to $61 for a single end seat, centre, which was the highest figure paid up to that point, a sale followed immediately by others at $50, $40 and gradually down to $25 in this row.

Succeeding sales in rows H, I, J, K and L showed premiums ranging between $24 and $61, the higher figure being the premium on a single seat, an end one in K, for which the bidding was spirited. Its companion seat brought $60, and seats next in order sold for $40. There was a bit of exciting competition in row M, which began at $28 for the first seats and in which four seats, none of which was an end one, brought a premium of $74 each, the same buyer paying $56 for choice of the next following seats.

When a sale at $81 was made for the middle of row N, four seats going for that price, there was general interest, especially as the next seats in order brought only $41. Later, $61 in this row was reached. In row O two seats also sold for $81 and one at $80, while in Q four centre seats, one an end one, brought the highest price of the morning, $91 premium. Last year the highest premium of the opening sale was $95. At 1.15 o'clock a recess for luncheon was declared.

All things considered, the average today seemed far higher than that reached last year, in the matter of premiums. In many rows where a year ago many seats sold at prices ranging between $10 and $20 premium, these same seats this year sold for above $20 and in many instances above $30 premium.

When the sale opened in the afternoon there were more people on hand than at the morning sale. The sale began in row R and the prices held up pretty well. For several seats back the premiums were between $30 and $40, occasionally going as high as $50; but in the U and V rows the figure was between $20 and $30.

SYMPHONY SEATS GO AT HIGH PRICES

Herald — Oct. 2, 1905
General Average of Prices for Friday Afternoon Concerts
Exceed Last Year by Substantial Figure.

HIGHEST PREMIUM OF DAY WAS $91

At the Afternoon Session Seat in Row T Went at Premium of $59—Prices Higher Than Last Year.

Symphony Hall was well filled all day yesterday, when the seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Symphony orchestra were placed at auction by Mr. Walter Jackson.

While sensational features such as have distinguished former occasions were lacking, the general average of premiums exceeded that of past years by a substantial figure. This was particularly true of those seats beyond the centre of the hall, for when they were offered at the afternoon session there appeared no diminution of bidding, which held strong until the last seat had been sold.

The bidding prices were supplementary to the regular assessment of $12 for each ticket, and during a spirited contest for four seats next the centre aisle in row 2 the premium reached the high mark of the day at $91.

This was $10 higher than the next highest bid of the day, and only $4 lower than the record of last year. There were some amusing incidents connected with the bidding, which arose through the unfamiliarity of ladies with such affairs. Two young ladies who were seated midway in the hall, after several ineffectual attempts to secure recognition, finally repaired to different parts of the hall.

One of them bid $28, and at the same moment the other was recognized by the auctioneer, with a bid of $29. Without being aware of the identity of the other bidder, but determined to secure seats, the two women very quickly had the centre of the stage. One of them finally dropped out, and her competitor issued triumphant with a bid of $48.

"How many?" asked the auctioneer. "Two," returned the successful bidder, and then rushing across the hall she notified her friend of the successful termination of the competition.

Herrick's Ticket Agency was a factor in nearly every bid.

The aisle seats throughout the hall were generally obtained by agencies, while individuals were forced to accept the inner seats of the rows.

Seats in the centre of the hall generally netted high premiums and were at all times eagerly sought, four seats in the centre of L bringing $81 each. The two centre seats in O netted a similar premium, while the next seat, No. 18, in the same row, brought $80. The four centre seats in M were sold for a premium of $74 each.

Some other fancy prices for seats near the stage were: $63.50 premium each for two centre aisle seats in J, Nos. 18 and 19; $59 for 17 in the same row. No. 18 in G brought $61; No. 17 in J, brought $59; Nos. 19 and 20 in D sold for $47 premium each; Nos. 19 to 22 in G brought an even $50 premium.

In I seats 18 to 22, near the aisle, netted a premium of $56 each. The first five rows, as usual, proved only moderately attractive, the best seat in A bringing only $28. Manager Mudgett, however, was highly pleased to note a better average on these seats than of late years. One seat in D, No. 19, brought a premium of $47.

At the afternoon session seat 17, on the centre aisle, in row T secured a premium of $59; 18 and 19 of the same row brought $44. In U No. 6 brought $48, 18 brought $45, and 17 and 18 each netted $47. The double-lettered rows also brought good prices.

The highest premium last year was $95, in 1908 $77, and in 1902 $305, on a very determined contest for two seats. Today balcony seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals will be sold at auction, and on Thursday the auction sale of regular $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will take place.

SYMPHONY SEATS BRING RECORD PRICES

Premium of $91 Paid for Single Seat for Public Rehearsals—Auctioneer Collapses During Bidding.
Sale Continues Today.

The auction sale of the $12 tickets for the twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday in Symphony Hall. The bidding throughout the day was spirited, and, on the whole, the prices of the seats jumped 25 per cent. higher than those of last year. The highest sum paid for a single seat was $91 premium, bid by a ticket agent for each of the four aisle seats in row Q.

There were several hundred of Boston's elite seated in the hall when Auctioneer Walter Johnson began the sale in the morning. No coaxing or persuasion on the part of the auctioneer was necessary to get bidders for the much-coveted seats. The offers were shouted so quick and fast that Jackson had to be on his guard every second. Handsomely gowned women, who had selected favorite seats from the printed diagram, were on hand to battle against speculators and other masculine bidders.

Auctioneer Overcome.

In the afternoon Auctioneer John Leonard, a veteran in this work, took up the exhausting job. On account of the very fast bidding and the close concentration attendant upon the sale Mr. Leonard was overcome with an attack of vertigo at about 5.30. He had just finished a sale when an officer standing near the platform saw him totter. The policeman, with two or three clerks, jumped to Leonard's side in time to catch him. The women in the hall became greatly excited over the event, and could not be induced to take their seats again until it was learned that Mr. Leonard had recovered from the attack of faintness.

The best prices were received for a block of seats running from row E to row R in the center section. In every case the price bid was added to the regular subscription of $12. In row O seats were sold for $81 premium; in row N they brought a like price, and in row M they were knocked down for $74. Two seats in H brought $63.50. One in G went for $61, one in J for $59 and one in I for $56.

Brokers Out in Force.

Ticket brokers were out in force. Herrick is said to have purchased $20,000 worth of seats for customers and on his own account. C. J. Connelly reports that his purchases were nearly twice those of last season. The latter broker bought tickets for ex-Attorney General Pillsbury, United States District Attorney Adams, Mrs. E. C. Swift of Pride's Crossing, G. B. Inches of North Grafton, Thomas Jefferson Coolidge of Beacon street, Mrs. M. A. Biglow, Hotel Victoria; Mrs. Ames, wife of the ex-governor; Dana Estes and G. M. Preston. The Thayers, Ames, Searses, Phillipses, Wendalls, Higginsons and Grews were all represented by their agents and got a choice selection of seats.

Today at 10 A. M. the sale of the $7.50 seats for Fridays will be held. Thursday at the same hour will begin the sale of the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts. Friday morning the sale of the $7.50 seats for Saturday evening concerts will begin.

PREMIUMS AVERAGE HIGH

Auction Sale of the $7.50 Seats for Symphony Rehearsals Shows Advance Over Last Season—Highest Premium Was
$23.50

Today's sale of the $7.50 seats at the Friday afternoon Symphony Rehearsals was most encouraging from the start, for the premiums averaged several dollars higher than last year, when the prices were an advance on what had prevailed for the two previous seasons. If the present prices therefore keep up to the same high average for the Saturday evening concerts, the net results in premiums will show a handsome figure.

The seats sold this forenoon included the eight last full rows and a fraction of a row on the floor, and the last four rows and a fraction of a row also in the first balcony. The highest price secured by Auctioneer Jackson was $23.50, at which several seats were disposed of in row KK. This premium stands out well as against $20 last year. Other seats were sold for $22.50, and $21, while a few single seats were bid in at $19. In row LL pretty nearly the same prices ruled, though some single places went for $17. In the third row, MM, three seats at the extreme right were disposed of for $15. In the same row toward the centre single seats brought $16 and $17, while $18, the highest price for any seat in this row, was paid by a man who evidently was bent on having the end place in the left centre aisle. In the left section most of the seats went for $16.50 each. In row NN $17.50 was the highest price received, and $15.50 the lowest. In row OO there was almost a uniform price of $14.50 paid. When row PP was reached the price jumped to $18.50, which was paid for two seats at the right. The very next single seat was procured for $13, the lowest price in the row. In row QQ the prices ranged from $15 to $12.50, while in RR, the last full row, the prices were kept within the narrow limits of $13.50 and $12.50. In the broken row, of which there are six seats on each side, and which are the very farthest away from the stage, the prices were but little less—$12 being the highest, and $10.50 the lowest.

In the balcony the choicest of the $7.50 seats brought almost as much as did the floor seats. The sum of $15 was paid for the first two sittings in row E, at the extreme right. This price continued to improve as the seats more toward the centre were offered until finally $22 was paid first for two seats, and then for one. Strangely enough, the end seats at the extreme left brought several dollars more than those at the extreme right of the same aisle. In the next row, F, the same high figure of $22 was paid for a pair of seats near the centre, while the lowest price for any seat in the row brought only $4 less. The prices for seats in the remaining rows showed little disposition to weaken and when the very back seats were reached even these brought from $15.50 to $17.50 premium.

The auction sale will be continued on Thursday and Friday mornings at Symphony Hall. At the former sale the $12 seats for Saturday nights will be disposed of, while Friday's session will be devoted to the $7.50 seats.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

TWO SEATS, floor, row MM. $25 each. Address O.P.L., Boston Transcript.
2t(A): 07

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

TWO SEATS, floor, row MM. $25 each. Address O.P.L., Boston Transcript.
2t(A): 07

SYMPHONY PRICES RANGE HIGH

Auction Sale of Second Balcony Seats Brings as High as $15.50

Several surprises were in store this morning for the good-sized audience of men and women at Symphony Hall, who thought they were going to get the $7.50 seats for the Saturday night concerts at low prices. While the $12 seats did not bring any fancy prices yesterday those of this morning in a relative sense did. This was especially true of the second balcony seats, which in some cases brought surprisingly high prices.

The first seats sold were those at the rear of the floor. The highest price which Auctioneer Jackson was able to get was $10, and from that figure the price was slowly shaded down with an occasional splurge over the previously quoted selling price. A number of seats were disposed of for $9, still more for $8, while those at the extreme rear brought a trifle less. When the rear seats in the first balcony were put up prices showed little inclination to recede, and the average price was pretty close to the premiums obtained for the $7.50 floor seats.

Expectancy was plainly written on the faces of a large part of the audience when the seats in the second balcony nearest the stage on the right were put up. The first two were sold for $8 each. Almost the very next places brought the surprising sum of $15.50 and on both sides of the hall this price was obtained in two other instances. Many seats in the front row brought $12, $11 and $10, and when it came to disposing of the rear of the second balcony the prices slowly yielded until finally, as the last two or three rows were reached, the prices received were $6, $5 and $4.

It was noticeable throughout the sale that a great many persons bought single seats. In some cases a block of four places would be taken and several couples had to be content with seats one across the aisle from the other. When the entire receipts are figured out from the four auction sales it is probable that the aggregate amount received will show a marked increase over last year, when the prices were considered in advance of what had been received during the two preceding seasons.

SYMPHONY SEATS LESS.

Seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra were placed on sale yesterday morning in Symphony Hall. Bidders were few. The best bid was $32.50 for four seats in the middle of row L. The demand appeared to be waning, and in the afternoon sale many seats were picked up at nominal figures. Herald Oct. 6, 1905

BOSTON'S 505.

The Aristocracy of Music as Seen on the Steps of Symphony Hall.

BOSTON, Sept. 23.—Boston's 505 is not the aristocracy of the Blue Book, but of music—the willing devotees who count it all joy to stand on the steps of Symphony Hall through the long Friday mornings from October to April, in fair weather or in foul, in driving storms of rain, hail and snow, or breathing in clouds of dust offered by the east wind, in order that they may gain access to the 505 seats of the upper balcony and listen to the Friday afternoon rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It does not need a great deal of money to belong to this aristocracy, but it takes much time. Twenty-five cents is the admission fee, but in order to be sure that you will not be outside the 505 limit you must be at the hall early in the morning, and the final chord of the great symphony will not die away till after 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

There are two ladies who have been at the head of the line at nearly if not quite every rehearsal for three or four seasons. They refuse to divulge the earliest hour when they have taken their places, but it is certain that on special occasions, when Melba was going to sing, for instance, they have been standing on the cold stone steps in zero weather before the sun could disentangle himself from the spires and chimneys of the city.

Next to the leaders the regulars soon begin to assemble, people who mean to attend every rehearsal, and who try to get near the head of the line so that they can secure a particular seat, where they fancy the effect of the music is just a shade better than it is anywhere else.

There is the Russian, called so not because he is a Russian, but because he looks like one, who smokes innumerable cigars and gives forth interminable musical criticism from 9 o'clock till 1. Then there is the weepy man, who gets this nickname because the fountain of his tears is sure to overflow whenever there is a specially beautiful melody or deep and tender harmony in the music. To tell the truth, he isn't the only one of that kind in the line, but he cannot conceal his feelings so well as others.

The great majority of the 505 are women. They come singly and in flocks, they are of all ages, and they have a more pronounced air of business, in this matter at least, than the men.

They bring books to read, they bring cushions and patent folding camp stools to sit on, they bring luncheons to eat, some of them, and all of them bring dark slabs of sweet chocolate. The mind staggers in the effort to compute the amount of sweet chocolate consumed in a single symphony season upon the steps of Symphony Hall.

Here come middle aged ladies, with sweet faces and pretty gray hair, and when they have envied themselves to their frail looking camp stools they will take out their lace or their knitting, and work and converse, calmly oblivious of all spectators. Here comes, too, one old lady, too feeble to keep in the line, and all rules are broken for her. She is allowed to have a seat, and there is a legend that Melba once spoke to the old lady and gave her a flower. And it sometimes happens that one of Boston's 400 joins the 505 on the steps of Symphony Hall. For she is determined to hear the symphony, and if there is no ticket to be had at any price for the floor or the first balcony, she drives up to the curb in her elegant carriage, with coachman and footman, and takes her place in the line, with a bright new quarter tucked in her glove.

She will even take her music free, if she can't get it by paying for it. A few years ago, when Carl Armbruster gave his lectures on Wagner, admission by free ticket only, in the Lowell Institute courses, members of the most distinguished Boston families were willing to sit for hours on the hard floor of the armory waiting for a ticket.

It is no small task for the attendants maintain the line until the doors are opened. Some do not understand the regulations and others are ready to evade them if they can.

To avoid all speculation, no one is allowed to change place, or to hold a place for another. On every rehearsal day some one is bitterly disappointed to find that he cannot keep a place for a friend, and that they must go to the tail end of the line together.

As 1 o'clock draws near the scene grows more animated. Every trolley brings its contribution of belated music lovers, who rush to the end of the line, hoping that they may still be counted among the 505.

Groups of conservatory girls flutter half-shrieking down the avenue, risking their chance of a seat rather than to stand long in line. Often the line extends hopelessly on along the Brookline road, containing hundreds who cannot possibly gain admission.

Promptly at 1 o'clock the door is opened and you must have your quarter ready. A quarter, mind you, not two dimes and a nickel, nor a dollar, nor anything that requires change. Down they go jingling into a burlap bag, and a man with a ticker clicks off the numbers until 505 have entered, and the door of hope is closed for that day.

There is some hustling for seats, but not much, for the crowd can enter only one by one, and there is not a very poor seat in the balcony. It is a unique sight when the balcony is packed and not a person in any other part of the great hall.

An hour and a half more the undaunted 505 must wait before those who have paid high prices begin to pour in, and the orchestra plays the tune which the Shah of Persia is said to have enjoyed so much; that is, they tune up. But when Mr. Gericke at last takes his place, lifts his baton, and, it may be, the first notes of the immortal Fifth Symphony pulse forth, then the 505 are forgetful of all else till it is over, and they fare homeward breathing deep with ecstasy.

THE SYMPHONY.

A velvet flute note fell down pleasantly
Upon the bosom of that harmony,
And sailed and sailed incessantly,
As if a petal from a wild-rose mown
Had fluttered down upon that pool of tone
And boatwise dropped o' the convex side
And floated down the glassy tide
And clarified and glorified
The solemn spaces where the shadows bide.

From the warm concave of that fluted
note
Somewhat, half song, half odor, forth
did float,
As if a rose might somehow be a throat:
When Nature from her far-off glen
Flutes her soft messages to men,
The flute can say them o'er again;
Yea, Nature, singing sweet and lone,
Breathes through life's strident polyphone
The flute-voice in the world of tone.
—Fragment by Sidney Lanier.

SYMPHONY

Tickets for Sale in all parts of the Hall, 40 State Street, Room 63, Telephone Main 4235-6.

(A) 4t:

04

SYMPHONY TICKETS

FOR SALE—Two first balcony, centre G, best offer over $33. Address F.H.C., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

TWO Seats in upper left balcony, front row, $25 each. Address D.W.K., Boston Transcript. TuTh(A): 010

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Saturdays, 2 fine seats, 5 and 6 H. $24 each Address M.J.D., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY

REHEARSAL TICKET, single seat, first balcony, centre, $35. Address L.F.B., Boston Transcript. 2t(A): 010

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Seats in AA-Centre; very desirable and reasonable. Address O.B.J., Boston Transcript. 2t(A): 011

MME. HOMER

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |            |   |
|------------|---|
| GOLDMARK.  | CONCERT OVERTURE, in A major, op. 36, "In the Spring."  |
| LISZT.     | SONG, "The Loreley," with Orchestral accompaniment.   |
| DVOŘÁK.    | SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Wood Dove." (after Erben's like-named Ballad), op. 110.(First time.)   |
| WAGNER.    | SCENE, "Just God!" and ARIA, "My Life fades in its Blossom," from "Rienzi," Act III, No. 9.   |
| BEETHOVEN. | SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 36.I. Adagio molto. — Allegro con brio.II. Larghetto.III. Scherzo: Allegro.—Trio.IV. Allegro molto. |

Soloist:

Mme. LOUISE HOMER.

MME. HOMER

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK.	CONCERT OVERTURE, in A major, op. 36. "In the Spring."
LISZT.	SONG, "The Loreley," with Orchestral accompaniment.
DVOŘAK.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Wood Dove." (after Eiben's like-named Ballad), op. 110. (First time.)
WAGNER.	SCENE, "Just God!" and ARIA, "My Life fades in its Blossom," from "Rienzi," Act III, No. 9.
BEETHOVEN	SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 36. I. Adagio molto. — Allegro con brio. II. Larghetto. III. Scherzo: Allegro. — Trio. IV. Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Mme. LOUISE HOMER.

This week's soloist will be Waldemar Lustschg, a pianist new to this country. The program will be as follows: Overture, "Libussa," Smetana, first time here; concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in a major, Liszt; "Death and Transfiguration," Richard Strauss; symphony No. 4, Tschalkowsky.

At the rehearsal and concert this coming week Waldemar Luetschg, a young Russian pianist now living in Chicago, will play Liszt's concerto in A major, No. 2, and this will be his first appearance in this country. The orchestral pieces will be the overture to Smetana's opera, "Libussa," Strauss' tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Tchaikowsky's symphony in F minor, No. 4.

Dvorak's "Wood Dove," given the first time in Boston, Saturday night by the filling of the foregoing libel, it is three times five notice to the is of transparent charm—the charm of beautiful and imaginative sound. In the overture it is the particular charm of fresh fancy, kindling quickly and freely into musical expression, and then flowing spontaneously, fully and smoothly forward with

And how well his men seconded him, and responded to him! They had hardly finished Goldmark's overture before most of us in the audience were sure that the orchestra was keeping all its familiar perfections. The symphonic poem and the symphony only confirmed our faith. Once more we heard the flawless fusion and the delicate adjustment of the instrumental groups. There was the old loveliness of tone—the subdued or the intense brilliancy of the strings, the liquid smoothness or the flowing richness of the wood winds, the clear tempered sonority of the brass. The band sung in broad melody, or it vibrated to quickly changing rhythms. Not a deli-

Oct 15 1905

The 25th season of Symphony concerts was opened in Symphony hall with the popular American singer, Mrs Louise Homer, as the solo artist. Her selections were the Liszt son, "The Loreley," and a scene and aria from Wagner's "Rienzi." The orchestral novelty was Dvorak's symphonic poem, "The Wood Dove," played here for the first time. The Goldmark overture, "In the Spring," and Beethoven's great Second Symphony completed the program. The assemblage was limited, as usual, to the seating capacity of the hall, hundreds were disappointed in not being able to gain admittance. Mr Gericke was received with the customary enthusiasm and the orchestra performed its duties in the manner so familiar to Bostonians that a standard which is considered unusual in other cities is now taken as a matter, of course, with our Symphony patrons. Mrs Homer's rich and powerful mezzo voice was at its best, the dramatic qualities showing to particular advantage in the aria from "Rienzi," the phrases of passion and despair being declaimed with splendid effect and without marring the beauty of her vocalism. She sang the score in German and showed that Wagner, even in very turbulent mood, could be made musical. The fantastic and tender "Loreley" was sung with appealing expression and sweetness of tone. Mrs Homer's reception was very hearty and she was recalled several times at the close of each number.

Goldmark's joyous "Spring" overture opened the program delightfully, and each charming episode and furtive theme was given as delicately and smoothly as one could desire. The "little rehearsal of the 'crack of doom'" went with the necessary fortissimo vigor, and the finale was a brilliant and harmonious finishing touch.

Dvorak's poem, "The Wood Dove," is a musical illustration of a lamenting young widow, who, after murdering her first husband, marries a jovial second. As they pass the grave of the first spouse the mourning song of the wild dove causes the woman to go mad and drown herself in a nearby stream. The composer has cleverly shown the various scenes in characteristic orchestration, which fits the story admirably as a rule, although lacking at times in suggesting its deep and tragic import. The treatment appeared to be rather simple, for there were no special difficulties in the score, and Mr Gericke's men had little or no trouble in making the interpretation pleasing. If it was void of dramatic strength the fault evidently was with the orchestra.

Last, but not least, was the beautiful Second Symphony by Beethoven, the gem of the program. This work showed the orchestra in its happiest vein, notably so in the legato melodies in the second and third movements, which were the perfection of ensemble playing.

This week's soloist will be Waldemar Lustschg, a pianist new to this country. The program will be as follows: Overture, "Libussa," Smetana, first time here; concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in a major, Liszt; "Death and Transfiguration," Richard Strauss; symphony No. 4, Tschalkowsky.

Sunday Post, Oct. 15/05. THE SYMPHONIES BEGIN

The 25th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was inaugurated last evening at Symphony Hall, the programme of the first concert being as follows:

Overture, "In the Spring".....Goldmark
Song, with orchestra, "The Loreley".....Liszt
Symphonic Poem, "The Wood Dove".....Dvorak
Scene and aria from "Rienzi".....Wagner
Symphony No. 2, in D.....Beethoven

Mrs. Louise Homer was the soloist. Mr. Gericke was warmly applauded when he appeared to direct the first number. The membership of the orchestra is nearly the same as before, the new members including Heinrich Warnke, first 'cellist; P. Sadoni, bassoon; Max Hess, first horn; also Boston's well-known and distinguished violinist, John C. Mullaly, who will be a most valued addition to the many artists composing the orchestra.

The opening number was Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring." Although from its title it might be considered out of season, the overture is one that can often be heard with pleasure, for it is in Goldmark's best mood, not only as to freedom and originality of thought, but as to the scoring, which is ideal in every way. In some ways the "In the Spring" overture surpasses such as the "Don Quixote" and "The Symphonic Poem," in the opening concert of its 25th season, proved disappointing in a degree. A symphonic poem, it is a piece of musical craftsmanship of a kind in which its composer several times failed to reach the heights he set himself to scale. In itself delightful music, it never told completely the tragic tale of which it was supposedly the musical expression, and what is music for if not to put into a more spiritual language the potential, it may be, sentiments and sympathies of mankind? Mr. Gericke, who conducted, gave a fine interpretation, painting his pictures finely and broadly, yet neglecting no detail. The orchestral work was excellent.

The opening number, Goldmark's concert overture in A major, "In the Spring," was, perhaps, the most enjoyable work of the evening. It was played tenderly with all its wealth of color emphasized. Its opulent, oriental beauty and melodic effects were given at their best.

Beethoven's familiar symphony No. 2, in D major, proved a delightful ending to the concert. Especially noticeable was its finale, in which thoughts expressed in previous movements recurred, a proceeding always sanctioned by Beethoven and endorsed by Brahms, notably in his C minor symphony. The second larghetto was taken at a little faster tempo than is common.

Mme. Louise Homer, the soloist, was heard at her best in Liszt's "The Loreley," with orchestral accompaniment. Her work showed growth in artistry since last she sang in Boston, a year ago. Her beautiful mezzo-contralto was also heard in the scene "Just God" and aria "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from the third act of Wagner's "Rienzi." This beautiful singer has strong dramatic powers.

FIR

Boston
Fame

Its 25th Season with Good
Programme.

Oct. 16. — 1905.

Dvorak's "Wood Dove," given the first time in Boston, Saturday night by

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BEGINS THE NEW SEASON

Mr. Gericke and the Band at Their Best—

Mme. Homer Sings and Dvorak's "Forest Dove" Serves for Novelty—Local Plans and Announcements—Max Reger, the New German Composer, Who Is "Halfback Redivivus"—Singers and Virtuosi

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert here of its twenty-fifth season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The chief newcomers to the band were Heinrich Warnke, first 'cello; Peter Sadony, first bassoon, and Max Hess, first horn. Mr. Gericke, who was welcomed with a ripple of friendly applause, conducted, and Mme. Louise Homer, the alto of the Metropolitan Opera House, was the singer. The novelty of the concert was Dvorak's symphonic poem, "The Forest Dove," played for the first time in Boston. The whole programme, which will be repeated tonight, ran as follows:

Goldmark: Concert overture, "In the Spring."
Liszt: Song, with orchestra, "The Loreley."
Dvorak: Symphonic poem, "The Forest Dove."
Wagner: Scene, "Just God!" and air, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from "Rienzi."
Beethoven: Symphony, No. 2.

As symphony concerts go, the afternoon could hardly have been gayer. Liszt's "toy" setting, as he rightly called it, of the ballad of the "Loreley" and the bit of musical melodrama out of Wagner's youthful "Rienzi" neither heightened nor subdued the gaiety. Mme. Homer a little chilled it, for her voice has often sounded clearer, smoother and more pliant. But she and her tunes were only more or less agreeable vocal interludes. The warm pleasure and the keen exhilaration of the concert lay in the purely orchestral numbers and in the way in which Mr. Gericke and his men played them. He could hardly have made a more ingratiating or a less taxing programme, and still one that showed his own and his band's virtuosity at their brightest. He was beginning the season gayly as one who, with still a touch of dignity, renews his youth.

Goldmark's "Spring" overture is not weighty with musical ideas, nor intricate and subtle in the development and the expression of them. No more is the symphonic poem of Dvorak's later years. No more even, in comparison with its successors, is Beethoven's second symphony. With all three the persistent and abiding impression is of transparent charm—the charm of beautiful and imaginative sound. In the overture it is the particular charm of fresh fancy, kindling quickly and freely into musical expression, and then flowing spontaneously, fully and smoothly forward with little meanderings by the way into tonal graces and instrumental ornaments. So many things touch a sensitive fancy like Goldmark's when he feels the incoming tide of spring. In the symphonic poem the particular charm is the charm of a homely tale told, with a little help from the programme book, in the finer and more exalted speech of music—told simply and sincerely, but warmly colored in the telling, bending responsively to every mood, and lighted with naively vivid orchestral details. Yet Dvorak, with all the many-shaded glow and tortuous glamour of his instrumental coloring could summon a child's soul. In the symphony the particular charm was richer, deeper, fuller-bodied—a nobler charm. Gay it still was and joyous, but the gaiety was more finely touched, and the joy the joy of him who sees the face of an ideal clear and close and rejoices boldly in the glimpse. "Believing Beethoven" someone called it.

It was easy in the exhilaration of listening yesterday afternoon to call the charm of all three abiding. Only the cooler blood of reflection brought the realization that not a little of their charm and our zest depended upon the sympathetic understanding of conductor and player, and upon the flowing perfection of their execution. There are orchestras and conductors under whose hands Goldmark's music is beginning to sound somewhat thin and faded. The "Forest Dove," unappreciated, might readily sound like the tame tale of a musing old man, long practiced in the art of instrumentation. It is easy to play some of Beethoven's symphonies like dead classics. It is much more difficult to play the second as though it had been written last summer. More and more Mr. Gericke is maturing a particularly individual talent for making the classics sound freshly alive. He did it last winter for Beethoven's fifth symphony. He did it yesterday for the second, and so to reanimate that is a far harder achievement. Nowhere did he try to inflate Dvorak's little musical tale into a swelling musical tragedy. Yet nowhere did he let the telling flag, or blunt or distort a single pretty detail. He gave us in the audience no time or wish to take thought whether Goldmark's music is beginning to wither. It went freshly, as in a spring air, and brightly, as in a spring sunshine.

And how well his men seconded him, and responded to him! They had hardly finished Goldmark's overture before most of us in the audience were sure that the orchestra was keeping all its familiar perfections. The symphonic poem and the symphony only confirmed our faith. Once more we heard the flawless fusion and the delicate adjustment of the instrumental groups. There was the old loveliness of tone—the subdued or the intense brilliance of the strings, the liquid smoothness or the flowing richness of the wood winds, the clear tempered sonority of the brass. The band sung in broad melody, or it vibrated to quickly changing rhythms. Not a delicate modulation, not an instrumental detail seemed to escape it, and overture and symphonic poem were full of both. The orchestra was like a single sensitive instrument played with unerring beauty. The charm of the three orchestral numbers was transparent, but it was conductor and band, as much as the composers, that made the transparency.

There is no reason to quarrel with Dvorak's symphonic poem as a bit of programme music. There is no need, even, to take it too seriously. It is by no means an inspired composition. It is a pleasantly entertaining one. A few lines on the programme spin the thread of the folk tale that was the composer's "literary" material. The music readily summons the moods of the telling. The widow follows her husband's funeral procession to the grave. Hers is a simple, wistful grief. Almost on the heels of the funeral train comes the eager, the bounding, wooer. To woo is to win, and the country folk make the wedding musically gay. But the dove, whither the soul of the good husband has flown, is plaintive on its forest tree, and remorse stirs in the wife. (She had poisoned her dead husband, says the programme, which is very obviously a fact that music may not impart.) She dies, and the composer gently mourns her. "T is true, 't is pity, and pity 't is, 't is true." The musical speech sounds as simple as the tale, though some of the transitions are full of half-concealed ingenuity. The changing moods are warmly colored. There are piquant details from the flickerings of the harp at the wedding feast to the wail of the wood winds as the dove coos its sorrow. It is all pleasant to hear—even when widow or dove is lamenting.

Mme. Homer was rather the disappointment of the afternoon. Her tones lacked pliancy, and her voice sounded woodenish. They lacked also smooth and rounded beauty as of one who forgets the art of song in the pursuit of "dramatic" effect. The richness of her alto voice seemed a little thick and viscous. There were the strivings for temperament, more than temperament itself. There were not always the signs of a finely controlling intelligence. She gave most pleasure in Wagner's declamatory scene. Liszt's "Loreley" at best is stiff, pale and finicking, and even the fragment from "Rienzi," beloved though it is of altos in concerts, needs the broken column and "the alarms and excursions without" that Wagner's stage directions prescribe.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY TICKET WANTED

To purchase; alternate Saturday evenings; moderate price. Address B.M.M., Boston Transcript. 2t(A) o 13

SYMPHONY

REHEARSAL TICKET, single seat, first balcony, centre, $35. Address L.F.B., Boston Transcript. 2t(A): o 10

SYMPHONY'S 25TH SEASON BEGINS

Good-Sized Audience Was Sympathetic — Dvorak's "Wood Dove," Played Here for First Time, Disappoints.

MRS. HOMER SHOWS VOCAL IMPROVEMENT

Fine Performances of Pieces by Beethoven and Goldmark—Some New Players Make First Appearance.

The 25th season of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, began last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gericke was very warmly greeted and although empty seats here and there showed that regular subscribers had not returned to the city—the return of the cottagers is later each year—yet the audience had a holiday air and it applauded heartily whenever there was opportunity for a manifestation of approval. There were a few new players in the orchestra. It will no doubt be a pleasure to speak of their accomplishments a little later when they are more accustomed to their respective positions and have occasion for individual display.

The programme was as follows:

Overture, "In the Spring".....Goldmark
Song, "The Lorelei".....Liszt
Symphonic poem, "The Wood Dove".....Dvorak (First time.)
Scene and aria from "Rienzi".....Wagner
Symphony No. 2.....Beethoven

The feature of the concert was the brilliant and supremely euphonious performance of Goldmark's overture. Inasmuch as Symphony concerts in all musical countries are given as a rule in the fall and winter of the year, orchestral hymns and invocations to spring are performed out of season. The first performance of Goldmark's overture was in December, and the first performance in America was in the same month. Mr. Nikisch made a brave attempt to suit the musical sentiment to the season, and he brought out the overture in April; but, as spring is in New England merely a division of the year, a word that is of meaning chiefly to milliners and poets, it matters little when such music is played. This overture is not characteristically Goldmarkian; it is not charged with oriental feeling, in fact, it is at first rather Mendelssohnian; and the contrasting section is Wagnerian, but it is spontaneous and inspiring music: it is full of buoyancy and swing; it is frankly melodious, and in its suggestion of twittering and restless birds it is not too deliberately mimetic. As played last night, the overture was full of grace, color, beauty and life.

After Dvorak returned to Prague, which he again made his dwelling-place until his death, he composed five pictorial or narrative symphonic poems, no one of which was eminently successful, and two or three operas which had only a success of esteem, if any one of them was even thus complimented. Dvorak was unhappy in consequence. Shortly before his death he complained of the public's failure to appreciate him, and his remarks as quoted were rather peevish, unlike his own cheerful and kindly nature. The fault was in the music itself, not in the public; for the talent of Dvorak was lyrical, not dramatic; his salient characteristics were melody, rhythm, color—and his melody and rhythm were derived from the folk tunes of his beloved land. He was happiest when he was with the plain people, and his "American music," as some call it, interested him, and, in a measure, inspired him because he had to do again with folk themes. Simple, naive, what could he do with subjects that were macabre or horrible? Take this "Wood Dove" for instance, based on a legendary poem by Erben.

Our old friend, the Ephesian widow, who was only too easily persuaded to fall in love with the soldier guarding her husband's corpse, is here in Bohemia; she weeps as she follows her husband's body, and Dvorak writes a funeral march that is outwardly as pompous as though it were for a hero, but the true contents are empty and jejune. As she breaks down in dismal walls, trumpets announce relief and consolation in the shape of a lusty peasant, who at once presses his suit. She does not keep him waiting, and there is wedding music that is distinguished by its unrelieved and dull vulgarity. There is a coarseness in music that seems elemental, natural, inevitable, human; there is also a fierce and terrible brutality in music that is appalling; we find such expressions of human nature in certain works of Tchaikowsky; but the vulgarity of this festival music of Dvorak's is stupid and tiresome; it is the vulgarity of a guttersnipe; it is not even amusing. A dove, the soul of the dead husband, is heard lamenting, and lo, we are told by the printed argument in the score that this charming and easily comforted widow had poisoned her first husband, that overcome by remorse—or possibly by the wedding music provided thoughtfully by husband No. 2, with the assistance of Dvorak—she goes mad and seeks death in the waters hard by.

Poor Dvorak made a brave attempt to write realistic music for this last tragic scene, but he no more chills the blood than does the urchin who exposes suddenly on a neighbor's doorstep a pumpkin jack-o'-lantern and then rings violently the bell. In this music there is no thought of the Dvorak of the wild Slavonic dances, the rhapsodies, the sad and haunting gypsy melodies. No effort of conductor or orchestra could make this symphonic poem impressive or even tolerable. Nor is the music so gorgeously colored as other works by this naive composer, who at the last fell into routine and conventionalisms when he purposed to be realistic and tragic.

It is a pleasure to hear now and then even an inferior symphony by Beethoven when it is performed with such loving care for the detail as is shown by Mr. Gericke. The larghetto of the second symphony is still beautiful in its simplicity. Mr. Gericke took it at a little faster pace than is customary, and the music gained thereby.

Mrs. Homer, two seasons ago, caused her many friends uneasiness by her evident desire to make effects at any cost; by her tendency to ignore the sane and voice-preserving laws of song and of vocal beauty. Perhaps she was drawn from the path of righteousness by the example of her German sisters in the Metropolitan Opera House Company; perhaps she was goaded to extravagance in tone-emission by a noisy orchestra dominated by the too enthusiastic Mr. Hertz. Last night she showed that she has been considering her ways, that she now realizes the beauty of repose, the force that lies in the suggestion of reserve strength. She was heard to her best advantage in "The Loreley," a song that has been censured by some for many years as an undue expansion of Heine's simple idea, as being an elaborate cantata instead of a direct and appealing song.

But Liszt's setting has a peculiar and romantic charm, and Mrs. Homer appreciated and expressed the spirit of the composer. She is to be thanked for comparative restraint in the declamation of the wretched music from "Rienzi," music of a third rate Italian opera imagined by a genius in the period of experimentation. As sung by many this scene and air remind one of the sounds heard on a famous occasion by Miss Maud's young man in Tennyson's poem, "The shrill-edged shriek of a mother divides the shuddering night."

The programme of the second concert, which is given on the music page of this issue, will be one of greater interest.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Interesting Opening of Symphony Season.

Chamber Concerts of Note — Preludes and Echoes.

The 25th season of Symphony concerts was opened in Symphony hall with the popular American singer, Mrs Louise Homer, as the solo artist. Her selections were the Liszt son, "The Loreley," and a scene and aria from Wagner's "Rienzi." The orchestral novelty was Dvorak's symphonic poem, "The Wood Dove," played here for the first time. The Goldmark overture, "In the Spring," and Beethoven's great Second Symphony completed the program. The assemblage was limited, as usual, to the seating capacity of the hall, hundreds were disappointed in not being able to gain admittance. Mr Gericke was received with the customary enthusiasm and the orchestra performed its duties in the manner so familiar to Bostonians that a standard which is considered unusual in other cities is now taken as a matter, of course, with our Symphony patrons. Mrs Homer's rich and powerful mezzo voice was at its best, the dramatic qualities showing to particular advantage in the aria from "Rienzi," the phrases of passion and despair being declaimed with splendid effect and without marring the beauty of her vocalism. She sang the score in German and showed that Wagner, even in very turbulent mood, could be made musical. The fantastic and tender "Loreley" was sung with appealing expression and sweetness of tone. Mrs Homer's reception was very hearty and she was recalled several times at the

Twenty-Fifth Season Of Boston Symphony Opens

With its beautiful home filled by the musically elect; with its conductor's stand entwined with greenery and decorated with flowers; with an unusually hearty welcome for Mr. Gericke, the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twenty-fifth season in due form Saturday night and gave the official signal that shall start all the other musical features of the town into full activity. It was almost the same organization in its personnel that marshaled its ranks before the audience a year before. A few faces, however, are new. Mr. Warnke has come from Munich to fill the position of first 'cello; Mr. Hess—not Willy—has the leading horn, while our familiar friend John C. Mullaly, is now one of the first violins. Otherwise the splendid band is practically unchanged.

Begins in Key of Gaiety.

The concert began in a key of gaiety and pure abandon, for Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," has more naive charm and simple beauty than one would expect from a man of his temperament. Schumannesque in many ways, the work yet has its own interpretation of the joy of renewed life, of birds and flowers and babbling brooks. It is a close of each number.

Goldmark's joyous "Spring" overture opened the program delightfully, and each charming episode and furtive theme was given as delicately and smoothly as one could desire. The "little rehearsal of the 'crack of doom'" went with the necessary fortissimo vigor, and the finale was a brilliant and harmonious finishing touch.

Dvorak's poem, "The Wood Dove," is a musical illustration of a lamenting young widow, who, after murdering her first husband, marries a jovial second. As they pass the grave of the first spouse the mourning song of the wild dove causes the woman to go mad and drown herself in a nearby stream. The composer has cleverly shown the various scenes in characteristic orchestration, which fits the story admirably as a rule, although lacking at times in suggesting its deep and tragic import. The treatment appeared to be rather simple, for there were no special difficulties in the score, and Mr Gericke's men had little or no trouble in making the interpretation pleasing. If it was void of dramatic strength the fault evidently was with the orchestra.

Last, but not least, was the beautiful Second Symphony by Beethoven, the gem of the program. This work showed the orchestra in its happiest vein, notably so in the legato melodies in the second and third movements, which were the perfection of ensemble playing.

This week's soloist will be Waldemar Lustschg, a pianist new to this country. The program will be as follows: Overture, "Libussa," Smetana, first time here; concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in a major, Liszt; "Death and Transfiguration," Richard Strauss; symphony No. 4, Tchaikowsky.

delightful, spontaneous bit of musical imagery, and it was played as it deserved—with delicate loveliness of rhythm and tone.

Dvorak's tone-poem, "The Wood Dove," had its first performance here, and it made little or no impression. Attempting to tell the story of the widow too soon consoled by a lover after the death of the husband she had poisoned, and the terrifying return of her spouse's spirit in the form of a dove, it merely sets forth, with something very near akin to dulness, a funeral march, a rustic dance or two and some rather rugged and somber strains supposed to be the accusing voice of conscience. The dove has little part in the matter, and its cooings are immediately swallowed up by hoarse blasts of the bassoon. Altogether, the work is unworthy the Dvorak of earlier days, and scarcely holds the interest of the most friendly.

Beautiful Second Symphony.

Beethoven's second symphony has beauty enough to make it still deserving of a place at modern concerts, spite of the endless repetitions of many of its themes and the undeniably old-fashioned cut of its form. It was played with that rare finish and perfection of detail which Mr. Gericke knows so well how to obtain from his orchestra.

Louise Homer, the soloist, more radiant than ever, and, it would appear, in more powerful voice, sang first Liszt's wonderfully fascinating setting to the "Lorelei" poem. She gave it in an honest, conscientious and hearty style that was partially effective, but that still lacked much of finesse and that weird suggestiveness the music ought to convey. Later she sang a scene and aria from Wagner's "Rienzi," dull things in themselves and not especially bettered by the tremendous strength with which she tossed her voice into the hall. On the whole her true "metier" is in grand opera with all its most turbulent accessories.

FIRST SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TODAY

Dvorak's "The Wood Dove" to Be Performed for First Time in Boston—Soloist Is Mrs. Louise Homer.

The 25th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, will begin in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 2:30 o'clock with the first public rehearsal. The programme will include Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," and Beethoven's symphony No. 2, both familiar works. Dvorak's symphonic poem, "The Wood Dove," will be performed for the first time in Boston.

After the composer left New York to make Prague again his dwelling place, he wrote a series of symphonic poems, or orchestral ballads. They were inspired for the most part by folk songs or legends, three or four of them of a bloody-head-and-rattling-bones nature: "The Noon Witch," "The Water Sprite," "The Golden Spinning Wheel" and this "Wood Dove." C. J. Erben, archivist at Prague, wrote a ballad, "The Wood Dove," and this gave Dvorak the subject for the work to be played today.

The Bohemians believe that the souls of the good appear after death as white doves, but those of the wicked as ravens. In Erben's ballad a widow with lamentation follows the corpse of her husband to the grave. While she is weeping, a jovial peasant appears, who offers her marriage. Like the famous Ephesian widow, easily consoled by the soldier who stood guard over her husband's corpse—the story told first by Petronius and afterward by many others, among them Jeremy Taylor, who narrated it with peculiar eloquence and gusto in his "Holy Living"—see also a play by Otway—this Bohemian widow forgets her grief and there is a gay wedding festival.

But a dove in a tree near the grave moans out his melancholy. 'Tis the spirit of the husband, who was poisoned by the wife so inconsolable for a day. She, tortured by remorse, kills herself. Dvorak's music is frankly pictorial and narrative. The composition was published in 1899, and played in Chicago in October of that year by Thomas' orchestra.

The soloist this afternoon will be Mrs. Louise Homer, who will sing a scene and aria from "Rienzi" and Liszt's "Loreley," with orchestral accompaniment. This will be her second appearance at these concerts.

At the second concert, the 21st, Mr. Waldemar Luetschg, a young Russian pianist now living in Chicago, will play Liszt's concerto in A major, No. 2, and thus make his first appearance in this country. The orchestral pieces will be the overture to Smetana's opera, "Libussa," Strauss' tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Tchaikowsky's impressive symphony in F minor, No. 4. Libussa, the heroine of Smetana's opera, is the woman who founded a mighty dynasty in Bohemia. The opera is intensely national. Mr. Warnke, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, will make his first appearance as a soloist at the third concert, Oct. 28. It is said that he will play Dvorak's concerto.

'CELLIST WARNKE OPENS ON OCT. 2

New Acquisition of Boston Symphony Orchestra Only One of Three—Max Hess and M. Sadony Others.

Heinrich Warnke, first 'cellist of the celebrated Kaim orchestra of Munich, Germany, who has been secured by the Boston Symphony orchestra to take the place of Rudolph Krasselt, first solo 'cellist for the past two years, will make his first appearance here at the opening of the season on Oct. 2. Two other noted musicians who will make their first appearances here at the same time are Max Hess, first horn of the Cologne orchestra, and M. Sadony, bassoon of the Cologne orchestra.

Prof. Willy Hess of the Boston Symphony orchestra returned to America

Tuesday, and to Boston Wednesday, after a four weeks' hunt through Germany for first-class musicians, and he is more than pleased with his success.

"I have known Mr. Warnke for years," said Prof. Hess, "and when the famous conductor, Weingartner, and Richard Strauss, both hearing that I was after a first 'cellist, told me to hear Warnke, I went to hear him—and I decided that he must come to Boston on the spot."

According to Prof. Hess, however, it was no easy matter to get Mr. Warnke away from the fatherland. He was very comfortably settled in Munich and had no desire to conquer other worlds. In fact, he had already refused most flattering offers from the Berlin Philharmonic orchestra and from the Vienna orchestra. But under Prof. Hess' urgings he finally consented to come.

Abroad Mr. Warnke has a very big reputation for a man of 33. As a musician he was the pet pupil of Klengel, and well known throughout Europe. As a teacher he was not less well known; he was the instructor of the same Mr. Krasselt, whose place here he has consented to fill.

Mr. Warnke is planning to arrive in America, for the first time in his life, about Sept. 25, in good time for the opening of the season, Oct. 2; and the other two acquisitions of the year, Messrs. Hess and Sadony, will arrive about the same time.

Mr. Hess is 27 years old, and for a man of his age has had wonderfully good offers to play in Munich, Berlin and Vienna, but until Prof. Hess got hold of him he has held by the Cologne orchestra. Mr. Sadony is about 40. He, too, has had very flattering offers, but is leaving Cologne for the first time.

With Mr. Warnke as first 'cellist, Mr. Hess as first horn and Mr. Sadony as bassoon, Prof. Hess is convinced that the Symphony orchestra has been enormously strengthened. Mr. Warnke will also make one of the famous Boston Symphony quartet.

THE SYMPHONIES BEGIN

The 25th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was inaugurated last evening at Symphony Hall, the programme of the first concert being as follows:

Overture, "In the Spring".....Goldmark
Song, with orchestra, "The Loveley".....Liszt
Symphonic Poem, "The Wood Dove".....Dvorak
Scene and aria from "Rienzi".....Wagner
Symphony No. 2, in D.....Beethoven

Mrs. Louise Homer was the soloist.
Mr. Gericke was warmly applauded when he appeared to direct the first number. The membership of the orchestra is nearly the same as before, the new members including Heinrich Warnke, first 'cellist; P. Sadony, bassoon; Max Hess, first horn; also Boston's well-known and distinguished violinist, John C. Mullaly, who will be a most valued addition to the many artists composing the orchestra.

The opening number was Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring." Although from its title it might be considered out of season, the overture is one that can often be heard with pleasure, for it is in Goldmark's best mood, not only as to freedom and originality of thought, but as to the scoring, which is ideal in every way. In some ways the "In the Spring" overture surpasses such as "Sappho," "Penthesilea" and is only second to "Sakuntala." It made a delightful impression.

Dvorak's symphonic poem, "The Wood Dove," was heard at these concerts for the first time. Briefly stated, the work, in five sections, played without pause, was suggested by an old Bohemian folk legend, and was composed about six years ago. The music is well descriptive of the story, so far as one can judge at a first hearing, and there are many pages of great beauty that fix the attention of the listener. The work deserves another hearing in the near future.

Mme. Louise Homer, a general favorite in this city, made her second appearance at these concerts. She sang Liszt's admirable setting of the familiar Heine poem with fine voice and intelligent grasp of the spirit of the text. She was even more successful in the scene and aria from the third act of "Rienzi." Mme. Homer was enthusiastically applauded and recalled after each number. Beethoven's second symphony in D, was the closing number. The ensemble of the orchestra was especially fine for the first of the season, owing, perhaps, in part to the recent trip to Canada and the West.

At the rehearsal and concert this coming week Waldemar Luetsch, a young Russian pianist now living in Chicago, will play Liszt's concerto in A major, No. 2, and this will be his first appearance in this country. The orchestral pieces will be the overture to Smetana's opera, "Libussa," Strauss' tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Tschalkowsky's symphony in F minor, No. 4.

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

SIX CONCERTS

THURSDAY, Oct. 26; WEDNESDAY, Nov. 29, and THURSDAYS, Dec. 28, Feb. 1, March 8, April 19, at 7.45 P. M.

Soloists: Miss ALICE R. COLE, Miss OLIVE MEAD, Miss CLARA KLOBERG, Mme. OLGA SAMAROFF, Mr. MYRON W. WHITNEY, Jr., Mr. GEORGE PROCTOR.

Season tickets for the series, $5. Subscribers of last season may secure the SAME SEATS on application to C. W. Sever & Co., Harvard Sq., on or before Oct. 18. The unclaimed seats will be on sale Saturday morning, Oct. 21, at 8 A. M.

A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests. (A)

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Oct 16. 05
Concert Overture, in A major, op 36, "In the Spring".....Goldmark Song, "The Loreley," with Orchestral accompaniment.....Liszt

Mme. Louise Homer.
Symphonic Poem, "The Wood Dove," (after Erben's like-named Ballad), op 110. (First time).....Dvorak
Scene, "Just God!" and Aria, "My Life fades in its Blossom," from "Rienzi," Act III., No. 3.....Wagner

Mme. Louise Homer.
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 36..Beethoven

The Bass-drum pounds the knell of parting day.
The lowing horns wind slowly through the key.
The Boston Orchestra starts in to play,
And work begins for Gericke—and me.

The boast of Gericke, the pomp of Paur,
And all that Henschel, all that Nikisch gave,
Await alike the season's opening hour
To play all things from furious to grave.

Full many a gem of purest ray serene
The big portfolios of Sauerquell bear.
Full many a work with gongs and wind-machine,
With much of dissonance and little air.

When Mr. Gericke took the stand the greeting was especially prolonged and cordial. The opening work of the season was decidedly different from the solemn style in which the former conductors used to break the ice. Henschel used to commence with Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture, as a sort of musical grace, and Nikisch and Paur generally gave some lofty number as "avant-courier."

It was much pleasanter, however, to take our spring medicine at once. Goldmark's Spring overture is entirely free from musical riddles, or "Weltschmerz," or any of those troubles which seem to afflict most modern composers. On the contrary, it seems that in the Springtime Goldmark's fancies lightly turn to thoughts of woodwind. Piplings and carollings and all veins of pastoral beauty were in the work, yet contrapuntal skill was not lacking. Such men as Goldmark, Rheinberger, or Jadasohn, may not be of absolutely the first rank in musical creation, but they certainly prove how much of melody and beauty can be united with strict form. The overture was heartily applauded.

Mme. Louise Homer made an unqualified success. She entered into the full spirit of Liszt's ballad, giving the climax—"Er schaut nur hinauf in der Hohn"—with fine effect, and making a very effective contrast with the sadness of the subsequent "Und das hat mit ihrem singen, Die Lorelei gethan."

As if to disprove the saying the Homer sometimes nods, she made a still greater success with the "Rienzi" aria. When one listens to a work of this kind how utterly absurd it makes the accusations of Rowbotham and other old fogey Englishmen, that Wagner introduced his theories because he could not write melodies!

There is too much of melody in this number; it interferes with the dramatic effect; and the roulades and vocal repetitions are almost comically unlike the Wagner whom the world has come to recognize.

Nevertheless the work, amid much of claptrap, has its moments of genius, and Mme. Homer has done well to resuscitate it. There were many recalls. Mme. Homer's voice was never as brilliant as it is at present.

How would one enjoy a melodrama written by Wordsworth? A symphonic poem by Dvorak is about as much at cross purposes. The story tells of a woman who poisons her husband, then wooed and won by a young peasant, is afterwards haunted by the spirit of the dear defunct, goes mad and commits suicide. Liszt might have made something out of this gruesome topic, but Dvorak only succeeds in giving a mixture of ghosts and rose-water.

The story is told at great length, as if by a man who had reached what Disraeli would have called his anecdote. There are some good points in the composition, as, for example, the sturdy peasant's dance, with its empty fifths as prelude, but the supernatural touches were tame and the work was far too long for what it had to say. The score might be sent to the Society for Psychical Research, for we have certainly no further use for it in the Symphony concerts.

Spite of the fact that one or 2 American critics have found fault with Beethoven, that composer seems to wear pretty well. Mr. Gericke spared not a single repeat in the symphony, yet there was scarcely a sign of any exodus before the last notes. The orchestra played with such spirit that we suspect that they liked the work as much as the audience did. The work is worth study were it only for its historical significance. Its larghetto movement (the gem of the work) was one of those compositions of long breath in slow tempo which Beethoven was the first to thoroughly master.

Its Scherzo is the first symphonic movement of this form, Beethoven having grown tired of the smug Minuet which Haydn had riveted upon the symphony. Yet the movement which he called "Minuet," in his first symphony, or the so-called Minuet of the Fourth Symphony, is far more of a Scherzo than this movement, although this second symphony marks the formal opening of the new path.

The finale, too, is epoch-making. The old suite had ended with a gigue, or jig, and all the old cycle forms had the habit of ending with a jovial movement to reward the patience of the auditors. Almost all the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart followed this lead and ended in a rollicking manner. Beethoven himself yielded to the custom in his first symphony.

But in this second symphony he begins to show what a symphonic finale should really be,—a true climax. The reviewer finds more meaning and more power in the finale than in any other movement of this symphony.

But perhaps it is rather late to write about the merits of Mr. Van Beethoven, and it may be unnecessary to defend them from modern attacks; therefore we limit ourselves to adding that the orchestra was of surprisingly good ensemble for a first concert, the bassoons were very steady in the Trio of the Scherzo, and the symphony made a good climax to an interesting concert. Louis C. Elson.

MUSIC NOTES.

It is possible that we shall have some opportunities of comparing orchestras this season. The Philadelphia Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Fritz Scheel, is contemplating a Boston performance. If Mr. Paur would venture here with his Pittsburgh orchestra we believe he would receive a cordial welcome.

Waldemar Lutschg,
Pianist, soloist at Symphony next week.

NEW WORKS

The program for next week's Symphony concerts, the second in the series, is one of unusual interest. Not only will it bring to Boston an unknown pianist and an unknown work by the Bohemian composer Smetana, but it will contain two of the most attractive works of Richard Strauss and Tschaiikowsky. The soloist will be Waldemar Lutschg, who on Friday afternoon will make his debut in America. Mr. Lutschg is a young man whose coming to this country was preceded by most favorable reports. He is a Russian by birth and parentage, having been born in St. Petersburg of Russian parents. His father was an artist of distinction and a teacher of painting. He himself showed at an early age a great talent for the piano, but he was thoroughly prepared for concert work before he made his debut in his native city in 1896. His success there was immediate and since that time he has been one of the most popular pianists in Russia. Two years later he made his first tour of Germany and attracted most favorable notice in Dresden, Berlin, Frankfort and other musical centres. His whole career has been spent on the continent.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILKINS. Mr. Nijinsky in Paris has shocked the Parisians so much by his mimicking of Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" that two of the Parisian papers refused to "cover" the performances. Of course the theatre was sold out for each and every one of these performances. This reminds the New Music Review of "a curious incident in the life of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Gericke, preparing his programmes for a trip to this city, Philadelphia and other towns, thought of Goldmark's overture to 'Sappho,' a tragic overture inspired by a play based on the old legend of the burning, passionate poetess, the Ella Wheeler Wilcox of the Grecian isles. About that time Miss Nethersole had shocked a sensitive, idealistic public by the realism of her performance in 'Sappho,' the play based upon Alphonse Daudet's celebrated romance of Parisian life. Mr. Gericke, reading about the scandalous proceedings—and surely the protests were more scandalous than the alleged offence—promptly withdrew Goldmark's overture, saying that he would do nothing to endanger the fair fame of the orchestra."

SATURDAY. P. M.

SMETANA. in A major.

LISZT.

RICHARD STRAUSS. ation," op. 23.

TSCHAIKOWSKY. Nor was Mr. de Pachmann allowed to injure the orchestra dignity last season, for his antics at the piano, his conversations with himself and his frank praise of his own performances would not have been en rapport with the atmosphere in the oblong auditorium, whether or not the performance would have been as incomparably poetic as Mr. de Pachmann's when he seats himself to discourse marvellously with Chopin's muse.

Soloist:

Mr. WALDEMAR LUTSCHG.

The Pianoforte is a Kimball.

WALDEMAR
LUTSCHG

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

From Getz 1995
STRAUSS, TSCHAIKOVSKY AND SMETANA

The Second Symphony Concert—More Plans for the New Season—Singers and Virtuosi

In Symphony Hall yesterday the Symphony Orchestra gave the second afternoon concert of the new season. Mr. Gericke conducted, and Waldemar Lutschg, a young Russian, who has lately settled in Chicago, was the pianist. He was making his first appearance in America and the audience applauded him warmly. Smetana's overture to his opera "Libussa" was the unfamiliar music of the concert, and it was played probably for the first time in America. The whole programme, which will be repeated tonight, was: Smetana, Overture to the opera "Libussa"; Liszt, Concerto No. 2, for piano; Richard Strauss, tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration"; Tschaikevsky, Symphony No. 4.

"Death and Transfiguration" is becoming Richard Strauss's "Tannhäuser." The full and true believers agree that it contains or foreshadows nearly all the peculiar qualities of his later tone-poems: yet regret that here and there in it he has preferred the ways of Liszt to his own. Meanwhile in Europe and in America conductors place it oftenest of all Strauss's music on their programmes, and their audiences seem to hear it more and more gladly. The wandering composer himself chooses none so frequently for his own conducting. The reasons are plain enough. Of all Strauss's tone-poems "Death and Transfiguration" is the most readily comprehensible and the most deeply moving. It does not matter at all whether the verses that accompany the music were written before or after it was composed. They do tell us sufficiently what was in Strauss's mind and fancy as he wrote, and that, as with any music that seeks expression first of all, we have a right and a duty to know.

With such guidance there is no obscuring or mistaking what the music would express. The details are trivial—the ticking of the clock in "the little necessitous chamber," the rattle in the throat of the dying idealist. They are the infatuations of programme-makers or the excesses of the composer. They are also the things upon which the detractors and the doubters love to dwell to the hiding of others that are infinitely more important. There is no mistaking the wan mood of a spent and expiring soul with which the music begins. There is no missing the tonal flashes—call them youth, childhood, "the lyric period," what you will—that brighten or soften it. There is no withstanding that tonal battle when ideals clash against all the world and Fate behind. And there is no resisting that mighty apotheosis when every instrumental voice cries at its fullest and richest: "Say not the struggle naught avaleth."

"Death and Transfiguration" is not only readily comprehensible; it is deeply moving. It is time to have done with the mechanics of Strauss, even with the mechanics of his imagination, except in our private studies. Most of us know by this time that he can invent such uncanny rhythms as that which brings Death into the chamber. We know, also, that he can split a theme into harmonic splinters, as he does when Fate beats down the Ideal of the tone-poem. We know the wonders of his polyphony; the miracles of his instrumentation; the strangeness and the marvels of his harmonies—and dissonances. It is time for us to take all these things for granted, as he does. They are means, not ends. Does the music of "Death and Transfiguration" search our hearts and kindle our spirits? Does it lay bare the soul of the dying man, mood upon mood, emotion upon emotion? Does it wage once more in tones the eternal battle for an Ideal? Does it cry with all the myriad voices of the Apocalypse that the struggle does avail? It is not a question of whether music can or ought to express these things and a dozen others in the emotional contents of the tone-poem. Those are matters for academic debate. The real question is whether this particular man, Richard Strauss, has made this particular music, "Death and Transfiguration," accomplish these things. Can there be but one answer from any imaginative or open-minded hearer?

This music searches our hearts with its pathos, shakes us with its warfare, intoxicates us with the plangent splendor of its triumph. And it does all these things the more because it is music of our own time, lives and strivings. When Beethoven wrote, they were remaking the modern world. In the prime of Wagner and Liszt romance had been born again. And now we search our own hearts and the hearts of others and cannot find the things we seek. They splinter like Strauss's harmonies. They vanish like his tonalities. We shift, we strive, we fail, we despair. Yet we are all optimists at bottom. We do hear at our best moments the full-throated C-major glories of that apotheosis. It remained for Strauss to put the moods of his time into tones that speak as with our voices.

Tschaikevsky followed Strauss on Mr. Gericke's programme, and he, too—it is easy to hear someone saying—is of our time. He is by the dates in the biographical dictionary, and no Russian of today is much more than that. Beside Strauss he is still primitive in mind and mood, though he has learned our arts of expression, and sometimes bettered our teaching. Hear Fate, according to Tschaikevsky, stamping and stalking through the first movement of the fourth symphony—a giant god, earth-shaking, irresistible. Shall we strive against him; shall we do tonal battle for our ideals, even as does Strauss? Not at all, replies the Russian. "Moderato con anima in movimento di valse." Let us float away in waltz rhythm on our dreams and visions. We can have them for the asking. Let us sit in sad-sweet melancholy and muse of old, forgotten, far-off things, "andante in modo di canzona," with the plaintive oboe to lead the instrumental choir. Or let us play with our fancies and with our stringed instruments in persistent pizzicato. Finally, shall we riot through a wild debauch of folk-tune, and yet hear Fate still stamping and stalking above the din?

Primitive minds, primitive emotions. Or so they seemed after Strauss, with his acrid, intense modernity. In bitter contest, he had persuaded us, lies surcease from sorrow and unrest. And Tschai-kovsky would take us for comfort into the rude tumults of a peasant holiday. No wonder it was hard to take his fourth movement for more than a rough-and-tumble of excited sound. Strauss's hero strives, falls, hopes, fights again, conquers. Tschai-kovsky's sits in the sun—maybe the brightness will hide him from that stalking Fate—and pipes sadly, moodily, or chases vagrant fancies up and down the strings. You hear Strauss's song of triumph, and Tschai-kovsky answers in "movimento di valse." 'Tis fate as a primitive mind sees it, as primitive emotions fear it, and shrink before it. The consolations are as primitive, be they plaintive or fanciful or tumultuous. Yet the "poetic basis" as the phrase goes, behind Strauss's and behind Tschai-kovsky's music, are one and the same—the struggle against the world, and Fate behind, for ideals and the happiness they bring. But how different is the treatment. Strauss's is all passionate contest; Tschai-kovsky's all pretty or tumultuous evasion. Emotionally Strauss's is the voice of a man. Tschai-kovsky's, in comparison, of a child.

It was almost a pity after such taxing and intricate music that Smetana's overture did not end the concert instead of beginning it. Libussa was a national heroine of Bohemia who does not deeply affect us who are beyond its borders. Smetana put her into a sort of national opera and wrote a solemn overture for it still more in the vein that suits national festivals. Stately sonorities begin it. Ingratiating melody continues it. (Libussa was woman as well as queen.) Chivalrous accents end it. After Strauss and Tschai-kovsky you recalled it like a calming memory. Of Mr. Lütschg and the playing of the orchestra it will be fairer to write after tonight's concert.

H. T. P.

FATE AND DEATH PAINTED IN MUSIC

Harriet ——— Get 22-05

R. Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" and Tschai-kovsky's Symphony No. 4 Given at Second Concert.

TWO MASTERPIECES GRANDLY RENDERED

Smetana's Prelude to "Libussa"—Luetschg Plays First Time in America—Next in Memory of Mrs. Lowell.

The second Symphony concert was given last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gerike conducted. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "Libussa" (first time)....Smetana
Piano concerto in A major, No. 2.....Liszt
"Death and Transfiguration".....R. Strauss Symphony No. 4.....Tschai-kovsky

Smetana wrote his opera "Libussa," a glorification of Bohemia's Amazon princess, who finally was forced to take to herself a husband to aid her in governing her people, for a "future audience," as his biographer, Weilek, puts it. Smetana's serious opera, "Dalibor," met with little success when it was produced in 1868 and the composer, cut to the quick, took great pains with "Libussa," especially in the matter of musical declamation. The opera was completed in 1872 and the overture was played in the seventies, but the opera was not produced until 1881, when it took a prize and was chosen as the work for the dedication of a new opera house in Prague. The composer designed his work for festival occasions; he could not endure the thought of it becoming a hackneyed repertory piece; but his wish was not regarded even while he was alive.

The overture is built on three typical themes. The first typifies Libussa, the Amazon, "the pride and glory of the female sex, doing wise and manly deeds," as the old chronicler describes her. The second is the theme of Libussa, the woman with all the feminine charms and wiles that were characteristic of her weaker sisters. The third typifies Premysl, whom she called from the field as he was ploughing, and wedded; with whose assistance she founded a powerful dynasty.

The overture is music for a solemn festival, better suited for the theatre and for the purpose of establishing a mood than for performance, detached and without special significance, in a concert hall; yet as music without any particular association it is impressive—in fact, singularly impressive by reason of the simplicity and the earnest, sincerity that are peculiar to Smetana, qualities that are revealed fully in his superb symphonic poem, "Vysehrad." It is music that might well prepare for the reading of a stately epic poem or accompany the unrolling of a painting of some historic and mighty deed.

The works of Strauss and Tschai-kovsky played at this concert are among the masterpieces of the two composers, and they were both inspired by thoughts of faith and of death. Each has a programme, an argument, for although the poem by Alexander Ritter was written after the music had been composed, the poem is published in the score as a commentary, and while no argument appears in Tschai-kovsky's score, the Russian wrote to Mrs. von Meck, to whom the symphony is dedicated, an elaborate explanation of his purpose. It was bold of Mr. Gerike to put two works of this nature in juxtaposition. The experiment was engrossing and successful. Few compositions could come after Strauss' work and hold the attention of an audience. Tschai-kovsky's symphony has been praised by some and feared by others as aggressively Russian; but it is not parochial in its national sentiment, rhythm and color; its theme is universal; it appeals to every thinking being who is perplexed or disheartened by the mystery of life.

Tschai-kovsky and Brahms were constitutionally curious about death, and their curiosity, which was akin to despair, was often expressed in their music. Brahms was inclined to be peevish or surly in his expression of doleful dumps. He wrote in the spirit in which he died, for at the last he cried and turned his face to the wall, while Tschai-kovsky simply said to his brother, who gave him assurance: "I think this is death; good-by, Modi," and just before his sweet soul left his tormenting body he looked toward heaven with an indescribable expression of unclouded consciousness, and there was a certain light in his eyes.

The Russian is heroic in his despair, and it should be remembered that he himself was not satisfied with the hopeless lamentation that closes his sixth symphony and purposed to rewrite it. Brahms in his music—with the exception of his "Tragic" overture in which there is a touch of noble serenity—reminds one of poisoned Brachiano's speech in Webster's awful play:

"On pain of death, let no man name death to me:

It is a word infinitely terrible."

Brahms' attitude is not unlike that of the sorry hero of Zola's "Joie de Vivre," who was haunted and incapacitated for manly work by the mere thought of death.

In Strauss' tone-poem and in Tschai-kovsky's symphony there is full and intense expression of man's rebellion against Fate. The sick man of Strauss reviews in the delirium of fever the scenes of his childhood and youth; once more he struggles for the things that men in this world set their hearts upon. To him in his death-sweat life is as mirage and shifting sand. And so, the mighty transformation! Death, dreaded, fought against, first gives him deliverance from the world; at last he sees clearly and knows the realities. "Death hath this also: that it openeth the gate to good fame." The veriest clown is thus ennobled; he knows at last the secret of secrets, and the proudest that look on his set face may well envy him.

After the fever and stress and fury of Strauss' music comes the apotheosis of poor humanity. There is the suggestion in the solemn strains of the uprising and disappearing forever of life's mist and clouds, of the fleeing away of all doubts and fears as shadows. Man's life, then, after all, is not so weak and pitiful. The corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality.

And yet there have been hearers who listening to this music found in it only charnel house horrors and bedlam ravings.

In Tschai-kovsky's music, man is portrayed as under the bludgeon of Fate. Of what avail is the fist shaken at the sky? How impotent the fiercest outburst! He may pursue happiness, but it is a chimera. He seeks consolation in past memories, in thought of old familiar faces that are gone forever, and in this melancholy is a certain joy. The scherzo might be compared to the "Sleep Chasings" of Walt Whitman, to the fantastical forms and incidents that flit through a dreamer's brain. At last the wretched one solves his problem before death brings relief; there is happiness to be found in observing and entering into the happiness of others. Thus may one live to the appointed end—yet the shadow of Fate will now and then darken the landscape and contract the horizon.

Is this too fantastical? But Tschai-kovsky himself well said: "It is the characteristic feature of instrumental music that it does not allow analysis." One hearing the tone poem and the symphony may hear them thus; another may be interested first of all in the technical proficiency of the orchestra; and still another may wonder what it is all about and sigh for a symphony by Haydn, one "with no nonsense in it—good, straight, pretty and lively music," or possibly for the overture to "Rienzi." The hearer must meet the composer at least half way.

The orchestral performance, on the whole, was of the highest order of excellence. It was a pleasure to the ear and to the imagination. There were moments of inimitable solo display and in ensemble the orchestra was as a commanding and entrancing virtuoso. If the climax of "Death and Transfiguration" was finely worked out and overpowering in its grandeur, the whimsical, capricious scherzo of the symphony, with its spectral jesting, was given with an astounding command of nuances. Mr. Gerike conducted with much sympathy and fervor, as well as with an exquisite sense of proportion.

Mr. Waldemar Luetschg, pianist, played here for the first time in America. Born in St. Petersburg in 1877, he studied there and began the career of a virtuoso in 1896. He is now living in Chicago. He chose the second concert of Liszt, which was last played at these concerts by Mr. Joseffy. The concerto itself is not a work for sensational display; it does not by dash and glitter, by

MUSICAL

Globe
Oct. 22, 1905

MATTERS

Second of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

Series of Notable Performances of Grand Opera in English.

Recitals and Minor Con- certs of the Week.

The Russian pianist, Waldemar Lutschg, made his first appearance in this country as soloist at last week's Symphony concerts, playing the Liszt A major concerto, a work in which brilliancy of performance is the chief requisite, although there are many cantabel passages of great beauty and some moments in which the deeper musicianly qualities may find expression. To Mr Lutschg the immense technical difficulties presented no obstacle for his finger work was accomplished with a skill and smoothness in execution that indicated a master of this art, and his shadings and variations in tempo were accomplished without marring the clarity of his tones, even in the most rapid fingering. Mr Lutschg evidently is a man of great power, judging from his physique; but he didn't abuse the instrument and his fortissimo, tempered to the capacity of the piano, was free from the jaggling accompaniment so frequently heard when the pianist allows passion and temperament to overthrow discretion.

The arpeggio measures were played gracefully, the chord runs and the light cadenza passages were equally good in execution and the small sample of cantabel proved to be of an exquisite singing quality. The almost whimsical finale was set forth in tonal color of great brilliancy and the whole interpretation was a splendid example of pianistic art of a high quality. Mr Lutschg was received with great warmth.

The other program numbers were the overture from Smetana's opera, "Libussa"; the Richard Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and the fourth, Tchaikowsky symphony. The Smetana excerpt is chiefly in festival form and has three chief themes typifying characters in the opera. The first is dignified, the second quiet and tender and the last heroic in suggestion. The opening fanfare, which is quite long, was magnificently played by the brass contingent of the orchestra; the strings and other instruments gave the second theme in an agreeably expressive vein, and the heroic mood of the closing part was set forth with due solemnity and pomp.

The massive and somber tone poem by Richard Strauss was played in an effective manner, of course, and doubtless many appreciated, and probably fewer really enjoyed, the numerous chaotic movements of the work. The characteristic symphony by Tchaikowsky was delightful from beginning to end. The varied instrumental combinations make it unusually attractive to the general public, and the peculiar phrases and themes sprinkled ad lib throughout the four movements enable the different "bands" to show what they can do—and they did it perfectly. The novel pizzicato scherzo deserves special mention, for here the strings were particularly efficient, the "picking" being crisp and in perfect unison. The vigorous fourth movement was sufficiently strenuous to suit the most exacting taste.

This week's program will introduce as soloist Mr Heinrich Warnke, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra. He will play Dvorak's B minor concerto, for 'cello. The other numbers will be Brahms' "Academic Overture," two compositions by Elgar, first time at these concerts, and Liszt's "Faust Symphony."

pomp and fury immediately compel the applause that rewards any apparently extraordinary feat of physical labor or relieves excited and tightly strung nerves. The pianist in order to make an effect with it must be a musician and a poet as well as a master of digital dexterity.

Mr. Lutschg made a very favorable impression. His tone is delightfully clear and crisp in bravura passages, liquid in cantabile, and his general technic is fluent. His reading was both musical and poetic, and there was the polished elegance in phrasing that is especially demanded in the interpretation of Liszt.

All in all, a brilliant and memorable concert.

At the special request of Mr. Henry L. Higginson the concert this week will be in memory of Mrs. Charles Russell Lowell. The programme will therefore be changed from that announced on the music page of this issue. Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Beethoven's "Eroica" will be played, and the balance of the programme will be announced later.

SYMPHONY A few Saturday Evening Concert Tickets
For sale or to rent. 40 State St., Room 33.
Telephone 4235-5 Main. 2t(A): o 19

SYMPHONY TICKET WANTED
To purchase; alternate Saturday evening moderate price. Address B.M.M., Boston Transcript. 2t(A) o 13

SYMPHONY
REHEARSAL TICKET, single seat, First Balcony, centre; $35. Address G.M.O., Boston Transcript. 2t(A): o 17

Waldemar Lutschg Is Heard At Symphony

Journal

The first American appearance of Waldemar Lutschg, the Russian pianist, was the feature of special interest at the second Symphony concert, although the whole evening was one to be remembered. Mr. Lutschg is young and serious. He appears to take his art rather solemnly, which is, after all, not so bad a thing in a youthful player. It has given him a dignity and a maturity of style not always found in a man of his years; it has made him free from mannerisms and has given him little of the aplomb of the storming virtuoso. He goes to the other extreme, sometimes, and appears to be holding his own energy and virility in check.

Perhaps the Liszt A major concerto, which he chose for his debut, was partly responsible for his lack of effectiveness. It is a rather dull affair, in the main, and even such a great player as Joseffy, who gave it here last year, was unable to lend it vitality. But Mr. Lutschg showed he has ample technique, a well-rounded tone and an artistic temperament. His appearance as a recital pianist will be awaited with interest.

Smetana's Overture.

The novelty of the program was Smetana's overture to the opera "Libussa," a glorification of the traditional Bohemian heroine of Prague. The music is festal, with the pomp of brasses predominating, full of rich color, and altogether interesting, as is everything that the hapless Smetana wrote. The touch of romantic sincerity, the passionate patriotism and the flashes of almost supernatural beauty in his works make them irresistibly fascinating. The playing of the orchestra was noble in the highest degree.

Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" seems more classically clear and simple as time goes on. Did we once believed it weird and revolutionary? All that has passed, and it now appeals by the extreme beauty of the death-bed dreams of youth and by the sonorous splendor of the dawning of the life beyond. Here again the band covered itself with honors for its elegance of technique, although the effect of the work would have been still greater had Mr. Gerlicke "let things go" with a little more abandon. Strauss himself did it last season, and nothing of real finish was lost.

Tchaikowsky to Close.

Tchaikowsky's characteristic and wonderfully suggestive fourth symphony, with its haunting melancholy, its "gripping" themes and its turbulent grandeur, all magnificently played, made a fitting close to an exceptionally interesting concert. For this week, in place of the program announced in Saturday's Journal, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, Beethoven's "Eroica" and other works will be given, at the request of Maj. Higginson, as a memorial to Mrs. Charles Russell Lowell who died recently in New York.

Transcript

Oct 23, 1905

Mr. Lutschg and the Symphony Orchestra

The young pianists are cultivating a modest reticence. One by one they come to us without a mark of eccentricity or a touch of personal display. The shaking of manes, the flinging of arms, the tossing of bodies are going out of fashion. In a few years, if the youngsters prevail, Pachmann's grotesquerie will be a last curious survival from the obsolete. Waldemar Lutschg, who played at the Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday, is one of the youngest and most modest of the new generation. Personally he was pleasantly unobtrusive. It was only afterwards that it occurred to you how agreeable a young man he seemed. Musically, as well, he was all discreet reticence. Presumably he had all the technical mastery and resources that we ask of our pianists as a matter of course, but he never thrusts them on his hearers. His playing was so limpid that they hardly realized its ease. Its bravura was smoothly crisp, its lyric passages smoothly rounded. It pursued the contours of a melody through Liszt's labyrinths of ornament and never obscured them or their setting. It was the playing of a pianist who is a musician before he is a virtuoso. Perhaps, however, it carried unobtrusiveness too far. Somehow, it lacked more substantial and individual distinction. It was a little too disembodied, and it wanted the brilliance that Liszt asks above all else. He composed a style, as someone said, as much as he did music. True in this second concerto, until near the end, it is a tempered brilliance and a tempered style, and there is the potent example of Joseffy for the subduing of even the chromatic riot of the end. Certainly Mr. Lutschg never let that go to his own head or to his hearers', and perhaps he and Mr. Gerlicke both turned Liszt's musical kaleidoscope rather too deliberately. It is not good for Liszt when his hearers have time to think.

As often before the real virtuoso of the concerts was the orchestra. Liszt, Strauss, Tchaikovsky, all wrote for a band of virtuosos, and Friday and Saturday they were fortunate enough to have one. Such beauty of tone as strings and woodwinds brought to "Death and Transfiguration" ought to persuade even those who will not understand Strauss. In the concerto there were almost as many tonal tints in the two choirs as there were in Liszt's imagination. The deep, smooth richness of the brass in the overture ought to have gladdened Smetana. Tchaikovsky was always distrusting bands. Yet no strings could have done more for him than did ours in his symphony. It caught the quickest of his fancies. But the band was more than merely ninety virtuosos. They were virtuosos who were understanding, imagining and feeling as one man and that man was their conductor. It used to be the custom and often the truth to say that Mr. Gericke was not at his best in such music as this of Liszt and Strauss and Tchaikovsky. Last winter he seemed to be warming to it again, to be feeling it as well as understanding it. Friday and Saturday, there was no questioning his response to it or his men's response to him. If the concerto ran a little too deliberately, the tonal light and shade, the half-tints and the full flashes were unfailing. Strauss had form and proportion under Mr. Gericke's hand, and the climax of the song of triumph was a mass of glowing tone. As for Tchaikovsky did not even the persistent lengths and the occasional banalities of the fourth symphony sound steadily impressive? Mr. Gericke was persuading us that they ought to mean something and a conductor could hardly do more.

H. T. P.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Overture, to the Opera "Libussa" (First time) ..... Smetana
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in A major ..... Liszt
Waldemar Lutsehg, soloist.
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," op. 23 ..... Richard Strauss Symphony No. 4, in F minor, op. 36. Tchaikovsky

The programme was decidedly modern, yet it gave such strong contrasts of style that its modernity was by no means a dreary waste of dissonance, and there was no monotony. Smetana was the most classical of these moderns. The "Libussa" overture was simple in its thematic material and the composer used it as a Beethoven might have done. Strong contrasts were in its measures, the lofty fanfares of the beginning being an admirable foil to the delicate duet of oboe and flute which constituted the subordinate theme.

There was clear, clean-cut development, and the composer did not expand the form by any long coda; when he had said his say he ended his work, a proceeding which is by no means usual with the composer of the present.

The slavic word "smetana" means "cream," and this Bohemian is worthy of his name. But we doubt whether the audience could fully appreciate the classicality of the overture on a single hearing, particularly as its lofty simplicity was at once effaced by the orchestral spices of Liszt.

Mr. Lutsehg made a fine impression in the Liszt concerto. He bristles with technique as his name bristles with consonants. Rarely have we heard an unheralded young pianist with so clear a conception of what he wanted to do and such good equipment for doing it. A shallowness of tone in the heavy bass chords was the only shortcoming of the work. The A major concerto is not as great a work to conjure with as its peppery companion in E-flat, yet it is intrinsically the greater of the two Liszt concertos.

Its orchestral touches are very beautiful. We do not think that Liszt has yet received full credit for his orchestral power; even Tchaikovsky or Richard Strauss do not cause him to grow pale, and the work held its own easily against the two masterpieces that followed. The ensemble was perfect, and the honor of this must be divided between Mr. Gericke and Mr. Lutsehg. While the pianist displayed an admirable surety, he did not discard a free interpretation at times; an occasional use of "tempo rubato" was eminently fitting and lent effect to some passages, but this gave added difficulty to the orchestral part. Every climax was well wrought up and at the end the pianist was recalled over and over again. He thoroughly deserved the tribute; we shall watch the career of this artist with much interest for there is something of genius in his performance.

The rest of the concert was devoted to studies of Fate and Death from the German and Russian points of view, yet it was not sombre and it was certainly intensely interesting and exciting (as well as elevating) to its very last note. The chief event of the programme was the Strauss performance. The composition ("Death and Transfiguration") grows greater and greater with each repeated hearing; in this case familiarity breeds reverence. It is not so long ago that the wifings called it "Death and Damnation" and thought the whole matter horribly morbid and unhealthy.

Now it stands revealed as one of the greatest possible pictures of human struggle, a Greek tragedy in tones, but with an ending far nobler than the Hellenic pictures of Fate. In Tolstoy's "Death of Ivan Iliitch" we find in words what Strauss has here told in tones, an accidental resemblance, but a close one, in the final calm, clear view of mortal dissolution. The work is not programme-music in the sense that Beethoven's Pastoral symphony or Mendelssohn's Hebrides overture are programme-music.

It pictures moods rather than events, and in this it is rather of the school of Beethoven's Heroic symphony or of Brahms' Tragic overture. At this concert we tried to listen without a thought of Ritter's descriptive poem or of the dozen little sick-room details which commentators have saddled upon the work—and the composition gained in consequence. An unavailing struggle, happy memories, a journey through the valley of Despair to a serene confronting of Death, that is programme enough for this mighty tone-poem.

We cannot sufficiently praise the performance. One could pick out individual excellences, the exquisite flute-playing and the delicate violin work at the point where memories of the past enter, but it is unnecessary; the whole orchestra played gloriously. And the reading of the work was one which must redound to Mr. Gericke's credit; it gained by the moderation with which it was performed; there was no attempt to inflate the emotions portrayed; everything was set forth powerfully and clearly, but never sensationally.

Even the chronic fault-finders must have been convinced that Mr. Gericke showed real greatness by his interpretation of this work. We were glad to see the audience pour out some of the resultant enthusiasm, at the end of the work, upon the poetic conductor.

Then came another view of Fate, this time "a la Russe." It was a bold, but wise, step to place the Tchaikovsky work after the Strauss composition. The grandeur of Sophocles does not abolish the vehemence of Sudermann or Ibsen; yet perhaps the juxtaposition was unfair to the Russian, who, although a genius in his way, has not the titanic power of the great German.

There were many fanfares at the beginning of the symphony, some of which reminded of the introduction of Schumann's B-flat symphony, seen through a glass (of vodka) darkly. The second movement, in song-style, was delightfully tuneful and gave the oboe a fine chance to do masterly work in folk-song melody, which M. Longy performed most delicately. The subordinate theme which follows is not far removed from light-opera music. The return of the first melody, this time upon the bassoon, gave that instrument a chance to give an excellent "obbligato."

The third movement, a spley little song-form with trio, was finely given by the strings, although, at the beginning of the trio, when the woodwind entered, there was an aberration of intonation (for once) between the two orchestral departments.

The finale is a peasant's orgie, more innocent than that one in which Berlioz caused Childe Harold to seek relief. Tchaikovsky desired to picture a relief from the scourings of Fate by going direct to the healthy life of the people and watching their enjoyments. But we must place Strauss' clear-eyed facing of doom on a much higher plane than Berlioz's absinthe and brandy, or Tchaikovsky's village festival among the moujiks. We cannot find much more than a case of nervous depression and physical relief in the emotions of the symphony. Possibly a musical picture of a game of golf as an antidote would have been quite as successful a climax.

But we prefer not to take Tchaikovsky's psychology, as here displayed, too seriously. Let it suffice that the work had some splendid orchestration, was tuneful, enjoyable and intelligible. We need not always be studying great problems or suffering "Weltschmerz" when he listen to music.

Louis C. Elson.

MUSIC NOTES.

At Mr. Higginson's request the symphony concert of next Saturday will become a memorial service in honor of Mrs. Charles Russell Lowell, and the programme will be changed to include Beethoven's Heroic symphony and Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony.

3 Bands. "The Forest Dove" Oct. 13, 1905

Dvorak's tone poem, "The Forest Dove," which the Symphony Orchestra is playing for the first times here, today and tomorrow, is one of the group of such pieces that he wrote in the quiet of his last years at Prague. The folksongs and the legends of Bohemia seemed to renew their appeal to him in his old age, and in them he found the imaginative and, sometimes, the musical ideas that underlie "The Forest Dove" and the three companion pieces. As Bohemian folk tales go, the souls of the good return after death as white doves to their former dwelling place, and a ballad embodying this fancy gave Dvorak the "literary" material for his music. A widow mourns her dead husband, and even as she weeps comes a new suitor that pleases. The wedding begins almost as the funeral rites end. But a white dove sits and watches and moans on a tree in the neighboring forest. It is the soul of the dead husband; and the dove's wails are so searching that the widow takes her life. For has she not poisoned the good husband that new wooers may come? It is easy to guess Dvorak's musical treatment of the tale—the mourning, the wooing, the wedding festival, the wailing dove, the remorseful woman. It seems fit material for musical narrative, and he was practised in the art of it.

SYMPHONY Seats For Sale and To Rent
CONNELLY'S Ticket Office, Adams House
21 (A) o 18

FOR SALE

One half Symphony Rehearsal Ticket, alternate days, beginning Oct. 27; price $15.58. Address W.N.R., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TICKET
SINGLE SEAT
First Balcony, price $24. Address G.C.C., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS
FOR SALE—Two seats on floor; W 28, 29; $7.50 each. P.H.D., Boston Transcript. SW(A): o 21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Beginning of Its First Quarter Century—Its Start in New York.

As the coming season marks the end of the first quarter century in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so it will be the twentieth in which that organization has given concerts in New York, for it was not until the orchestra was five years old that its first concert was given in Steinway Hall. Then, as now, Mr. Gericke was the conductor, but conditions were very different. Concertgoers who attend the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall have difficulty in realizing what a long, hard fight it was to build up the splendid patronage that is now found in New York, a work of the better part of the nineteen years that it has visited this city. The growth was always sure, but at first very slow. Steinway Hall was deserted for Chickering, and Chickering in turn gave way to the Metropolitan Opera House, and finally, seven years ago, the orchestra moved to Carnegie Hall and doubled the number of its New York concerts, giving five Saturday matinees in addition to its five Thursday evening concerts.

This move was greeted at the time with much skepticism, but its wisdom was demonstrated from the beginning. Since the season of 1899-1900, when ten concerts were given for the first time, the patronage has steadily and rapidly increased, until last season it was rare that Carnegie Hall was not filled to its utmost capacity.

What was true last year will be true this. The renewals of subscriptions which has been going on for the last few weeks is larger than ever before, and the prospects for a large season sale were never so good as they are now. This season sale for new subscribers opens to-morrow morning at the Carnegie Hall box office, Luckhardt & Belder's, 10 East Seventeenth Street, and at Tyson's. The prices will be the same as last year, $7.50, $6, $5, and $3, with boxes at $50 and $40.

The dates of the concerts are as follows: Thursday evenings, Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 15, and March 15, and Saturday afternoons, Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 17, and March 17.

A particular interesting series of concerts is promised. Mr. Gericke will conduct all the concerts except those in December, which will have as their conductor M. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer. An invitation was extended to M. d'Indy last Summer to come to America this Winter and conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of its concerts. This he accepted with much pleasure, and the concerts assigned to him are two in Boston, two in New York, and one each in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington.

This will be his first visit to America. M. d'Indy is the leader of that school known as "the younger Frenchmen," and to-day is the unquestioned dictator of things musical in France. Much of his music has been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As a conductor M. d'Indy has been successful in Germany and Austria, whither he has gone as guest several times. His two New York programmes will be composed largely of modern French music, for the most part unknown to New York.

LUTSCHG NEXT SYMPHONY STAR

Boston Traveler

Brilliant Young Russian Pianist
Will Delight Music Lovers at Next Week's Concerts.

Oct. 14, 1905.

The programme for next week's Symphony concerts (Friday afternoon and Saturday evening), the second in the series, is one of unusual interest. Not only will it bring to Boston an unknown pianist and an unknown work by the Bohemian composer Smetana, but it will contain two of the most attractive works of Richard Strauss and Tschalkowsky.

The soloist will be Waldemar Lutschg, who on Friday afternoon will make his debut in America. Mr. Lutschg is a young Russian whose coming to this country was preceded by most favorable reports. He is a Russian by birth and parentage, having been born in St. Petersburg.

Smetana is a most familiar name to the patrons of the Symphony concerts, and the announcement that an unknown work from his hand is to be played has attracted much attention. It is the overture to his opera "Libussa," and so far as is known, this has never been played in America.

The programme in full is as follows:

Smetana..... Overture, "Libussa"
(First Time.)
Liszt. Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2 in A major
Richard Strauss. "Death and Transfiguration"
Tschalkowsky.... Symphony No. 4 in F minor
Soloist—Waldemar Lutschg.

THE LISTENER

Trans. Oct. 25, 1905

"I really believe," said a much-travelled connoisseur the other day, "that you Boston people, in spite of all your talk about it, don't know what a good thing you have got in the Symphony Orchestra. If you should ever have brought here the orchestras you read about in other cities, one after another, your self-satisfaction would be simply insufferable." The bare sight of the Saturday nights at Symphony Hall, is enough to show that Boston knows its good thing sufficiently to rally to it as it cannot be made to do to grand opera and at about the same prices. Here is always the most distinguished and most characteristic audience that Boston ever assembles, all in its best dress. Every seat, from stage to statues, is filled; and the interest is of the kind that can be felt by the expert at public shows; it is running throughout the house unmistakably genuine, eager and intense, at least always at the start. Undoubtedly where Mr. Gericke conducts there is the best orchestra. No, we are not indifferent to, or oblivious of the truth that we have for regular diet the very finest music in the world!

+ + +

And yet it seemed to the Listener the other night that we have not drawn out of it with due consciousness of its importance, the whole of the significance, moral and social, of a symphony performance. Apart from, and in addition to, all questions of art, there is much merely in the organization of the band, merely in the fabric of the composition on which the orchestra does its work. Taken together, they form a curiously complete parallel to the world we live in and all its goings-on. You might almost say that a great orchestra performing a Beethoven symphony illustrates both the world itself and all those living in it, is in fact a microcosm—a little world or cosmos, an epitome, physically and morally, of the universe or great world. There are grand divisions of the orchestra that might typify orders of creation or races of men. There are "classes and masses;" there are the great swells of soloists, with the required entourage of ordinary folks. There are tremendous stresses and storms of public feeling sweeping it, and again levels of the happy everyday living and its experiences of joys or sorrows. Above all, there are personal episodes carried on between instruments, pretty little dramas of love or grand passions forbidden, half hidden away in the accompaniment or development, perhaps, through suggestions and understandings that finally grow to a tragic climax. There are heartbreaking pathos and vague poetic yearnings, forming the undertone of whole passages of interest, as it were the plaints of helpless spectators of fate.

+ + +

In short almost everything that goes on in the world goes on in a way in the orchestra sooner or later in a programme of great compositions such as the magnificent layout of last Saturday night which Mr.

Gericke with characteristic reserve presented on the second instead of the first night, with Smetana, Richard Strauss and Tschalkowsky the chief dramaturgists—a stalwart mediaeval queen's caprice, marriage and glory—a dying man's struggle with delirium and uplifting into transfiguration—a picture of the mind of a happy lover, and the isolation of his joy from that of the healthier, unconscious holiday-makers at a country fair. But with all this going on in the music one wonders that the elements can be prevented from falling into confusion. Why does not such nebulous stuff only whirl to a grand smash? Sometimes it has seemed strange that the world of men does not stop, in the enormity say of such a crash as that of mighty Russia's downfall before little Japan, or such a moral cataclysm as the revelations of "big men's" coarse looting of the great insurance trusts—in the presence of such private shocks as turn men's hair gray, break up families and leave life "never the same again;" yet the world must and does go on all the same. The sun rises again on time, the stars come out at night, the sun shines and the wind blows, and not only the trees and the dumb animals, but the people in the street, people indeed in the same house or office, go about their ways blithely as before. All the episodes and all the performers in them, no matter what their sort, are bound by law and are driven along at the prescribed tempo. Diverse as their purposes may seem to be at moments they only end in falling into the scheme of the composition like the figures on a piece of tapestry—like a tale that is told of human life and love and woe.

+ + +

Now, here are a hundred men, each one an admired musician, the pride of some town, it may be in Russia, or Poland, or Roumania, or of Paris, or Vienna, many a one a prodigy at first and then a marked man, excelling his fellow musical students. Such a virtuoso, of course, has his own artistic individuality, his personal ideas of how passion or pathos is expressed, his peculiar poetic taste and polish of phrase. Yet without his fellows, even he is as another in such music. Occasionally he may display the heaven-born hue and flash of beauty in the turn of a solo sentence or two; but for the most part his work must be uniform with that of the rest and so go to swell the tide of beauty of the whole. Never was there a more cogent forcing home upon the mind of the truth that we must all live with one another and by and for one another, whether we would or no. Not even genius is a law to itself, or at liberty to distort the picture. The greatest virtuoso, if he set at naught the demands of time and tune, would simply have to be excluded. The best of us must play the game of life as it is played; and it must be admitted that, as only a few are soloists, most of us are not, and that over all there must be the authoritative, accepted leadership to which all are alike obedient and from which all may in turn depend on having what the didactic President calls "the square deal." Only thus is the great orchestra for great music made and played, and only so wags on the world of human society.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

IN MEMORY OF
MRS. CHARLES RUSSELL LOWELL.

SCHUBERT.

UNFINISHED SYMPHONY.

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Andante con moto.

DVOŘÁK.

CONCERTO in B minor for Violoncello, op. 104.

- I. Allegro.
- I. Adagio ma non troppo.
- III. Finale: Allegro moderato.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY in E flat major, No. 3, "Eroica," op. 55

- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
- III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace: Trio.
- IV. Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Mr. HEINRICH WARNKE.

51
ing what the didactic President calls "the square deal." Only thus is the great orchestra for great music made and played, and only so wags on the world of human society.

53
Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

IN MEMORY OF
MRS. CHARLES RUSSELL LOWELL.

SCHUBERT.

UNFINISHED SYMPHONY.

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Andante con moto.

DVOŘÁK.

CONCERTO in B minor for Violoncello, op. 104.

- I. Allegro.
- II. Adagio ma non troppo.
- III. Finale: Allegro moderato.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY in E flat major, No. 3, "Eroica," op. 55

- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
- III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace: Trio.
- IV. Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Mr. HEINRICH WARNKE.

Heinrich Warnke, New First 'Cellist of Symphony Orchestra, Sails in Week

HEINRICH WARNKE.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Schubert—Unfinished Symphony. G. M. 10.05
Dvorak—Violoncello Concerto in B minor.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.
Beethoven—Heroic Symphony.

The concert was a tribute from the founder of the orchestra to the memory of a great and good woman, one affiliated closely to Boston and connected with two of our worthiest families—Mrs. Charles Russell Lowell. A laurel wreath upon the stage emphasized the fact of the memorial character of the occasion. It might have been well also to have quoted the recent sketch of the heroine (from "The Outlook") in the programme book.

The Schubert symphony was written in the days when Music, Heavenly Maid, was young, and yet beautiful; before these latter times when she has grown ugly and careworn with worrying over many unsolvable problems. Dvorak once wrote that he considered the symphonies Schubert's greatest title to fame. Yet even in this charming work, or in the more powerful C-major symphony, we find a song-writer using the orchestra, just as in Beethoven's "Fidello" we find an orchestral mind using the voice. Schubert thought vocally, and the fact is evident even in his chief instrumental works. This is not a defect, but it causes one to judge the work differently. Beethoven wins his effects by development of figures, Schubert by contrasting melodies. There was evident appreciation of the symphony on the part of the audience, and Mr. Gericke was twice recalled to bow to the long-continued applause.

The Dvorak concerto introduced our new violoncellist, Mr. Warnke. The chief interest of the concert centred upon this work because of this fact. The concerto itself was quite in line with the central idea of the concert, being subdued and melancholy, even elegiac in character. We do not consider the work a grateful one for a debut. The figure development of the first movement is carried to excess, and in the first movement the ingenuity of treatment does not quite offset the "damnable iteration."

The Adagio is the best part of the composition, and the contrasts of melancholy and fury were well-made. The duet work for flute, with the solo instrument, gave Mr. Maquarre an opportunity to shine. The finale began heroically with hints at military glory; but with a Bohemian the paths of glory lead but into minor; your true Czech is as fond of brooding as he is of Goulasch.

The dialogue between the oboe and the cello in the Adagio ought also to be chronicled, although the symphony gave M. Longy more opportunities. Two soliloquies for the violoncello, in the two last movements, were especially expressive.

It was a difficult occasion for Mr.

Warnke. We have always had great masters of his instrument in our orchestra even from the days of Fritz Giese; even our second cellists have often been of very high rank. To come after such a procession as Giese, Hekking, Schulz, Schroeder and Krasselt, is a trying ordeal. Then, too, the concerto has a long orchestral exposition before a solo note is heard; during this the artist can think upon his sins and get up a fine attack of nervousness. Yet, when Mr. Warnke began we were at once impressed with his purity of style. His intonation is impeccable, and in the Adagio he showed that he is a master of expressive, sympathetic tone. His surety in double-stopping and in high position work is commendable. But he seems not to have the breadth of some of his predecessors nor their fire. He is likely to shine more as a painter in miniature, as a chamber-musician. Of that the reviewer may be able to judge tonight at the concert of the Boston Symphony Quartette. Mr. Warnke was very warmly received, and recalled three times at the end of his performance.

Then came Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony. Mr. Gericke read the first movement with an abundance of spirit, but for once he omitted the repeat of the exposition. At the end of the development, where the horn enters against the violins with the tonic harmony against the dominant, the conductor represses the violins and augments the power of the horn, so that the war of harmonies is not perceived. This is polishing a rough point unnecessarily.

Yet Beethoven's hero seems a very quiet gentleman compared with Strauss's combative party, whom we have met in "Heldenleben." It is a pity that Carlyle could not have written an appendix to his great essay, and treated of hero-worship in music. He would have descanted liberally upon the idea of lauding ones-self as Strauss has done, and would surely have made a chapter on "Every man his own hero!" Beethoven is guiltless of any such fantastic proceeding.

In that great funeral march which Coleridge called "a funeral in purple," in which Beethoven buries his hopes of liberty and Napoleon together, the oboe playing was beautiful, full of grief in the first theme and of consolation in the Trio, and that great orchestral sob at the close was remarkably impressive. In the Scherzo, that movement which has evoked more comments than Shakespeare's "Ducdame" ("As You Like It") the horns did good work. Once their part in this was considered as difficult as any horn passage in existence.

The finale was rather roughly played for our symphony orchestra, but it was a great reading as a whole for which credit is due Mr. Gericke. The Heroic symphony does not wear quite as well as some of the other Beethoven symphonies, possibly because in just this field of combat and strife the modern school has found its best mood, and with increased forces and much greater orchestral virtuosity gives more powerfully dramatic tone-pictures than ever were dreamed of in 1804.

Louis C. Elson.

MUSIC IN MEMORY OF MRS. LOWELL

Third Symphony Concert Is Also Occasion of First Appearance as Soloist of Mr.
Warnke.

LATTER IS 'CELLIST OF INDISPUTABLE PARTS

Dvorak Concerto, However,
Not in Keeping with Ceremonial Spirit of Evening—
"Eroica" and Schubert.

Herald — Oct. 29, 1905

The third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall.
The programme was as follows:

Unfinished Symphony.....Schubert
Concerto for 'cello.....Dvorak
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica".....Beethoven

The concert was in memory of Mrs.
Charles Russell Lowell, and the symphonies were chosen as appropriate to the occasion. A concert of this nature may well be free from critical and detailed discussion, even if the symphonies were not so familiar as to make any long consideration of them an almost impertinence, save as to questions arising from the manner of the performance.
Yet it may not be out of place to say a few words about the character of memorial or commemorative music.

There is music that may be fitly played or sung because it was dear to the departed or because, associated with them it has some private and significant meaning. Even music that is not in itself serious or deeply emotional may thus be charged with sentiment and become, in connection with the memory strangely sacred. "For even that vulgar and tavern music," says Sir Thomas Browne, "which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes in me a deep fit of devotion and a profound contemplation of the first composer." A waltz or a humble ditty in which a beloved one found pleasure can never again be to those recalling this personal taste merely a tune for dancing or a street song.

There is music which by its nature is a lament and for general application—

a funeral march or ode, written without specific thought of an individual.

Then there is the music composed deliberately in memory of a friend or of a public man. Much of this music is conventional, perfunctory. Yet there have been striking works written of late years. Tchaikowsky loved the man Nicholas Rubinstein, though he often stood in fear of his musical judgment or was irritated by it, and when he wrote the noble piano trio dedicated to the memory of Nicholas, he included a set of variations in which he endeavored to portray certain characteristics of his friend, as, for instance, his passion for dancing, so that strains that might seem to the outsider incongruous in such a work by reason of their frivolity are to those acquainted with the purpose of the composer and the character of Rubinstein full of significance, and they form an indispensable part of the tribute. So Hans Koessler, in his Symphonic Variations "dedicated to the manes of Johannes Brahms," which have been played at these concerts, attempted to portray to the audience his first meeting with Brahms in Hungary. Brahms as a friend, Brahms as the friend of children, Brahms as a friend of nature and as a humorist, and the final variation is entitled "He has given an example for emulation," the example apparently being a double fugue. But Koessler is not a Tchaikowsky, and the latter was not guilty of the folly of a programme in his memorial tribute.

Surely, no one would deny the melancholy beauty of the first movement of Schubert's symphony, with its lyricism that is appealingly feminine, with its melancholy that is without touch of peevishness and without taint of pessimism; and the second movement has the serenity—that is, Schubert's romantic serenity—which is another thing than the classic serenity of Mozart, the quiet beauty and the restrained passion of a Grecian frieze.

But the "Eroica"? Had not Napoleon disappointed Beethoven's hope of him, the symphony would now be dedicated to him, as it was originally in the manuscript score. It is not necessary to go so far as Wagner went in his explanation of the symphony—as though there were need of any explanation, as though the word "Eroica" with the music were not enough! At the same time, a hearer, wondering at certain pages in the symphony, or perplexed, not being able, unaided, to see their connection with the dominating idea of the work, may be thankful for some of Wagner's hints.

The symphony is for humanity, not for an individual. The mighty dead march is for humanity, not alone for the restless man, who, dying at St.
Helena, was borne years after and unknowing in triumph through the streets of Paris to his imposing tomb. Nor is the heroic life reserved only for warrior or statesman. It is not lived solely by man. There have been women whose lives spent in gracious ministration may justly be described as heroic,
as there have been saints in humble villages whose names are not recorded in any hagiology. And it should be remembered that in the tribute to Mrs.
Lowell there was, inevitably, through association, the thought of manly lives and manly deeds of heroism.

Mr. Heinrich Warnke made his first appearance in this country as a virtuoso.
Before the change of programme was announced, he had chosen Dvorak's concerto as his piece for display. He is a 'cellist of indisputable parts, but there are very few concertos for any instrument that would have been in keeping with the ceremonial spirit of the evening, and Dvorak's work, which on the whole is interminably soulless, is not among them. There will be other opportunities of judging Mr. Warnke's artistry.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last week's Symphony program, which was in memory of the late Mrs Charles Russell Lowell, was unusually long, although only three composers were listed, Schubert, Dvorak and Beethoven.
Mr Heinrich Warnke, the new first cellist of the orchestra, made his local debut as a soloist, playing Dvorak's B minor concerto. Schubert's unfinished
B minor symphony and Beethoven's
"Eroica" symphony completed the selections. It is a well known fact that Mr Schroeder assisted Dvorak in writing the cello concerto, with the result that the work is considered one of the foremost as well as difficult compositions for that instrument produced in recent years. The first movement gives prominence to the orchestra, the solo instrument being heard mainly in some florid passages, simple themes of secondary importance as related to the orchestral body. The subsequent movements give greater scope to the soloist.

Mr Warnke's performance was masterly throughout, his whole interpretation showing him to be a cellist whose skill is of the highest order. His tone is pure and resonant, his bowing graceful, and there appeared to be no difficulties in fingering which he could not easily compass. The simpler themes in the first part were "sung" with fine sentiment and limpidity of tone, at times suggesting, in the upper register, the violin. In the second movement there was the requisite brilliancy of execution, the complex and elaborate development of the different phrases were beautifully worked out, clarity of tone not being sacrificed by rapid finger work and the chord passages were run smoothly in harmoniously. The triple themes in the finale, with the tempo constantly changing, form a somewhat unusual combination of "stumbling blocks," but the soloist and the orchestra managed them in perfect time, giving a splendid example to ensemble playing.

The concerto is of great length and taxes the performer severely, but Mr Warnke met all physical demands as thoroughly as he did the technical, and at the close of each movement the artist was heartily applauded.

The orchestra deserves the usual measure of praise for its contributions to the program. Mr Warnke would not have found a better or more sympathetic musical assistance. In the impressive Schubert work the interpretation was exquisite and the great "Eroica" symphony was played with splendid effect.

This week's program will be composed entirely of excerpts from Wagner's works. Mme Gadski and Mr Ellison
Van Hoose will be the soloists. Next week the orchestra will make the first of its regular trips to other cities.

Our New 'Cellist

There is a fatality for modern composers in concertos for violoncello, and that fatality, we fear, lies in the narrow range and the rather monotonous color of the instrument itself. After all the true place of the 'cello is as one of the darker and deeper voices of the string choir. There its incidental solo utterances tell, because, if the composer is wise, he uses only its richness and fullness and uses them not too long. Once oboes and all their brethren in the wood-wind group were solo instruments in the conventional sense. Handel and Mozart wrote concertos for them. Now we think of them only in their place in the orchestra or as the sweetmeats of a chamber concert. The same fate is in store for the violoncello, and every year brings it nearer unless some composer shall arise as by a miracle with the gift to write interesting concertos for the instrument. The older men wrote without self-consciousness, doubts or apology when they approached that task. The modern feels the burden of it almost before he has set pen to music-paper. Imagination and vitality desert him.
He contrives patterns in tones and the lines are cold, monotonous and hard. He devises "passage-work" to display virtuoso and instrument, and toils visibly and audibly at his task. He reaches out for any harmonic or instrumental resource that will lighten his labor and their fruits, and you hear a twitch and a creak as he puts it in place.
Dvorak does all these things in the concerto that he wrote for 'cello and that Mr.
Warnke played last Friday and Saturday.
He does them no more successfully than most other moderns. The more he is diligent, the more he is dull.

It is for the virtuoso to lessen and to relieve this dullness, and often Mr. Warnke held the listener's interest where Dvorak did not. There is no need to dwell upon his virtuosity. It was virtuosity of the finer and higher sort that serves its purpose when it is an untrammelled means to musical and emotional expression, and in the accomplishment of that hides itself. Yet it had something of the fineness, the delicacy and the continence that seemed Mr.
Warnke's best traits. He never forces his instrument and it is so easy, so inviting, to force the tone of a 'cello in the plaintive cantilena that composers always write for
it. In the most intricate of "passage-work"
Mr. Warnke never lets you believe that he is doing technical "stunts." He persuades you, again by that same fineness and reserve, that he is only weaving a compleweb in tones with a sure, fine hand. It so equally with his tone: Other 'cellists have given forth a larger, richer and deeper. His has a peculiar, penetrating fineness.
It is persuasively clear, clean and flowing as it follows the contour of a melody, plays through the figuration that adorns
There is life in the tone, but a delicate life that is all sensitive responsiveness.
Tints and half-tints constantly vary, and animate it, and sometimes very sub-

The body of it is always ebbing and flowing to the musical and emotional mood. Now and then you hear it as a new and finer voice than you have been wont to hear from the 'cello. In a sense Mr. Wernke represses his instrument, but oftenest in doing so makes it a finer one. H. T. P.

AN EXCEPTIONAL SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Higginson Honors the Memory of Mrs. Lowell—Next Week's Opera—Chamber Music Begins—Coming Concerts and Recitals—A Symposium About Bach—Singers and Virtuosi

Trans. — Oct. 28, 1905

It was an exceptional concert that the Symphony Orchestra gave yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and with two numbers of its programme the reviewer in the ordinary practice of his calling has little, under the circumstances, to do. The concert began with Schubert's "unfinished" symphony. It ended with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Between the two came Dvorak's concerto for violoncello, in which Mr. Warnke, the new principal 'cellist of the band, made his first appearance, apart from it. The concerto and the new virtuoso are the reviewer's concern, and we shall write of them at length on Monday. The two symphonies were not played, as they usually are, as so much absolute music for our pleasure. They were played at Mr. Higginson's request to recall and to honor the memory of Mrs. Josephine Shaw Lowell, who died in New York not many weeks ago. Behind, but still bright, were the memories of the two families whose names she bore, and, brightest of all, of those of both houses who gave their lives in the Civil War. Our finest piece of sculpture bears daily witness to one of them. Yesterday it fell to another art, in the particular name of sister or of wife, to honor them all.

There was the art of music at its fullest and finest in the concert. Who shall write new praise now of the two symphonies? But neither they nor the art that they incarnate were serving their usual purpose. Yesterday it was for the "Eroica" symphony, in all its glorified voices, to recall with the transfiguring power of beautiful sound a noble life lived well, a life that ran rich and full and that gave lavishly of its richness and fulness. It was for that same power of sound to recall a little of the stress and suffering in which some of that life was lived as it gave to the state those that it held dearest. It was most of all for it to publish a solemn grief and to exalt an illustrious memory. Such mourning and such proclamations were for it and for Beethoven. More intimate and more lyric were the passion and the beauty of Schubert's fragment. Here was the passionate longing that is music's peculiar voice, and passionate regret, and side by side with them the lyric beauty that soothes and softens. The "Eroica" symphony had been a stately mourning. The unfinished symphony was as the voice of personal griefs. Beethoven's music proclaimed a life well fought and an exalted memory. In Schubert's played the light of the ideal for which that life was lived and the light that will suffuse the memory of it for them that cherish it. In Schubert were the human cry and the human solace. A woman's memory asked his music. Beethoven's was for her, and both her houses, and all her heroes. H. T. P.

Mr. Gericke was warmly received at the Symphony concert last Saturday evening, and was warmly applauded at the end of the performance of Goldmark's "Spring" overture and of Beethoven's second symphony. In the former the orchestra surpassed even the spontaneous virtuosity that it has shown on Friday afternoon. The audience listened rather coldly to Dvorak's "Forest Dove." It was too critical—or expected too much—to let the music entertain it, and to take the symphonic poem seriously is to discover every lame, wobbly or halting spot in it. Mme. Homer sang better than she had on the preceding day, and the audience recalled her many times.

WILL JOIN SYMPHONY.

John C. Mullaly Leaves Hollis-St Theatre Orchestra After 18 Years as Leader. Globe July 11, 1905

John C. Mullaly, the well-known leader of the Hollis-st theatre orchestra, has resigned, and it is said will join the Boston Symphony orchestra as first violinist.

Mr. Mullaly has for 18 years been at the head of the Hollis-st orchestra. It is several weeks since he handed in his resignation, although it is only now it has become public on his return from Milwaukee. He is now in Newport, where he is conducting an orchestra of Boston Symphony members on the horseshoe piazza of the Casino.

Mr. Mullaly took charge of the orchestra at the Hollis-st theatre in 1887, immediately on the retirement of Mr. Lorsch. He had previously been for 11 years connected with the old Globe theatre.

Mr. Mullaly began the study of the violin when 10 years old, and at the age of 11 was playing with his father's orchestra in Wallack's theatre, New York. He later studied under Zeis, and in 1882 came to Boston. His first engagement in Boston was with D. C. Hall and later he joined Gilmore's band, remaining with it for eight years. Through Gilmore he became a member of the Harvard musical association.

In 1872 he went to the Boston theatre to play first violin for the Beethoven quintet club, in which he was associated with Fries, Kopplitz and Heindl. He succeeded Kopplitz at the Globe in 1885, remaining there a year. He has played in quartets with Wieniaski, Camilla Urso and Vieuxtemps, a privilege that has fallen to the lot of few American violinists.

SYMPHONY TRIBUTE TO MRS. CHARLES R. LOWELL.

Boston American—Oct 29, 05

By Kent Perkins.

Remarkable, indeed, was the third Symphony concert of the season last night in Symphony Hall—remarkable both in its conception and its execution, for it was given as a memorial to a noble woman, Mrs. Charles Russell Lowell (Josephine Shaw), who died recently in New York, and the tribute of music in its highest forms was paid in a spirit of tenderness and devotion that harmonized most completely with the central idea of the occasion.

Boston society was fully represented in the great audience, particularly that portion of it which knew, loved and honored Mrs. Lowell and the two distinguished families whose names she bore. A spirit of dignified solemnity was upon the house; the usual festal tone was markedly absent, and recognition of the orchestra's and soloist's splendid work was given warmly but with subdued enthusiasm.

At Major Henry L. Higginson's request the orchestra played Schubert's "unfinished" symphony in B minor and Beethoven's "Heroic" Symphony, No. 3, the first to open the concert and the second to close it. There are not two works in the wide range of musical composition that could more fittingly be used as tributes to the memory of Mrs. Lowell and what she represented.

In the marvellously beautiful lyric work of Schubert there sings the yearning affection of intimate friends and of family. In the "Heroic" symphony there is sounded a deeper and broader paean to the nobility of high endeavor and glorious self-sacrifice—for humanity and for country.

Between these two works Heinrich Warnke, the new chief 'cellist of the orchestra, played Dvorak's concerto in B minor. It was Mr. Warnke's first appearance as a soloist and his efforts were received with a demonstration that was as lively as the occasion allowed. He proved that he was an artist of the first rank. His bowing was smooth and pleasingly devoid of rasping; his tone was of golden purity and limpid clearness and he gave remarkably forceful expression to both the passion and pathos that ran through this work of Dvorak.

At the next concert, the fourth, Mme. Gadsdi and Ellison Van Hoose will be heard as soloists in a Wagner programme.

The Boston Post

NEW 'CELLO SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the third Symphony concert, last evening (as a memorial to Mrs. Charles Russell Lowell), included the following numbers, Mr. Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist, being the soloist: Unfinished symphony in B minor.....Schubert Concerto for 'cello, op. 104.....Dvorak Symphony in E flat, "Heroic".....Beethoven

This was not the programme originally intended for performance, but was changed at the desire of Mr. Higginson, in memory of Mrs. Charles Russell Lowell, whose death occurred recently. The orchestral numbers are old favorites and shining lights in the classic repertory, notwithstanding the fact that Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony is one of the longest of the nine written by him and among the longest by any composer living or dead. The unfinished symphony of Schubert is one that is eternally fresh in spirit, and in it there is melody enough to supply at least 50 composers of the present day.

The performance of both symphonies proved most enjoyable to the audience.

Mr. Heinrich Warnke, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, made his initial public appearance in America as soloist on this occasion. He is about 35 years of age, born at Wesselburen, Germany, and for the past eight years has been first 'cellist of the Kalm Orchestra at Munich. This season he joined the local Symphony Orchestra, succeeding Rudolf Krasselt.

Mr. Warnke played the B minor concerto by Dvorak, one of the works written by him while a resident of New York city, some 10 years ago. The work has been played in Boston, by Alwin Schroeder, who is said to have written much of the part of the solo instrument.

Mr. Warnke plays with only a moderate tone, which, however, is refined and pleasing, if not one that will haunt the memory of the listener. He is a mature artist of much temperament, and his interpretation of the concerto was authoritative and convincing. Mr. Warnke was warmly applauded and several times recalled.

A Wagner programme is offered for this coming week, with Mme. Gadsdi and Ellison Van Hoose as the soloists.

N VAN HOOSE.

MME. JOHANNA GADSKI.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, AT 8, P.M.

PROGRAMME.

- |        |   |
|--------|---|
|        | March of Homage.  |
|        | Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser "   |
| WAGNER | Elisabeth's Greeting from Act II., "Tannhäuser."(Instead of the duet. )   |
|        | Prize Song from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."   |
|        | Siegfried's Parting from Brünnhilde, Siegfried's Death andFuneral March, Closing Scene, from "The Dusk of theGods." |

Soloists:

Mme. GADSKI,

Mr. ELLISON VAN HOOSE.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

Ellison Van Hoose.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES A WAGNER CONCERT

Good Work by the Savage Company in "La Boheme"—Next Week's Operas—
Coming Concerts—A Grist of Miscellany

The Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its fourth pair of concerts yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gericke conducted and Mme. Gadske, making her first appearance in America for the new season, and Ellison Van Hoose, the tenor, were the singers. Wagner's music made the entire programme. Originally the duet between Tannhäuser and Venus in the first act of "Tannhäuser" stood upon it. As long ago as last August Mme. Gadske agreed to prepare the music of Venus, which was new to her. As recently as Thursday noon Mr. Gericke discovered that she had not prepared it and that it was too late to repair her neglect. A change in the programme became imperative, and Elisabeth's burst of song at the beginning of the second act of "Tannhäuser" was substituted for the longer excerpt. As the programme finally stood, it comprised the "Huldigungsmarsch," the Bacchanale and "Elisabeth's Greeting," from "Tannhäuser"; Walter's prize-song from "Die Meistersinger," the duet between Siegfried and Brünnhilde in the prologue to "Götterdämmerung," and Siegfried's last speech, his orchestral apotheosis and Brünnhilde's closing scena from the same music drama.

It was a "Wagner concert" and a "Wagner concert" has become a permissible and an established anomaly in cities that have no opera. Through his later years Wagner cried lustily against such concerts. His was music of the scene, he liked to say. It was, indeed, but one element in a fusion of all the arts of the theatre. There should be a pictorial background for it. Waves of light, often, should appeal to the eye simultaneously with the waves of sound that strike the ear. Dramatic action should accompany and emphasize it, while at the same time it should explain, illumine, or enforce that action. Sometimes it was linked to disembodied passion or to purely mental images. Often, as well, it was bound to material things or to the physical aspects of characters or actions passing at the moment before the spectator's eye. In a word, almost all of it was music of the theatre that lost many of its intrinsic qualities when it was transferred to the concert room.

Wagner's sense of humor was not conspicuous especially when it might have played about himself and his music, and, so far as the gossips have yet recorded, he never applied it to "Wagner concerts." He did not frequent them, and their full flowering indeed came long after his death. If he had known them, the humorous aspect of them might have struck him, as at perverse moments it strikes even the most serious and sympathetic of us that listen to them. Elisabeth, warmed anew to life by the return of her minstrel lover, comes joyfully again to the hall of the tournaments of song. Its arches frame her. Through them stretches the slopes and the sky of the Wartburg in the spring sunshine. She herself is as a virginal figure stepping from the illuminated page of a mediæval manuscript. Her gladness is on her lips. It is thrilling through the little orchestral introduction that brings her into the hall. Then it floods her, and she breaks in pure elation into the momentary outburst:

"Dich, theure Halle, grüss' ich wieder, Froh grüss' ich dich, geliebter Raum!"

It is the spontaneous cry of maidenly joy at a particular moment in a particular play. Wagner has imagined it with warm beauty and sympathy in his tones. And what happens at a "Wagner concert." The singer comes with measured step from the retiring room. A frock of the newest fashion clothes her. She salutes the audience in front of her and the band behind her. She stands decorously during the orchestral prelude. Then she sings, with what feeling she may, though to that throbbing climax of pure-hearted rejoicing:

"Sei mir gegrüsst, sei mir gegrüsst."

Outburst? Rejoicing? "Elisabeth's greeting" has become a mere concert number to display the singer's vocal art. Even Patti and Melba have so saluted the Hall of Song.

Recall for a moment the scene of Siegfried's death—the gathering darkness, the ominous flight of the ravens; Hagen's revengeful thrust; the tottering hero struggling to rear his shield and crush with it; his fall; the group of shrinking, fearsome barbarians around him; the silence broken only by the hollow drumbeats; the moment of final struggle and exaltation, the eyes that see nothing around, but do see in ecstatic vision the flame-bound rock and the Valkyr that sleeps upon it:

"Brünnhilde!
Hellige braut."

And an amiable gentleman in a frock coat, his hands clasped benignantly on his white waistcoat, is trying to persuade us that he is the expiring Siegfried, and not an admirable tenor in admirable voice.

Or out of the darkness, through the smoky torchlight of the Gibichungs' Hall comes the Valkyr herself to wall her dead hero. She apostrophizes gods and men. Divine, she reads from the book of fate. Human, she cries with a woman's agony. It is the supreme climax of a mighty tragedy. And here is the same lady from the retiring room. How pleasant is her hat to see! The Valkyr casts herself on the pyre. The mounting flames lick and kindle the very abode of the high gods. The old world crumbles. We all know how impotent is the scenic illusion in this end of the whole "Ring" drama to reach the height of Wagner's imaginings. But is it not the spark that lights our responsive mood while that orchestral postlude blows it into flame? Without the background of scenery and action, without the quick memory of all that has gone before, does that turbulent instrumental splendor carry its full significance?

It is to laugh or it is to cry when "Wagner concerts" are in question—if only our musical world was quite ideal. There are twenty arguments to uphold them: that half the listeners—you may doubt the proportion—are recalling all that Wagner wove around the music that they are hearing and recalling it in glorified memory; that they are grasping its purely musical content and detail as they could not grasp them in all the distractions of the theatre; that without such concerts we should not hear eminent conductors in Wagner's music; that in an opera-less city we should in fact hear none at all except a few preludes and fragments. But is this to say no more than that they are a permissible, tolerated, established, even well-liked anomaly, and that already custom has dulled us to some of their aspects. But in that ideal musical world of our visions there will be no anomalies. It has not yet dawned upon us here in Boston. Usually it seems as remote as other millenniums. Perhaps it will come when some one or some few think an opera, even an opera here in Boston, worth the endowing, or when we cease our affectation of superiority to the company of the Metropolitan Opera House. Its manager is one thing. Itself is another, one of the three or four great companies of the world, and the only one that can give us such opera as by our title as a musical capital we should welcome. A concert orchestra has its place in such a capital. So too has an opera.

To say all these things is not for a moment to depreciate Mr. Gericke or his "Wagner concert" of yesterday. He was a conductor in an opera house—and one of the foremost in Europe—before he was a conductor in the concert room. None of us is so well aware, none of us, probably, feels so keenly the anomalies that lurk in such concerts. His very programme shows that he tried as much as circumstances permitted, to avoid or to cloak them. The "March of Homage" may not be the most interesting music that Wagner wrote, but it is concert music. Siegfried's orchestral glorification proclaims that hero, though the theatre be miles away. The Bacchanale in the Venusberg, as we were saying only yesterday, becomes the more "the momentous background" that Wagner designed for the tragedy of "Tannhäuser," when the eye sees only the images that the music brings and not a gross and too tangible physical semblance of them. It is possible to listen to the Prize-Song as a pure and disembodied lyric. Within the inevitable limits of a "Wagner concert" Mr. Gericke's programme was well chosen. Besides, what orchestra in an opera house, with all the resources of theatre to aid, could play this music with such penetrating and suffusing beauty of tone, with such pliancy and subtlety and symmetry, with such illuminating detail and just feeling as did ours? Inevitably we tend to forget Wagner, the composer of music, in Wagner the architect of huge fabrics that employ all the arts. Once or twice a year our orchestra reminds us that Wagner the musician excels Wagner the actor, the scene-painter, what you will. Perhaps that is justification enough for "Wagner concerts" in Boston. H. T. P.

Journal Oct. 28, 1905

The fourth program of the season of Symphony concerts, for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, is one which will bring much pleasure to the patrons of the concerts. With two popular soloists, Mme. Gadski and Ellison Van Hoose, a program made up of excerpts from Wagner's works is always very attractive. The numbers chosen will not only be grateful to the singers, but will give full scope to the virtuosity of the orchestra. Mme. Gadski is now on the ocean, having sailed in the Kaiser Wilhelm II. from Bremerhaven last Tuesday. Her first appearance in this country will be with the orchestra, and she will also be the soloist at five of the six concerts the next week. It will be particularly interesting to hear her sing the excerpts from "Götterdämmerung," for since she was last here she has appeared in Munich as Brunnhilde in the third performance of "The Ring" at the summer festival at the Prinz Regenten Theater. Her success was very great, which will be gratifying to her friends in Boston, as it was the first time she had attempted any of the larger roles of Wagner in her native land. The program will include "Huldigungsmarsch," bacchanale and duet between Tannhäuser and Venus ("Tannhäuser," act I); prelude ("Die Meistersinger") (a) Siegfried's parting from Brunnhilde, (b) Siegfried's death, (c) funeral march, and (d) closing scene from "Götterdämmerung."

WANTED—TWO SYMPHONY REHEARSAL
TICKETS for alternate Friday afternoons (floor), desirable seats, at moderate price. Address S.E.M., Norfolk House, Roxbury.
(A):

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS
FOR SALE—Two seats on floor; W 28, 29; $37.50 each. P.H.D., Boston Transcript.
SW(A): o 21

TIGHT BINDING

SYMPHONY WAGNER NIGHT A GADSKI TRIUMPH.

Big Audience Greet Famous Soprano and Ellison Van Hoose, Tenor, with Enthusiasm at Fourth Concert

By Kent Perkins.

A Wagner night of the Symphony Orchestra with Mme. Gadski and Ellison Van Hoose as solo singers, this program for the fourth concert was sufficient to draw an immense and eager audience to Symphony Hall last night.

Severe critics are prone to carp at the anomaly of giving Wagner's music in concert and without complete dramatic accessories. Their theory is logically correct, but with such selections as Mr. Gericke chose last night, with the Symphony players to interpret the stirring harmonies, and in view of the fact that outside of such occasions the majority of Bostonians do not hear Wagner at all, logic and theory vanish in a sweeping storm of musical enthusiasm.

That is what happened last night. The people cared not at all that they heard Brunnhilde in a concert gown and that Siegfried died for them in immaculate evening dress. They wanted the music, rejoiced that they got it, and their imaginations supplied all that was needed of scenic effects.

The programme consisted of "March of Homage," written by Wagner as an expression of gratitude to his friend and benefactor, King Ludwig II. of Bavaria; as Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser," Eliza-beth's Greeting from Act II. of the same opera, Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger," Siegfried's parting from Brunnhilde, Siegfried's death and funeral march, and the closing scene from "The Dusk of the Gods."

Mme. Gadski's splendid voice was never in better condition, and she used it with particular inspiring effect in the Brunnhilde music. She was the embodiment of noble vigor and her clear and penetrating, indignant tones were instinct with the heroic pathos and triumphant passion of Wotan's daughter.

Mr. Van Hoose sang with his accustomed sweetness of tone, but his voice and man-ner do not measure up to the hero size of Siegfried. He was more satisfactory in the Prize Song, but even there he was not sufficiently in earnest. Both the soloists were frequently recalled after each of those numbers.

The orchestra played with magnificent spirit and the most delicate appreciation of the finest shadings. Their work was warmly applauded.

in Rio Janeiro and welcome the news of performances in Italy. There are few composers who are not eager to secure performances of their works under any conditions, however unfavorable these conditions may be.

There are other protestants who insist that excerpts from Wagnerian operas lose in effect when they are performed in a concert hall. As a matter of fact, they both lose and gain. The opera, or music drama if you prefer, is an appeal made at the same time to the ear and the eye, to the senses and the understanding. The hearer is also the spectator. He is supposed to be interested at one and the same moment in music, dramatic action, the intrigue of the plot, and, also, in the later Wagnerian operas, in metaphysics and in symbolism. Full, yet discriminative, appreciation of the music itself is hardly possible unless it is known both as absolute music, without dramatic connection, and as dramatic music in the opera house for which it was designed and constructed.

Again, some are disturbed by the appearance of Siegfried or of Wotan in a more or less irreproachable claw-hammer coat, of Brunnhilde in a concert dress and with a smile in gratitude for the applause that is to come. But on the operatic stage are there never disquieting apparitions? Siegfried is a beardless youth when he frees Brunnhilde. When he appears in "The Dusk of the Gods" he has whiskers. How long, pray, was he with Brunnhilde in the mountain cave before domesticity became harassing and the yearning to wander could no longer be resisted? Neither Wagner nor anyone of his grubbing commentators has thrown light on this important subject. Is not the sight of a massive and concrete Brunnhilde, the replica of a Germania statue on a brewery, disillusionizing? Does not the singing of many of the impersonators in "The Ring" break the spell?

And, finally, one excellent reason for a Wagner programme in a series of symphony concerts is that 99 out of 100 subscribers are highly pleased by it. They have few opportunities of hearing "The Ring," "Tristan" and "The Mastersingers." It gives them great delight to hear fragments of these operas performed by a great orchestra and with one or two singers of good repute.

The orchestral performance last night was one of uncommon splendor. There was as usual the inimitable euphony, the exquisite balance of tonal contrasts; but in addition there was dramatic spontaneity, uncommon elasticity, superb emotional breadth and sweep, supreme passion. Never before have we heard here the funeral music of Siegfried played with such deep significance and overwhelming grandeur.

The singers were fresh-voiced and in the vein. Mme. Gadski sang the monologue of Brunnhilde with a fine display of differentiation in dramatic emotions. She is one of the very few of the German sisterhood who, as Brunnhilde, does not trample arrogantly on all the fundamental laws of song. Mr. Van Hoose bore well his part.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL
J 13, Floor, $40. Less than cost
Address K.S.E., Boston Transcript
(A):

SYMPHONY
REHEARSAL TICKET, single seat, First Balcony, centre; $35. Address G.M.O., Boston Transcript.
2t(A): o 17

height of Wagner's imaginings. But is it not the spark that lights our responsive mood while that orchestral postlude blows it into flame? Without the background of scenery and action, without the quick memory of all that has gone before, does that turbulent instrumental splendor carry its full significance?

It is to laugh or it is to cry when "Wagner concerts" are in question—if only our musical world was quite ideal. There are twenty arguments to uphold them: that half the listeners—you may doubt the proportion—are recalling all that Wagner wove around the music that they are hearing and recalling it in glorified memory; that they are grasping its purely musical content and detail as they could not grasp them in all the distractions of the theatre; that without such concerts we should not hear eminent conductors in Wagner's music; that in an opera-less city we should in fact hear none at all except a few preludes and fragments. But is this to say no more than that they are a permissible, tolerated, established, even well-liked anomaly, and that already custom has dulled us to some of their aspects. But in that ideal musical world of our visions there will be no anomalies. It has not yet dawned upon us here in Boston. Usually it seems as remote as other millenniums. Perhaps it will come when some one or some few think an opera, even an opera here in Boston, worth the endowing, or when we cease our affectation of superiority to the company of the Metropolitan Opera House. Its manager is one thing. Itself is another, one of the three or four great companies of the world, and the only one that can give us such opera as by our title as a musical capital we should welcome. A concert orchestra has its place in such a capital. So too has an opera.

To say all these things is not for a moment to depreciate Mr. Gericke or his "Wagner concert" of yesterday. He was a conductor in an opera house—and one of the foremost in Europe—before he was a conductor in the concert room. None of us is so well aware, none of us, probably, feels so keenly the anomalies that lurk in such concerts. His very programme shows that he tried as much as circumstances permitted, to avoid or to cloak them. The "March of Homage" may not be the most interesting music that Wagner wrote, but it is concert music. Siegfried's orchestral glorification proclaims that hero, though the theatre be miles away. The Bacchanale in the Venusberg, as we were saying only yesterday, becomes the more "the momentous background" that Wagner designed for the tragedy of "Tannhäuser," when the eye sees only the images that the music brings and not a gross and too tangible physical semblance of them. It is possible to listen to the Prize-Song as a pure and disembodied lyric. Within the inevitable limits of a "Wagner concert" Mr. Gericke's programme was well chosen. Besides, what orchestra in an opera house, with all the resources of theatre to aid, could play this music with such penetrating and suffusing beauty and subtlety and luminating details? Inevitably, the composer, architect of his arts. One orchestra reminds of a painter, what justification ends in Boston.

RS.

ew Englan

iskey than all other

cause we are selling

e. Whiskey that is

ust such a Whiskey.

We deliver

1 Quarts

3.00 Express Paid

By Us.

of Wine FREE with

Every Order

3.00 EXPRESS PAID.

Bottle of Wh

With Every

on Old 56.....

tle Holland Gln.....

tle Cognac Brandy .....

tle Medford Rum.....

tle Duff Gordon Sherry.....

Jug and 4 Bottles .....

Gals. of Either 3 Gals.—One

00 Express 7.00

Prepaid

Old Colony I

Just a word about Old

Rum. This Rum is made, and will soon rank

as the highest. We ar

it at the very low price

4 Quarts 12 0

2.00 6.0

ress charges on all orders to the except Ales, Champagnes and ed in unlettered boxes.

ully packed against breakage and an Express same day as received.

money-saving price list. No goods

Cash must accompany each order.

Don't

Bottle

FR E

every large

ALL IS WAGNER AT SYMPHONY

Mme. Gadski and Mr. Van Hoose Are Soloists in Fourth Concert—Orchestra's Playing Especially Fine.

"FAUST" AT TREMONT
UNDIMMED TO CROWD

"Tannhaeuser" at Matinee—
Mr. Charles Anthony's
Piano Recital Shows Results of Summer Abroad.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, gave its fourth concert last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows: Wagner's March of Homage, and these excerpts from his operas: Bacchanale and Elisabeth's Greeting from "Tannhaeuser"; Prize song from "The Mastersingers"; Siegfried's parting from Bruennhilde, Siegfried's Death and Funeral March, and the Closing Scene from "The Dusk of the Gods." The programme was changed unavoidably at the last minute, and Elisabeth's Greeting was substituted for the duet of Venus and Tannhaeuser, according to the Parisian version. The solo singers were Mme. Gadski and Mr. Ellison Van Hoose.

The music itself is familiar, the singers are well known, and there is little to say about the orchestral performance save words of praise.

Some protest against Wagnerian concerts. Extreme Wagnerites are indignant at the injury thus done "the Master." They forget that Wagner himself, however he may have written in pamphlets about the importance of preserving the integrity of his works, was delighted in private life—if he can be said to have had any private life—whenever concerts of this nature were organized. He encouraged them, he conducted them, just as in one breath he would say that only Germans could perform and appreciate his operas, and then immediately dream of triumphs at the Paris Opera House or in Rio Janeiro and welcome the news of performances in Italy. There are few composers who are not eager to secure performances of their works under any conditions, however unfavorable these conditions may be.

There are other protestants who insist that excerpts from Wagnerian operas lose in effect when they are performed in a concert hall. As a matter of fact, they both lose and gain. The opera, or music drama if you prefer, is an appeal made at the same time to the ear and the eye, to the senses and the understanding. The hearer is also the spectator. He is supposed to be interested at one and the same moment in music, dramatic action, the intrigue of the plot, and, also, in the later Wagnerian operas, in metaphysics and in symbolism. Full, yet discriminative, appreciation of the music itself is hardly possible unless it is known both as absolute music, without dramatic connection, and as dramatic music in the opera house for which it was designed and constructed.

Again, some are disturbed by the appearance of Siegfried or of Wotan in a more or less irreproachable claw-hammer coat, of Bruennhilde in a concert dress and with a smile in gratitude for the applause that is to come. But on the operatic stage are there never disquieting apparitions? Siegfried is a beardless youth when he frees Bruennhilde. When he appears in "The Dusk of the Gods" he has whiskers. How long, pray, was he with Bruennhilde in the mountain cave before domesticity became harassing and the yearning to wander could no longer be resisted? Neither Wagner nor anyone of his grubbing commentators has thrown light on this important subject. Is not the sight of a massive and concrete Bruennhilde, the replica of a Germania statue on a brewery, disillusionizing? Does not the singing of many of the impersonators in "The Ring" break the spell? And, finally, one excellent reason for a Wagner programme in a series of symphony concerts is that 99 out of 100 subscribers are highly pleased by it. They have few opportunities of hearing "The Ring," "Tristan" and "The Mastersingers." It gives them great delight to hear fragments of these operas performed by a great orchestra and with one or two singers of good repute.

The orchestral performance last night was one of uncommon splendor. There was as usual the inimitable euphony, the exquisite balance of tonal contrasts; but in addition there was dramatic spontaneity, uncommon elasticity, superb emotional breadth and sweep, supreme passion. Never before have we heard here the funeral music of Siegfried played with such deep significance and overwhelming grandeur.

The singers were fresh-voiced and in the vein. Mme. Gadski sang the monologue of Bruennhilde with a fine display of differentiation in dramatic emotions. She is one of the very few of the German sisterhood who, as Bruennhilde, does not trample arrogantly on all the fundamental laws of song. Mr. Van Hoose bore well his part.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL
J 13, Floor, $40. Less than cost
Address K.S.E., Boston Transcript
(A):

SYMPHONY
REHEARSAL TICKET, single seat, First Balcony, centre; $35. Address G.M.O., Boston Transcript.
2t(A): o 17

FOURTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Wagner was the only composer represented on the fourth Symphony program, the orchestra having the assistance of Mme Gadski and Ellison Van Hoose in the vocal excerpts from the German master. The selections were, "March of Homage," "Bacchanale" and Elizabeth's "Greeting" from "Tannhauser," the "Prize Song" from "The Mastersingers" and scenes from "The Dusk of the Gods." The visiting artists are so well and favorably known that their joint appearance with the Symphony men aroused great interest in that class of intermittent patrons who flock to the hall on "special" occasions in hopes of getting seats in the upper balcony, and at noon the line of would-be attendants extended from the hall as far south as the Conservatory of music. As only the regulation number of seats were available hundreds were obliged to go away disappointed at not gaining admission.

There is no doubt that Wagner, selected, proves really more entertaining to the average musical ear than does the majority of his music dramas in which prolixity and profundity of musical expression make any of the scenes wearisome to all but enthusiastic Wagnerites and musical students with advanced ideas. Mr. Gericke's concert selections were judicious and the performance was thoroughly enjoyable from beginning to end.

Mme Gadski sang beautifully, her glorious voice being as flexible, rich and resonant as ever, and showing that dramatic quality so necessary in the Wagner roles and which is too seldom found associated with melodious utterance. Even the most emotional passages in the Brunnhilde music were sung and not shouted, and in this duet with Siegfried the charming prima donna gave renewed evidence that she is entitled to rank with the foremost interpreters of Wagner's war goddess. Mme Gadski was received with great enthusiasm. Mr. Van Hoose's contributions, too, call for high praise, his sweet tenor voice and expressive delivery making his work very enjoyable. He is specially to be commended for his artistry in the "Prize Song," which so many tenors declaim, regardless of the title.

The orchestral work was of a high standard. The opening march was as dignified and impressive as one could wish; in the "Bacchanale" the varying themes were cleverly brought out and the funeral march from "The Dusk of the Gods" was given with splendid effect, the fortissimo crescendos and contrasting measures showing ensemble playing which it would be difficult to improve.

This week the orchestra will be away and the fifth rehearsal and concert will not be given until Nov 17 and 18. Mr. Felix Winteritz will be the soloist, playing a Sinding violin concerto. The orchestral pieces will be Mozart's G minor symphony, prelude to J. K. Paine's "Birds of Aristophanes" and the Tchaikowsky variations from suite No. 3.

SYMPHONY EXCELS IN WAGNER WORKS

Superb Fire and Force of Orchestra
Far Outshines Work of Gadski and Van Hoose.

At its fourth of this season's concert the Symphony Orchestra was put through the tremendous paces of Richard Wagner, the selections from the work of the master being March of Homage; Bacchanale and Elizabeth's Greeting from "Tannhauser," Prize Song from "The Mastersingers," Siegfried's Parting from Brunnhilde, Siegfried's Death and Funeral March, and the Closing Scene from "The Dusk of the Gods." The singers to interpret the vocal parts were Mme. Gadski and Ellison Van Hoose.

It should be said at once that the instrumental portion of the concert far outshone the work of the singers. Rarely has Mr. Gericke so allowed himself and his men to give way to the fire and force of the titanic music. From the opening march, which the playing made to sound less trivial and uninspired than usual, to the magnificent tone picture of the fall of the gods everything was full of that special emotional touch without which the Wagnerian output is a vain thing. The Venus-music had the tang of fiery sensuousness besides the charm of perfect technique; while the colossal funeral music, one of the most stupendous orchestral conceptions that ever came from the brain of man, was affecting in the highest degree.

Mme. Gadski was in excellent voice and sang the Brunnhilde music with that artistic sense and expression that always is so prominent a part of her work. In the closing scene she rose to noble heights of emotional power. Mr. Van Hoose was inadequate. He has a smooth and pleasant voice, it is true, and he sings in tune; but the music of Siegfried, whether it be given in the operatic or the concert stage, demands an heroic tenor, a man who can stir the emotions with the inherent quality of his singing. Mr. Van Hoose's personality, his style and his voice are all against him in such interpretation.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT. PROGRAMME.

Ady:

Wagner. Nov. 6

March of Homage.

Bacchanale from "Tannhauser."

Elizabeth's Greeting from Act. II, "Tannhauser."
Madame Gadski.

Prize Song from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Mr. Ellison Van Hoose.

Siegfried's Parting from Brunnhilde, Siegfried's Death and Funeral March, Closing Scene, from "The Dusk of the Gods."
Mme. Gadski and Mr. Van Hoose.

A Wagner concert and an entire success. It had the advantage of presenting a crescendo of power to the very end. Even the march with which it began was an effective number. Wagner was not at his best in his concert marches, and the meaningless "Centennial March" (our national gold brick for which we paid $5000) was the weakest work that the great composer was ever guilty of. But the "Kaiser Marsch" is much better, with its reiterations of "Ein Feste Burg" as the voice of protestant Germany, and the March of Homage is the best of the 3.

The work was finely interpreted, but the succeeding "Bacchanale" was absolutely great in its whirlwind of passion. Mr. Gericke is developing an emotional power that was not present in his work of years ago; he is riper and more brilliant now that he has ever been before. The public appreciated the fervor of the performance and much enthusiasm ensued, the conductor being obliged to bow his thanks twice.

Mme. Gadski made a success of Elizabeth's Greeting to Symphony Hall, although she entered too soon with her solo. But both orchestra and soloist passed bravely over the slip and the end of the number was as triumphant as it deserved to be, the B in alt being very forcible and clear. A high note sways the multitude even in a Wagner number, and there was much enthusiasm after the song, the artist being recalled many times.

Mr. Van Hoose sang the Prize Song with much breadth, but the ensemble was not so perfect as we have heard it. As usual, this artist was sure in intonation even in the broadest crescendos and the highest passages.

The parting of Siegfried and Brunnhilde does not lose much by its transference from the operatic to the concert stage, for there are no vivid theatrical accessories to the scene where the young hero starts upon his Rhine journey. Possibly a portmanteau, an umbrella and a travelling rug might add to the realism of the work on the concert platform. But after all the glorious music stands by itself and guides and stimulates the imagination wherever it is sung.

Mr. Van Hoose sang Siegfried's death very expressively. Here one misses the impressive stage setting, and it seemed odd to see the corpse remain standing during his funeral music. The number was called (as usual) "Siegfried's Funeral March," but it ought to be remembered that it is not a march at all. Wagner never inculcated keeping any kind of step to it upon the stage and never treated it as the marches in "Lohengrin" or "Parsifal." It should be entitled "Funeral Music."

Again there was a lofty interpretation. The various motives, punctuated by the impressive Death-figure, narrated the biography of Siegfried in effective story. An especial word of commendation is due to the trumpet for the manner in which the sword motive was rung out.

After this the remains walked off and an intermission took place before the culmination of the memorable concert. The finale of "Goetterdaemmerung" and of the trilogy is the grandest climax in the entire repertoire of music. Motive is piled upon motive and the fire, sword, Siegfried, Brunnhilde, Rheingold, Rhine daughters, ring, heroism, and many other motives, pass in dramatic review, all summing up in the most impressive three-chord progression ever invented,—the Fate-motive.

The number gained and lost by concert performance, but we think that the ledger account leans to the side of profit. One missed the funeral pile, the mourning Vikings, the conflagration of Walhalla, but one was not disillusionized by the cab-horse Grane, and, above all, one heard the exciting and intricate music in a much fresher state of mind than would have been possible after 3 long acts of opera. Wagner's epic style makes abnormal demands upon an auditor, and we confess to being a little jaded by the time that Brunnhilde's majestic monologue is reached in the opera house.

Nor was Wagner at all opposed to excerpts of this kind. Indeed the present writer has the most vivid recollection of this same finale as he heard it in Villa Wahnfried (Wagner's home), with Stavenhagen and Mottl playing a piano accompaniment, Mme. Wagner turning the leaves, and Materna singing the vocal part.

But the orchestral part tells its mighty story whether in opera house or concert room. It is a picture of the crack of doom. Compare it with Berlioz's Judgment Day in his Requiem and we can better measure the greatness of Wagner. Berlioz uses the larger orchestra, the most sensational devices, even to 16 kettledrums and cohorts of trombones, but the true "Dies Irae" is here at the end of Goetterdaemmerung.

Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

FOR SALE—Two seats on floor; W 28, 29; $37.50 each. P.H.D., Boston Transcript.
SW(A):

FOR SALE

One Symphony Concert Seat, second balcony. Address M.J.J., Boston Transcript. (A):

Wagner According to Gericke and Gadski
—The Return of the Kneisel Quartet—
"Faust" Once More—An Irish Choir and
a Young Pianist

Mr. Gericke's conducting and Mme. Gadski's singing at the Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday were the complement of each other, and both were of the sort that is displacing the old "Wagner singing" and that will displace certain varieties of "Wagner conducting." It is easy to remember when "Wagner singers" were shouting and chopping his music in sublime defiance of the art of song. They sought power, they said, dramatic sweep and emotional poignancy. Then others came, who were merely unlabelled singers. They sang their Wagner according to the rules of the art of song, and the music had not only a new beauty but a power and a poignancy that all this shouting and chopping could not gain. In the concert room at least, the eagerest listener could hardly ask for fuller warmth than Mme. Gadski threw into Elisabeth's greeting on Saturday night. Her singing of Brünnhilde's final speech is growing steadily deeper in understanding and larger in expression. There was genuine exaltation in her part in the duet with Siegfried as Brünnhilde sends him forth to new adventures. In a word, Mme. Gadski caught and imparted much of the emotional content of her music. The most hidebound "Wagnerite" could not quarrel with her singing on that score. Yet it was also singing that had many of the best virtues of the art of song, and the crowning virtue of sustained and beautiful tone. Thereby the moods that filled it were the more persuasive, and the emotions that colored it the more searching.

It was the same with Mr. Gericke's conducting. It brought no relentless and reverberating riot of excited sound, relieved only by sharp and naked contrasts. It was free from restless and almost hysterical anxiety to find and to impart a particular significance in every phrase. There were heroic power and sweep of massive climax in Siegfried's glorification as Mr. Gericke and his men played it. Their orchestral postlude to Brünnhilde's death glowed with turbulent splendor. And each was the more potent for the balance and the beauty of tone in every group of instruments and, above all, for the proportioning with which the conductor built the whole. His climaxes rose—and rose unforced. The most nervous "Wagner conductor" could hardly have pointed the Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" with more sharp and penetrating details. Yet each was but a thread, flashing for the moment, in the woven web of the whole. They were the more poignant, because there was a virtuoso behind to keep them musically, as well as dramatically true, and because there was a conductor to give each its due place in the whole musical fabric. The art of song has restored its just beauty to much of Wagner's music. The art of conducting as Mr. Gericke exemplified it is similarly restoring its just proportions. To singer, conductor, and composer an orchestra gives the glories of its tone.

Trans. Nov. 6, 1905 H. T. P.

SYMPHONY HALL.

Some of the Novelties for the Orchestra's Season.

Journal — Sept. 30, 1905
Novelties in music do not necessarily mean works fresh from the hands of the composer. In the list of music unknown to Boston which Mr. Gericke has prepared for the coming Symphony season are three works by masters who are no longer among the living. At least one of these works, Smetana's overture to his opera "Libussa," has never been played in this country and Dvorak's symphonic poem "Die Waldtaube," one of the last things he did, has never been played in Boston and its only performance in this country was at an obscure concert in New York. Nor has Cesar Franck's "Psyche" ever been played in Boston. Another work on the list of novelties which Mr. Gericke has prepared will be labeled "First Time at These Concerts." Professor Paine's prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes. This, of course, has been heard in Boston and Cambridge, but has never been played at the Symphony concerts. Altogether, the Symphony Orchestra will play fifteen works which are quite new to Boston. Among them are two symphonies, both of which are likely to attract more than ordinary interest. Perhaps the more important is Mahler's Fifth. Gustav Mahler, director of the Imperial Opera in Vienna and the conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts, is without question one of the most interesting figures in the musical world of today. The other symphony, one in E major, is by Amherst Webber, a young English musician, who became known to many personally in this country several years ago through his association with the de Reszke brothers. Another Englishman on the list is Sir Edward Elgar, whose rise to popular favor in this country has been little short of phenomenal. He will be represented by three works: a new overture entitled "In the South," and two short pieces, "Chanson de Nuit" and "Chanson de Matin." Frederick S. Converse, whose name appeared on the programs last season, will be represented by a Balade for barytone and orchestra. Other novelties will be: "Le Kremlin," a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe—an entirely new name; a "Lustspiel" overture and a "Geharnischte" suite by Busoni; "Der Pfeifertag," an overture by Max Schillings; and "Le Tasse," an overture by Eugene d'Harcourt.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TICKET
SINGLE SEAT
First Balcony, price $24. Address G.C.C.,
Boston Transcript. (A):

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART.

SYMPHONY in G minor (K 550.)

I. Allegro molto.

II. Andante.

III. Menuetto: Trio.

IV. Finale: Allegro assai.

SINDING,

CONCERTO in A major, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA
op. 45.

Allegro energico—Andante—Allegro giocoso.

(First time.)

J. K. PAINE,

PRELUDE to "The Birds" of Aristophanes.

(First time at these concerts.)

TSCHAIKOWSKY.

THEME and VARIATIONS from SUITE No. 3, in
G major, op. 55.

Soloist:

Mr. FELIX WINTERNITZ.

Wagner According to Gericke and Gadski
—The Return of the Kneisel Quartet—
"Faust" Once More—An Irish Choir and
a Young Pianist

Mr. Gericke's conducting and Mme. Gadski's singing at the Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday were the complement of each other, and both were of the sort that is displacing the old "Wagner singing" and that will displace certain varieties of "Wagner conducting." It is easy to remember when "Wagner singers" were shouting and chopping his music in sublime defiance of the art of song. They sought power, they said, dramatic sweep and emotional poignancy. Then others came, who were merely unlabelled singers. They sang their Wagner according to the rules of the art of song, and the music had not only a new beauty but a power and a poignancy that all this shouting and chopping could not gain. In the concert room at least, the eagerest listener could hardly ask for fuller warmth than Mme. Gadski threw into Elisabeth's greeting on Saturday night. Her singing of Brünnhilde's final speech is growing steadily deeper in understanding and larger in expression. There was genuine exaltation in her part in the duet with Siegfried as Brünnhilde sends him forth to new adventures. In a word, Mme. Gadski caught and imparted much of the emotional content of her music. The most hidebound "Wagnerite" could not quarrel with her singing on that score. Yet it was also singing that had many of the best virtues of the art of song, and the crowning virtue of sustained and beautiful tone. Thereby the moods that filled it were the more persuasive, and the emotions that colored it the more searching.

It was the same with Mr. Gericke's conducting. It brought no relentless and reverberating riot of excited sound, relieved only by sharp and naked contrasts. It was free from restless and almost hysterical anxiety to find and to impart a particular significance in every phrase. There were heroic power and sweep of massive climax in Siegfried's glorification as Mr. Gericke and his men played it. Their orchestral postlude to Brünnhilde's death glowed with turbulent splendor. And each was the more potent for the balance and the beauty of tone in every group of instruments and, above all, for the proportioning with which the conductor built the whole. His climaxes rose—and rose unforced. The most nervous "Wagner conductor" could hardly have pointed the Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" with more sharp and penetrating details. Yet each was but a thread, flashing for the moment, in the woven web of the whole. They were the more poignant, because there was a virtuoso behind to keep them musically, as well as dramatically true, and because there was a conductor to give each its due place in the whole musical fabric. The art of song has restored its just beauty to much of Wagner's music. The art of conducting as Mr. Gericke exemplified it is similarly restoring its just proportions. To singer, conductor, and composer an orchestra gives the glories of its tone.

Trans. Nov. 6. 1905 H. T. P.

SYMPHONY HALL.

Some of the Novelties For the Orchestra's Season.

Journal — Sept. 30, 1905

Novelties in music do not necessarily mean works fresh from the hands of the composer. In the list of music unknown to Boston which Mr. Gericke has prepared for the coming Symphony season are three works by masters who are no longer among the living. At least one of these works, Smetana's overture to his opera "Libussa," has never been played in this country and Dvorak's symphonic poem "Die Waldtaube," one of the last things he did, has never been played in Boston and its only performance in this country was at an obscure concert in New York. Nor has Cesar Franck's "Psyche" ever been played in Boston. Another work on the list of novelties which Mr. Gericke has prepared will be labeled "First Time at These Concerts." Professor Paine's prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes. This, of course, has been heard in Boston and Cambridge, but has never been played at the Symphony concerts. Altogether, the Symphony Orchestra will play fifteen works which are quite new to Boston. Among them are two symphonies, both of which are likely to attract more than ordinary interest. Perhaps the more important is Mahler's Fifth. Gustav Mahler, director of the Imperial Opera in Vienna and the conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts, is without question one of the most interesting figures in the musical world of today. The other symphony, one in E major, is by Amherst Webber, a young English musician, who became known to many personally in this country several years ago through his association with the de Reszke brothers. Another Englishman on the list is Sir Edward Elgar, whose rise to popular favor in this country has been little short of phenomenal. He will be represented by three works: a new overture entitled "In the South," and two short pieces, "Chanson de Nuit" and "Chanson de Matin." Frederick S. Converse, whose name appeared on the programs last season, will be represented by a Ballade for barytone and orchestra. Other novelties will be: "Le Kremlin," a symphonic poem by Ernst Boehe—an entirely new name; a "Lustspiel" overture and a "Geharnischte" suite by Busoni; "Der Pfeifertag," an overture by Max Schillings; and "Le Tasse," an overture by Eugene d'Harcourt.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TICKET
 SINGLE SEAT
 First Balcony, price $24. Address G.C.C.,
 Boston Transcript. (A):

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART.

SYMPHONY in G minor (K 550.)

I. Allegro molto.

II. Andante.

III. Menuetto: Trio.

IV. Finale: Allegro assai.

SINDING,

CONCERTO in A major, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA
 op. 45.

Allegro energico—Andante—Allegro giocoso.

(First time.)

J. K. PAINE,

PRELUDE to "The Birds" of Aristophanes.

(First time at these concerts.)

TSCHAIKOWSKY.

THEME and VARIATIONS from SUITE No. 3, in
 G major, op. 55.

Soloist:

Mr. FELIX WINTERNITZ.

"Patient Waiter," writing concerning the plaint of "Twenty-Five-Cent Symphoner," calls attention to one of the worst features, not mentioned in the paragraph referred to, of this awkward arrangement: "The number of persons admitted on these occasions is limited to about 500-504 being, I think, the exact number. Now, when the line is long, as is often the case, a number of the last comers, even after waiting an hour or so in the cold, do not know whether or not they are to gain admittance until, at the opening of the doors at one o'clock, 504 persons are counted." All others in line who follow that number "get left," their long wait being in vain. It cannot be said that not many are so turned away. It is well known that whenever musicians of note are to appear at the concerts, the line of people waiting admission to the hall extends around the corner of Gainsboro street. "Patient Waiter" has seen over a hundred persons turned away after having stood in line for a long while. It is also to be noted that the uncertainty of knowing whether one is to be included in the lucky five hundred undoubtedly deters many from attempting to attend the rehearsals.

+ + +

To remedy this condition of affairs is a simple matter. There seems to be no reason why one of the several attendants at the hall should not count the people as they take their places in the line. When the full number is reached, a sign, flag, or other signal would indicate to later arrivals that they cannot gain admission. Nor has "Patient Waiter" met anyone able to satisfactorily explain why the doors of the hall should not be opened at two o'clock, instead of at one o'clock. One suggests that perhaps the admission of the crowd at two o'clock would be an annoyance to the regular ticket-holders. This is not a valid objection, as it has been noted that less than a dozen ticket-holders arrive at the hall as early as two o'clock. Surely, at least, they do not begin to arrive at 1.45. Another gives the following solution to the puzzle: "The management desires that only genuine music lovers shall take advantage of the twenty-five-cent admission price. Now the only way to tell who these are is to submit them to a freezing test. If they stand the 'cold process,' they are worthy to pass within the sacred portals." To the rest of us, however, the existing arrangement is an enigma." Trans. Jan. 10/06

SINDING'S VIOLIN CONCERTO HEARD

Herald

Has Its First Performance by the Symphony Orchestra—More Interesting in Orchestral Passages.

IN FINAL SECTION, MANY MEASURES ARE UGLY

Mr. Winternitz Is Soloist—Familiar Works by Mozart and Tschaikowsky—Prof. Paine's Prelude to "Birds."

The programme of the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Concerto in A minor for violin.....Sinding
(First time.)

Prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes..Paine
Variations from Suite No. 3....Tschaikowsky

Mozart's symphony in G minor has not been played at these concerts for some years, and it was therefore the more appreciated last night. Some, it is true, do not hesitate to say that it now has only a historical interest; there are others who are apparently vexed by its exquisite proportions and tender melancholy, and, like the old Athenian, they would gladly mark an oyster shell with the word "exile." That it was played in the true and frank spirit in which it was conceived it is unnecessary to say, for Mr. Gericke is a lover of Mozart, and he has an extraordinary orchestra to carry out his wishes. Hearing at the end of the concert the engrossing variations of Tschaikowsky, with the polacca finale, superb in its festal pomp, we recalled the Russian's affection and admiration for Mozart and the eloquent letter in which he explained to Mrs. von Meck the reasons of this admiration. Richard Strauss is another of the ultra-moderns who join the long line of those that do Mozart homage, and not with mere lip service.

The announcement of any unfamiliar concerto may well interest an audience. This concerto by Sinding, the first of two, was introduced in German cities by Mr. Marteau, to whom the younger composers for the violin owe a heavy debt of gratitude. Mr. Marteau played it for the first time in America at a Philharmonic concert in New York in March, 1900. The performance last night was the first in this city.

A distinguished composer once said to us: "I was born hating Weber and the Scandinavian composers." This remark showed catholicity of prejudice, for surely there is little or nothing in common between the romanticism of Weber and that of the Norwegians and Swedes. The latter evidently objected to the character of the formulas in each instance rather than to mere formulas, for every composer has his formulas, and no one is more faithful to them than Wagner, except possibly Debussy. The most exasperating formula of Weber is that which has been characterized in praise as his "chivalric flourish." Equally exasperating is the peculiar whine of nearly all the Scandinavians that have followed Grieg, nor is Grieg himself free from it. The admirers of northern music find this whine suggestive of wind-swept pines, lonely firds, black water, the midnight sun, cairns of heroes, and the Lord knows what else besides.

Sinding's later music that we have heard is like a dilution of Grieg stiffened with Wagner. The promise of the earlier, stern, granitic works has not been fulfilled. When there is no whine there is a forbidding rigidity, as in this concerto.

The concerto is in three movements, which are so connected that the piece might be characterized as a fantasia in three moods. The hunter, after reminiscences, pricks up his ears as soon as he hears the first theme. He is reminded of the last movement of Bruch's concerto in G minor, of the last movement of Brahms' concerto; or does the theme recall a polonaise by Wieniawski, or is there not a touch of Dvorak? Let him have his pleasure. What Sinding does with the theme is of more importance. It may be said of the work as a whole that it is more interesting in the full orchestral passages than in the solo part. Much of this part is unthankful, and in the final section there are long series of measures that are ugly, deliberately or carelessly ugly, it matters not.

The most impressive portions of the concerto are the final orchestral passage at the end of the first section and the immediately following measures of the andante. The opening of this andante has sombre imagination; there is the suggestion of something elemental and grand, but when the solo violin enters, the suggestion is dispelled. There is also a striking effect gained by the use of the solo violin against flute and horn. The finale begins with a tune that might be any vigorously accented sailors' song or dance, and the contrasting theme is effective in its way, but the interest in the organic whole is not maintained.

Mr. Winternitz played with delightful accuracy in these days when smearing too often is mistaken for an emotional display. He is to be classed among the sound musicians who have an excellent technic rather than among the players of pronounced individuality or deep sentiment, for he gains few effects by mere quality of tone. He was heartily and deservedly applauded.

Prof. Paine's prelude to "The Birds," composed for a performance of Aristophanes' comedy by the Harvard Classical Club, was performed over a year ago in Chickering Hall. The performance last night was the first at these concerts. If some wondered at the exultation of the festal spirit of the prelude and queried why the expression of this spirit rather than ornithological suggestion should be the main theme of the prelude, they should know that the composer had in mind the bridal chorus toward the end of the comedy, and it should be remembered that the final scene was staged in the amphitheatre with the pomp and gorgeousness lavished on the production of a great tragedy. Prof. Paine was obliged to acknowledge the applause.

Tschaikowsky's variations, familiar and well liked, a virtuoso test for an orchestra, were played by an orchestra of virtuosos, and the polacca dismissed the audience in holiday mood.

MOZART SYMPHONY AT FIFTH CONCERT

Mozart's beautiful, ever fresh and inspiring G minor symphony began the fifth concert of the Symphony Orchestra with a call to the noblest emotions. Plain and simple as it appears to be, it has within it a complexity of thought and a richness of inspiration that place it far above most of the resounding, heavily orchestrated works of the moderns. It would "carry" better, probably, in a much smaller hall, and yet the perfect dynamic force at which Mr. Gericke and his men gave it made it large enough for all purposes. That it was played with complete purity and charm goes without saying.

Sinding's A major concerto for the violin, played here for the first time by Felix Winternitz, is a work that does not greatly attract at one hearing. "Dark and true and tender is the North," wrote Tennyson, and in many ways the line fits Norse music. This concerto is mostly dark, however; somber in its breadth and not always tender in its poetry. Yet it has moments of romantic beauty in its andante and a certain rugged warmth in its final allegro. Mr. Winternitz played it with grace, elegance and good taste, but lacked the force and fire to make the concerto as vital as it might have been.

Another "first time at these concerts" was professor John K. Paine's prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes. The work is festal in tone, richly scored and artistic in its musicianship. It is not in the least suggestive, however, as program music; it would serve equally well as an introduction for any play or for none at all. It is best to listen to it as absolute music; it then gives the impression of classical strength, some inspiration and not a little beauty. Professor Paine, in answer to hearty applause, walked down to the platform and bowed in his oddly sincere fashion.

At the end came another giant—Tchaikowsky. The wonderfully diverse and fascinating variations on a theme from his Suite No. 3 have never been more clearly and gorgeously played in this city, and rarely has the all-around genius of the Russian been better illustrated. Almost every mood and style of musical writing is contained in these dozen glowing bits of composition, yet through them all, from choral to polonaise, the theme is never buried beneath nor overburdened by the opulent scoring it contains. The work was a triumph and the orchestra's playing of it worthy in every respect.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Felix Winternitz the Symphony Soloist.

Operatic Society's Production of "Chimes of Normandy."

Numerous Recitals of the Week.

Two novelties were played at the fifth Symphony rehearsal and concert, Prof. J. K. Paine's prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes and Sinding's A major violin concerto, the latter with Mr. Felix Winternitz as the soloist. The other numbers were the G minor symphony by Mozart and Tschaikowsky's theme and variations from suite No. 3. Prof. Paine's orchestral prelude to "The Birds" was given in this city in 1904, but with a much smaller band of musicians and with less pleasing effect than was the case at the Symphony, for the larger orchestra enabled Mr. Gericke to illuminate the trial contrasts more vividly and to impart to the scholarly work an impressiveness that was lacking at the previous performance. The prelude, which is composed of themes of the music-drama, is a tone poem in miniature, skillfully orchestrated and developed into climaxes which illustrate the most dramatic episodes of the story, and close in a stunning fortissimo worked up by the whole orchestra. The instrumentation is very varied in character, giving to the various parts of the orchestra plenty of complex work alternating in character. The interpretation was thoroughly satisfactory and interesting, too, despite the classic nature of the composition, for Prof. Paine has the gift of melodic utterance combined with his high ideal of musical expression.

The Sinding violin concerto is chiefly interesting, so far as the solo instrument is concerned, in the final movement, although all of Mr. Winternitz' performance was meritorious, and displayed his artistry in a way to win hearty plaudits. He was little at fault in fingering some of the passages on the G string in the first movement and in the quick double fingering in the finale, but the deflection was so slight that one may speak of his work in high praise and with little reservation.

The Mozart symphony was given in a sympathetic spirit by the orchestra. The Tschaikowsky variations on a simple theme is one of those compositions which illustrate the cleverness of the writer in juggling with instrumental possibilities and combinations, conditions which were admirably met and conquered by Mr. Gericke's men. Aside from showing the abilities of the orchestra, either in parts or as a whole, the work calls for no special consideration.

The soloist at this week's rehearsal and concert will be Hugo Heerman, who will play Brahms' D minor concerto for violin. The orchestral numbers will be Busoni's "Lustspiel" overture, for the first time here; Loeffler's "Villanelle du Diable" and Schumann's first symphony.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

ENTERTAINMENT AT THE SYM-PHONY CONCERT

Mozart, Paine, Tschaikovsky and Gericke Give It—The Concerts of Next Week and of Weeks to Come—Messenger, the French
Composer, on the Decline of French Opera
—The Prima Donna's Labors, According to Nordica

It was a comparatively light programme that Mr. Gericke had made for the fifth pair of Symphony concerts. Mozart's symphony in G-minor began it, yesterday afternoon, and Sinding's concerto for violin and orchestra and Professor Paine's prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes continued it. For ending there was the set of variations that make the final movement of Tschaikowsky's third suite. By all accounts, the concerto, in which Felix Winternitz played the violin part was heard for the first time in Boston, and Professor Paine's prelude for the first time at the Symphony concerts. Mr. Winternitz has not played often in public of late, and the pupils from the Conservatory, in which he teaches, partly filled the upper gallery and applauded him with a warmth that Ysaye or Kreisler might have envied.

Mr. Gericke is a wise maker of programmes. He must be, perforce, when he has twenty-four to contrive for forty-eight concerts to the same public in six months. He has passed the age when he burns to be perpetually educational. Perhaps his cool discretion has always kept him from that pernicious heat, and made him adamant in atmospheres that sometimes blaze red with it. He is content sometimes to be simply entertaining. He was so in the programme that he chose for the first pair of concerts last month, and he was so, again, yesterday. We in America have made rapid progress in the last ten years with our orchestras, and we have tripped willingly along in the founding and the support of them to the tune that they were very educational indeed. They are, and they are also very entertaining. They can provide us, moreover, with a sort of public entertainment that almost every one of our cities sorely lacks—entertainment that is refined, artistic and intelligent, and they need not do that by descending to what, in Pittsburg and Chicago the conductors rather patronize as "popular" programmes. Mr. Gericke's yesterday was by no means such, but most of us in Symphony Hall listened to it for the pure pleasure of beautiful and ordered sound. A week hence Mr. Gericke will ask us to open our minds to Brahms and Schumann. A fortnight ago he was stirring our emotions with Wagner. A little before, he was playing upon us as sensitive men and women of this twentieth-century world with Richard Strauss and Tschaikovsky. To do all these things is a part of the duty of our conductor and our band toward us. It is just as much their duty to give us pleasure and nothing else now and then. Sometimes we reproach Mr. Gericke with over-much sanity, as conductors go. But were he not so sane would he distribute so well all the various functions of an orchestra that ministers to a town like ours? Two entertaining concerts thus far is a pleasant omen for the rest of the season.

But, it is easy to hear certain lovers of Mozart saying, you are taking his symphony much too lightly. There are deep moods in it, and sore; tumultuous moods even, according to the means of expression that were at his command. There are and there are not, you are as ready to reply. Richard Strauss when he conducts any of the three last symphonies of Mozart persuades his listeners of such moods, and they depart in debate as to how much he has read into them from himself and how much he has discovered that no other imagination has detected there. Mottl is almost as persuasive. But their Mozart was not the Mozart of Mr. Gericke yesterday. He was content to take him as he stood transparently, and perhaps the composer rose up in the Elysian Fields to bless him. Certainly Mozart did not take his emotions nearly so seriously as some of the commentators have taken them. It is as hard to transfigure him, almost as it is to transfigure Schubert. Beethoven and Schumann strove with themselves and with the world and wrought with travail. Mozart and Schubert were simple men, who let the world do with them as it would, and expressed themselves oftenest in pure spontaneity. Schubert touches his music with a peculiar melancholy; Mozart touches his with a peculiar tenderness. But these are not searching emotions and surging passions for orchestral bite and thunder.

They are lyric, and not tragic, and it is one more proof of Mr. Gericke's sanity that, last month with Schubert's unfinished symphony, and yesterday with Mozart's, he took them for what they frankly are. After all, is there finer musical pleasure than to yield unfeignedly to the charm of Mozart's melodies as of pure song springing spontaneously into being, to follow their fluttering, gentle tracery, to hear them leap with youthful energy, soften with youthful tenderness, or loiter in simple youthful dalliance? It is the music of idealized youth in an idealized world, where the very air gives it birth and where no shadow lingers long or turns very dark while it stays. Shall not charm serve us better sometimes than passion, and still delight be the keenest emotional response? Need Mozart be put into a twentieth century forcing house, if we do miss a little of his spontaneous fragrance out-of-doors?

The severest had to take the rest of the programme as pure entertainment. Tschalkovsky's variations are all orchestral play. Yesterday it was a composer, who is a virtuoso when he undertakes such sport, in full frolic with a band of virtuosos. Tschalkovsky tossed off his variation con amore. The band tossed it about for the pure fun of the game. Between them they made it flawless fun. To the listeners it was like drinking orchestral champagne, when every bubble is rushing upward to tingle on the palate—or the ear—and the lamp-light is playing through the glass in twenty tints. For a pricking nervous thrill Tschalkovsky never did better than in the little ritardando before the band swings into the final glorified dance. It bites and it catches. A very eminent conductor once told us that he had a nearly irresistible desire to shout "Now we go!" whenever he was carrying his men through it.

There is not a hint, again, in the prelude to "The Birds" that Professor Paine is a born New Englander who has lived there all his life, and who was the best of teachers those many years at Cambridge. Was it Aristophanes who had taken him out of New England, out of himself, and set him to writing, like that volatile Slav thousands of miles away in Russia, for the pure sport of the thing? By every sign he had as much fun in the making and the scoring of that prelude as we listeners had in hearing it. The dry-as-dusts will discover whether there are "worthy" musical ideas in it, properly academic ideas for an academic function. For our part, we neither know nor care. We do know, and it seems much more to the point, that much of it sounds and swings and clicks like a chorus in Aristophanes's own verse with an orchestra, instead of Greek choristers, to sing it. There is the joy of living in the prelude. For the moment, though it is hard to imagine, the good professor turned pure pagan.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Season Ticket for sale at reduced price. Inquire at 434 Tremont Bldg. C. H. C. (A):

Concerts Next Week

A violinist of the first rank, Hugo Heerman, who is on his way to Germany from a tour of Australia, appears at the sixth pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play Brahms's concerto, and as he proved on his previous American tour, scarcely a living violinist is better fitted to cope with it technically, mentally and musically. He used to make it sound like the music of a man, played by a man, for men. The symphony is Schumann's first, and the other numbers are Mr. Loeffler's "The Devil's Round" for orchestra and organ, and a concert overture "for a comedy" by Busoni. The latter is altogether new, and there need be no doubt of its musical scholarship, and we hope there will be something more besides. Mr. Loeffler's tone poem, which is comparatively unfamiliar, is sure to have imagination. For the last time in three weeks Mr. Gericke will conduct at these concerts. For the following pair, on Dec. 2, D'Indy takes the orchestra. The next week the band will be making its monthly tour.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The first of the pension fund concerts this season will be given in Symphony Hall on next Sunday evening, Nov. 26. The concert will be commemorative of the 25th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Mr. George Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, will come from New York to assist Mr. Gericke.

The object of these pension fund concerts should and does find ready sympathy with all the patrons of the Symphony concerts. It is to establish a sufficient fund to care for members of the orchestra when the time has come, whether through age or through inability, they must give up active work as members of the organization. Governmental support for music is out of the question in America, for the present at any rate, and therefore governmental pensions are equally impossible. Musicians in Germany are not so well paid as they are in America, but living expenses there are considerably less, and musicians connected with any of the subsidized orchestras in Germany and Austria can look forward to the future free from care, because at the end of their term of service there is a pension awaiting them.

It was with the idea of placing the Boston Symphony orchestra on a similar basis that the movement was begun several years ago to establish a pension fund, so that the men in the orchestra might be sure of support when the time of need came. Already a considerable sum has been invested for the benefit of the men. While it is true that the men contribute themselves to the fund by means of annual dues, a considerable part of this money must come from the music loving public, and to get this money two concerts are given each year on a Sunday night.

The programme will be announced later.

Saturday's Symphony Concert

Sinding's concerto for violin had one advantage at the Symphony Concert, Saturday night, and it needed every aid that chance might bring. It happened to follow Mozart's symphony. It happens also to begin with a sonorous introduction for the whole band, richly colored in the Wagnerian fashion, and vigorous with broad, sharp rhythms. Mr. Gericke's Mozart is Mozart of the eighteenth century, unmagnified, undistorted, but by no means unilluminated. Sometimes it seems a little too precise in its accents. Always it sounds archaic, as Mozart should. It was still in the ear when the orchestra plunged its listeners into Sinding's full-throated harmonies. The effect was as tingling, and for the moment as bracing, as that of water itself. Mozart's music is of his own time and of all time, but, admire its beauty as we may, it is not the music of our own particular time. Sinding's, with all its shortcomings, is. It is quite too much so to be lasting. But after half an hour of the eighteenth century the mere sound so to say of our own orchestral voices speaking our own particular musical dialect, was queerly stimulating.

The rest was far from exhilaration. For band or for solo instrument, Sinding had nothing particular to say. Often he seemed distinctly irritated toward the solo instrument, as though he had expected an inspiration from it that it had failed to give. Therefore he retaliated with a few passages that were ugly and many that were commonplace. Perhaps Marteau, for whom the concerto was written, made it sound alive and significant. He has, or he used to have, a communicating energy, but there was no such fire in the cautiously correct Winternitz taking thought of every phrase. Sinding, moreover, would hardly ever treat his violin as an individual voice. It was only one with the rest, speaking a little more conspicuously than its fellows. Upon the whole orchestra the composer spent what imagination and energy were in him. Now and then he made it sound rich, warm and alive. Oftener it was that pleasant latter-day pastime of scoring in the Wagnerian manner. Nowhere did Sinding strike his own peculiar note—the high, clear, pictorial, romantic note of the "Chivalrous Episodes" of last season. Somehow the mere intention to write a concerto seems to turn the new generation of composers dry and perfunctory. But they always carry out the intention.

H. T. P.

TWO SYMPHONY SEASON TICKETS

FOR SALE—At very reasonable prices; excellent location on floor. Address J.G.C., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY TICKETS

FOR SALE—For alternate Saturday nights, 2 seats, 1st Bal. A 31-32, remainder of season; price $10.50 each. Address D.S.E., Boston Transcript. WS(A) n 8

Vincent d'Indy, the eminent French composer of the younger generation, who has come to America at the invitation of our Symphony Orchestra, arrived at the St. Botolph Club this morning. He left Paris a week ago, reached New York last night, and with Mr. Ellis and Mr. Loeffler, who is to chaperon his visit, so to say, travelled at once to Boston. On Friday and Saturday, Dec. 1 and 2, he will conduct at the Symphony Rehearsal and the Symphony Concert. Through the following week he will conduct at the regular concerts of the orchestra in New York, Washington, Philadelphia and Baltimore. A few days afterward he returns to France. In the course of his stay he wishes to lecture here on the younger Paris composers, their master and his, César Franck, their work and their ambitions.

D'Indy is the first French composer of distinction to visit America. He is also the first "outsider" that has ever been asked to conduct with our orchestra at a series of regular concerts. The invitation was our "homage," as the French say, to the new school of French composers who are reanimating French music. Nowhere in America is their music played so often or heard so sympathetically as it is here. Accordingly D'Indy will make his programmes entirely of the music of the younger Frenchmen, choosing from his own, from Franck's, Debussy's, Dukas's and Magnard's. Of his own he intends to play his second symphony, his tone-poem "Istar" and one or two smaller compositions, and from Franck he has picked the little known symphonic poem, "Psyche."

In New York, yesterday, the reporters put to D'Indy the inevitable questions, and one of them makes him say these things:

"Though I cannot say that I am a young man, I do belong to the younger French school of composers. I am a follower of César Franck, who did much to popularize symphonic music in Paris. It required some encouragement, for the general taste in Paris leans to the opera rather than to classical music, but of late years there has been a great change. There are now many concert halls, whereas formerly there were but one or two."

"What are the lines along which the music of the future will develop?"

"There are three elements in music—melody, harmony and rhythm. The resources of melody and harmony I believe to be well-nigh exhausted, so eccentricities of rhythm will probably be the next element of music to be experimented upon."

To the question why America and England had produced no great composers, though both countries had given birth to such commanding geniuses in other departments of creative art, he answered: "I have only the explanation that music is the last of the arts to be developed in a national art life. The national art life of England and of America is younger than that of France or Italy, consequently their music is to come, and assuredly it will come."

760

77

Symphony Hall.

---

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

---

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, AT 8, P. M.

---

Programme.

BUSONI.

COMEDY OVERTURE in C major, op. 38.
(First time.)

BRAHMS.

CONCERTO for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, in D major
op. 77.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio.
III. Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.

LOEFFLER.

FANTASIA for ORCHESTRA and ORGAN, "The Devil's Villanelle," (after Rollinat's poem), op. 9.

---

SCHUMANN.

SYMPHONY No 1, in B flat major, op. 38.
I, Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo molto vivace. Trio I. Molto più vivace. Trio II
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

---

Soloist:

Mr. HUGO HEERMANN.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

HEERMANN, THE VIOLINIST, AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Concerts of the Coming Week—Gilbert and Sullivan Again—Recitals in Prospect

The musically conservative could rejoice with full hearts at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. For once the concerto and the symphony—Brahms and Schumann—surpassed all else on the programme. A new overture by the scholarly Busoni began it, dedicated to Mr. Gericke and played for the first time on this side of the sea. It is gay in mood, spontaneous in expression. The melodies are quick, light fancies pleasant to hear, but hardly impressive or notably individual. Busoni develops them fluently, adorns them richly and sets them against a warmly colored background. He does not bury them in intricacies or dry and stiffen them with meditation. They flow forward in bright interplay or contrast, with now and then a flash of imagination in the scoring to make them sparkle. A "comedy" overture Busoni calls it, and evidently life in Berlin has made him merry. In his Boston days he was scholarly seriousness incarnate. He never trifled and he was seldom gay.

It was easy to think well of the overture while it was still sounding in the ear, but somehow after the concerto and Hugo Heermann's playing of it, Busoni's music had vanished. To Brahms went the smaller share of the glory. Our audiences have heard his violin concerto so often that they are beginning to take it for granted and to think chiefly of the virtuoso who may be playing it. By every sign the particular audience that filled every seat in Symphony Hall yesterday had come to hear Heermann in whatever music he might choose. For two years it had cherished its discovery of him as one of the most notable violinists of our time. The moment in which he appeared on the stage it hailed him with warmer and more general applause than any virtuoso or singer has received thus far this season. When once he and the band had begun, not even the swish of a programme leaf broke the rapt silence. At the close of the first and the second movements the listeners seemed too stirred to applaud, but at the end of the concerto there was round upon round of clapping, and from an audience nine-tenths of whom were women. As such things go in Boston and on Friday afternoons, it was almost magnificent. It took a cynic to say that by sheer masculinity Heermann had won a man's victory over the sex.

No wonder that Brahms seemed to recede. Heermann was not playing his concerto in the ordinary sense of the word. Seemingly he was creating it, movement by movement, passage by passage, phrase by phrase. There was no place to ask where the composer ended and the interpreter began. The two had become as one voice. In vague flashes of memory came the recollection of tender young women struggling with the difficulties and pitfalls Brahms had laid in their path. Yesterday there seemed none such in the concerto. The most intricate and difficult passages were serving only for the expression of the composer's and the virtuoso's thought and mood. Why had violinists vexed themselves and their audiences with them? Under Heermann's hand they sounded natural, almost inevitable. So with his own technical mastery. It was superb in its largeness and surety. Yet the listener took no thought of it. The violinist was using it only as the voice of his own and the composer's eloquence. There was the beauty of sound in the voice—most of all of the long, warm curves that rise and deepen and then fall and fade. There was the power of sound as well—the power that fills and transports. At every moment there was the exultation of mood and of expression that makes musical or any other eloquence. For once it was easy to feel and to yield to the large austere beauty of Brahms's music. Heermann had lifted it, or perhaps lifted himself, to its heights. In a few moments his listeners had climbed with him.

Between this Brahms, as Heermann recreated him, and Schumann, as Mr. Gericke has often made him live again, stood the "orchestral fantasia" to which certain macabre rhymes of the French poet, Rollinat, inspired Mr. Loeffler. It was not the best possible place for it. Try as you might to catch Mr. Loeffler's vein and sympathize with him and his poet, the music sounded trivial, forced and much too earthy. You felt Mr. Loeffler's characteristic virtues, but you also felt, as he seldom lets you do when his music has its proper environment, the limitations and the defects of those virtues. You were impatient of the close Parisian night when Schumann was about to proclaim the spring. Rollinat's fancies were hollow meanderings and discordant cries after Brahms's and Heermann's exalted eloquence. Perhaps it will be easier tonight to take Mr. Loeffler by himself. H. T. P.

/ / + / /

Concerts Next Week

Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, about whom we are printing an article in another column today, will be the conductor at the seventh pair of Symphony concerts, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. Never before in its twenty-four years of existence has the orchestra had any but its established conductor at its regular concerts. Mr. d'Indy takes the band at the invitation of Mr. Gericke and Mr. Higginson as an honor to the newer and less academic school of French music of which he is the acknowledged chief, and which has found quicker and warmer appreciation in Boston than in any other American city. From the music of this school Mr. d'Indy has chosen his entire programme. It begins with his own second symphony that Mr. Gericke played for us last winter. It continues with a suite from Gabriel Fauré's incidental music to Maeterlinck's play, "Pelléas and Mélisande," which was heard when Mrs. Campbell acted the piece in Boston. Next comes d'Indy's own tone-poem in the form of variations, "Istar," the ingenious musical setting of a Phœnician legend that has been played at least once before at the Symphony concerts. The fourth number, however, is entirely new here—a fragment of César Franck's tone-poem, "Psyché." For ending is Dukas's gay and humorous scherzo, "The Magician's Apprentice," first performed here a year ago. There will be no soloist. The following week the orchestra makes its monthly journey to New York and other cities with Mr. d'Indy conducting.

On Sunday evening, in Symphony Hall, at eight, the Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its two annual concerts for the profit of the Pension Fund of its members. On Wednesday we wrote at length of the duty and the pleasure of our musical public in the support of the fund and of the opportunity to hear the orchestra that these extra concerts give to those who do not care to attend the regular series. On Sunday evening in one of the conductors and in a single number, the programme will recall the first concert of the orchestra twenty-four years ago. The first number on that first programme was Beethoven's overture, "The Dedication of the House," and Georg Henschel was the conductor. Tomorrow the same overture, under the same conductor, begins the concert, and Mr. Henschel, who is now teaching in New York, has come to Boston for the occasion. The rest of the programme, with Mr. Gericke conducting, comprises Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, the Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhäuser," and Richard Strauss's tone-poem "Don Juan," all richly colored and highly emotional music of the modern sort. If we half appreciate what we and the artistic prestige of Boston owe to the Symphony Orchestra, we should fill the hall to the last seat.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Hugo Heerman, the Symphony Soloist.

Interesting Program Tonight

for Pension Fund Benefit.

D'Indy's Coming — Other Events of the Week.

globe Nov. 26, 1905

Ferruccio Busoni's "Comedy" overture, dedicated to Conductor William Gericke, and Charles Loeffler's fantasia, "The Devil's Villanelle," dedicated to Franz Kneisel, were two of the four selections on the 6th Symphony program. Mr. Hugo Heermann, the celebrated violinist, was soloist, playing Brahms' D major concerto, and Schumann's first symphony completed the list. The Busoni overture was given for the first time here. This composer was a resident of Boston about a dozen years ago and his association on one program with Messrs Gericke, Loeffler and Kneisel made two numbers especially interesting, as the four artists are personally known to many of the Symphony patrons.

The Busoni work is a charming little concert piece, the dainty thematic material being skilfully scored and treated melodically without a profusion of dissonant modulations of the so-called up-to-date character. Of course our orchestra gave to each phase of the composition its proper significance, for Mr. Gericke conducted and the bond of sympathy between men and director was unusually strong and ensured an artistic interpretation.

The splendid abilities so modestly displayed by Mr. Heermann in past seasons have suffered no diminution, nor has his honest and earnest demeanor changed. He played the Brahms concerto with a delicacy of sentiment, vigor and depth of expression that was appealing in its nature, and his facility of execution, more prominently shown in the cadenza in the first movement, was something to be highly praised, even in these days of phenomenally deft fingered young executants. The dignity and grace of the second movement was given with consummate skill and in difficult demands of the finale, with its arpeggios, double-stopping, single and chord runs, he met every requirement. The whole performance was one to be greatly enjoyed, and the orchestra joined with the audience in the plaudits at the close that summoned Mr. Heermann to the front of the platform a half dozen times. Mr. Hess conducted this number in admirable style.

The fantastic "Devil's Villanelle," by Mr. Loeffler, was given all the diabolic significance its title implies, all the weird, inharmonic musical phrases and bits of themes being set forth with the effect intended by the composer. The Schumann symphony was up to the standard of performance usual in important works. This week the celebrated French composer and director, Vincent d'Indy, will assist in conducting.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

adv — PROGRAMME. Nov 27, 1905
Comedy Overture in C major, op. 38.....Busoni
(First time.)
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, in D major,
op. 77.....Brahms
Soloist, Mr. Hugo Heermann.
Fantasia for Orchestra and Organ, "The Devil's Villanelle" (After Rollinat's poem), op. 9.....Loeffler
Symphony No. 1, in B flat major, op. 38.....Schumann

The pendulum swung between very diverse schools of composition in this concert, and the more sedate works lost somewhat because of their fiery companions. The Busoni overture reminds us that another Bostonian once wrote a comedy overture, and we consider Chadwick's "Thalia" more distinctly in the comedy spirit than this number.

Busoni can be tremendously modern when he tries, and some of his scores are very complex; but in this work he is fairly conservative and even his orchestral forces are scarcely beyond the classical demands. The work was clear, the scoring original and brilliant, and if there was no rollicking fun of the modern type in the composition it had something of the Aristophanian sharpness and contrast. Many faint trumpet passages imparted a martial flavor; and the figure treatment was what we should expect from so thorough a musician as Ferruccio Busoni.

Then came Brahms sandwiched in between Busoni and Loeffler, like a church deacon walking between a dancing girl and a case of delirium tremens. Brahms' violin concerto is not a pleasing work, it is too ascetic for that, but every modern violinist who aspires to be known as classical must conquer 3 things—the Beethoven concerto, the Bach Chaconne and the Brahms concerto.

And Mr. Heermann certainly conquered the last-named work. We have never heard the chaste character of the composition so well brought out. One might have wished for a larger tone, but in intonation, in sweetness, in surety of phrasing, the performance was something to remember. Mr. Heermann sank himself into the ensemble with a spirit of self-abnegation which is demanded by the style of this concerto, which is nothing if not orchestral. It was a worthy display of sterling musicianship on the soloist's part.

If there is not the magnetism in the concerto that exists in the first movement of the Beethoven, or the romance of the second movement of the Bruch G minor, that is not to be charged against the performer; yet it is a great work in its own style, though this leans somewhat to the academic vein. Even the cadenza used by Mr. Heermann was modest and brief, consisting chiefly in the display of double-stopping and of trills.

The second movement was given with much effect, and even the Johnsonian jocosity of the finale, marked "Giocoso," was made attractive. And our Brahmins and Bramsies applauded to the echo and recalled Mr. Heermann 4 times! Boston has evidently reached the Brahms stage of its musical culture.

After this there was the devil to play. Rollinat has written up his Satanic Majesty in a manner which would delight that citizen of Detroit who recently erected a statue to the same personage. It is a piquant French jingle full of mockery and surprises. Possibly an Englishman would conceive it thus:—

There is a gentleman in black
And round the earth he goes,
While near him the thermometer
In melting fervor glows.

The folks in his vicinity
Must wear their Summer clothes.
He burns holes in his handkerchief
Whenever he blows his nose.

He has a band of muted horns
To add to people's woes.
A cloven malformation is Upon his fiery toes.

Add to this a refrain every few lines to the effect that hell "glows, glows, glows," and that the devil "goes, goes, goes," and the central idea of the Loeffler music-poem is acquired.

It received a superb performance. It is the third time that Boston has heard this work. We care but little for the saturnalia of dissonance, the wails of the muted horns, and the general St. Vitus Dance of this peripatetic demon, yet we may acknowledge the genius displayed in some parts of it. The ecclesiastical portion is stronger than Berlioz's similar touch in the last movement of the Symphonie Fantastique, and Mr. Loeffler's orchestral virtuosity is unparalleled on this side of the Atlantic. The composer was forced to bow his acknowledgments twice to the enthusiastic plaudits of the public.

Then the pendulum swung back again. Even after 10 min. of intermission the Schumann symphony sounded weak. The perfume of Spring violets was overcome by the preceding odor of brimstone. Therefore, although it was admirably played, we never found the first movement of the B flat symphony so tame. We wish that it had come at the first of the concert. But the Scherzo was as beautiful as ever, and the finale, with its bold syncopations, was a gem of purest ray serene, to which the excellent flute-playing of the cadenza added an extra gleam. Nevertheless Johannisberger Cabinet loses its flavor after Arrack Punch. Louis C. Elson.

FOR SALE—SEAT Y 3

Symphony Rehearsal. Price $30. Address F.A.A., Boston Transcript. (A):

FOR SALE

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERT tickets, balcony, left, C-33, 34, $19 each. Address Public Library, Brookline. (A)

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Hugo Heermann, violinist, was the soloist at the sixth Symphony concert last evening, the programme being as follows:

Comedy overture, op. 38.....Busoni
Concerto for violin, op. 77.....Brahms
The Devil's Villanelle, op. 9.....Loeffler
Symphony No. 1, B flat.....Schumann

Busoni's comedy overture was heard at these concerts for the first time. It is dedicated to Mr. Gericke, which probably indicates the reason why the work appeared on the programme. The "comedy" element is not easily apparent, and except for some pages of clever instrumentation the overture is without distinction. It made little if any impression on the audience.

Loeffler's orchestral fantasia on Rollinat's weird poem, "The Devil's Villanelle," has been heard here before, its initial hearing being at a Symphony concert April 12, 1902. The work will please whomsoever is in sympathy with the fantastic poem which suggested Mr. Loeffler's musical picture. To others the work will impress chiefly as a virtuoso piece to show the resources of the modern orchestra. The technical detail is exceedingly clever and the work makes a good "show" piece. It was much applauded; so was the composer, who was present.

Mr. Heermann, the soloist, appeared here about three years ago for the first time. He made a most favorable impression on the former occasion, and last evening he gave further evidence that he is a violinist of very high rank. His playing of the Brahms concerto was superb technically and artistically, and as authoritative as one could well desire. Mr. Heermann was the recipient of a well-deserved ovation and there were several recalls.

The concert ended with a fine performance of Schumann's Symphony No. 1, op. 38.

The rehearsal and concert this coming week will be memorable in that they will be directed by Vincent D'Indy, the eminent French composer-conductor, who will make his first appearance in the United States. The programme will include two of his own compositions, also others by Cesar Franck, Faure and Paul Dukas.

SYMPHONY GIVES LOEFFLER'S WORK

"The Devil's Villanelle" Calls Out
Every Resource of Orchestra.

The Author Responds.

Journal Nov. 27, 1905

Charles M. Loeffler's extraordinarily ingenious fantasia for orchestra and organ, "The Devil's Villanelle," was performed for the third time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the sixth concert of the twenty-fifth season, Saturday night. The composition is widely fantastic and every resource of the orchestra is taxed. The burden of the work is the oft-occurring refrains, "Hell's a burning, burning, burning," and "The devil, prowling, runs about." Weiridly fascinating throughout, the piece was given a vivid performance under Mr. Gericke. Wallace Goodrich was at the organ. Mr. Loeffler was in the audience and was obliged to acknowledge the applause twice.

Busoni's comedy overture, dedicated to Mr. Gericke, was given its first performance. The overture is devoid of interest and borders upon dullness. Comedy is lacking throughout.

Hugo Heermann, violinist, was the soloist. He played the Brahms D major concerto eloquently. He was recalled three times. Schumann's first symphony completed the program.

Vincent D'Indy will conduct the seventh rehearsal and concert Friday and Saturday night.

Ferruccio Busoni's "Comedy" overture, dedicated to Conductor William Gericke, and Charles Loeffler's fantasia, "The Devil's Villanelle," dedicated to Franz Kneisel, were two of the four selections on the 6th Symphony program. Mr. Hugo Heermann, the celebrated violinist, was soloist, playing Brahms' D major concerto, and Schumann's first symphony completed the list. The Busoni overture was given for the first time here. This composer was a resident of Boston about a dozen years ago and his association on one program with Messrs Gericke, Loeffler and Kneisel made two numbers especially interesting, as the four artists are personally known to many of the Symphony patrons.

The Busoni work is a charming little concert piece, the dainty thematic material being skilfully scored and treated melodically without a profusion of dissonant modulations of the so-called up-to-date character. Of course our orchestra gave to each phase of the composition its proper significance, for Mr. Gericke conducted and the bond of sympathy between men and director was unusually strong and ensured an artistic interpretation.

The splendid abilities so modestly displayed by Mr. Heermann in past seasons have suffered no diminution, nor has his honest and earnest demeanor changed. He played the Brahms concerto with a delicacy of sentiment, vigor and depth of expression that was appealing in its nature, and his facility of execution, more prominently shown in the cadenza in the first movement, was something to be highly praised, even in these days of phenomenally deft fingered young executants. The dignity and grace of the second movement was given with consummate skill and in difficult demands of the finale, with its arpeggios, double-stopping, single and chord runs, he met every requirement. The whole performance was one to be greatly enjoyed, and the orchestra joined with the audience in the plaudits at the close that summoned Mr. Heermann to the front of the platform a half dozen times. Mr. Hess conducted this number in admirable style.

The fantastic "Devil's Villanelle," by Mr. Loeffler, was given all the diabolic significance its title implies, all the weird, inharmonic musical phrases and bits of themes being set forth with the effect intended by the composer. The Schumann symphony was up to the standard of performance usual in important works. This week the celebrated French composer and director, Vincent D'Indy, will assist in conducting.

FADED TEXT

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

New Comedy Overture by F.
Busoni Played—Themes
Lack Distinction and Development at Times Is Dull.

LOEFFLER'S "DEVIL'S VILLANELLE" AGAIN

Is a Piece of Uncommon Fancy
—Hugo Heermann Gives Eloquent Performance of Brahms' Violin Concerto.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Comedy overture.....Busoni
(First time.)

Concerto for violin.....Brahms
Fantasia "The Devil's Villanelle".....Loeffler
Symphony in B flat, No. 1.....Schumann

This is the third composition by Mr. Busoni that has been played here at a Symphony concert. Excerpts from his first suite were performed in 1892, and his Tone Poem was heard for the first time at a concert of the following season. In the early years of his career he was aggressively contrapuntal in his treatment of dance-forms, as in the suite just mentioned, and he seemed to fear the reproach of being frankly and sensuously melodic in the Italian fashion.

We still remember the din of his Tone Poem, and the discussion it excited after ears could receive the ordinary tones of conversation.

Mr. Busoni has always as a piano virtuoso delighted in formidable tasks. Having exhausted the repertory of concert-givers, he wept for more technical worlds to conquer, and then invented feats, chiefly of transcription—as his arrangement of Bach's violin chaconne for the piano—with which to excite the amazement of the constantly open-mouthed.

He, too, has written a concerto, a tremendous procession of difficulties which is, they say, over an hour in passing a given point, and, not content with a large piano and a huge orchestra, he called in the aid of a chorus. But last month excerpts from his latest work, stage music to a fairy drama by Gozzi, were played in Berlin, and the delicacy and the humor of the music were warmly praised.

This comedy overture is a revised version of a composition written and produced eight years ago. When Mr. Busoni was last in Boston he spoke of it to Mr. Gericke who is always searching for overtures. He rewrote it and the new version was published in 1904 with a dedication to Mr. Gericke.

And what, pray, are Mr. Busoni's views concerning a suitable prelude to a comedy? Is his comedy music light and spontaneous or as laboriously contrived and as artificial as the comedy prose of Mr. George Meredith? The first thought is, "What must this overture have been before it was revised?" For it is now so inconsequential, so purposeless; its spirit is so far removed from the lightness and the gaiety of the playhouse audience anticipating the curtain's rise.

The themes are without distinction, and the development is for the most part laboriously dull. A man by the name of Auber was far more successful in this manner of overture, nor is it necessary to mention a classic name. Operetta writers of little pretensions have done much better. Mr. Gericke certainly deserved a more musical and spontaneous tribute of regard.

Mr. Loeffler's "Devil's Villanelle" was played here for the third time. It is an extraordinarily ingenious and fantastical work—in spite of the fact that he hampered himself deliberately by his choice of a poem for a programme, a poem in which there is a double refrain or burden: "Hell's a-burning, burning, burning," and "The devil, prowling, runs about." Other modern composers have attempted to use a single refrain in symphonic work, as Sinding in his orchestral "Rondo In-finito."

Furthermore, it is a question whether the publication of Rollinat's poem does not distract the attention of the hearer-reader from the music as an organic composition, whether he does not lose much and appreciate less in his endeavor to discover in a particular section of the fantasia a translation of a particular couplet of the poet.

We speak concerning the poem itself and its strange author in the music page of this morning's Herald. We have now to do only with the music.

Would not the hearer's task be lessened and his pleasure increased if only the refrains had been published as a motto? There are many literal men and women in this world—possibly without them the world would not revolve according to appointment; they read: "There, floating as a bubble, here squirming as a worm, the Devil, prowling, runs about": are they to be blamed if they strain their ears in the endeavor to see Satan in these highly entertaining impersonations in the music itself?

But Mr. Loeffler might answer with justice: "I have not tried to write panorama music. I print the poem that you may read it before you hear my transliteration; reading it, you will be in the mood. Then you can hear as far as it is in your capacity, for no two near precisely in the same spirit or with the same imaginative receptivity. Do you ask why I explain certain lines of Rollinat's poem by introducing Bruant's canaille ditty and the bloodthirsty revolutionary airs when few in an American audience will recognize the tunes? I find pleasure in introducing them; they aid in the expression of my idea of the Villanelle, and remember that I did not compose the music merely for one parish. Do not these introduced tunes make an effect, even when the ironical significance of their appearance is understood only by a few?"

Mr. Loeffler's Villanelle was played here at first with its companion piece, a sonorous love poem of rare beauty inspired by Verlaine's exquisite Aubade in "La Bonne Chanson." To us the latter is the higher flight, by reason of the fact that it is absolute music which needs no programme, music that would make a deep impression even without a signboard title. Furthermore, the subject is nobler, more human, and the appeal is far more direct and elemental. The Villanelle is necessarily a tour de force. It is inevitably both pictorial and narrative. But what ingenuity, what fancy, is displayed in the conception and in the execution of the detail! Nor has Mr. Loeffler ever composed anything broader or more truly impressive than the episode of the church music, which might have been suggested by the wild mystery of Saint-Pol Roux's "Black Soul of the White Prior."

In this episode there is suggestion both of the mass and of the worship of Satan for the Macabre in which Mr. Loeffler delights is more than once in the Villanelle of close kin to Satanism. Page after page in this composition might justly give to Mr. Loeffler the title to alter slightly the phrase of the discredited gentleman in "Measure for Measure"—"the fantastical composer of dark corners."

Mr. Gericke read the Villanelle with the finest appreciation and the performance was vivid, elastic and of great euphony. Mr. Loeffler, who was present, was twice obliged to acknowledge the applause.

Mr. Heermann delivered an eloquent plea in behalf of the violin concerto of Johannes Brahms, a work which, as played by highly respectable men of routine and by too ambitious young women, reminds one of a New England boiled dinner. It is for the most part so prosaic and so filling. Mr. Heermann played with a breadth and dignity, with a purity of tone and with a musical understanding that would have vitalized even a more laboriously manufactured composition.

The familiar symphony of Schumann was read and performed romantically.

The Concerts of Saturday and Sunday

Mr. d'Indy, as the way is of all the composers, conductors and virtuosi who visit us, has been speaking warm and spontaneous praise of our Symphony Orchestra. Thrice he has heard it—at the rehearsal Friday, at the concert Saturday and again last night at the special concert for the profit of the Pension Fund—under circumstances that showed exceptionally well the range and pliancy of its powers and the fineness and the fulness of them. Read the score of Busoni's new overture that the orchestra was playing at the regular concerts, and it seems empty where it is not trivial. Listen to it, as our band played it, and they and Mr. Gericke made it sound interesting and alive. It was the characteristic power of virtuosi at their best to glorify whatever they touch. Brahms's concerto for violin followed on Friday and Saturday, with Mr. Hess leading. The orchestral and the solo parts in it seemed as perfectly fused and proportioned as human skill could make them. Some of this euphony was due to Mr. Heermann's fine sense of these things, but more to the band's. Mr. Loeffler's fantastic "tone-poem" asked the utmost and the freest technical mastery of his instrument from each player in the orchestra. It asked also the responsive imagination that could make that mastery the vivid expression of every suggestion, pictorial, ironic, narrative, what you will, that the music contains. Rarely did the orchestra fall him. Rather at every moment it served him in the way that set his music in the best possible light. The sense of musical design and continuity that Mr. Gericke has infused into every man under him held the fantasia together as a coherent musical structure. The imagination of conductor and men seized the pictorial significance of each detail, while their skill expressed it. Schumann's "Spring" symphony ended the programme. It is hard to fancy it played with richer warmth and beauty of varied tone, with finer ardor of rhythm, with brighter romantic glow and elation of spirit. It was an intoxicating performance—one more of those in which Mr. Gericke and his men reanimate and almost recreate familiar music. Yet all this eloquence was nearly faultless in detail. No wonder, Mr. d'Indy, familiar as he is with most of the orchestras of Europe, wondered and praised as he heard. He is not used to our orchestra as we are—far too used to it to appreciate all its virtues, and a little too disposed to play the parts of the Athenians who were tired of hearing Aristides called the Just.

SYMPHONY HALL

SUNDAY EVENING, NOV. 26, at 8

Pension Fund Concert

Commemorative of the 25th Year of the Founding of the Orchestra

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

GEORG HENSCHEL } Conductors
WILHELM GERICKE }

PROGRAMME

OVERTURE, "Dedication of the House," Op. 124, Beethoven
(First overture performed at the Symphony Concerts)

GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor

SYMPHONY No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, Op. 74, Tchaikowsky

- I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo
- II. Allegro con grazia
- III. Allegro molto vivace
- IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso

BACCHANALE from "Tannhaeuser" . . . . . Wagner

TONE POEM, "Don Juan," Op. 20 . . . . . R. Strauss

hear precisely in the same spirit or with the same imaginative receptivity. Do you ask why I explain certain lines of Rollinat's poem by introducing Bruant's canaille ditty and the bloodthirsty revolutionary airs when few in an American audience will recognize the tunes? I find pleasure in introducing them; they aid in the expression of my idea of the Villanelle, and remember that I did not compose the music merely for one parish. Do not these introduced tunes make an effect, even when the ironical significance of their appearance is understood only by a few?"

Mr. Loeffler's Villanelle was played here at first with its companion piece, a sonorous love poem of rare beauty inspired by Verlaine's exquisite Aubade in "La Bonne Chanson." To us the latter is the higher flight, by reason of the fact that it is absolute music which needs no programme, music that would make a deep impression even without a signboard title. Furthermore, the subject is nobler, more human, and the appeal is far more direct and elemental. The Villanelle is necessarily a tour de force. It is inevitably both pictorial and narrative. But what ingenuity, what fancy, is displayed in the conception and in the execution of the detail!

Nor has Mr. Loeffler ever composed anything broader or more truly impressive than the episode of the church music, which might have been suggested by the wild mystery of Saint-Pol Roux's "Black Soul of the White Prior."

In this episode there is suggestion both of the mass and of the worship of Satan for the Macabre in which Mr. Loeffler delights is more than once in the Villanelle of close kin to Satanism. Page after page in this composition might justly give to Mr. Loeffler the title to alter slightly the phrase of the discredited gentleman in "Measure for Measure"—"the fantastical composer of dark corners."

Mr. Gericke read the Villanelle with the finest appreciation and the performance was vivid, elastic and of great euphony. Mr. Loeffler, who was present, was twice obliged to acknowledge the applause.

Mr. Heermann delivered an eloquent plea in behalf of the violin concerto of Johannes Brahms, a work which, as played by highly respectable men of routine and by too ambitious young women, reminds one of a New England boiled dinner. It is for the most part so prosaic and so filling. Mr. Heermann played with a breadth and dignity, with a purity of tone and with a musical understanding that would have vitalized even a more laboriously manufactured composition.

The familiar symphony of Schumann was read and performed romantically.

Trans. — Nov 27 1905 The Concerts of Saturday and Sunday

Mr. d'Indy, as the way is of all the composers, conductors and virtuosi who visit us, has been speaking warm and spontaneous praise of our Symphony Orchestra. Thrice he has heard it—at the rehearsal Friday, at the concert Saturday and again last night at the special concert for the profit of the Pension Fund—under circumstances that showed exceptionally well the range and pliancy of its powers and the fineness and the fulness of them. Read the score of Busoni's new overture that the orchestra was playing at the regular concerts, and it seems empty where it is not trivial. Listen to it, as our band played it, and they and Mr. Gericke made it sound interesting and alive. It was the characteristic power of virtuosi at their best to glorify whatever they touch. Brahms's concerto for violin followed on Friday and Saturday, with Mr. Hess leading. The orchestral and the solo parts in it seemed as perfectly fused and proportioned as human skill could make them. Some of this euphony was due to Mr. Heermann's fine sense of these things, but more to the band's. Mr. Loeffler's fantastic "tone-poem" asked the utmost and the freest technical mastery of his instrument from each player in the orchestra. It asked also the responsive imagination that could make that mastery the vivid expression of every suggestion, pictorial, ironic, narrative, what you will, that the music contains. Rarely did the orchestra fail him. Rather at every moment it served him in the way that set his music in the best possible light. The sense of musical design and continuity that Mr. Gericke has infused into every man under him held the fantasia together as a coherent musical structure. The imagination of conductor and men seized the pictorial significance of each detail, while their skill expressed it. Schumann's "Spring" symphony ended the programme. It is hard to fancy it played with richer warmth and beauty of varied tone, with finer ardor of rhythm, with brighter romantic glow and elation of spirit. It was an intoxicating performance—one more of those in which Mr. Gericke and his men reanimate and almost recreate familiar music. Yet all this eloquence was nearly faultless in detail. No wonder, Mr. d'Indy, familiar as he is with most of the orchestras of Europe, wondered and praised as he heard. He is not used to our orchestra as we are—far too used to it to appreciate all its virtues, and a little too disposed to play the parts of the Athenians who were tired of hearing Aristides called the Just.

SYMPHONY HALL

SUNDAY EVENING, NOV. 26, at 8

Pension Fund Concert

Commemorative of the 25th Year of the Founding of the Orchestra

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

GEORG HENSCHEL } Conductors
WILHELM GERICKE }

PROGRAMME

OVERTURE, "Dedication of the House," Op. 124, Beethoven

(First overture performed at the Symphony Concerts)

GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor

SYMPHONY No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, Op. 74, Tchaikowsky

- I. Adagio ; Allegro non troppo
- II. Allegro con grazia
- III. Allegro molto vivace
- IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso

BACCHANALE from "Tannhaeuser" . . . . . Wagner

TONE POEM, "Don Juan," Op. 20 . . . . . R. Strauss

A MUSICAL COMMEMORATION.

There is to be a concert next Sunday which makes a triple appeal to the Bostonian. First, because of its excellent numbers; 2d, because of the beneficent object for which it is given, and 3d, because of the event it commemorates. The Pension Fund concert is to present a performance of Tschalkowsky's Pathetic Symphony, Strauss' "Don Juan," and other important and interesting music. But there are more potent reasons than this why the hall should be crowded.

If we are ever to have a fund that shall be of benefit to the musicians of our orchestra it is high time that a better foundation for it should be laid. The musicians of our orchestra are not members of any Musical Union and are therefore deprived of any benefits accruing from such a source. The concerts given to the aid of the pension fund in the past have not yielded enough to place the plan upon a really permanent footing. It is time that our citizens realized that there is a duty and a debt in this matter; every Pension Fund Concert should add a large sum to the inadequate funds now being laid up to protect the old age of our favorite musicians.

But this time there is also the commemorative feature, which should add zest and prestige to the occasion. America is by no means abreast of Europe in this manner of paying homage to Art. The present writer recalls visiting F. Hiller and Franz Lachner during their "jubilees" and recalls rooms filled with laurel wreaths, letters presents, tokens of appreciation from all Germany, recognizing the art-work that had been done by these veterans. He has seen similar tribute paid to the Cologne Male Chorus and the Vienna Schubertbund.

Boston has always vaunted its great orchestra; it ought now to make a great occasion of its 25th birthday.

The celebration is to take on peculiar significance also from the fact that the first conductor, Mr. Georg Henschel, is to be present and is to conduct the first work ever played by the orchestra, Beethoven's "Dedication of the House." For the first three seasons of our symphony concerts this composition was given at the beginning as a species of musical grace before the banquet. Many will be the reminiscences crowding around this concert. One will recall the broad programmes of Henschel, the poetic freedom of Nikisch, the fire of Paur, and last and greatest, the care of Gericke which first built the organization into its present shape, the energy which took a second-class orchestra and made it the peer of any in the world.

It is said that republics are ungrateful; we hope that municipalities are not equally so, and that next Sunday may be made the occasion of a marked tribute to our orchestra, to two of its conductors, to the public spirit of Mr. H. L. Higginson, and, finally, of a solid benefit to the Pension Fund. Adv. Nov. 20. 05 Louis C. Elson.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The eighth concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony hall tonight. The purpose of this concert has become almost self explanatory. It is to add to the fund which is now being accumulated for the purpose of providing for the members of the orchestra when age or sickness incapacitates them for active duty.

All the members of the orchestra contribute to the fund in the shape of annual dues, but the money secured in this way is not sufficient for the purpose, and rather than to make an appeal to the public which patronizes and is interested in the orchestra, the policy has always been, since the movement started three years ago, to give special concerts and devote to the fund the gross proceeds from these.

In a sense, these concerts are a boon to many music lovers of this city. It is a curious fact that Boston is a most difficult place to hear the orchestra for all that do not subscribe for the whole series of concerts. Such is the esteem in which the orchestra is held that there are no seats for sale on Friday afternoons and only a very limited number for Saturday evenings. Consequently, for the large public which does not feel able to subscribe for the series and is unable to take its chances in the "rush line" on Friday afternoon, the chances of hearing the orchestra in Boston is very small.

But on account of the pension fund at least two concerts are given on each year on Sunday evenings, when most people are free. This gives an extra opportunity for nonsubscribers to hear the splendid organization which has done so much to make Boston famous, and the experience of the past has shown that the opportunity has not been neglected.

The concert tonight has an added interest, in that it is commemorative of the 25th season of the orchestra. And in honor of this event, Mr. George Henschel, the first conductor, has consented to come to Boston and conduct the first number, Beethoven's overture, the "Dedication of the House," which was the first number on the program of the first concert in the old Music hall, Oct 22, 1881.

The program for tonight is as follows: Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; "Symphonie Pathétique," Tschalkowsky; bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Wagner; symphonic poem, "Don Juan," R. Strauss. Globe

On Sunday night Mr. Henschel, warmly received and honored with a wreath, took the band to recall its first concert, twenty-four years ago, with the overture, Beethoven's "Dedication of the House," that then began the programme. He was unfamiliar to the men and the men to him. Yet as it played, the band seemed the same perfectly responsive instrument. After this little episode of reminiscence, Mr. Gericke took his place again for Tschalkowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. It is possible to make parts of the march movement sound more like flashes of darting tonal fire than they did last night. You may even imagine a bizarre, almost an affected grace in the syncopations of the second movement, which Mr. Gericke hardly gives. He has not the Tartar fury of Safonoff, the Russian conductor in the one, or the nervous tremor of the half-English, half-Russian, Wood in the other. They, with Nikisch, are the acknowledged masters of this symphony. Yet not one of the three, as we recall them, lifts the fourth movement as Mr. Gericke lifts it. They make it individual—the self-torture and the self-pity, the hopeless longing, of Tschalkowsky himself or of any other unstable, delirious temperament touched with weakness. So conceived, the music is pathetic enough to earn the symphony its name. Mr. Gericke, on the other hand, makes the same music sound epic, almost universal. He puts into it the woe of things that beat down and oppress, and that will not be conquered, and the despair of them that do battle against them, and the glimpses of their ideal and the longing for it that holds them to the contest. In a word, he makes the music the exalted and poignant expression of large human moods, while some other conductors leave it an exciting case of nervous sensitiveness—not to say degeneracy—put into tones. Here again the orchestra was all responsive eloquence.

The "Bacchanale" from Tannhäuser, and Strauss's "Don Juan" ended the concert. Every orchestra and every band in these days can summon more or less the riot of the Venusberg. The pervading voluptuousness of it and of Wagner's music is finer and more evasive. Our orchestra's mastery of tone brought it last night now clear, tense and biting, now soft, vague and languorous. By the same mastery it caught the peculiar acrid intensity of much of Strauss's music. It is easy to seize its telling phrases, its piercing dissonances, its broad progressions. It is much more difficult to bind them together as parts of large and proportioned whole, that has musical and intellectual structure. Yet so Strauss made his tone-poems, and so he would have them played. Orchestra and conductor, to do him and his hearers justice, must be masters of musical design, and ours are such. It is the fashion here at home to think of them as best in the classics. Yet within a fortnight, Mr. Mengelberg, the conductor of Amsterdam, who is almost Strauss's chosen pupil, was praising its Strauss and Wagner when he heard them in New York, and last night Mr. d'Indy, modern of moderns, was at one with him.

Gwilym Miles was the singer and George Proctor the pianist at the Sunday chamber concert yesterday afternoon at Chickering Hall. With Bach Mr. Proctor was admirably lucid. With Scarlatti, he was graceful; with Rubinstein he was becomingly light; but with all three he was besettingly dry. Mr. Miles, who had nine songs to sing, between two groups of pieces for the piano, was warmer. Schumann and Strauss at one extreme and Irish dialect songs at the other proved the range of his musical intelligence and the variety of his musical sympathies. In all he showed more skill in the art of song than he has even shown here before. Out of that skill came a larger and finer musical and dramatic expressiveness. As voices go, Mr. Miles is not remarkable. He makes it seem so by the practised intelligence with which he uses it, and by the adroitness with which he makes it expressive of the finer things in the music and the mood of the songs that he chooses. His progress has been the progress of pure artistry, and it is pleasant now to see him entering its reward. Trans. Nov. 27, 1905

ITS 25TH YEAR.

Symphony Orchestra Gives Pension Fund Concert.

Occasion of Uncommon Significance and a Wonderful Musical Treat.

Globe — Nov. 27, 1905

The commemoration of the 25th year of the existence of Boston's noblest musical organization, the Symphony orchestra, took the form of a "pension fund concert" of uncommon excellence at Symphony hall last night. There were present a great number of music lovers, not alone from Greater Boston, but from distant centers, Worcester, Springfield, Providence and New York city being generously represented in the audience.

It was an audience made up of many others than regular Symphony subscribers, who testified in this way to their appreciation of the remarkable work being accomplished for musical life in the state by Mr. Gericke's magnificent band. The appearance of Georg Henschel, the first conductor, added to the impressiveness of the occasion, and it was appropriate and most interesting that these skilled musicians (every one a solo artist) should play Beethoven's famous overture, "The Dedication of the House," the piece with which commenced the first program in November, 1880.

The joint appearance of the always gracious Mr Gericke, and the cordially greeted Mr Henschel was of course the signal for a great demonstration, and they were both evidently greatly pleased, for somewhat different reasons. The conditions were all of the most favorable for hearing the fine organization at its very best. The very atmosphere seemed charged with the spirit of appreciation. The result was a concert the like of which may not be heard again in a long time. The musicians who have passed away—who have gone to other earthly fields—who, like Mr Nikisch, have taken up residence overseas, all these seemed in spirit to be present. The occasion was one of uncommon significance and reminiscent impressiveness, reminding those who have watched the organization's steady growth of the days of 1879 and later, when Theodore Thomas and his orchestra had stirred the city to its musical depths, and in the unrest which followed the splendid movement—thanks to Maj Higginson—became a reality.

The "Musical Invocation" (played Oct 22, 1881, by 67 performers) made a most appropriate overture, Mr Henschel's conducting having apparently lost none of its old-time delicacy. When he stepped down a great wreath of laurel was given him—almost too big for first violin Hess to hand him, or for the well-nigh-overcome recipient to carry away. Then the stately Mr Gericke's turn came with the Tschalkowsky "Pathetic Symphony" in four delightful movements. The adagio is full of haunting airs, sweeping chords and soothing fervor. In the "vivace," where there is a strident marching theme, and in the finale, filled with rich organ-like melody, the effect of massed strings is something indescribable. In the latter movement, too, the odd "Mime"-like motif was a marked characteristic.

The Richard Strauss number, a "tone poem" from "Don Juan," demonstrated anew the fact that Mr Gericke is a far more satisfactory conductor of this composer's music than is the latter himself. It was as near as anything to being the flower and fragrance of the orchestra's finest work. At times the solo violin soared above the rest of the orchestration like a spirit. Then the harp became dominant, then the oboe, flute, cornet and clarinet in turn had precedence.

It was a beautiful and dignified ending to a notable musical event. But why does not the musical element in Boston, abundantly able to pack the hall to overflowing if it would, see to it that there are no vacant seats at these pension-fund concerts? Here is a case, truly, where charity begins at the home door.

B Herald — Nov 27/905
Brilliant Musical Fete at Symphony Hall in Aid of Pension Fund of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra this season was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme included Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House," Tschalkowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," R. Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

Inasmuch as the concert was also in commemoration of the establishment of the orchestra—for this is the 25th season—Mr. Georg Henschel, who is now living in New York, was invited to conduct Beethoven's overture, the first piece played by the orchestra at its first concert, Oct. 22, 1881, when he entered upon his directorship of three years. He was heartily welcomed. After the overture he was applauded with the like heartiness and a laurel wreath was given to him. The other pieces were conducted by Mr. Gericke.

Much has already been said by The Herald about the purpose of this pension fund and the peculiar relationship between the orchestra and the people of Boston, a relationship that should always insure a generous response to the appeal, even if concert-goers consulted only their own selfish interests. It is not necessary now to repeat what has been said, nor is it necessary at this late day to enlarge on the excellence of the orchestra. The fame of this organization has spread throughout the musical world, and it is a pleasure to hear Mr. Vincent d'Indy saying of his own accord that no orchestra has so marked euphonic character. Mr. d'Indy is acquainted with the leading orchestras in Europe, and his opinion is not that of a person of limited experience. Nor is his opinion merely the exuberantly careless compliment of an invited guest.

The time has not yet come for a history of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with a complete list of the programmes. This history, when it is written, will have more than a local interest. It will be an important contribution to the history of music in America. What a wealth of anecdote it might contain for the amusement of the general reader interested in gossip about men and women of the operatic and concert stage who have appeared with the orchestra in the course of 25 years!

The character of the programme last night led one to reflection. What, for instance, would the orchestra of 1881 have done with Strauss' "Don Juan" and with the symphony, if the two pieces had then been in existence? And how would the audience have listened to this music? "The sun do move," as Bro. Jasper remarked to his congregation.

Concerts of this nature are, as a rule, to be dismissed without critical comment. The rule is a wise one. Yet in this instance it may be said without impertinence that the concert last evening was one of exceeding brilliance, one long to be remembered with wonder and gratitude. The overture, which today has only a historical or rather an antiquarian interest, was played with great spirit, and Mr. Gericke and the orchestra in the pieces that followed covered themselves with glory. The large audience was quick to recognize the merit of the performance and the demonstrations of appreciation were enthusiastic and long-continued.

Inasmuch. A Debt to Our Orchestra

Next Sunday evening we that go week after week to the Symphony concerts have one of our rare opportunities to repay the men in the orchestra for a little of the pleasure that they give us. Our applause goes to composer, conductor and band, and there is no dividing it. Our praise in talk and print falls to the orchestra as a whole. The impersonal "it" must be our word. Yet in that whole and in that "it" are ninety-six men, and each has contributed something to the pleasure that we receive. We like to speak and to write of the perfections of our band, but those perfections are only the sum of the individual excellences of every player in it. We have the finest orchestra in America, and one of the three or four finest in the world. More than anything else it has spread and heightened the artistic note of our city. Endowment, with all Mr. Higginson's generosity, could not alone have made the band what it is. A conductor, however potent, must work with the men that sit before him. We compare our orchestra with those of other cities. We congratulate ourselves upon its obvious superiorities. We give this and that reason for them, and the most considerable of all is the finer quality of its personnel.

"A band of virtuosos," we call the orchestra deservedly, and like others to call it. Out of its virtuosity come the beauty of our strings, the lusciousness of our woodwinds, the mellowness of our brass and the flawless fusion of all these instrumental voices. Other orchestras have been known to struggle with the technical tasks that relentless modern composers lay upon them. We take the ability of our men to meet them for granted, and it has never failed. Other orchestras have stopped short in expressive eloquence. Our men have answered every call of imaginative composer and eager conductor. At bottom all this is the virtuosity, the ability, the responsiveness of ninety-six individuals practising one of the finest and hardest of artistic virtues—subordination to the large design and the large effect. It is one of the distinctive glories of the band that the players have made us regard it always as a whole. It is one of the smallest of compensations to them that once or twice in a season we should take thought of them as individuals.

Virtuosos are but men. They live and they work like the rest of us, and under no slight tension. They are no more and no less rewarded than are most of us that follow one or another of the arts. They give their best years and their best talents to our service and pleasure. Like other men, they take heed of their future. As with any other pleasure, it is for us to take heed also of the future of those that give it to us. The Pension Fund of the orchestra is the men's provision for that end. The concert that the band gives for it next Sunday is one of our opportunities to strengthen that provision. We discharge our general obligation to the Symphony Orchestra as a musical institution when we take our season tickets. We should pay our personal debt of pleasure to the men in it when we take our tickets for their concert for their Pension Fund. The programme that they play—next Sunday Beethoven, Tschalkowsky, Wagner and Richard Strauss happen to make it—is the sweetening of the occasion. It is for many programmes and many concerts that their regular audiences have to show their appreciation. For the rest, for the many that like so well to name the orchestra when they are praising their city, there is equal opportunity to give the men that make it a more tangible reward. And it is so seldom and so modestly that they ask us to heed them.

H. T. P.

THE PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Beethoven, overture, "Dedication of the House."
Georg Henschel, Conductor.
Tschalkowsky, Symphonie Pathétique.
Wagner, Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser."
R. Strauss, Symphonie Poem, "Don Juan."

Spite of the fact that there was no soloist on the programme a good sized and enthusiastic audience was in evidence, gathered to celebrate the 25th anniversary of our Orchestra and to help swell its pension fund exchequer. From the time when Gottlieb Graupner established the Philo-Harmonic Orchestra in Pond st. (now Bedford st.) in old Boston, to the epoch when the Henry Siegel Co. started a "Gewandhaus" Orchestra in their department store, there has been nothing so important in Boston's orchestral matters as the work of our Boston symphony orchestra. It has, as Theodore Thomas often acknowledged, elevated orchestral music throughout all America.

On a beneficent occasion, such as this, where almost all of the artists donate their services for the good of the cause, criticism is out of place, yet the evening's performance was "hors concours" also because of the excellence of the work. Mr. Henschel received a cordial greeting when he took the baton and the conductor's stand. Mr. Henschel received a very large and beautiful wreath of laurel.

It made us feel very old when we thought back upon the time when the same conductor conducted the same composition at the first of the symphony concerts. For it was Mr. Henschel's custom to "say grace" at the beginning of the season's musical banquet with Beethoven's "Dedication of the House," and we had it regularly at the first of each series of concerts in those days when American orchestral music, heavenly maid, was young.

It might have been another souvenir had the eminent conductor but placed his orchestra as he used to set it in the first 2 seasons. He used to divide the strings, so that half of the 1st violins, 2nd violins, violas, and violoncellos, sat on his right hand, and the other half upon his left. The contrabasses too were at the front of the stage, in 2 divisions, right and left, all save one lonely contrabassist who stood, undivided, at the back of the platform, in the centre, reminding one of James' "solitary horseman."

We were all glad to welcome our old conductor back at this concert, and to think of how much he has achieved and how great he has grown in the quarter-century since he launched our orchestra.

We have but recently heard the Wagner "Bacchanale" and the "Don Juan" in our orchestral concerts, and the playing of the Tschalkowsky "Symphonie Pathétique" by our band is also well-known. The latter wears less well than Strauss' picture of Death (and Transfiguration) but Coleridge need not abolish Keats and 2 different schools of music may co-exist amicably. The Tschalkowski symphony was played gloriously. Mr. Gericke was received with much enthusiasm and his interpretations greatly applauded.

As we generally have two Pension Fund concerts each season it may be permissible to make a suggestion for a future programme. Would it not be interesting and profitable for our band to give us a "Concert of Musical Curiosities"? For such a programme one might suggest Mozart's "Musical Joke" which pictures a village Kapellmeister struggling fearfully with a classical composition.

This is chamber-music, but could easily be made orchestra. Then Beethoven's "Battle Symphony" with its two bass-drums pounding on each side of the stage and "We won't go home till Morning" ("Malbrooke") turned into minor. Bach's "Coffee Cantata" could be added if vocal work were desired. And finally Tausch's concerto for Kettle-drum could be given, with its 5 drums and its elevation of the humble instrument into the chief rank of the orchestra.

Louis C. Elson.

Henschel Leads Symphony In Pension Fund Concert

Journal

The first of this year's Pension Fund concerts by the Symphony Orchestra was given at Symphony Hall last evening before an audience that, while of goodly size, ought to have been larger. The object was praiseworthy and the concert itself one of the most powerful and fascinating of years. The men were in finest form, the program was one of great intensity, if little variety, and Mr. Gericke's reading of everything absolutely superb. Then, too, George Henschel, the first conductor of the band, was present and led the players in the first work ever given by the orchestra, Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture.

Mr. Henschel read the square-cut and dully formal old composition vigorously, but the breath of life has long since departed from it. The conductor was very warmly recalled and was presented with a great laurel wreath, in which the white ribbon and purple immortelles seemed to be, in part, a memorial of his lost wife. At any rate, he received the tribute with deep emotion.

Tschalkowsky immortal "Pathétique" symphony, with its wordrous call to all the deeper emotions of man, had a profoundly stirring and effective performance. Never has Mr. Gericke so brought out the passion and fire of the first movement, while at all points the reading was splendidly virile and the performance full of virtuosity. The "Tannhauser" Bacchanale has been better played—in fact, was better played at the Symphony concert of a few weeks ago—but Richard Strauss' great "Don Juan" tone poem was another masterpiece of magnificently free and fiery reading, while the performance showed the orchestra at its highest pinnacle of technical accomplishment.

An audience large and fashionable attested its loyalty to the cause. A conspicuous figure was the French composer, D'Indy, who was a guest of Mrs. Rachard Hall. Noticeable in the throng were Mr. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. E. Preble Motley, Mrs. T. Adamowski, with party; Mme. Marius, with friend, and greeted on all sides, she having recently returned from Paris; Mr. and Mrs. Robert M. Morse, with party, from Jamaica Plain; Miss Marianna Guild, aunt of Governor-elect Curtis Guild, accompanied by her old friend, Mrs. Marsh; Jeannette Noyes Rice and Mr. Rice, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Richmond, Mr. Arthur Austin, Mrs. John C. Phillips, chaperoning a party of young ladies, including her daughter Martha; M. and Mme. Wagniere and friend, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Crocker Stevens, Mr. George Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newton Bagg and daughter, Mr. Howell Hansell, the actor; Mrs. S. B. Field, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. and Mrs. T. Russell Sullivan, Mrs. E. H. Francis, Mr. and Mrs. E. V. R. Crosby, Mr. and Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Miss Ethel Forbes, Mrs. Charles Perkins, with party; Mr. C. A. Ellis, Mr. Louis Elson, Mrs. John Grey, the Misses Mason, Mr. and Mrs. P. A. Livermore and many more.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

VINCENT D'INDY, Conductor.

SPECIALLY ENGAGED FOR THESE CONCERTS.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

D'INDY.

SYMPHONY in B flat major, No. 2, op. 57.

- I. Extrêmement lent; Très vif.
- II. Modérément lent.
- III. Modéré; Très animé.
- IV. Introduction, Fugue et Finale.

FAURE.

"Pelléas et Mélisande," SUITE from Stage music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, op. 80.

- I. Prelude: Quasi adagio.
- II. "The Spinning Woman." Andantino quasi allegretto.
- III. Molto adagio.

D'INDY.

"Istar." Symphonic Variations, op. 42.

FRANCK.

"Psyche and Cupid." excerpt from "Psyche," a Symphonic Poem.
(First time.)

DUKAS.

The Sorcerer's Apprentice.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

We were all glad to welcome our old conductor back at this concert, and to think of how much he has achieved and how great he has grown in the quarter-century since he launched our orchestra.

We have but recently heard the Wagner "Bacchanale" and the "Don Juan" in our orchestral concerts, and the playing of the Tschalkowsky "Symphonie Pathétique" by our band is also well-known. The latter wears less well than Strauss' picture of Death (and Transfiguration) but Coleridge need not abolish Keats and 2 different schools of music may co-exist amicably. The Tschalkowski symphony was played gloriously. Mr. Gericke was received with much enthusiasm and his interpretations greatly applauded.

As we generally have two Pension Fund concerts each season it may be permissible to make a suggestion for a future programme. Would it not be interesting and profitable for our band to give us a "Concert of Musical Curiosities"? For such a programme one might suggest Mozart's "Musical Joke" which pictures a village Kapellmeister struggling fearfully with a classical composition.

This is chamber-music, but could easily be made orchestra. Then Beethoven's "Battle Symphony" with its two bass-drums pounding on each side of the stage and "We won't go home till Morning" ("Mal-brooke") turned into minor. Bach's "Coffee Cantata" could be added if vocal work were desired. And finally Tausch's concerto for Kettle-drum could be given, with its 5 drums and its elevation of the humble instrument into the chief rank of the orchestra.

Louis C. Elson.

Henschel Leads Symphony In Pension Fund Concert

Journal

The first of this year's Pension Fund concerts by the Symphony Orchestra was given at Symphony Hall last evening before an audience that, while of goodly size, ought to have been larger. The object was praiseworthy and the concert itself one of the most powerful and fascinating of years. The men were in finest form, the program was one of great intensity, if little variety, and Mr. Gericke's reading of everything absolutely superb. Then, too, George Henschel, the first conductor of the band, was present and led the players in the first work ever given by the orchestra, Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture.

Mr. Henschel read the square-cut and dully formal old composition vigorously, but the breath of life has long since departed from it. The conductor was very warmly recalled and was presented with a great laurel wreath, in which the white ribbon and purple immortelles seemed to be, in part, a memorial of his lost wife. At any rate, he received the tribute with deep emotion.

Tschalkowsky immortal "Pathétique" symphony, with its wondrous call to all the deeper emotions of man, had a profoundly stirring and effective performance. Never has Mr. Gericke so brought out the passion and fire of the first movement, while at all points the reading was splendidly virile and the performance full of virtuosity. The "Tannhauser" Bacchanale has been better played—in fact, was better played at the Symphony concert of a few weeks ago—but Richard Strauss' great "Don Juan" tone poem was another masterpiece of magnificently free and fiery reading, while the performance showed the orchestra at its highest pinnacle of technical accomplishment.

An audience large and fashionable attested its loyalty to the cause. A conspicuous figure was the French composer, D'Indy, who was a guest of Mrs. Rachard Hall. Noticeable in the throng were Mr. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. E. Preble Motley, Mrs. T. Adamowski, with party; Mme. Marius, with friend, and greeted on all sides, she having recently returned from Paris; Mr. and Mrs. Robert M. Morse, with party, from Jamaica Plain; Miss Marianna Guild, aunt of Governor-elect Curtis Guild, accompanied by her old friend, Mrs. Marsh; Jeannette Noyes Rice and Mr. Rice, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur-Richmond, Mr. Arthur Austin, Mrs. John C. Phillips, chaperoning a party of young ladies, including her daughter Martha; M. and Mme. Wagniere and friend, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Crocker Stevens, Mr. George Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Newton Bagg and daughter, Mr. Howell Hansell, the actor; Mrs. S. B. Field, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. and Mrs. T. Russell Sullivan, Mrs. E. H. Francis, Mr. and Mrs. E. V. R. Crosby, Mr. and Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Miss Ethel Forbes, Mrs. Charles Perkins, with party; Mr. C. A. Ellis, Mr. Louis Elson, Mrs. John Grey, the Misses Mason, Mr. and Mrs. P. A. Livermore and many more.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

VINCENT D'INDY, Conductor.

SPECIALLY ENGAGED FOR THESE CONCERTS.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

D'INDY.

SYMPHONY in B flat major, No. 2, op. 57.

- I. Extrêmement lent; Très vif.
- II. Modérément lent.
- III. Modéré; Très animé.
- IV. Introduction, Fugue et Finale.

FAURE.

"Pelléas et Mélisande," SUITE from Stage music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, op. 80.

- I. Prelude: Quasi adagio.
- II. "The Spinning Woman." Andantino quasi allegretto.
- III. Molto adagio.

D'INDY.

"Istar." Symphonic Variations, op. 42.

FRANCK.

"Psyche and Cupid." excerpt from "Psyche," a Symphonic Poem.
(First time.)

DUKAS.

The Sorcerer's Apprentice.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

IS NOTED FRENCH COMPOSER.

Vincent d'Indy, Who Will Conduct Symphony Orchestra, Dec 1 and 2. 1905

VINCENT D'INDY,
Who Will Conduct Symphony Orchestra Dec 1 and 2.

D'INDY AS GUEST LEADS SYMPHONY

First Instance in History of the Orchestra That Foreign
Conductor Has Been so
Invited,

MODERN FRENCH MUSIC COMPRISES PROGRAMME

Two of Visitor's Own Compositions Among Them—Conducts Quietly, but with Force.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last night at Symphony Hall. The orchestra was conducted as at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon by Mr. Vincent d'Indy of Paris, who made his first appearance in this country as a conductor. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in B-flat, No. 2.....D'Indy
"Pelleas and Melisande" suite.....Faure
"Istar," symphonic variations.....D'Indy
"Psyche and Cupid".....Franck
"The Sorcerer's Apprentice".....Dukas

For the first time in the history of this orchestra a foreign conductor was invited to lead it as a guest. The innovation was a tribute both to Mr. d'Indy, the composer, and to the younger school of French composers whom he so worthily represents. This school is "young" in the freshness and vigor and modernity of its musical views, opinions, tendencies, rather than in the respective ages of its most distinguished members. It is characterized by the purity and the nobility of its artistic aims and purposes.

Mr. d'Indy, it should be understood, is not one of the tribe of virtuoso conductors, who go from European city to city, as in a triumphal car, who excite popular interest as that aroused by any bejewelled prima donna with warranted cascades of bravura, or by any tenor with a well authenticated high chest C. Trumpets proclaim their terrible approach; they rehearse hastily; in the concert they give an original and startling interpretation of a familiar symphony or symphonic poem; they then leave melodramatically, as though caught up in the whirlwind of applause.

Mr. d'Indy, who has the modesty and the simplicity of the truly distinguished, has conducted in the leading cities of various European countries for the chief purpose of acquainting audiences with the works of this younger French school, the ultra-modern, the hypo-modern school, call it what you will. To exclude rigorously any one of his own compositions would be false modesty, and it would be unfair to the school which he represents and of which he is the head. His own musical life is that of a composer and also that of a teacher, for he takes great pride in the chola Cantorum, of which he was one of the founders. As an instructor or lecturer on composition he thus exerts an influence that cannot be estimated too highly. He thus hands down the sane and beneficent precepts of his master, Cesar Franck.

As an honored visitor in this city Mr. d'Indy finds many music lovers who have a deep interest in the works of the modern French school. Nor is this interest, this acquaintanceship, something sudden. Boston has always been willing to hear what composers of any nation had to say. Its German population is not so great that by showing a chauvinistic spirit it succeeded in Germanizing thoroughly and narrowly the musical taste. Nor did the Germans, who did the pioneer work here, and to whom we owe much, display an illiberal spirit. The "Waverly" overture, by Berlioz, who is still a modern among the moderns, was played here 54 years ago, and this great master was applauded in Boston long before the Berlioz cult was fashionable in Paris. The conductors who brought out these works were for the most part Germans, as were the members of the orchestras that played them.

Of late years Mr. Loeffler and after him Mr. Kniesel, Mr. Lang, local pianists and singers, Mr. Longy, Mr. Paur and above all Mr. Wilhelm Gericke have made us acquainted with compositions of this modern school. The programme of last night included only one piece that was not known to symphony audiences—the excerpt from Franck's "Psyche," and Mr. Gericke announced this symphonic poem at the beginning of the season. It may here be said that certain Parisian publishers prevent a still wider acquaintanceship with modern compositions. In cases where the orchestral parts are not published, these publishers are not inclined to let them out on hire, either through indifference or because they fear lest some advantage be taken of them when the work is not protected by a rigorous copyright.

The programme last night included compositions by acknowledged masters, Franck, D'Indy, Faure and by Dukas, a composer of indisputable skill and no little imagination, if he is to be judged fairly by his "Sorcerer's Apprentice." It was a pleasure to hear again the charming music that Faure wrote for Mrs. Patrick Campbell's production of Maeterlinck's tragedy, although the peculiar genius of Faure is revealed in his songs and chamber music more fully than in his incidental music to three or four plays. The excerpt from Franck's "Psyche" awakened a desire to hear the whole work. This movement portrays the bliss of the lovers, after the voices of the invisible ones in the garden of Cupid warn her against curiosity and before she is tempted, as was Elsa, to wreck her happiness. The music is both ecstatic and passionate, yet noble in its expression of a sensuousness which sounds the depths and knows the heights. The themes are so blended or linked together that they are of nearly equal importance, yet one theme which is brought in again with full orchestral force toward the end of the movement is as a superbly sonorous chant of triumphant love.

Mr. d'Indy chose from his own works the second symphony and his orchestral variations "Istar," which is practically a symphonic poem to illustrate the old Babylonian legend of Istar's descent to the land of No-Return, her adventures at the gates, at each of which some ornament or garment is taken from her, until, as she is about to enter the presence of the Queen, she stands revealed and unabashed in her dazzling ularity. His choice was a wise one, for the Symphony on a Mountain Air, which has been performed here, will be played later in the season, as will, no doubt, the legend "Saugefleuri," which is on the programme of the concerts to be given on the trip of the orchestra with Mr. d'Indy this week. "Istar" has already been heard twice at these concerts, and then, as last night, it excited admiration by the display of the composer's technical skill, ingenuity and imagination, by the brilliance of the orchestration and by the majesty with which the full and complete theme is proclaimed when Istar stands at last before the warder in her glory.

The symphony perplexed even some of the composer's warmest admirers when Mr. Gericke performed it here with infinite care and almost personal affection early in last January. To them it seemed after one hearing chiefly a marvel of constructive skill. Here is music without any programme, without a suggestive title. Yet the symbolist may find this symphony a symbol as Sir Thomas Browne found quincunxes in the heavens, on the earth, in the waters, in the bowels of the earth, in the optic nerve of man, in everything. Two themes are presented at the beginning; they are developed separately or together throughout the work; they war against each other; themes of lesser importance are shed from them or are struck from them in the violence of the contest; at the end one of these two themes conquers and soars above the defeated and fettered rival. In this lies the dramatic action of the symphony. There is nothing that is purely narrative; there is nothing that is obviously pictorial.

Let it be said at once that this symphony is a work of uncommon strength and importance. It contains deep and impressive thoughts, pages of a beauty that is almost unearthly, passages that are intensely dramatic. The music is clothed in festal orchestral robes. On the other hand, the speech that conveys the thought is peculiarly idiomatic. It is as though Mr. d'Indy had fashioned it with the greatest care lest there should here and there be commonplaces that have not been despised even by the greatest masters. There is white heat in the passion; the average audience asks for red. There is no keener emotion than that which may be called cerebral; the average audience wishes to share in the emotion which is purely physical and often only epidemic.

Then there is the peculiar austerity which often distinguishes Mr. d'Indy's thought. The Herald has before this alluded to this loftiness of thought, which is as a high peak or the rarified air of the mountain chain that has been so dear to him since boyhood. It is not given to every one to breathe freely this air. There are some who would not fain climb, who prefer to dream idle dreams in lush vegetation far down in the valley.

Again, the boldness of many of Mr. d'Indy's harmonic progressions, the audacity of his dissonances and his rhythms shock ears that believe the sole mission of music to be this: To soothe the process of digestion or to encourage a gentlemanlike joy. What have such ears to do with the orgies of the muse? And at times Mr. d'Indy is a debauchee in his austerity.

It would seem as though in his righteous contempt for all that which makes for immediate and easy popularity, Mr. d'Indy has deliberately avoided anything that would at once win the favor of the average music lover, one that is sensitive to conventional and expected impressions. There are passages in this symphony that perplex the trained musician, one willing, eager to admire. We well remember when the prelude to "Lohengrin" was regarded in this country as dangerously radical music, when the prelude to "The Mastersingers" was even in Boston declared to be hideous cacophony, when Brahms and Tschalkowsky were looked at askew by learned professors and assiduous concertgoers. The time will undoubtedly come when the younger generation that heard Mr. d'Indy's symphony last night will smile as they remember vaguely that this music was at first a mystery to many in the audience. His idioms will then seem simple and inevitable; the logic of his musical thought will be considered perhaps too apparent.

Yet who that knows the purity of this composer's artistic life and is acquainted with his growth and development in the course of a long and honorable career would have him speak today a more vulgar language, the use of which would be hypocritical? His is no ordinary appetite for fame. He may well say with Walter Savage Landor: "I shall dine late; but the dining room will be well lighted, the guests few and select."

We believe this symphony to be one of the most important works of modern times. We believe that it will constantly grow in beauty and power to the hearer that listens willingly and intelligently. We believe that certain passages which now seem cryptic or without definite purpose will in time be as significant as the first and second movements and the superbly broad and overpowering finale were last night.

Mr. d'Indy conducted quietly, but with force, and with the perfect understanding of what he wished to express. The magnificent orchestra seconded his wishes in every way as a tribute of respect and admiration. He was most warmly greeted, and applause was hearty and long continued after the various numbers of the programme.

Record Nov 22 1905
Vincent D'Indy, the French composer, who comes to this country by invitation from H. L. Higginson to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts, arrived in Boston this morning, having taken the train from New York after the arrival of the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse.

By asking Mr. d'Indy to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a precedent of 24 yrs. was broken, for he will be the first musician, other than its regular conductor, to direct it at its regular concerts. The invitation was intended as a compliment to the school of "younger" French composers.

MUSICAL MATTERS

D'Indy Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Famous Composer Conducts Performance of Own Works.

Emma Eames Concert—Other Coming Events.

Vincent d'Indy, composer and pupil of Cesar Franck, who came to this country at the invitation of the Boston Symphony management, led his own symphony in B flat major (opus 57) last night and Friday afternoon, the program containing also his symphonic variations on "Istar," and music by his contemporaries, Dukas, Faure, and his teacher Franck. The result was a concert intensely moving and interesting, but one in which the modernity of the music made wall-paper designs instead of paintings for the general public. Mr. d'Indy came to the platform quietly, and was received with the gentle hail of tapping bows on violin-backs, and a rapturous, but not overloud hand-clapping from the audience. He is a well-built Frenchman, perhaps 50 years old, with a fine head, a noble forehead, high, round and fronting a capacious skull; eyes hidden entirely in the shadow of a brow that forms a heavy ledge, barely curved at its outer ends and a straight line across, a rather heavy nose, and the mouth of a man able to persuade himself of the truth of that which is not so.

At the conductor's desk he is graceful, most polite, and more suggesting to the players by pantomime the tempo, the character of attack, the climaxes of the music, than commanding these things from the musicians. His hand was always in advance of the baton's tip, his beat always thus a staccato, and his reading shaded by measures, taking cognizance of the tiniest details of his tone-pictures.

The symphony was composed in 1903-1904, and was played in Boston by the symphony orchestra last January. It is "without a program of any sort," its themes mere cell-forms of the simplest sort, combined ingeniously, but having no story to tell that is intelligible except to the advanced student of music. It is the calculus of musical mathematics. The Faure number was a suite from the stage music to Maeterlinck's tragedy of "Pelleas and Melisande," the three movements including a noble prelude to the play, an entr'acte called "La Filleuse," and a third movement associated with the tragic final act.

"Psyche and Eros," an excerpt from Franck's symphony "Psyche," was played for the first time in Boston. To hear it provoked the thought that after all, those other fellows could get as monotonous with their six-hole scale as the older bores with the diatonic, or somebody else with the Chinese, doubtless. Its sweetness wrings the heart, its very simplicity is a charm greater than all the tangles of the ultra-modern school.

The concert ended happily with the scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," the story of the fellow who set the broomstick a-carrying water, but lost the combination and couldn't shut off the flow. It tickled Goethe, and his ballad inspired Dukas to a most vivid musical description of the clown monkeying with the powers of darkness, and finding in comic dismay and terror that they had the best of him. Wherever Saint-Saens got his "danse macabre" effects, Dukas was not far away. He robbed the same shop for some of his weird rhythms and imitative clomps and bumps in "L'Apprenti Sorcier."

The orchestra will be away this week on its second trip. Mr. Alfred Reisenauer, pianist, will play Weber's "Concertstuck" at the concerts Dec 15 and 16.

VINCENT D'INDY.

The Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday will be extremely interesting. The chief interest lies in the presence of one of the most distinguished French composers, who has come by invitation to conduct the orchestra for these concerts and for the concerts which will be given on the regular monthly trip next week. Mr. d'Indy is one of the principal leaders of what is known as the younger school of French composers; he is the head of the Schola Cantorum, which has made such serious inroads on the prestige of the Paris Conservatory; he is generally regarded as the most important leader of the modern world of music in Paris.

The invitation given to Mr. d'Indy is all the more noteworthy since it is the first time any composer or conductor has been asked to conduct the Symphony Orchestra at one of its regular concerts. The invitation was intended and was accepted as a compliment to that most interesting movement in France which for the past 30 years has been seeking to divide the field of music in that country with the opera, which for the better part of the last century had the monopoly. Starting with Cesar Franck it has been continued by his followers and pupils of whom d'Indy is the leader. Much of this music has been heard here at the Symphony concerts; in fact, in the programmes that Monsieur d'Indy has made which are devoted exclusively to this modern French music the number of novelties is very small. Mr. d'Indy himself has expressed surprise that these works are so well known in Boston, for while he keeps track generally of the musical situation in America he did not realize how completely the entire field of modern music has been covered.

Aside from the natural curiosity the public always has to see a distinguished man, especially if he be a musician, these concerts will appeal most strongly to the large number of admirers of French music that the work of the Symphony Orchestra has created in Boston in the past few years. It is interesting always to hear a composer's interpretation of his own work. In such music as that written by these "younger" Frenchmen it is also interesting to have a reading of one who is thoroughly in touch and sympathy with them, in other words, a Frenchman. Mr. d'Indy has brought to America the reputation of being a most talented conductor. He conducts regular series of concerts in Paris and as a guest he has conducted in Belgium and Holland, Germany and Russia, and everywhere he has been very well received.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

D'INDY CONDUCTS AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT Dec. 2. 05

From: His Personality and His Methods—How Far Can He Make Music Intellectual Expression?—Concerts of Next Week and Weeks to Come—A Little Conversation with Mme. Eames—Musical Miscellany

The burst of applause when Mr. d'Indy came across the stage at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon struck the note of novelty at the start. We take Mr. Gericke for granted, and unless we are in a particularly sympathetic mood, we no more think of applauding him from week to week than we should any other honored musical institution. For the first time in years another conductor—and he an eminent composer—was taking the orchestra at a regular concert and expectancy quivered in the air. There was the band, familiar of face and aspect, but it did not seem quite the same as usual. The most diligent reader of the programme book forgot, for once, to rustle its leaves. Everyone sat up, looked and listened, and Mr. d'Indy's second symphony, with which the programme began, is by no means easy listening. Perhaps, therefore, some of us looked the more. We saw a tall, squarely-built man, well settled in middle age, of self-possessed, unpretentious, dignified bearing. A gentleman clearly, and so many composers do not give precisely that impression. A fine head crowned the stalwart shoulders, distinctly the head of a man of mental force and weight. There were fortitude and resolution in the firm jaw and chin; a suggestion of contemplative abstraction in the eyes. A man of convictions, you were sure, ready to prove his faith, and steadfastly, by his works. It was not difficult to guess, if most of us had not known, Mr. d'Indy's fondness for a rather solitary life among the mountains of his Cévennes. Of the Paris that most of us know and of the French temperament, as most of us fancy it, there was not a hint in his outward aspect. He was more English in his self-contained dignity, more German in his suggestion of a mind quietly busy with itself and its work. He lacked mobile animation. He seemed even to want nervous vigor. Yet somehow you felt the intellectual strength of the man, and a high detachment in him from little, common, daily things. His appearance suggested his own music.

Mr. d'Indy's conducting was as quiet, as impersonal, as unmagnetic in the ordinary sense of a sorry word, as he is to see. He was all for the music in hand and for the band before him, and not for display of himself. There was no mere physical emphasis, no leaping to meet salient details, no ostentatious beckoning of instruments or groups of instruments. His right hand quietly guided his men, pointed a detail, or threw a summoning hint. His left suggested rhythms and contours. Now and then both lifted the band through a sharp transition. His own symphony he seemed to conduct least freely. His eyes followed the score closely. Had he been only a conductor, and not the composer, you would have said he might have been more familiar with it. Perhaps the very consciousness of his own music hampered him. He seemed a man that might honestly be so hindered. His older tone-poem, "Istar," he seemed to take much more spontaneously. But he was best as a conductor in music not his own.

In Franck's or Fauré's or Dukas's, that made the rest of his programme, two of his characteristic traits were clearest—his mastery of climax, especially of the ebb and flow, the advance and the recession of excited sound, that make our modern orchestral climaxes what they are; and his feeling for fine and undulating texture of tone. The listening ear seemed sometimes to touch rather than hear the music. Color there was, but more the conductor was seeking line and texture, now rich, thick and deep, now clear, firm and transparent. His proportioning was admirable. A large sense of design, as became a man of mental force, shaped it, adjusting details and transitions, yet keeping them incisive. At moments he showed something of Richard Strauss's keen understanding and personal sympathy, so to say, for groups of instruments. Now and then his conducting might have been more pliant. Once and again, especially with Fauré, it seemed to be trying to inflate the mood and contents of the music when the composer would keep them of a more subdued and smaller, but not less piercing, intensity. Always d'Indy worked his will with his men. Our orchestra was alert to meet him. Always, too, it seemed intellectual conducting. His mind apprehended the moods of the music more than the intangible thing called temperament felt them.

Mr. d'Indy is not sensuous. No more is he simple. No more is he impassioned, except with a thoughtful passion of the brain. And perhaps Milton's trite qualification of great poetry holds as truly of great music. To judge him by his second symphony, which made the first half of the concert yesterday, and by his tone-poem in the form of variations and a theme that followed, he is all for the development of music on its intellectual side. The romantic composers, from Weber and Schubert through Liszt and Wagner, have carried the emotional responsiveness and the emotional expressiveness of music far and high. We who follow them are spent with futile effort to carry these things further. It is time to pause, Mr. d'Indy seems to be saying in his compositions; to turn in a new direction; to develop the intellectual responsiveness and expressiveness of music. Here in a measure he is at one with Richard Strauss. There can hardly be more intellectual music than "Zarathustra," for example, and "Til Eulenspiegel," with all its humor and irony, is like to it. But Strauss is equally concerned with the pictorial and descriptive development of music. He must make it mirror things, like the red hair of Don Juan's beloved or Don Quixote's windmills. Into that path Mr. d'Indy has not wandered. He is for the advance of music as the mirror of thought and ideas, their relation, contrast and contest. He is in no sense the mere maker of geometrical patterns in tones, like a certain sort of dry composers. But it is less emotion that gives his music life and meaning than the thought and the play of intellect behind.

Try to hear Mr. d'Indy's second symphony as a whole in spite of its complex and perplexing details. Listen to his intimate friend, Mr. Calvocoressi's, explanation of it: "The putting into play of two principal themes, which present themselves at the beginning side by side, follow each other, war against each other, or, on the contrary, are each developed separately, associate themselves with new ideas which complete or serve as commentary, and at the end of the work are blended in an immense triumphal chant." In spite of the "triumphal chant," all this is purely an intellectual process, and the struggle of the themes and all their offspring is purely a contest of musical thoughts. The symphony sounds like a sublimated mental exercise charged, so absorbing is it to the composer, with a sublimated mental passion.

Consider also the general design and structure of "Istar." Behind is the Babylonian legend—how Istar, the life-giving goddess, descended into the changeless land, where the dead abide, and whence there is no return; how at every gate the warder stripped her of some jewel or some veil, until at the last gate she stood forth in all the marvel and glory of her unclad beauty; and how to earth she bore back her lover, the Son of Life. The tale has moved d'Indy to a tone-poem, a theme and variations in reverse order. At seven gates was Istar stripped of garment or gem, and there are seven variations. Only at the end with the naked Istar does the theme come as nakedly forth. All this is delightfully ingenious in conception and execution. Call it imaginative even. But it is an intellectual ingenuity and imagination, a mental exercise in music dealing with sensuous things, but not dealing with them sensuously. In symphony and variations d'Indy is pure intellect applied to music and expressing itself in music. He apprehends the sensuous impressions of the legend of "Istar," and thoughtfully transmutes them into tones. He does not seem to feel them.

"The dramatic element is more and more introduced into absolute music," Mr. d'Indy wrote a few years ago, "in such a way that form is here, as a rule, absolutely submissive to the incidents of a veritable action." In the composer's own music that "action" seems purely an intellectual "action." Its "incidents" in the symphony are the association, the divergence, the contrast and contest, the relations and interplay generally of his warring themes. We all know how Wagner translates every "incident" in the "action" of his dramas into their music. That indeed is the intent and function of such music of the theatre. Mr. d'Indy would similarly translate every "incident" in this "action" within his brain, and every detail of the musical thoughts therein, into the absolute music of his symphony. Hence spring its bewildering complexity and intricacy. Yet it sounded clearer yesterday than it did last winter at a first hearing. Heard often enough, it may be very clear indeed. After all d'Indy is French and therefore lucid. One does not usually understand Locke or Descartes at a single reading. No more in music does one grasp at a single hearing the intellectual and philosophic d'Indy. But he has also one form of the family trait of these younger French composers—their intense sensitiveness to impressions. (Recall Debussy's "Clouds" and "Fetes," for example). Only d'Indy's is a sensitiveness to mental rather than to purely sensuous images. Hence, again, come the piercing vividness of many details of the symphony. Perhaps, even, the succession of these intense impressions helps to give it a form of its own. Hence, too, is the inspiration of such vivid passages as that in "Istar" where the music seems to grow hollower and hollower as the last veil is stripped from the goddess and then swells and warms with the glow of her discovered beauty.

Again, to judge by the second symphony, this music of thought and intellect requires new means of expression. The romantics and their emotions have measurably exhausted the power of melody. New and strange harmonies shall better serve this new music. Dissonances shall point it. Rhythms, as strange and intricate as the harmonies, shall reveal and emphasize it. There shall be new and bizarre combinations of instruments for it. These instruments shall range often in their highest registers or be persistently muted. Instrumental transition and contrast shall be of the swiftest and sharpest. In the quest of new means of expression d'Indy has left Strauss well behind. A folk-tune in broad progressions now and then contents the German. If music can express pure intellectual "actions" and the "incidents" of thought, d'Indy is contriving the means to make it do so. With them, more than once yesterday, he gained his end, and was justified by it.

H. T. P.

*Vincent D'Indy, French
Composer Here to Lead
the Symphony Orchestra*

BOSTON PLEASES VINCENT D'INDY

Distinguished French Composer Arrives Here to Conduct Symphony Orchestra in Series of Concerts.

WAS MUCH IMPRESSED
BY N. Y. SKYSCRAPERS

Programmes Arranged Represent Best Product of the Younger French School—Raoul Pugno's Piano Recital.

Herald — Nov. 23, 1905

A slender man of medium height, his head crowned with one of those seal skin caps which pull down over the ears if Jack Frost is nipping; his body encased in a thick overcoat, beneath which were seen trouser legs of Parisian voluminosity; a cigar in the end of an abnormally long meerschaum holder, held nervously in the right hand—such were the first impressions made by Mr. Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, who has come from Paris to conduct the Symphony orchestra in some of the concerts of modern French music here, in New York, in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

Another glance showed a pair of dark keen, twinkling eyes, an attractive face—attractive not only in its regularity, but in its manifest signs of culture—a slight gray moustache and the beginnings of what used to be called an imperial.

Mr. d'Indy reached Boston Wednesday morning in company with Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, who went to New York to meet him. He has not been long in that city, as the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, on which he came, was not docked until nearly 8 last evening, and Mr. d'Indy was delayed at the pier waiting for his music, which had been stored away in the lowest part of the hold. Just a glimpse at Broadway and Fifth avenue and he took the midnight train; for he was anxious to get to this city and settle himself at the St. Botolph Club, where he will stay while here.

Mr. d'Indy is full of enthusiasm over this, his first visit to America. He marvelled at the wonderful panorama of lights which was spread before him last evening as he came up New York bay. The ferryboat was "tres amusant"; the skyscrapers, what little he saw of them, were "merveilleux"; the train, with its long string of sleeping cars, was "epatant" and the South station was "magnifique."

He speaks little, very little English, although he reads it without difficulty. Wherefore he was much worried how he would get on with the orchestra. When he was told that all the men spoke either German or French, he was most relieved, but he could not understand why so few Americans took up orchestral playing as a profession.

"It is a great pleasure for me to come to America," said Mr. d'Indy, "although the coming was not so pleasant as it might have been. The first two days we were out from Cherbourg the weather was very bad and the sea very rough. After that, however, it was not very uncomfortable."

"I have arranged for my concerts what I think are most interesting programmes, and at the same time are very representative of the so-called younger French school. Some of us are not so young as we once were, but the name was given to us through our effort to make opera less monopolistic in France. For years past, nearly the whole tendency of music in France has been toward the theatre. Cesar Franck was the first 'independent,' and we have been working along in the same general lines as he did."

"Most of the works which I shall present are more or less known in America and in Boston. For my Boston programme I have chosen my second symphony, which was played by the Symphony orchestra last year; Faure's 'Pelleas et Melisande' suite and my 'Istar' variations, which have also been played in Boston. The other two numbers, however, will be quite new here: Cesar Franck's 'Psyche et Eros,' from the symphonic poem 'Psyche,' and Ropartz's 'Les landes, paysage breton.'"

"I shall be in this country about three weeks. I regret that I cannot stay longer, but an important concert of the Schola Cantorum of Paris, of which I am the head, demands my presence at home in December. I have heard much about the Boston Symphony orchestra and I am most eager to hear it. To be asked to conduct it is a great honor."

B. Globe Sept. 23, 1905

Vincent D'Indy, the great French composer, who is to conduct the Symphony orchestra in Boston Dec 1 and 2, was intended for the law, but, as was the case with many another musician, the call of music was too strong to be resisted, and ultimately he made it his life work. He was born in Paris in 1852. His father, a wealthy man, was a good amateur violinist, and his grandmother, who brought him up, was a very fine musician. His first serious musical studies were with Diemer and Lavignae. These the war with Prussia interrupted, and during the siege of Paris he was a volunteer in the 105th regt and fought in several of the desperate battles around the beleaguered city.

After the war he became acquainted with Cesar Franck and thence until Franck's death was his most devoted friend and advocate. He studied with the great Frenchman and later went to Germany and spent several months in Weimar with Liszt. In 1875 his first work for the orchestra was performed by Pasdeloups in Paris, and his first work for the stage, a one-act opera comique, was performed at the Opera Comique in 1882.

Since then D'Indy has stood in the front rank of French musicians, and is justly regarded as the leader of the school called "the younger Frenchmen," followers and disciples, all of them, of Cesar Franck, who are doing a mighty work to restore absolute music to its proper position in France.

He has written in almost every form, large and small, instrumental, lyric and operatic, and no less than seven of his larger works have been played in Boston in the last five years. He is a profound student of the history of music, a lecturer of great attainments and a conductor of high renown, although he has never made a specialty of this branch of the art.

He was one of the founders, in 1896, of the now celebrated Schola Cantorum in Paris, of which he is now the director and professor of composition.

Mr D'Indy's coming to Boston will be the most interesting event of the musical season, and it is not unlikely that arrangements may be made for a lecture by him during his stay.

D'INDY AT THE SYMPHONY.

This week's Symphony concerts will be in many respects the most interesting that have been given in years. The chief importance and interest lodges in the presence of one of the most distinguished French composers, who has come by invitation to conduct the orchestra for these concerts and for the concerts which will be given on the regular monthly trip next week. M d'Indy is one of the principal leaders of what is known as the younger school of French composers, he is the head of the Schola Cantorum which has made such serious inroads on the prestige of the Paris conservatory, and is generally regarded as the most important leader of the modern world of music in Paris.

The invitation given to M d'Indy is all the more noteworthy since it is the first time any composer or conductor has been asked to conduct the Symphony orchestra at one of its regular concerts. These concerts will appeal most strongly to that large number of admirers of French music that the work of the Symphony orchestra has created in Boston in the past few years. It is interesting always to hear a composer's interpretation of his own work.

Following the prevailing usage of past orchestral concerts in Paris there will be no solist next week. Three of the works to be presented have already been played here. M d'Indy's second symphonie had its first performance in Boston under Mr Gericke last season, his "Istar" variations were first played under Mr Gericke several years ago and have since been repeated. Faure's Suite "Pelleas et Melisande," written for the performance of Maeterlinck's play, has also been played here. The other two works—a movement of Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche" and Ropartz' "Les Landes" will be new to Boston.

SYMPHONY'S FIRST FOREIGN CONDUCTOR

Journal Dec 4, 05
D'Indy Leads Boston's Great Orchestra in Interpretations of French Masterpieces.

The most notable Symphony event of the season, or for many seasons, was that of Saturday night, when, for the first time in the history of the orchestra, a man from abroad took the place of the regular conductor at one of these concerts. The appearance of Vincent D'Indy, the great French composer, was significant, therefore, not only for what he represents in his art, but as showing the inauguration of a plan to have at least one eminent guest-conductor here each season. It is an admirable scheme, for there is great satisfaction, and not a little education, in seeing the men who have won their way to the front rank in music.

Made Pleasant Impression.

In D'Indy's case there are nothing but pleasant impressions to record. His personality is winning, his presence commanding and his style of conducting graceful, yet compelling. He makes no pretense of being an orchestra leader of the virtuoso type, whom people rave about as over a famous performer. Yet he handles his forces with authority and skill; he produces "big" effects when he needs them without undue excitement, and, altogether, he reveals himself as the modest master he is.

As Mr. D'Indy's special errand was to present and interpret the work of "young France," it was inevitable that the program should be made accordingly. So we were given, besides a couple of the conductor's own compositions, pieces by Faure, Franck and Dukas. The result was illuminating enough, but not wholly satisfactory. The things come near to killing each other, and the general similarity of the music, fine as most of it was, made for a monotony that hurt interest. "Young France" is glorious in many ways, but there is such a thing as too much of him at one time. With the exception of D'Indy's own symphony, each of the other three familiar works has made a stronger effect when better placed by Mr. Gericke.

Symphony Cold and Austere.

As for the symphony itself—that hard nut to crack, that austere, cold, joyless utterance in a musical speech that is as jargon to most ears—what can be said of it now more than was said when it was first played here last season? It is clearer, at least; it is undoubtedly better translated; its few gleams of beauty are perhaps a little brighter, and its rich and glowing ending more majestic. But it remains essentially unlovely, lacking in charm even to those who are far beyond the honey stage in music. As an example of the art of composition it is an intellectual "tour de force;" as an appeal to any human emotion it is without power, and it is hard to believe that it will ever be any more compelling than it is today.

An excerpt from Cesar Franck's "Psyche" was heard for the first time. It is a fine example of the composer's serene beauty of style, just tinged with a passion that is always sane and full of dignity. D'Indy's own "Istar" variations, familiar through two previous performances, were played with great splendor, and the jocose "L'Apprenti Sorcier" of Dukas, went with immense vivacity.

WILL CONDUCT SYMPHONY.

Vincent D'Indy Arrives in New York, Together with Composer Humperdinck—Comes Directly to Boston.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 21, 1905. Two well known composers, Engelbert Humperdinck and Vincent D'Indy, arrived tonight on the Kaiser Wilhelm Der Grosse. Mr. Humperdinck comes at the invitation of Mr. Conried, chiefly to attend the first performance, on Saturday afternoon, of "Hansel und Gretel." M. D'Indy is here to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a series of concerts.

Mr. D'Indy is director of the Schola Cantorum in the Latin quarter of Paris. He is of distinguished appearance, with gray mustache and imperial.

"I am to remain in America only three weeks," said M. D'Indy. "I am going straight to Boston and shall conduct the Symphony orchestra there, in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and in New York, where the orchestra will be heard Dec. 7 and 9. I hope to be in Paris for Christmas. I shall conduct the works of composers of the younger French school, represented by such men as Debussy, Dukas and Magnard. Several of my own works will be given, notably my second symphony—a 'Symphonie Poésic,' called 'Istar'—and an orchestra piece, 'Sauge Henrie,' and I shall conduct a symphony composed by my master, Cesar Franck, now dead, and called 'Psyche.'"

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adm. PROGRAMME. Dec 4, 05
D'Indy. Symphony in B flat major, No. 2, op. 57.
Faure. "Pelleas et Melisande," Suite from Stage music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, op. 80.
D'Indy. "Istar." Symphony Variations, op. 42.
Franck. "Psyche and Cupid" excerpt from "Psyche," a Symphonic Poem.
(First time.)
Dukas. The Sorcerer's Apprentice.

M. Vincent D'Indy conducted the orchestra. It was certainly an event of much importance to hear a prominent composer conduct not only his own works, but a composition of his teacher, and other numbers representing his Parisian colleagues. There is always a lurking danger, on such an occasion, of the public mistaking the novel for the great, and imagining each new effect an artistic advance. We read, for example, in Mr. Gilman's article in "The Review of Reviews" that for D'Indy, Wagner was a mere "point of departure" in the matter of harmonic novelty or flexibility of form and also that—

"He goes even further beyond Wagner in such matters than Wagner went beyond Gluck, Weber, and his immediate fore-runners. Compared with such a work as D'Indy's B-flat symphony, for example, Wagner's "Tristan," which a quarter of a century ago seemed to touch the furthest limits of musical radicalism, sounds as simple and comprehensible as a score by Mozart or Haydn would have sounded beside what was then Wagner's most adventurous achievement."

Mr. Philip Hale, speaking of the symphony, says:—

"It contains deep and impressive thoughts, pages of beauty that is almost unearthly, passages that are intensely dramatic. * * *

"We believe this symphony to be one of the most important works of modern times."

We cannot join this enthusiastic procession. We heard the work admirably performed by Mr. Gericke 11 mos. ago, and then found it replete with the most repellant ugliness. Since then we have studied its pages more closely and can do homage to the ingenuity of development and the subtleties of form which are to be discovered in its measures.

But it is all the profound skill of the mathematician. Wagner accused Berlioz of "ciphering with notes," but Berlioz's works are the acme of poetry when compared with the musical arithmetic here displayed.

Such music, properly studied, could at the best only produce a headache; it certainly could not soothe a heartache. The scoring is of course very advanced. Yet we believe that the works of Loeffler achieve greater results in this direction. The constant intermingling of opposing rhythms is another modern touch, yet none of the musical problem-makers has been as convincing as Tschalkowsky or Wagner in this matter.

There are certain formulas of ugliness which recur again and again in the symphony. The skip of an upward seventh, the use of the augmented fifth (both with and without the seventh), the passages of major seconds, do not lose their ugliness by repetition, but they cease to surprise. The work is as ascetic as the compositions of the time of "pure counterpoint," as the choruses of Dufay or Des Pres, but with a different kind of intellectuality.

The form becomes more clear with study. It is intricate yet not without symmetry and logic. The transference of figures from movement to movement is something we can find in Beethoven and Schumann in a simpler way, but distinctly better done in the C minor symphony of Brahms. There is some of the most profound figure treatment ever perpetrated, to be studied in this work. But at the end of it all one is left unsatisfied. One turns to music for something different from this artificial complexity.

Much better than this symphony was the set of symphonic variations called "Istar." The gradual despoiling of the Assyrian heroine, the taking away of her trombones, her chromatics, her diminished seventh chords, by 7 successive subterranean grafters, is quite a novel way of undressing a melody, but there is coherency in the plan and dignity in its treatment.

M. D'Indy is undoubtedly a composer of great possibilities. We believe him to be upon a wrong path. It is easy enough for his admirers to cry out—"All geniuses in music have been misunderstood at first,"—and quote the battles of Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner or Richard Strauss. But there is something to cite on the other side of musical history as well. Burney thought Philipp Em. Bach much greater than John Sebastian; Hummel was thought greater than Beethoven by his admirers; Kalkbrenner was deemed a greater pianist than Chopin for a little while; Schumann was deemed the inferior of Mendelssohn, and one might multiply cases of over, as well as of under-appreciation.

Faure's Suite was an unpretentious yet tender setting of the Maeterlinck subject. The second movement, "La Filleuse," in which Melisande is spinning in the dark room, with Pelleas beside her, while Yniold has his first presentiment of coming evil, as his mother sings him to sleep, was the most attractive. The first violins were very delicate in the spinning figure, and the oboe solo was beautiful in its pathos.

But the loftiest impression of the entire programme was made by Cesar Franck's "Psyche and Cupid." Here there was a surety of touch and beauty of treatment. If D'Indy only possessed more of the poetic inspiration which existed in his master he might be one of the foremost composers of the present time. The true union of emotion and intellect is always achieved in Franck's works.

Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" is as successful a bit of musical humor as Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and is more easy of comprehension than the German work. In the matter of orchestration we consider this to have been the best work of the concert. The sorcerer's apprentice has succeeded in turning a broomstick into a servant to carry water to the house, but forgets how to dissolve the spell. Rendered desperate by the threatened inundation he seizes the broomstick and saws it in 2. All in vain, for now there is a pair of servants bringing water in dangerous profusion. Finally the master magician returns and dissolves the enchantment.

Every point of this was brought out to perfection. It was a fine opportunity for bassoon work, and these instruments played excellently. The bass clarinet had also an important part in the score, and the canonic work where 2 broomsticks are working, instead of one, is a very effective touch. The work is written for the largest kind of orchestra, which is handled with excellent results.

Orchestra and audience were evidently most friendly to M. D'Indy. Applause at the first appearance and after each number proved the "entente cordiale," which was accentuated by a floral tribute with a tricolor attached.

We do not think that any stranger could take our orchestra and at once achieve Mr. Gericke's results. We have had most of the works of this programme at these concerts within a year, or 15 mos., and they have all received admirable performance. But M. D'Indy was a most intelligent leader, with a firm and unmistakable beat and, of course, he knew his scores thoroughly. Everyone appreciated the fact that an important visitor was among us, and that his direction of our orchestra was a memorable event. Louis C. Elson.

One of the wits of our clubs declares that "Search me" is the "motto" that Vincent d'Indy should put on the titlepage of his symphony that he played for us last week.

Mr. d'Indy, by the way, is not to repeat the programme that he conducted on Friday and Saturday at all his concerts with the Symphony Orchestra in other cities this week. In Philadelphia, tonight, and in New York next Saturday afternoon, the chief item on the list is a symphony by Ernest Chausson which has not been played hitherto in America. Chausson, who died a few years ago from a fall from a bicycle, seemed the most promising of the younger French composers, and this symphony is accounted the maturest work that he left behind. Time and again, Mr. Gericke has tried to secure the parts, which exist only in manuscript, but without result. Mr. d'Indy was able to bring them to America. In New York, too, the composer will conduct his own early "legend" called "Saugefleurie," Debussy's "Clouds" and "Fetes," and a fragment by his own pupil, Magnard, whose music is quite unknown in America. Some of these interesting things, especially Chausson's symphony, Mr. Gericke is likely to give us later in the winter. Certainly he will play the whole of Franck's suite, "Psyche," from which Mr. d'Indy took a single movement on Saturday.

D'INDY CONDUCTS IN GOTHAM

Programme Wholly of Modern French Music Proves Tiring to the Audience.

[Special Dispatch to the Sunday Herald.]
NEW YORK, Dec. 9, 1905. Vincent d'Indy was again the conductor by special arrangement at the Boston Symphony orchestra's second matinee concert in Carnegie Hall this afternoon, the programme, like that of Thursday night, consisting wholly of music by modern French composers. The occasion thus provided another exceptional opportunity to study present day French music under an authoritative interpreter, and there was a large audience on hand to take advantage of it.

It must be confessed, however, that the afternoon's entertainment, save to students and to some impressionists, proved dull. Even so cultivated a body of listeners as the Boston orchestra's clientele found it difficult to maintain the mental attitude of strained attention demanded by the programme, and the applause was as a consequence lukewarm.

Mr. d'Indy and His Frenchmen

Mr. d'Indy conducted with a surer hand and a larger and freer spirit at the Symphony Concert on Saturday, and the orchestra was quick to catch his more animated mood. Details told in themselves and fell into their due place in his symphony as they had not on Friday. Some of them even took on beauty as of a feeling in d'Indy for tonal tints as well as for tonal incisiveness. His transitions seemed less the abrupt turning of a square corner than a more undulating musical progress. Often, too, he lifted the symphony to a soft of massive eloquence. The gasping crabbedness of almost bitter searching for the most precise, sensitive, and individual expression smoothed and softened in the genuine exaltation of the whole. Mr. d'Indy is no lover of old Greek things. He knows them, and he is rather disdainful of them. But there were moments when his symphony sounded curiously like the high, austere, close-knit speeches Thucydides put into the mouth of Pericles.

In "Istar," which was received again with the warmest and longest applause that we have heard in Boston this season, the conductor's freer mood served the composer even better. The tonal details of the variations flashed, and the climax, with the final bursting of the theme, matched such moments in Wagner himself, and with none of the resources of the theatre to aid. Even Strauss has hardly matched the rhetorical power, the elasticity and the nervous suspense of it. After all, this supreme sensitiveness and the supreme expression of the impression that this sensibility conveys are the goal of all these new Paris men, whether they are conducting or composing. It may be such a climax or the triumphal chant with which the symphony ends. It may equally be only some melancholy memory of old, forgotten, far-off things in Fauré's music to Maeterlinck's "Pelléas and Mélisande" or some gay rhythmic trick in Dukas's scherzo of the sorcerer's boy that tried his 'prentice hand on the broom and had the fright of his life for his pains.

Behind these is always this intense sensibility. The minds and the imaginations of these composers are more susceptible than the most sensitive plate of which scientist ever dreamed, and far more tremendous. Before them is the equal passion to say things in music more intensely and precisely than they have been said before, and to say in this wise what has hitherto seemed musically unutterable. D'Indy would so say things of the intellect. Fauré would so, express his dreams and visions and the haunting melancholy of them. Debussy would so mirror his impressions as he looks upon the world around him and feels it. Franck was the master of them all, and in his music are the beginnings of all these things. Some of them have surpassed him in incisiveness and intricacy of musical thought or in poignancy and sensitiveness of musical expression, but not one of them has the largeness of idea, emotion and utterance, the serenity of controlled power, the large impersonality and high detachment from little things that are in his music. The tale of "Eros and Psyche" is a pretty, tender sham-classic legend. Franck would picture in music the moods and impressions that he had received from it. And before he was half done with the single movement of the suite that Mr. d'Indy chose, his voice was the voice of universal disembodied, serenely pure passion.

H. T. P.

VINCENT D'INDY.

A Jovial Celebration.

A charming account comes to me of the Christmas celebration by the leading French artists here at the home of M. and Mme. Lenom of Atherton street, Roxbury. It took the form of a masquerade, participated in by about twelve members of the Symphony orchestra, their wives and others, including Mme. Emille Alexander Marius, who impersonated "Pierrot."

The entrance of each was ushered in by the host as the town crier, and none knew what the others were to wear, so the surprises were many. M. Longy was "Caesar," his young daughter, aged 9, won first prize as a dancer, and Mme. Longy was a picture as a retired sociétaire of the Comédie Française. Mme. Lenom impersonated a "Spirit of the Forest," Mme. Magnarre was a milkmaid, M. Minard a superb Mandarin, Georges Grisez made a funny Chinaman, Andre Magnarre was a Gibson girl, Daniel Magnarre made up as an up-to-date girl in picture hat, and so on. There was a procession to the dining hall, which was dressed up in Christmas greens and cut flowers, and much merriment reigned, especially when a flashlight picture was sprung. Each guest contributed a dance or musical number, and the occasion was one of pure delight. Dec. 27, 1905

ALFRED REISENAUER.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN.

SYMPHONY in B flat major (B. & H., No. 8.)

I. Adagio: Allegro.

II. Adagio cantabile.

III. Menuetto; Allegro; Trio.

IV. Finale: Presto; Più moderato.

(First time at these concerts.)

WEBER.

CONCERT PIECE in F minor for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, op. 79.

HUMPERDINCK.

a) INTRODUCTION to Act III. of "King's Children."

b) HUMORESQUE.

LISZT.

SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 2: "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

Soloist:

Mr. ALFRED REISENAUER.

The Pianoforte is an Everett.

ALFRED REISENAUER.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN.

SYMPHONY in B flat major (B. & H., No. 8.)

I. Adagio: Allegro.

II. Adagio cantabile.

III. Menuetto: Allegro: Trio.

IV. Finale: Presto: Più moderato.

(First time at these concerts.)

WEBER.

CONCERT PIECE in F minor for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, op. 79.

HUMPERDINCK.

a) INTRODUCTION to Act III. of "King's Children."

b) HUMORESQUE.

LISZT.

SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 2: "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

Soloist:

Mr. ALFRED REISENAUER.

The Pianoforte is an Everett.

Alfred Reisenauer

PIANIST

Trans: Musical Miscellany Dec. 16, 1905

Tonight our orchestra is playing Liszt's "Tasso," and for Monday evening Mr. Lutsch, the pianist, has put a sonata of Liszt's on the programme of his recital. By these tokens it is the hour again for new reminiscences of the master of Weimar, and new reminiscences there always are. This time it is Walter Damrosch, the conductor, recalling an encounter with Liszt when the pianist was aging and his visitor was still a young man.

I was on my way to Ems, Mr. Damrosch began, to have my throat treated, and had made up my mind to stop over at Weimar in order to pay my respects to the celebrated virtuoso and composer, of whose friendship my father was so proud. I made my obeisance to Liszt, who at that time had given up his active duties as virtuoso and occupied himself with his piano class and his compositions. He was very cordial to me and talked very much of my father. Finally he asked me how long I was going to stay in Weimar, and I told him over night. I noticed immediately after that a slight frostiness in his manner which I could not account for. I laughed gayly at his remark to me, never seeing the sarcasm, that he hoped I was going to stay long enough to have a cigar. That night I went to the Ducal Theatre to attend a play by Calderon, for which Lassen, an old friend of Liszt and of my father, had composed the music. Between the acts Lassen sent for me and behind the scenes took me seriously to task. "What did you say to the Meister?" he inquired. "I found him after your departure in tears, saying: 'Oh, yes, I am no longer of account. The young people pass me by; they come and stay over night and run away again as fast as they can. They have no longer any use for the old man.'" I protested my innocence of offence, and Lassen advised me to go in the morning and make my peace. All that night—my first night in historic Weimar—I tossed on my sleepless pillow. I was only a boy, barely twenty. I adored Liszt, and to think I had been so awkward, so gauche, simply overwhelmed me. Just as soon as I decently could I hurried the next morning to the Gartenhaus, Liszt's residence, near that of the grand duke, and asked for the Meister. When he finally appeared I was up to the highest pitch of nervous apprehension. I tried to explain, and, instead, I burst into tears. Perhaps that was the best thing I could have done, as it turned out, for the Meister was placated at once. He forgave me royally, and I stayed a day or two longer. That same morning I attended his class and heard his instruction. In the class were several notabilities, among them D'Albert. He would hear a pupil play part of a sonata, then sweep him off the piano stool, sit down and play it himself, then, rising, would say, with his gentle sarcasm: "Now, my dear child, sit down and make a fool of yourself again." D'Albert he treated with evident love and with confidence in his musical genius. I saw Liszt

a number of times after that in subsequent visits to Europe, and he would always treat me with great kindness, but generally reprovingly, would shake his finger and say: "Ah, the young American! flying he goes through the world."

Weber and Reisenauer at the Symphony

Trans. Concert Dec. 18, 1905

It was almost a pity that Weber was not there to hear, and it was easy to wonder whether that "Concert-Piece" of his, as Mr. Reisenauer played it at the Symphony Concert Saturday night, was so applauded when the composer himself performed it eighty years ago. The cynic wondered at its survival at all to a place, after many years, on the programme of a symphony concert; at the seriousness with which pianist and orchestra took it, at the evident sympathy of the audience for both the music and the performance. The "Concert-Piece" is very simple and transparent programme music, in days when such music balks neither at the riddles of the universe nor at the subterranean wanderings of Assyrian goddesses. Its freedom of form has become a musical commonplace. Its technical exactions, though Weber was no mean pianist and spared not, are of the days before Liszt. Its intricacies are innocent beside those in which our generation of composers unfold their ideas for piano and orchestra. But it has the charm that they sometimes miss and that is as appealing to an audience of 1905 as it was to an audience of 1821. Pure charm has saved pages of verse that we still read with pleasure. If conductors and virtuosos would give it half a chance, it would save as much music that we like to call antiquated. Because Mr. Reisenauer felt and kept that charm, and the orchestra, with him, the "Concert-Piece" seemed fresh again. More continent playing than Mr. Reisenauer's, more quietly masterful, or more delicately sympathetic toward the music in hand, it would be hard to imagine. Its tempered brilliance left Weber clear and unforced and therefore charming.

H. T. P.

Concerts Next Week

To begin with a contradiction, there will be no Symphony Concerts next week. The orchestra, with Mr. d'Indy to conduct, goes to pay its monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore. In each city it is to play a programme of music by the new school of French composers, some of which we at home in Boston have not heard though we are Mr. d'Indy's hosts. Meanwhile Mr. Gericke has gone to Lenox for a holiday to return for the next pair of concerts on Dec. 15 and 16. At them, Reisenauer, the masculine German pianist, will appear.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Reisenauer, Soloist, at the Symphony.

The eighth Symphony program introduced the famous German pianist, Alfred Reisenauer, as soloist in Weber's F minor concert piece for piano and orchestra. The other selections were Haydn's B flat major symphony, first time at these concerts; introduction to the third act of King's Children and the "Humoresque," by Humperdinck, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph." Haydn's symphony was interesting as a novelty, even though much of it was formal in character. The sudden variations in tonality makes the work appear more episodic than coherent; as if the composer had experimented with the public taste just to learn what effect his musical innovations would produce. There was evident care taken to give each choir of the band its proportional work, and the different instrumental bodies have so-called "opportunities" in one or more of the four movements. The Menuetto and the finale are the most satisfactory, the former movement being mainly a dainty dance theme in varied forms in which the brilliant ensemble work of the strings was conspicuous. The last movement is rather erratic in manner, but the effect is pleasing, and all the changes in tempo and key were given with precision and clarity.

Mr. Reisenauer's interpretation of the Weber piece showed that the pianist's fame was not undeserved, for the very favorable impression made at his former recitals here was more than duplicated. He is a big player in more ways than one; an artist of consummate skill and versatility to whom technical difficulties are slight. The brilliant work, once so popular, but now rather neglected, is an excellent show piece, full of fortissimo passages, double arpeggios, glissandos, chord runs and other piano fireworks, and all of these Mr. Reisenauer handled and fingered in a masterly manner. The march theme of the second movement was notably effective, and the dash and vigor of the finale was fairly thrilling. The orchestra, led by Mr. Hess, gave able assistance. At the close of the performance Mr. Reisenauer was called back a half-dozen times.

The sad little symphonic poem, the introduction to the third act of "King's Children," by Humperdinck, and the same composer's "Humoresque" presented great contrasts in sentiment, and both of the simple works were very pleasingly told in a musical way. The woodwinds deserve a special word for good work in the first piece. The "Lament and Triumph" was splendidly played, the magnificent finale showing the orchestra in its best form. The program this week will include Dvorak's overture, "Nature"; the Pastorale from Bach's Christmas overture, Strube's new violin concerto No. 2 in F sharp minor (played by Mr. Timothee Adamowski) and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

Mr. Alfred Reisenauer, Pianist, Will Make His First Appearance at These Concerts.

The eighth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be in Symphony Hall this afternoon. Mr. Gericke will conduct, and Mr. Alfred Reisenauer, who gave two recitals in Jordan Hall late in the season of 1903-4, will play for the first time at these concerts.

Haydn's Symphony in B flat major (B. & H. No. 8) has not been played at these concerts, although it was a favorite with the audiences of the old Harvard Musical Association. It was first produced at a Salomon concert in London in 1791, and it gave so much pleasure that the first and last movements were repeated, "encore," as Haydn wrote in his curious diary. Mr. Reisenauer will play Weber's once popular concert piece, which has been played at these concerts by Mr. Busoni and Mr. George M. Nowell. The introduction of act III. of Humperdinck's music to "Kings' Children" and the same composer's Humoresque will follow the concert piece. Liszt's familiar symphonic poem, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph," will be the final number.

The programme of the concerts next week will include Dvorak's overture, "Nature"; the Pastorale from Bach's Christmas overture, Strube's new violin concerto No. 2 in F sharp minor (played by Mr. Timothee Adamowski) and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

Mme. Eames will sing at the concerts of Dec. 29-30, when Amherst Weber's symphony will be performed for the first time in America. He is now the pianist of her concert company.

Mr. Alfred Reisenauer, pianist, who will play at the next Symphony concert, was born at Koenigsberg Nov. 1, 1863. He studied with Louis Koehler and Liszt, and he was a celebrated virtuoso as long ago as 1881. He left the concert stage for a few years and studied law at Leipzig, but in 1886 he again appeared in public as a pianist, and has ever since been famous throughout Europe. In 1900 he was appointed professor of piano teaching at the Leipzig Conservatory (Meisterschule). He has composed a few piano pieces, "Pictures of Travel," and some songs. His first visit to America was in the season of 1903-4. He played for the first time in Boston on March 5, 1904, in Jordan Hall. He gave a second recital on March 19.

SYMPHONY GIVES EIGHTH CONCERT

An Old-New Work by Papa Haydn Played for First Time at These Concerts—Mr. Reisenauer in Weber Piece.

A DIGRESSION ON MR. HUMPERDINCK

Mr. Jan Kubelik Makes His First Appearance of Season at Jordan Hall Before an Applauding Audience.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, gave its eighth concert last evening in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in B-flat (B. & H. No. 8) Haydn
Concert piece for piano Weber
Introduction to Act III. of "Kings' Children" Humperdinck
Symphonic poem "Tasso" Liszt

Haydn, like Hannibal, was a very pretty fellow in those days, and it is a pleasure to hear occasionally his amiable chatter and cheery laugh. This symphony in B flat was played for the first time at these concerts, and it was a novelty to the younger generation, although in the palmy years of the Harvard Musical Association it was a favorite.

But is this honest music now heard to its best advantage? Written for a Salomon concert in London, it was played by an orchestra of about 40 men and in a hall 95 feet by 35. The gay spirit was then contagious; the sentiment—as a rule inherently perfunctory, or graceful rather than deep or tender—did not probably seem so thin and superficial. Let this music be played by a full modern orchestra, with 30 or more violins against a flute, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns and two trumpets, in a huge hall, and what, pray, becomes of its charm, its simple mirth?

Certain German conductors of late years try to solve the problem by reducing the string band. Unless the hall be reasonably small, the reduction is of little profit. Others, like Mr. Gericke, double the wood-wind instruments, but the addition does not really help matters, for the music then assumes swollen proportions, and the spirit of it, the pleasantly archaic flavor, is lost. With Haydn's orchestra in a small hall the violin solo in the finale of this symphony might be piquant. In Symphony Hall it would be ineffective, and therefore Mr. Gericke wisely gave the passage to all the first violins.

Mr. Reisenauer was already known here as a pianist of indisputable gifts and acquirements. His choice of Weber's concert piece was an unfortunate one, for the music is hopelessly antiquated. Its very modernity at the time it was composed hastened its death, yet it made a brave struggle, and even in the 70s it was popular with audiences and a show piece for virtuosos. Mr. Reisenauer took it seriously last night and triumphed with it by a pianistic tour de force. No doubt the running passages and long continued technical strains appeal to him, but it seemed a pity that the smoothness, elegance and brilliance of his technique were not better employed. Fortunately we shall soon have an opportunity to hear him in recitals. We say "fortunately," for he surely will not have the cruelty to present a Weber programme.

Engelbert Humperdinck! "O Amos Cottle! Phoebus! what a name!" His music played last night—the introduction to an act of a drama written by the daughter of the late Heinrich Porges and the Humoresque—is eminently Humperdinckian. Sir Augustus Harris spoke better than he knew at the first performance of "Hansel and Gretel" in New York, when he alluded feelingly in a Cockney manner to the composer as "Mr. Humperdinkel." Mr. Humperdinck was lately in New York; he also saw Niagara Falls and Mr. Roosevelt. We like to think of him now on the steamer sketching a symphonic poem inspired by the cataract and a symphony entitled "Roosevelt." Did not Maj. A. D. Hermann Hutter of Nuremberg compose a "Bismarck" symphony in four movements? Did not Huber compose a "Boecklin," and Bell, the Englishman, a "Walt Whitman" symphony? Mr. Roosevelt has certainly characteristics enough for four movements, indeed there is a superabundance of material. The first allegro might illustrate his passion for the chase or his military career; the slow movement, something tender yet impressive, should be entitled "Advice to American Mothers: Genesis i., 22"; as for the scherzo—is not Mr. Roosevelt himself a scherzo? The finale, of a heroic nature, might represent him as warring against railroads and trusts, with a grand apotheosis and the introduction of "The Star Spangled Banner" ingeniously counterpointed.

But we wander, which is, according to the old song, the peculiar privilege of the miller. It is a good thing to hear such music as this of Humperdinck to remind us of the inanity of so many of the later German orchestral compositions. Brahms is dead, the last of the great German formalists with a romantic streak. Richard Strauss is still alive. And who are the others in Germany that have both ideas and facility of expression?

This music of Humperdinck is as the rinsings in the Bayreuth kitchen. Let it be granted that the Humoresque is a comparatively early work; that Humperdinck published it shows he has no sense of humor, although he did teach Siegfried Wagner composition. But we forget. They discovered lately in New York that "Hansel and Gretel" was intended by the composer as a side-splitting burlesque of Wagner's methods; that he therefore turned a fairy tale into a pompous epic; that he for this reason made his little fishes talk like whales. Sunbeams from cucumbers! And this music to "Kings' Children"—what is it but Wagner's orchestral dress thrown over a manikin without the semblance of facial intelligence? Moods from "Tristan" followed by a ditty for male voices given to the horns. The music would not be worth serious discussion were it not for the attempt of a clique in Germany to hail him as a direct descendant of Wagner.

The feature of the concert was the performance of Liszt's "Tasso." This symphonic poem is nearly 60 years old, yet it is today more modern than the two pieces that preceded. Liszt wrote for audiences unborn and had faith in the judgment of posterity. When he was truly inspired, as in "Tasso," there was a nobility in his thought and an elegance in the expression that are still unsurpassed in this particular kind of orchestral composition. Tchaikowsky was in some respects the greater. He was more elemental, more direct, more passionate, more overpowering; but what did not he, as well as Wagner, learn from Liszt in harmonic progressions and in orchestral color, as Liszt in turn learned from Berlioz, the father of all modern orchestration? Saint-Saens, in his symphonic poems, has caught the elegance of Liszt, but the subjects he chose, except "The Youth of Hercules," did not admit the peculiar nobility, nor is it in Saint-Saens' musical nature. Nor in "Tasso" is there any need of a detailed programme. "Lament and Triumph" is enough, if it be granted that the hearer is acquainted with Tasso. Even as absolute music, the work is beautiful, stirring, impressive.

EIGHTH SYMPHONY WAS A DELIGHTFUL TREAT

B. Journal — Dec 18/1905

To those in whose mind still dwelt vividly the recollection of the "Young France" concert of two weeks ago, with its great monotony and its large share of unloveliness, the eighth of the Symphony series was a pure delight. There was variety in plenty, charming contrasts in style and a general brilliancy that sent the audience home in joyous and unwearied mood. To be sure, there was little that was "great," as the word is now understood in music, there were no problems of thematic mathematics nor any particular cult to be advanced. But there was a deal of honest enjoyment and some orchestral playing that was of the finest possible kind. There was also a pianist who conquered mightily by his dazzling virtuosity.

And there was, too, a "first time at these concerts" symphony by Haydn, an event of much interest when so many of the old master's works have been worn threadbare.

Alfred Reisenauer was the pianist, a man who has already won high esteem in this city, and again he showed himself an artist of enormous virility and all-compelling brilliancy.

The eighth Symphony program introduced the famous German pianist, Alfred Reisenauer, as soloist in Weber's F minor concert piece for piano and orchestra. The other selections were Haydn's B flat major symphony, first time at these concerts; introduction to the third act of King's Children and the "Humoresque," by Humperdinck, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph." Haydn's symphony was interesting as a novelty, even though much of it was formal in character. The sudden variations in tonality makes the work appear more episodic than coherent; as if the composer had experimented with the public taste just to learn what effect his musical innovations would produce. There was evident care taken to give each choir of the band its proportional work, and the different instrumental bodies have so-called "opportunities" in one or more of the four movements. The Menuetto and the finale are the most satisfactory, the former movement being mainly a dainty dance theme in varied forms in which the brilliant ensemble work of the strings was conspicuous. The last movement is rather erratic in manner, but the effect is pleasing, and all the changes in tempo and key were given with precision and clarity.

Mr Reisenauer's interpretation of the Weber piece showed that the pianist's fame was not undeserved, for the very favorable impression made at his former recitals here was more than duplicated. He is a big player in more ways than one; an artist of consummate skill and versatility to whom technical difficulties are slight. The brilliant work, once so popular, but now rather neglected, is an excellent show piece, full of fortissimo passages, double arpeggios, glissandos, chord runs and other piano fireworks, and all of these Mr Reisenauer handled and fingered in a masterly manner. The march theme of the second movement was notably effective, and the dash and vigor of the finale was fairly thrilling. The orchestra, led by Mr Hess, gave able assistance. At the close of the performance Mr Reisenauer was called back a half-dozen times.

The sad little symphonic poem, the introduction to the third act of "King's Children," by Humperdinck, and the same composer's "Humoresque" presented great contrasts in sentiment, and both of the simple works were very pleasingly told in a musical way. The woodwinds deserve a special word for good work in the first piece. The "Lament and Triumph" was splendidly played, the magnificent finale showing the orchestra in its best form.

The program this week will include Dvorak's overture, "Nature"; the Pastorale from Bach's Christmas overture, Strube's new violin concerto No. 2 in F sharp minor (played by Mr Timothee Adamowski) and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. Globe Dec 17/1905

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adv.

PROGRAMME. Dec 18, 1905

Haydn—Symphony in B flat major (B. & H., No. 8). (First time at these concerts.)

Weber—Concert Piece in F minor for Piano-forte and Orchestra, op. 79.

A. Reisenauer, Soloist.

Humperdinck—A Introduction to Act III. of "King's Children." b Humoresque.

Liszt—Symphonic Poem, No. 2: "Tasso: Lament and Triumph."

We could have wished a good Brahms symphony (preferably the second or third) as a lesson to the D'Indy party. To go back to Haydn was too great a contrast, even though the work was the most interesting symphony that we can recall by that composer. But there are other reasons why such a symphony should not be brought to our attention.

1st. It is intelligible, and who cares to hear works that he can understand? We have the serenest contempt for all musical works that we can comprehend and enjoy. What we desire is something problematical; we can find unearthly beauty in almost any work that is unintelligible.

2nd. The work is symmetrical. Everybody knows that to be at all emotional, we must begin by smashing every rule of form. Chopin adhered to the very simplest forms, therefore he must be the most unemotional of composers!

3rd. The scoring is absurdly limited. No trombones, no tubas, no gongs, no wind-machine, no artillery, no anything!

4th. The absurd thing is tuneful; as if anybody wanted a tune in music. The art of Music was not meant to use tunes, it was meant—well, we are not quite sure nowadays what it meant for, but we are quite certain that it was not meant to be at all melodic.

The symphony was played with abundant spirit and won much applause; yet it must be confessed that Haydn no longer is very appetizing to our jaded musical palates, although (if we except the G minor and the "Jupiter") his symphonies wear better than those of Mozart.

We were surprised at the effect won by Weber's work. Much of the furore was due to the really great playing of Alfred Reisenauer, who was recalled 6 or 7 times, but it is evident that the work is not so old-fashioned as some have considered it.

It is quite probable that the effective tune of the Crusader's March, which plays so prominent a part in the last half of the composition, may account for the triumph. In spite of Wagner's theories (which he did not hold to himself), in spite of the hue and cry of the modern cacophonists, the people still respond to a melody, just as they have always done since the time of Herodotus.

But it must be confessed that such a work is more liable to fade than a Haydn symphony, for the latter is in a class by itself, while in just this field of dramatic "programme-music," represented by Weber's "Concert-stueck," something greater has been done (although without piano solo) by a German gentleman named Richard Strauss, and a Russian called Tchaikowsky.

Yet the number gives abundant chance for display of dash and brilliancy, and the work of the soloist is not hidden under a bushel, as is sometimes the case in a Brahms or Beethoven concerto; that is, he is not sunk into the ensemble at any time.

The march tune alluded to above is twin brother to the march of the "Lenore" symphony, and while all critics must agree that the two are a trifle vulgar, there is not the least doubt as to their winning popular suffrage at every hearing.

Mr. Reisenauer's scintillating performance deserved the great recognition it received.

We enjoyed Humperdinck's Prelude greatly. It is not as powerful as Wagner's music, but it is in the same school, well scored and with fine melodic touches combined with rich harmonies. It does not quite attain the beauty of parts of "Hansel and Gretel," but it may be classed as one of the worthy examples of the modern school of composition.

The German enjoys being very sad, and this picture of the royal children dying in the forest is not vastly different from Heine's pathetic poem, "Es fiel ein Reif in der Fruhlingsnacht," which Schumann and Mendelssohn set to tearful music.

The "Humoresque" was not in very vivid contrast. One may doubt whether instrumental music can ever become truly humorous without a "programme." Nevertheless it was a light and bright work that awakened neither joy nor animosity in the reviewer's breast.

Now Mr. Gericke let slip the leash and allowed the brasses to use as much wind as they possessed. Liszt's "Tasso" is by no means as inspired a work as that other symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." Its loftiness is rather strained and comes dangerously near to bombast. When Tasso takes to triumphing he keeps it up like a Roman Saturnalia or an old English Christmas. One climax follows another; each one louder than its predecessor.

It suggests a terrible "Katzenjammer" for the day after. Nor was it perfectly played. The bass clarinette and the oboe did some very fine work, but the brasses were crude, and in the Humperdinck selections the horns were not always sure of the embouchure.

It is not often that one can point to a technical flaw in our orchestral performances.

Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY TICKET

For remaining rehearsals for sale. Address A.M.G., Boston Transcript. (A):

THE SYMPHONY SOCIETY.

ANOTHER COMPOSITION OF VINCENT D'INDY HEARD.

N.Y. Sun Dec. 18, 1905

A Symphony for Orchestra and Piano Which Proves to Be Pleasing Music—Bessie Abbott Returns to America With Paris Grand Opera Stamp on Her Singing.

At the fourth afternoon concert of the New York Symphony Society, which took place at Carnegie Hall yesterday, Walter Damrosch brought forward another of the compositions of Vincent D'Indy, the distinguished Frenchman who recently gave us a visitation. This was his "Symphony for Orchestra and Piano on the Song of a French Mountaineer." It was heard for the first time in this gloom enshrouded city and was cordially received. The piano part, which is designed not as a solo exhibition, but as an integral part of an orchestral work, was well played by Raoul Pugno, whose self-effacement was valued by the audience at its true worth.

For authoritative account of this composition we must call upon the ever willing Hugues Imbert, who writes thus: "In October, 1886, was finished the symphony in G (opus 25) for orchestra and piano on a French mountain song. It was heard at the Concerts Lamoureux in March, 1887, with Mme. Bordes-Pène at the piano. Vincent D'Indy has availed himself of the resources of the keyboard with much skill."

"The symphony is divided into three parts, which are no more than variations of a theme submitted to an infinite number of transformations. The English horn, from the opening of the first part, gives the pastoral motive, which is developed by the other instruments in turn. In the second part the piano assumes greater importance and gives the reply to the orchestra, in which the most conflicting rhythms, the most imaginative combinations, may be distinguished. The calls of the horn, an alto solo full of tenderness, suggest very effectively the scenes of woodland life. And as an apotheosis we have a kirmess in which the rhythms are full of swing and humorous fancy."

This is an enthusiastic view of a composition which is decidedly more agreeable to hear than the symphony in B flat and the chamber music recently brought out by the Kneisel Quartet. We are not now concerned with the attempt to make the piano part of the orchestral mass, for this would lead into the discussion of a side issue. Suffice it to say that the piano part, while not quite a solo, is a pronounced obligato.

Mr. Damrosch before performing the symphony addressed the audience and made a claim for the modern French composers of greater freedom from the influence of Wagner than is usually attributed to them. He further asserted his belief that they were in the forefront of a "tremendous movement" toward progress and that their idiom had in it something essentially Gallic and decidedly novel.

He could hardly have had a less convincing illustration for his argument than the composition played yesterday. It has few of those characteristics which differentiate D'Indy's musical style from that of German or Russian writers. It is frankly melodious and its harmonic plan clings to the safe and established traditions.

The real value of the composition lies in its atmospheric effects, which are engaging, and in the brilliant spirit and splendid orchestral sonority of its final movement. The whole thing sounds well and it is music in the old meaning of that word. It propounds no problems of tonality and demands no new education of the ear. For this relief from the late proclamations of the D'Indy coterie much thanks are due.

The other orchestral numbers on the programme were "Variations on a Russian Folk Song," by Arceibouchev, Wihtol, Liadov, Sokolov and Glazounov, and the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried." The concert also served to bring about the first public appearance here of Bessie Abbott, an American singer, who has had her success at the Paris Grand Opéra.

Miss Abbott was singing in extravaganzas and similar works a few years ago when her pretty voice attracted the attention of Jean de Reszke. Acting upon his advice she went to Paris and studied singing. With what success was made known to her countrymen yesterday when she sang "Gli angeli d'inferno" from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and some songs with piano accompaniment.

She has a light soprano voice of pure and agreeable quality in the middle and lower register. The upper tones are a trifle thin, but as a whole it is a pleasing organ. Her singing of the Mozart aria showed that she had been carefully trained in colorature singing. Her staccati were facile, though superficial in tone, and her general execution was smooth and accurate in intonation.

In an ariette by Paul Vidal, Tschai-kowsky's "Dors ma mignonne" and Bizet's "Vielle Canson" she sang with a good understanding of the French chanson style. Miss Abbott's rise from her former artistic state to her present one bespeaks an honorable ambition.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

SUGAR-PLUMS AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Light Programme and Pleasant Entertainment—The Choral Art Society Recalls the Pleasures of Pure Tone—Next Week's Concert—The Recitals of the New Year—Musical Miscellany

After all, we Bostonians are not so serious as our neighbors like to believe us, and now and then we prove it. Audiences at symphony concerts in New York never smile a general smile. It might not be good form. Audiences at symphony concerts in London are grave as images. In Germany they are heavily attentive, and so on, perhaps, the world over. At least we in Boston dare to smile in the full tide of a symphony concert, generally, spontaneously, genuinely. It happened yesterday, in the midst of Weber's "Concert-Piece" for piano and orchestra that we were hearing for the first time in ten years. Mr. Reisenauer, the pianist, was playing his part as sympathetically as though it was the newest concerto of the hour. The orchestra, under Mr. Hess, was playing the accompaniment as sympathetically. Weber had an innocent little programme for the piece, as programmes go nowadays. He saw in fancy the lady of the castle mourning her absent lord, gone to fight the infidels in Palestine. They had slain him perchance. And lo! as she looked out upon the forest, she saw spears flashing through the leaves and heard the tramp of men-at-arms. Then she knew that her lord had returned safe and sound, and there was much rejoicing in rondo form. The orchestra begins the march that pictures the return of the Crusaders. The piano embroiders it and heightens the rhythm. The march rises and falls. There is a sudden sharp glissando on the piano for no apparent reason, except that Weber was excited and wished to "cut loose." Then off goes the march again fuller and higher than before. It was dramatic effect, no doubt, in Weber's days. Perhaps even the glissando mirrors the glance in which the lady recognizes her spouse. Yesterday it mirrored a little in anticipation the smile that went around the hall. A few youngsters almost smiled audibly. It was hardly at the music. It was not archaic enough for that. It was hardly at the naive "programmatic" effect, if there was any. It was the humor of the hour and of the concert. Mr. Gericke was content that we should amuse ourselves. And we Bostonians have smiled unitedly and gladly in the midst of a symphony concert.

It was not an important programme, as Mr. Gericke's programmes go, but it was very agreeable and interesting entertainment. Maybe it was our sugar-plum for our listening so intently and sympathetically to Mr. d'Indy and his young Frenchmen. Certainly it was the orchestra's, after all its labor, with their exacting scores. Haydn led us pleasantly through the four smooth movements—all tonal pattern weaving just touched by feeling—of his symphony in B-flat, played for the first time at a Symphony concert. Two brightly figured allegros, really gay at heart; a slow movement that melted its sugary way along; a piquant little minuet and trio; and through all the light play of such an orchestra as Haydn knew. With a little more distinction of melody and workmanship, it would have been all that such music should be. As it was, it gave a pleasure that is in no modern symphony to give, the simple pleasure of pure curves and arabesques of sound lined in as pure tone by our orchestra. It is a pleasure as well worth receiving as any that flows from the newest tone-poem of Berlin or of Paris. It is nearer completeness, too, in its kind.

It happened yesterday also to set the mood for the afternoon. Therefore, perhaps, we smiled at the glissando of the "Concert-Piece" and yielded ourselves readily and delightedly to the thin, clear brilliance of the rondo of the rejoicing pair. Gay, too, was the little "Humoreske" of Humperdinck's. Perhaps Mr. Gericke feared he was giving us too many sugar-plums. Or he wished to remind us that Humperdinck has also been visiting America, though he wandered no farther than New York and Washington. So, it may be, he played the introduction to the third act of "King's Children," the fairy play for which Humperdinck wrote incidental music. But with all its Wagnerian pomp and intricacy that, too, was a sugar-plum. There is no deep lamenting these little creatures of elf-land, though they were very hungry and cold and died in each other's arms. It is all wistful, and the wonder is that Humperdinck could keep it wistful through all that Wagnerian scoring. He is the paradox of his school. He writes intricately as a full-grown son of Wagner, yet he feels as simply as a child. There the box of musical sugar-plums closed with a gentle snap, and for ending came the tonal stress and tonal fervors of Liszt's "Tasso." From the forest and fairy folk to the court of Ferrara and a poet's "triumph" at Rome. From the wistful little princes to the self-torturing Tasso and the heaven-storming Liszt. Exciting music it is, and there were stirring moments as our band and conductor played it. But somehow it did not efface the wistfulness of the royal children as Humperdinck played them, and Haydn seemed only the gayer to recall. Perhaps Liszt was really as sincere as they, but they persuade of their sincerity, and he does not.

H. T. P.

114

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

DVOŘÁK.

OVERTURE, "Nature," op. 91.

BACH.

PASTORALE from the CHRISTMAS ORATORIO.

STRUBE.

CONCERTO in F sharp minor for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA.

I. Allegro assai.

II. Reverie : Adagio.

III. Passacaglia : Andantino grazioso.
(First performance.)

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral." op. 68.

I. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country : Allegro, ma non troppo.

II. Scene by the brook-side : Andante molto moto.

III. Jolly gathering of country folk : Allegro. In tempo d'allegro. Thunderstorm ; Tempest : Allegro.

IV. Shepherd's song ; Glad some and thankful feelings after the storm : Allegretto.

Soloist:

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

ADAMOWSKI PLAYS STRUBE'S NEW VIOLIN CONCERTO

"Nature Music" at the Symphony Concert

Once in a while the keenest impression of a Symphony concert is that of the perfections of our orchestra and of the authority and the imagination of its conductor. It was so yesterday afternoon even with an unfamiliar overture and a brand-new concerto on the programme. As often in the past, when Christmas is near, the "Shepherd's Music" from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" had a place upon it. The orchestra played it with surpassing beauty of cool, transparent, flowing tone. Familiar as the music is Mr. Gericke and his men seemed to create it anew for us. It came from nowhere. It vanished nowhere. And between was perfect euphony without edge or joint in it. There was no thought of men or instruments behind. It was as disembodied sound as the music that the legend makes the shepherds hear.

Beethoven's "pastoral" symphony ended the concert. (Was it appropriate to the time, too? Anyhow Beethoven played it first when Christmas was only three days away.) And here again orchestra and conductor seemed to recreate familiar music. No band playing the symphony for the first time could have brought such mingled fire and finesse, such cool lucidity and such warm imagination to the music. Yet it was hard to believe that it sounded fresher or more alive—more new even—on that December evening when Beethoven first gave it in Vienna. The quality of the expression matched the understanding and the sympathy of the conception. Mr. Gericke and his men made the symphony one long, flowing, changeful yet perfectly proportioned song. Endless were the tonal colors and shades of tonal colors with which they touched it. Figure and ornament were all spontaneous grace. Rhythms danced. Once upon a time some of us liked to deny Mr. Gericke fulness of imagination. Of late he has been proving his possession of it in the ultra-modern music that is presumed to require it most of all. But what fuller feat of the imagination or of the power of a conductor over his men and his hearers than so to recreate a symphony that began to be familiar fifty years ago? "Woods, trees and rocks send back the echoes that man deserves," wrote Beethoven, perhaps when the symphony was in his mind. Yesterday conductor and orchestra seemed to send back also the very sounds into which he had transformed those echoes.

A pastoral programme Mr. Gericke was seemingly planning for yesterday's concert, and so with the "pastoral" symphony and the "Shepherd's Music" went Dvorak's overture "Amid Nature" which for ten years our orchestra has not played. Great things, according to the composer, were in his mind as he wrote, even impressions of the universe which must be very big things indeed. Yet his Nature, so far as the music went, is Nature as the peasant sees it who happens to have simple imagination as well and command of orchestral coloring to express it. The little sounds of "all out-doors" tickle his fancy. Shall we not hear them murmuring or twinkling through the strings and wood-winds? This peasant out-of-doors rollicks in the sheer joy that wind and sunshine, woods and stream bring him. Lucky enough to be composer too, his music rollicks and sings with him. Then he tires. He begins to muse, and into his music go his simple musing. The overture is not the music of Dvorak's prime. It belongs to the beginning of his decline when he was slowly becoming the peasant again—that queer "throw-back" of his advancing years—and by no means always the musically inspired peasant. Contrast him with Beethoven when both in Dvorak's phrase are "Amid Nature" and the moods that Beethoven feels and that he translates into his music run deeper, broader and clearer with the universal appeal of poetry. No wonder Beethoven said he "poetized" in the woods and sang in his music. Dvorak makes but a pretty oat-pipe lay beside that symphony. And for simple feeling, for pastoral mood does Dvorak with all his peasant mind and heart, match the bewigged, town-loving Cantor that wrote his "Christmas Oratorio" probably in his stuffy living-room hard by his Leipsic church? It is the difference of genius in Bach from talent in Dvorak.

In the midst of all this "nature music," as Mr. Gericke has been calling it, and perhaps for foil to it, came Mr. Strube's new concerto for violin. Last spring he wrote it for Mr. Adamowski, and Mr. Gericke added a scholarly and musicianly cadenza, as it seemed at a single hearing in rather severer style. Yesterday Mr. Adamowski played the concerto and Mr. Strube himself conducted the orchestra. The listeners had round upon round of applause for both. It is good to know that a composer of such worth sits modestly week after week among the first violins, and that there is a fellow-virtuoso in the same company to play it so sympathetically. And if Mr. Strube had not been one of ourselves, so to say, his concerto would have deserved its warm welcome. Here at last was a modern composer who was writing a concerto for violin not because it is a part of the whole duty of man, but because the work gave him pleasure, while he sought to impart that pleasure to his hearers. A violin concerto actually sounded spontaneous and fanciful, and was even alive with feeling for the instrument—for the beauty and graces of its tone more than for its technical possibilities.

Not that Mr. Strube's concerto is any belated masterpiece in its kind. There is not body and largeness enough in his musical ideas for that. Maybe, too, the masterpieces among concertos, for the time at least, have all been written. But the concerto is music of persuasive, even fascinating lyrical and elegiac charm, bright and animated with shimmering tonal fancies that once and again flash brilliantly. Mr. Strube respects established forms, but he bends them easily and freely to his purpose and his harmonies, modulations and adornments often have a fresh and imaginative individuality. He is skilful and fanciful when he sets his solo instrument against wood winds or fuses its tone with one or another orchestral group. Almost always the result is the charm of winning euphony. The concerto is supple throughout—in the finale Mr. Strube risks no less than twelve variations on a theme in Passacaglia form—and throughout there is a fine, clear, soft plangency in the whole tonal impression. Sometimes, too, it is a brilliant plangency shining against a background of flowing sensitive phrase. So one fancies at moments one of the new Frenchmen might write a violin concerto. So too, one also fancies, when Mr. Strube lingers too persistently in the higher register of the violin, Richard Strauss might linger. But it is enough—more than enough—that at last some young composer, and one of our own, has written a concerto of spontaneous charm in itself and of lively feeling for the violin that is to play it. Yesterday it sounded the better for the fineness of Mr. Adamowski's tone and for the skill with which he fused every technical grace or accomplishment into the whole musical design.

H. T. P.

Concerts Next Week

Mr. Strube's new concerto for violin, with Mr. Adamowski to take the solo part, is to be played at the ninth pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. One of the first violins of the orchestra has written it, and another of them is to play it. Already we know by several tests the worth and the interest of Mr. Strube as a composer, and Mr. Adamowski is, perhaps, the figure of longest and most familiar standing in the whole band. For the rest of the programme, Mr. Gericke has made what he was calling the other day a "nature" programme. It comprises Dvorak's overture, "In der Natur," the pastoral from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The novelty of the ninth Symphony program was Gustav Strube's concerto in F sharp minor for violin and orchestra, with Timothee Adamowski as soloist. The work is still in manuscript and its first performance was at the Friday afternoon rehearsal. The other numbers were Dvorak's overture, "Nature," the shepherd's music from Bach's "Christmas" oratorio, and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. Mr. Strube, who has been associated with the Boston Symphony orchestra for about 14 years, is a composer of great ability, many of his works having been performed at concerts in this city by the Symphony orchestra and other prominent musical organizations. His latest violin concerto, which is dedicated to Mr. Adamowski, gives great prominence to the solo instrument, the orchestral background, though substantial, being of secondary importance. A work, in short, written by a violinist for his favorite instrument, and a thoroughly interesting and sane composition through each of the three movements.

Mr. Strube indulges in but few "surprises" in modulations or orchestral effects. The piece is full of melody, the score is written with a thorough understanding of the limitations, as well as the capabilities of the violin, and although abounding in brilliant passages, it is not to be classed as a "show piece," but as a scholarly contribution to musical literature, and one that is not so abstruse as to be enjoyed only by the musical expert. It is downright good music, and Mr. Adamowski, who had memorized the concerto, played it splendidly, doing even better work than usual. His intonation was nearly always correct, he gave the variations of the three-note motive in the first part very sweetly, and the upper register fingering and broken phrasing in the next movement were commendable in every way. In the finale the variations of the themes were clearly shown and the difficult cadenza, written by Mr. Gericke, was played dexterously and smoothly. Mr. Adamowski and Mr. Strube were received with great favor, before and after the concerto performance.

Mr. Gericke's program was in keeping with the spirit of the season and opened with "Nature," the first of Dvorak's triple overture, "Nature," "Life," "Love." The sweet and gentle suggestiveness of the charming work was given with exquisite effect, showing the orchestra at its best in music of the simpler form. The shepherd music by Bach, this also with a pastoral atmosphere, was played expressively, and in Mr. Strube's concerto, which the composer led, the work of the orchestra was as sympathetic and perfect in execution as one could reasonably desire. Beethoven's beautiful "Pastoral" symphony, grandly played throughout, closed the program.

The soloist this week will be Mme Emma Eames, who will be heard in an aria by Mozart and Schubert's "Die Allmacht." The symphony in C minor, by Amherst Webber, will be given for the first time in this country; Elgar's overture, "In the South," will be played for the first time in Boston, and the other selection announced is Tchaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini." Dec. 24/05

Doubtless the Symphony Hall managers intend to be as considerate as possible to the unmonied public who cannot afford to pay fancy premiums for their music and who must perforce accept humbly the twenty-five-cent seat conditions that are meted out to them, but to an inquiring mind the logic of some of those conditions is not quite clear. The enthusiastic and devoted music lover hies her—and frequently him—to Symphony Hall steps one hour, sometimes two or even three hours, before the doors are opened at one o'clock. The line lengthens as the hour approaches and sometimes it obstructs the sidewalk. There are five hundred seats, we believe, which, for the rehearsal, are sold at twenty-five cents each; when those are gone no others are sold. At one o'clock the doors are opened and the crowd mounts quietly to its allotted place, there to wait for an hour and a half more until the concert begins. It is a long and tedious ordeal for music's sake and one wonders why it cannot be made easier for those who display such real devotion to it. It would seem as though it might be feasible to open the doors at two o'clock, instead of one o'clock, as it only takes a few minutes to fill the seats, and thus obviate the long and tiresome wait. It would seem as though the devotees might be allowed to stand inside the lobby until the appointed hour, where protection from the wintry blasts could be secured. But perhaps there is a deep-lying reason for it all which a prying mind must not seek to fathom, and the indigent music lover can thank luck that she no longer has to sprint up six flights of stairs in a headlong rush as in the old Music Hall days, when muscle and brawn secured the seats. Perhaps some day the "twenty-five-cent Symphoners" may be accorded further concessions. Trans. Dec. 30/05

Musical News

Mengelberg, the Dutch conductor who conducted two Philharmonic concerts in New York last month and heard our orchestra between whiles, has been telling his friends in Amsterdam that it is one of the three or four finest bands in the world. Only three, he believes, can be compared with it—the orchestra of the opera at Vienna, Mr. Wood's in London and, modestly, his own.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT TIMELY

Herold

Programme Chosen Suitable for Christmas Season, with Thought of Nature and Man's Rejoicing Predominant.

TWO CHRISTMAS PASTORALS FEATURES

Mr. Strube's New Violin Concerto Was Admirably Played by Mr. Adamowski—Mr.
Gericke Conducted Concert.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gericke conducted and Mr. Timothee Adamowski was the solo violinist. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Nature".....Dvorak
Pastorale from "Christmas" oratorio.....Bach
Violin concerto in F-sharp minor.....Strube
Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral".....Beethoven

It will be seen that this programme was arranged chiefly with reference to the Christmas season and the thought of nature and man rejoicing in the birth of the Saviour. The stickler for facts, "absolute facts," might say that there has been fierce dispute even among the devout over the precise date of this event, and that deep thinkers have differed as to the year, naming years between 746 and 754. A list of these disputants with the record of their conclusions may be found in Gabriel Peignot's "Recherches Historiques sur la Personne de Jesus Christ."

Joseph Scaliger proved, at least to his own satisfaction, that the divine birth was in the month of April; but Scaliger was an erratic and occasionally malicious person; not always to be trusted. Did he not at the age of 60 dance in his doctor's robe the Pyrrhic dance before his Emperor to the amazement of the latter and of all the court? Furthermore Scaliger wrote about the squaring of the circle. Not a man to be chairman of a committee or to serve as foreman of a jury.

The world at large has accepted the day that has long been celebrated with ecclesiastical pomp and household good cheer, and the association of oriental shepherds and their flocks with a raw or ice-bound December does not strike the New Englander as incongruous. In the Christmas music of today—and much of it is poor stuff—there is usually a pastoral episode, and shepherds sing of approach the grade in the rhythm of the Siciliana.

Nor is it pure fancy to represent the historic and enviable shepherds as musical. The lot of the shepherd, as described in the Bible, was full of hardship and of danger, and it was dull. Then, as even now in Syria, he would pass an hour away in playing on some musical instrument, a little harp, a timbrel, or on something not unlike the pipes of Pan.

Gave Two Famous Christmas Pastorals of Bach, Handel.

The two famous Christmas pastorals are those by Bach and Handel. Both these compositions have been tinkered for modern use, and neither one of them has been improved thereby. Of the two, the one by Handel in the "Messiah" is by far the more poetic in its simple, naive beauty, with its air that might have come from the pipe of some rude shepherd clad in his sheepskin mantle. What matters it whether Handel heard the melody piped by pifferari in Rome to street madonnas, or whether the tune came to him? The music has the atmosphere of that memorable night with wondering stars. Bach's is laboriously simple; he felt the need of a certain amount of scholastic development; he was not content with an impression; his shepherds had been to a conservatory.

Dvorak's overture, which the composer wished played in company with the "Carnival" ("Life") and the "Othello" ("Love"), was performed for the second time at these concerts. It gives a glimpse of parochial nature, nature as seen in a corner of Bohemia, with a dance hall not far away, not nature the universal mother. And once or twice Siegfried entered and the Czech forest begins to murmur for him. Yet the music is often pretty, and it soothes, and so it, too, has its uses. We cannot always be listening to strains of woe and despair, to snivel and whine, or to music illustrative of the horrors in the story of Thebes or of Pelop's line.

These two amiable compositions, with Beethoven's Pastoral, filled the breasts of many with a gentle joy, and Mr. Strube's new violin concerto was not in violent contrast.

The development of Mr. Gustav Strube as a composer is worthy of curious study. He had, to begin with, a sound, diversified, practical education as a musician. There are few orchestral instruments, if any, which he cannot play, and, naturally, the piano is familiar to him. He was brought up in the composer's straight and narrow path at Leipzig, and it is not probable that he strayed from it as a teacher in the Mannheim conservatory.

In his first orchestral work he paid homage to the memory of Joan of Arc with an overture, and thus added his name to the list that fills 90 large octavo pages in Huet's "Jeanne d'Arc et la Musique," a list that begins with Adolphe Adam and ends with Widor.

His tribute was orthodox, and in his rhetoric there was nothing to disturb the most sensitive. He also wrote his symphony, without a title, without a programme, in four movements, and according to the rules.

The scherzo followed the adagio. But in his first violin concerto (1897) Mr. Strube showed clearly a tendency to be modern, in the sense of the word that is so obnoxious to those who are dismayed by the complications of latter-day music and fear lest their minds give way if they listen to the quietly heterodox or to the open and pronounced blasphemers against long established forms. He acquainted himself with forbidden dissonances; he learned new rhythms; he no longer took J. C. Lobe's treatise on instrumentation as the key to paradise. He heard music by Chabrier, Loeppler, the wild Russians, heated by vodka till they screamed in their passion, the cerebral Frenchman, the extraordinary Richard Strauss; he heard this music, and his own Rhapsody for orchestra was in 1901 frankly and delightfully nihilistic. He was perhaps equally audacious three years later in his fantastic overture, but the public accustoms itself quickly to the unusual and it hears after three years with other organs of audition and understanding. His string quartet performed here last March would have shocked his teachers. They would have mourned him as one wandering after strange gods. In his symphonic poem "Longing," produced a month later, there was a blend of sensuousness and mysticism that made a direct appeal.

Last night he came before the Symphony audience with a new violin concerto, for which Mr. Gerieke wrote a cadenza. Fortunate Mr. Strube! His compositions do not grow restive from lying in a portfolio.

Frankly Melodic and in More Conventional Line.

It was said of Ambroise Thomas that he anxiously trimmed sails to catch any wind of popularity that might drive him toward the haven of success. If Mr. Strube has heard, and meditated, and assimilated, and from year to year shaped his musical expression, his speech has been his own, and he has said honestly what came to him to say.

In this concerto he is frankly melodic, and as a rule his melody is in a more conventional line than in his rhapsody and fantastic overture; but his harmonic thought is often ultra-modern, and his orchestration is super-refined. The first movement is compact and interesting throughout. The themes are fresh and the material is deftly handled by the orchestra, while the solo instrument indulges itself in arabesques and in pas-

CHRISTMAS CALM PERVADES CONCERT

Journal

Ninth Symphony Brings Out Series of Pastorals Appropriate to Season and Temper of Audience.

An air of placidity brooded over the ninth Symphony concert, a condition that not even Mr. Strube's somewhat unconventional violin concerto did little to disturb. An attempt had perhaps been made to bring the program into the Christmas mode; at any rate there was a bit of Bach from his "Christmas Oratorio," and almost everything else was pastoral, as if the country flavored music was in some way suggestive of the Christ-Child. The result was at least peace in the hall and good-will toward Mr. Gerieke and the rest.

Mr. Adamowski, the soloist of the evening, played Strube's new concerto, and he played it well. Where it sounded harsh and uncouth from his violin, the fault was the composer's, for the work had many moments of bald ugliness both of themes and orchestration. The first movement, especially, was for the most part barren of invention and devoid of beauty. The second part, a reverie, was the best of the three, although the variations of the last movement were clever so far as their mechanics went. Altogether it must be said that the concerto is an ungrateful task for a soloist, and cannot become popular.

Dvorak's mellifluous "Nature" overture, charmed by its sincere thoughtfulness, and Bach's very artificial and tinkling pastorate delighted by reason of its exquisite playing. The genial and hearty Beethoven symphony—apotheosis of the city man's views of rusticity—was a joyous ending to a concert that asked little except calm appreciation.

AMHERST WEBBER,
PIANIST.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adv. PROGRAMME. Dec 25. 05
Overture, "In die Natur".....Dvorak.
Pastorale from Christmas Oratorio.....Bach.
Concerto for Violin, No. 2.....Strube.
(New, First time.)
Soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski.
Symphony No. 8, "Pastoral".....Beethoven.

"One touch of nature makes the whole world kin." The concert of Saturday consisted of several touches of nature. There was nature according to Dvorak, and nature according to Beethoven, there were birds warbling in all keys and on all instruments, there was a severe thunder storm, and there were shepherds and other "happy peasantry" on the scene.

Dvorak's views of Nature had rather a picnic flavor; it was an artificial grove with a bowling alley, a village green and rustic dances that were called up to the reviewer's mind by the strongly rhythmic phrases of the overture. Yet at times a very diluted Siegfried appeared and one thought of "Waldesweben" and water. The work, in short, does not impress us as being as powerful as much other music from the same master.

The Bach Pastorate was as beautiful as ever. It was a fine chance for the woodwind to display itself, and the English horns and clarinettes were in excellent form. How gloriously refreshing, in these hysterical days, is the blessed serenity, the constant surety of Bach! The audience seemed to share the reviewer's opinion, for the simple and unaffected work was enthusiastically applauded.

Solo

Mme. E

Then came Mr. Strube's annual composition. It was with surprise and pleasure that we noted a change in the style of this composer. Instead of seeking frightful dissonances he presented a quite intelligible work, not devoid of melody.

There was still a sufficiency (perhaps an excess) of originality, and the ingenuity of the figure treatment in the first movement, the contrasts of the variations of the last movement and the experiments in odd rhythms, kept the auditor alert through all the measures. One can commend also the "violinistic" character of the work; it is written by a man who knows exactly what is feasible upon the solo instrument.

The second movement is the best of the composition. In this Adagio the composer is in what old Weller called "a referee," and he presents some very effective passages upon the G string in a poetic manner. These Mr. Adamowski gave in an impassioned manner. In fact, all through the work Mr. Adamowski was at his very best, and the technical difficulties with which the concerto was liberally strewn did not seem to trouble him in the least.

The cadenza of the last movement was written by Mr. Gericke and was brimful of double-stopping of difficult character. Not the slightest blur or lapse from intonation was noticeable in its performance, and the finale, in which Mr. Strube has taken a leaf out of Brahms' note-book, was a technical triumph.

But the work is not a concerto. It is really a set of violin solos with orchestral accompaniment. The soloist is in the foreground almost all the time, and the impression is anything but symphonic, which ought to be the result of a true concerto. The mere interpolation of an occasional "tutti" for the orchestra does not make a work orchestral.

It might not be fair to compare the work with the concertos of Brahms or of Beethoven, but if one places it beside even the second or third concerto of Bruch our meaning will be made clear. A true concerto is an orchestral work with a thread of solo interwoven through its fabric, not a solo with an obliging orchestra in the background.

Mr. Strube conducted his own work, and both soloist and composer-conductor received an ovation at its close. It was certainly well directed, superbly played, and had many moments of charm, wherefore the enthusiasm was not misplaced.

Then we all went back to "Nature" and listened to the first important piece of "programme-music" ever written,—Beethoven's "pastoral symphony." It suddenly came upon us that the first 4 notes of this symphony are practically the same figure as the first notes of D'Indy's string quartette. Beethoven, however, does not wear them quite so threadbare as the modern Frenchman. A word of praise must be spoken for the clearness of the performance of the contrabass figure in the development.

Mr. Gericke loves the second movement of this symphony, but we cannot help finding it a little prolix. Beethoven's brook, like Tennyson's, seems to "go on forever." Nor do we care for those final birds, which are ticketed in the score like poultry in a shop-window, and which tootle out alone, while the rest of the orchestra pauses in breathless suspense. The case is hopeless! We have had too much of Richard Strauss' brandy and Franz Liszt pepper ever to care for musical gruel again.

Mr. Gericke spared not a single repeat, even giving the exposition of the first movement twice. The Scherzo was given finely, with perhaps a trifle of too much finesse in the village dance, and the storm was the most effective part of the whole work.

How much Beethoven effected with small means! The violoncellos and contrabasses against each other in unequal groups, the blare of the trombones (only the second time that they had been used in symphony) and the piping, long notes of the piccolo, made a tempest that causes one instinctively to reach for his umbrella. There has been much bad weather in music since that time; Berlioz, St. Saens, Wagner, Rossini, Verdi, and a host of others have had their little thunder-storms, but none of them have eclipsed this particular hurricane.

The fact that Beethoven causes the shepherds to appear, after the tempest, upon the clarinette and French horn, causes one to remember that he seemed ignorant of the effect of the English horn, which is "par-excellence" the shepherd's pipe of the orchestra and has been used as such by Berlioz, Rossini, Wagner, Schumann, et id genus omne. Beethoven never used the English horn in any orchestral score.

It was evident that the audience were quite in sympathy with the programme, for not only was applause very spontaneous and frequent, but everyone stayed until the weather had quite cleared up and the shepherds had finished their last notes of thanksgiving. Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

WEBBER.

SYMPHONY in C minor.

I. Molto sostenuto; Allegro.

II. Andante.

III. Scherzo: Trio.

IV. Prelude: Allegro.

(First time.)

MOZART.

SCENE, "Ei parte" and RONDO, "Par Pietà" from Act II. of "Così fan Tutte."

TSCHAIKOWSKY.

ORCHESTRAL FANTASIA after Dante, op. 32, "Francesca da Rimini."

SCHUBERT.

SONG with ORCHESTRA, "Die Allmacht."

ELGAR.

CONCERT OVERTURE, "In the South." op. 50.
(First time.)

Soloist:

Mme. EMMA EAMES.

Then came Mr. Strube's annual composition. It was with surprise and pleasure that we noted a change in the style of this composer. Instead of seeking frightful dissonances he presented a quite intelligible work, not devoid of melody.

There was still a sufficiency (perhaps an excess) of originality, and the ingenuity of the figure treatment in the first movement, the contrasts of the variations of the last movement and the experiments in odd rhythms, kept the auditor alert through all the measures. One can commend also the "violinistic" character of the work; it is written by a man who knows exactly what is feasible upon the solo instrument.

The second movement is the best of the composition. In this Adagio the composer is in what old Weller called "a referee," and he presents some very effective passages upon the G string in a poetic manner. These Mr. Adamowski gave in an impassioned manner. In fact, all through the work Mr. Adamowski was at his very best, and the technical difficulties with which the concerto was liberally strewn did not seem to trouble him in the least.

The cadenza of the last movement was written by Mr. Gericke and was brimful of double-stopping of difficult character. Not the slightest blur or lapse from intonation was noticeable in its performance, and the finale, in which Mr. Strube has taken a leaf out of Brahms' note-book, was a technical triumph.

But the work is not a concerto. It is really a set of violin solos with orchestral accompaniment. The soloist is in the foreground almost all the time, and the impression is anything but symphonic, which ought to be the result of a true concerto. The mere interpolation of an occasional "tutti" for the orchestra does not make a work orchestral.

It might not be fair to compare the work with the concertos of Brahms or of Beethoven, but if one places it beside even the second or third concerto of Bruch our meaning will be made clear. A true concerto is an orchestral work with a thread of solo interwoven through its fabric, not a solo with an obliging orchestra in the back-ground.

Mr. Strube conducted his own work, and both soloist and composer-conductor received an ovation at its close. It was certainly well directed, superbly played, and had many moments of charm, wherefore the enthusiasm was not misplaced.

Then we all went back to "Nature" and listened to the first important piece of "programme-music" ever written,—Beethoven's "pastoral symphony." It suddenly came upon us that the first 4 notes of this symphony are practically the same figure as the first notes of D'Indy's string quartette. Beethoven, however, does not wear them quite so threadbare as the modern Frenchman. A word of praise must be spoken for the clearness of the performance of the contrabass figure in the development.

Mr. Gericke loves the second movement

of this symphony, but we cannot help finding it a little prolix. Beethoven's brook, like Tennyson's, seems to "go on forever." Nor do we care for those final birds, which are ticketed in the score, like poultry in a shop-window, and which tootle out alone, while the rest of the orchestra pauses in breathless suspense. The case is hopeless! We have had too much of Richard Strauss brandy and Franz Liszt pepper ever to care for musical gruel again.

Mr. Gericke spared not a single repeat, even giving the exposition of the first movement twice. The Scherzo was given finely, with perhaps a trifle of too much finesse in the village dance; and the storm was the most effective part of the whole work.

How much Beethoven effected with small means! The violoncellos and contrabasses against each other in unequal groups, the blare of the trombones (only the second time that they had been used in symphony) and the piping long notes of the piccolo, made a tempest that causes one instinctively to reach for his umbrella. There has been much bad weather in music since that time; Berlioz, St. Saens, Wagner, Rossini, Verdi, and a host of others have had their little thunder-storms, but none of them have eclipsed this particular hurricane.

The fact that Beethoven causes the shepherds to appear, after the tempest, upon the clarinets and French horn, causes one to remember that he seemed ignorant of the effect of the English horn, which is "par-excellence" the shepherd's pipe of the orchestra and has been used as such by Berlioz, Rossini, Wagner, Schumann, et id genus omne. Beethoven never used the English horn in any orchestral score.

It was evident that the audience were quite in sympathy with the programme, for not only was applause very spontaneous and frequent, but everyone stayed until the weather had quite cleared up and the shepherds had finished their last notes of thanksgiving.

Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

WEBBER.

SYMPHONY in C minor.

I. Molto sostenuto; Allegro.

II. Andante.

III. Scherzo: Trio.

IV. Prelude: Allegro.

(First time.)

MOZART.

SCENE, "Ei parte" and RONDO, "Par Pietà" from Act II. of "Così fan Tutte."

TSCHAIKOWSKY.

ORCHESTRAL FANTASIA after Dante, op. 32, "Francesca da Rimini."

SCHUBERT.

SONG with ORCHESTRA, "Die Allmacht."

ELGAR.

CONCERT OVERTURE, "In the South." op. 50.

(First time.)

Soloist:

Mme. EMMA FAMES.

MME. EAMES IN BIG SYMPHONY TRIUMPH.

Great Singer Shares with
Mr. Gericke, Composer Webber and Orchestra in Honors of Memorable Concert

TSCHAIKOWSKI, TOO,
WINS ENTHUSIASM

By Kent Perkins.

Mme. Emma Eames, as soloist, and a programme of superb music, played with finish and gusto, remarkable even for the Symphony Orchestra, drew a throng that filled Symphony Hall to its utmost capacity last night at the tenth concert of the season, furnished a harmonic banquet that will long linger in the memories of those privileged to enjoy it, and roused the great audience to a pitch of enthusiasm seldom looked down upon by the cool, white figures that adorn the cornice of the hall.

The orchestral part of the programme was strongly characterized by its melodic richness and the direct and powerful appeal of its music to the general heart. It moved throughout on a lofty plane, yet was clothed in the simplicity of real art. It exploded no freakish school, yet was distinctly modern and expressed in cadence and harmony of the nature to which the Caucasian race has been musically accustomed by centuries of development. Consequently it went straight to the mark.

Eames Aided General Splendor.

Mme. Eames contributed nobly to the general impression of splendor by the excellence of the selections she chose and the magnificence of her singing.

The programme consisted of Amherst Webber's symphony in C minor, played here for the first time; scene, "El parte" and Rondo, "Par Pleta" from Act II. of "Cosi fan tutte," by Mozart, Mme. Eames; Tschaiakowsky's orchestral fantasia after Dante, op. 32, "Francesca da Rimini"; Schubert's song with orchestra, "Die Allmacht," Mme. Eames, and Sir Edward W. Elgar's concert overture, "In the South," op. 50, played here for the first time.

Mr. Webber, who is an Englishman, was born in France, educated in music in Germany, France and England, and has worked at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. Naturally his music is cosmopolitan, yet shows German influence. His symphony, which was first performed at Warsaw in October of last year, is a noble production from beginning to end. It is tinged with a shade of melancholy, but this is shaken off with abundant action toward the end, and it is made rich and strong with a fine use of bass harmonies and a skilful employment of the wood wind instruments. It received a remarkably warm tribute of spontaneous applause, which reached its climax when the composer was discovered in the balcony with the aid of a gesture from Mr. Gericke and came forward to bow his appreciation.

Chief Honors to Tschaiakowsky.

In spite of the admiration roused by the symphony the chief orchestral honors went to the Tschaiakowsky fantasia. The orchestra veritably outdid itself in expressing the whirling clouds of tortured souls in Inferno, their remorse, their walls, their deathless sufferings, and the passionate story told in ravishing melody by Francesca. Mr. Gericke was forced to bow again and again to the whirlwind of plaudits that rivalled in intensity the emotional blizzards his players had just portrayed, and finally the whole orchestra had to rise to receive its meed of praise.

Schubert's adoring hymn to the Almighty was sung by Mme. Eames with glorious power, beauty and exalted fervor, and the enthusiasm she evoked nearly equalled that roused by the Tschaiakowsky piece.

Elgar's florid and harmonious overture, picturing the joy and loveliness of life in Italy, with reminiscences of the stern power and glory of Rome, was in mighty company, and would have suffered much by contrast to its fellows if it had not possessed sterling merits of its own and offered a pleasing offset to the more strenuous numbers that preceded it.

CARNEGIE GIFT

Century old. It is a landmark, three-quarters of a century old. The building is from $400,000 to $500,000. The contents are valued at $100,000. The building is owned by Samuel Mottson, whose place is owned by the Carnegie Foundation. The building is a room in the second story of the Commercial House, burning down the roof and ruining the building. The building is a landmark, three-quarters of a century old.

Elgar's overture, "In the South," a title that as applied to this work is not wholly individual, was the most satisfying product of this composer that has been heard in this country. It is in technical construction an object lesson and pleases also by its euphony.

Mme. Emma Eames was heard in scene and rondo from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutti" and in Schubert's song, "The Almighty." She sang better than her recent concert here, but in neither selection achieved distinction.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

A BRILLIANT SYMPHONY CONCERT YESTERDAY

A Masterpiece of Tschaikovski's, Elgar's Italian Overture and a New and Unpretentious Symphony—Many Concerts Next Week—The Month's Calendar—Runciman Writes Sensibly of Programme Music

Trans. Dec. 30, 1905
Altogether, the Symphony concert, yesterday, was the most brilliant, thus far, of the series. One of the masterpieces of the music of our time, Tschaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," was played in a fashion that revealed much of its pictorial and imaginative power, something of the passionate creative instinct behind it, and all of its tonal bite and beauty. For the first time we in Boston heard the eager, changeful and richly colored overture, "In the South," to which Italy, and spring in Italy, inspired Elgar. A new symphony by a young Englishman, Amherst Webber, disclosed, and very unexpectedly, a composer who was content to please the ear and the fancy—the rarest of reserves among the strenuous young symphonists, big with ideas and ambitions, of today. Finally an eminent singer from the Metropolitan Opera House, Mme. Eames, sang with all her singular individuality of tone and purity of phrasing in an air from Mozart and with a new breadth of voice and manner in Schubert's "Almighty." No audience on a Friday afternoon, since the concerts of the winter began, has applauded so often, spontaneously, and heartily. After Tschaikovsky's fantasia it had Mr. Gericke bowing at least half as many times as it had Mme. Eames after her singing.

Perhaps this was taken that here in Boston at least "Francesca da Rimini," hissed and hooted once in stupid Berlin, has come into its own. Some of Tschaikovsky's music—and most of all his "Pathetic" symphony—has been played so persistently that every shortcoming in it seems to glare at the listener. As much of it is coming with familiarity to seem only sound and fury with the inevitable contrasts and reactions—more illustrative of the Slav temperament and the peculiar phases of it in Tschaikovsky than of the art of music large and naked. But his orchestral fantasias, which are really symphonic poems, hold their own and heighten it. Repetition has not staled them. Tschaikovsky's imagination and invention rarely flag in them. They seem indeed to lift him out of himself. In many respects, moreover, they are models of what such descriptive music should be—largely yet poignantly delineative, pliant yet not splintering the logic of musical form and development, surcharged with imagination, yet giving all that it kindles rich and legitimate expression in the normal terms of potent melody, striking harmonies, and significant modulations. Perhaps it was cold baths, as Tschaikovsky, often absorbed in his physical well-being, wrote in a letter. Perhaps it was the fires, as his brother hints, that a first hearing of "Carmen" lighted in him. But certainly "Francesca" at each new hearing seems the most inspired of all these fantasias—one of the authentic and enduring achievements of the music of our time.

Not in Berlin or in Paris has the large delineative power of music, its power to summon atmosphere and to suggest what may not be spoken or written or wrought in paint or marble so poignantly, been carried higher than in the wind-lashed, shuddering, shivering, tortured hell that begins Tschaikovsky's tone-poem. The bitter winds streak and smite through the long crescendos. Pale averted ghosts flitter and gibber in the figuration. And then Francesca and Paolo come entwined, their pain forgetting in the joy of their embrace, in that wonderful melody for clarinet and violins—the climax of Tschaikovsky's melodic invention—that suggests them, the longing of them, the tragedy of them, the faint background of the garden where they read and kissed, and the wan awakening when Lancelotto came. Give but the title for a clew and some faint notion of the tale, some little spark of answering imagination, and the suggestive power and the searching beauty of music can hardly go further. And with superb sense of imaginative contrast it is a darker and louder-moaning hell that Tschaikovsky sends to close over them: Our orchestra, and especially Mr. Grisez in the clarinet melody, seemed often to seize and impart his very imaginings.

It fares ill with music, unless it all be masterpieces, that stands side by side with "Francesca da Rimini" on a concert programme, and it fared especially ill yesterday with Elgar's new overture. To put it prosaically, a year ago last spring Sir Edward "ran down" from London to Italy. Everyone who has ever done it knows the downright elation of leaving London on a gray, wet morning and emerging the next afternoon in a warm flood of Italian sky and sunshine. You must do something, if it is only to jump up and down, in the sheer elation of it all. Sir Edward naturally betook himself to music-making, and the joy that was warm within him speaks in the beginning of the overture. (In form it is very free, indeed—a loose series of thematic sequences with an occasional long-drawn melody.) Then he began to take thought of the Italy around him and also—it is easy to suspect—of the Italy of poetry, old and new. It is a land where gentle shepherds pipe. They shall and do in an episode of the overture. It is a land where Caesars and their armies strode up and down, and stride they do through many long pages of music paper slashingly and weightily. It is a land of melancholy retrospects. Shall we muse upon its contrasts in fine-drawn and slowly-curving plaintive melody? But, after all, it is the land of the joy of life and light, and so the long overture

MME. EAMES IN BIG SYMPHONY TRIUMPH.

Boston American — Dec. 31, 1905

Great Singer Shares with
Mr. Gericke, Composer Web-
ber and Orchestra in Honors of Memorable Concert

TSCHAIKOWSKI, TOO,
WINS ENTHUSIASM

By Kent Perkins.

Mme. Emma Eames, as soloist, and a programme of superb music, played with finish and gusto, remarkable even for the Symphony Orchestra, drew a throng that filled Symphony Hall to its utmost capacity last night at the tenth concert of the season, furnished a harmonic banquet that will long linger in the memories of those privileged to enjoy it, and roused the great audience to a pitch of enthusiasm seldom looked down upon by the cool, white figures that adorn the cornice of the hall.

The orchestral part of the programme was strongly characterized by its melodic richness and the direct and powerful appeal of its music to the general heart. It moved throughout on a lofty plane, yet was clothed in the simplicity of real art. It exploded no freakish school, yet was distinctly modern and expressed in cadence and harmony of the nature to which the Caucasian race has been musically accustomed by centuries of development. Consequently it went straight to the mark.

Eames Aided General Splendor.

Mme. Eames contributed nobly to the general impression of splendor by the excellence of the selections she chose and the magnificence of her singing.

The programme consisted of Amherst Webber's symphony in C minor, played here for the first time; scene, "El parte" and Rondo, "Par Pieta" from Act II. of "Così fan Tutte," by Mozart, Mme. Eames; Tchaikovsky's orchestral fantasia after Dante, op. 32, "Francesca da Rimini"; Schubert's song with orchestra, "Die Allmacht," Mme. Eames, and Sir Edward W. Elgar's concert overture, "In the South," op. 50, played here for the first time.

Mr. Webber, who is an Englishman, was born in France, educated in music in Germany, France and England, and has worked at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. Naturally his music is cosmopolitan, yet shows German influence. His symphony, which was first performed at Warsaw in October of last year, is a noble production from beginning to end. It is tinged with a shade of melancholy, but this is shaken off with abundant action toward the end, and it is made rich and strong with a fine use of bass harmonies and a skillful employment of the wood wind instruments. It received a remarkably warm tribute of spontaneous applause, which reached its climax when the composer was discovered in the balcony with the aid of a gesture from Mr. Gericke and came forward to bow his appreciation.

Chief Honors to Tchaikowsky.

In spite of the admiration roused by the symphony the chief orchestral honors went to the Tchaikowsky fantasia. The orchestra veritably outdid itself in expressing the whirling clouds of tortured souls in Inferno, their remorse, their walls, their deathless sufferings, and the passionate story told in ravishing melody by Francesca. Mr. Gericke was forced to bow again and again to the whirlwind of plaudits that rivalled in intensity the emotional blizzards his players had just portrayed, and finally the whole orchestra had to rise to receive its meed of praise.

Schubert's adoring hymn to the Almighty was sung by Mme. Eames with

NOVELTIES AT THE SYMPHONY

Traveller

A splendid performance of Tchaikowsky's tone poem, "Francesca da Rimini," was the feature of the 10th symphony concert. It was adequate at all points, and the fantasia was given a reading that brought forth such long-continued applause that the audience was not to be satisfied until the entire orchestra and Mr. Gericke rose in acknowledgment.

Amherst Webber's symphony in C minor was given for the first time in America. It is a work written along classically serene lines and bears no touch of the tumultuous, fevered grasp for musical sensation. It was heard with pleasure.

Elgar's overture, "In the South," a title that as applied to this work is not wholly individual, was the most satisfying product of this composer that has been heard in this country. It is in technical construction an object lesson and pleases also by its euphony.

Mme. Emma Eames was heard in scene and rondo from Mozart's "Così fan tutti" and in Schubert's song, "The Almighty." She sang better than her recent concert here, but in neither selection achieved distinction.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

A BRILLIANT SYMPHONY CONCERT YESTERDAY

A Masterpiece of Tchaikovsky's, Elgar's Italian Overture and a New and Unpretentious Symphony—Many Concerts Next Week—The Month's Calendar—Runciman Writes Sensibly of Programme Music

Trans.

Dec. 30, 1905

Altogether, the Symphony concert, yesterday, was the most brilliant, thus far, of the series. One of the masterpieces of the music of our time, Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," was played in a fashion that revealed much of its pictorial and imaginative power, something of the passionate creative instinct behind it, and all of its tonal bite and beauty. For the first time we in Boston heard the eager, changeful and richly colored overture, "In the South," to which Italy, and spring in Italy, inspired Elgar. A new symphony by a young Englishman, Amherst Webber, disclosed, and very unexpectedly, a composer who was content to please the ear and the fancy—the rarest of reserves among the strenuous young symphonists, big with ideas and ambitions, of today. Finally an eminent singer from the Metropolitan Opera House, Mme. Eames, sang with all her singular individuality of tone and purity of phrasing in an air from Mozart and with a new breadth of voice and manner in Schubert's "Almighty." No audience on a Friday afternoon, since the concerts of the winter began, has applauded so often, spontaneously, and heartily. After Tchaikovsky's fantasia it had Mr. Gericke bowing at least half as many times as it had Mme. Eames after her singing.

Perhaps this was taken that here in Boston at least "Francesca da Rimini," hissed and hooted once in stupid Berlin, has come into its own. Some of Tchaikovsky's music—and most of all his "Pathetic" symphony—has been played so persistently that every shortcoming in it seems to glare at the listener. As much of it is coming with familiarity to seem only sound and fury with the inevitable contrasts and reactions—more illustrative of the Slav temperament and the peculiar phases of it in Tchaikovsky than of the art of music large and naked. But his orchestral fantasias, which are really symphonic poems, hold their own and heighten it. Repetition has not staled them. Tchaikovsky's imagination and invention rarely flag in them. They seem indeed to lift him out of himself. In many respects, moreover, they are models of what such descriptive music should be—largely yet poignantly delineative, pliant yet not splintering the logic of musical form and development, surcharged with imagination, yet giving all that it kindles rich and legitimate expression in the normal terms of potent melody, striking harmonies, and significant modulations. Perhaps it was cold baths, as Tchaikovsky, often absorbed in his physical well-being, wrote in a letter. Perhaps it was the fires, as his brother hints, that a first hearing of "Carmen" lighted in him. But certainly "Francesca" at each new hearing seems the most inspired of all these fantasias—one of the authentic and enduring achievements of the music of our time.

Not in Berlin or in Paris has the large delineative power of music, its power to summon atmosphere and to suggest what may not be spoken or written or wrought in paint or marble so poignantly, been carried higher than in the wind-lashed, shuddering, shivering, tortured hell that begins Tchaikovsky's tone-poem. The bitter winds streak and smite through the long crescendos. Pale averted ghosts flitter and gibber in the figuration. And then Francesca and Paolo come entwined, their pain forgetting in the joy of their embrace, in that wonderful melody for clarinet and violins—the climax of Tchaikovsky's melodic invention—that suggests them, the longing of them, the tragedy of them, the faint background of the garden where they read and kissed, and the wan awakening when Lanciotto came. Give but the title for a clew and some faint notion of the tale, some little spark of answering imagination, and the suggestive power and the searching beauty of music can hardly go further. And with superb sense of imaginative contrast it is a darker and louder-moaning hell that Tchaikovsky sends to close over them. Our orchestra, and especially Mr. Grisez in the clarinet melody, seemed often to seize and impart his very imaginings.

It fares ill with music, unless it all be masterpieces, that stands side by side with "Francesca da Rimini" on a concert programme, and it fared especially ill yesterday with Elgar's new overture. To put it prosaically, a year ago last spring Sir Edward "ran down" from London to Italy. Everyone who has ever done it knows the downright elation of leaving London on a gray, wet morning and emerging the next afternoon in a warm flood of Italian sky and sunshine. You must do something, if it is only to jump up and down, in the sheer elation of it all. Sir Edward naturally betook himself to music-making, and the joy that was warm within him speaks in the beginning of the overture. (In form it is very free, indeed—a loose series of thematic sequences with an occasional long-drawn melody.) Then he began to take thought of the Italy around him and also—it is easy to suspect—of the Italy of poetry, old and new. It is a land where gentle shepherds pipe. They shall and do in an episode of the overture. It is a land where Cæsars and their armies strode up and down, and stride they do through many long pages of music paper slashingly and weightily. It is a land of melancholy retrospects. Shall we muse upon its contrasts in fine-drawn and slowly-curving plaintive melody? But, after all, it is the land of the joy of life and light, and so the long overture ends as it began.

An ingenious and imaginative series of mood-pictures, but rather too ingenious to seem quite spontaneous, except at the beginning. Listening brought little of the sense of a burning creative instinct behind as did the hearing of Tschalkovsky's tone-poem. Elgar made his overture. Strenuously he seeks melodies, but they are either short-breathed or long-winded. They will not stand—the miracle of that clarinet melody aside—beside the Russian's inventions. Intricate is Elgar's score, far more intricate than all Tschalkovsky's chromatics, and very richly and variously, even gorgeously, colored. But often it leaves a persistent impression of bright scrappiness, as though we listeners were looking into an instrumental kaleidoscope with Elgar turning it very briskly. It is all interesting; the beginning, the end and the striding Romans are great fun to hear, but it is not Elgar at his best.

Mr. Webber with his symphony was in very good company indeed and by simplicity and unpretentiousness held his place in it. These are the days of strenuous young composers who would put the universe—or a little less—into their first symphonies, and in a new form besides. Mr. Webber is content with the traditional structure and sequence of a symphony. He is academic by free choice, but very seldom dryly so. Still more is he content with themes that are only tonal fancies without any hint of that besetting universe and its woes in them or in their development. Like our Mr. Strube a week ago in his new violin concerto, Mr. Webber seems only to seek spontaneity, pleasant fancy and charm. Often he gains them. He has written a short, light, continent and graceful symphony that is agreeable musical entertainment. Such entertainment is worth the having, but very rarely in these days will these mighty young symphonists deign to give it us. There is individuality in this willingness and still more in one curious trait of Mr. Webber's music. At a first hearing it is a temptation at least to call his an operatic symphony. He has spent much of his working years in opera houses in New York and in London, and as our ears heard them yesterday, there was distinct operatic cut and flavor in his melodies and his treatment of them. A sort of romance (Andante) makes the slow movement of the symphony. It seemed mainly the broad, luscious cantilena dear to romantic tenors. It is easy to fancy vague tinkling echoes of ballet music here and there in the bright, delicate scherzo. The dark introduction to the final movement might prefigure a tragic scene of music-drama, and now and again is there a faint smell of the footlights in the first? Rubinstein wrote a "dramatic" symphony. Perhaps Mr. Webber, and unconsciously, has written an "operatic" one. H. T. P.

EAMES SOLOIST, NEW SYMPHONY

Tenth Rehearsal of Symphony Orchestra Today—Will Include Webber's and El-gar's Compositions.

Herold Dec. 27, 1906

The 10th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be in Symphony Hall this afternoon. Mr. Gericke will conduct. The programme will include a symphony in C minor by Amherst Webber, Tschalkovsky's impressive "Francesca da Rimini," an orchestral Fantasia after Dante, and Elgar's "In the South" overture.

Mr. Webber is an Englishman, though he was born at Cannes. He was educated musically at Dresden and Paris, and he afterward took a musical degree as well as the degree of M. A. at Oxford. He was for some years répétiteur at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and at Covent Garden in London, which is his dwelling place. It may be remembered that he was pianist for Mme. Eames at her concert here not long ago. Mr. Webber has written a one-act opera which was produced successfully at the Waldorf Theatre, London, toward the end of the last musical season. This symphony, composed about three years ago, has been played at a Philharmonic concert in Warsaw. The performance this afternoon will be the first in America. The symphony is written in orthodox form and it is simple and unpretentious.

Elgar's overture will be played for the first time in this city. It was played in Chicago and in New York in the fall of 1904. The composer, sojourning in Italy, mused on the ancient glory and the present beauty of that country and was moved to composition. The overture is of an ultra modern nature and is scored sumptuously.

Mme. Eames will appear for the third time at these concerts—her first appearance was as the soprano of a quartet in Schumann's music to "Manfred," before she went to Paris to study with Mme. Marchesi. She will sing this afternoon the scene and rondo from act 2 of Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" and Schubert's "The Almighty."

The programme of the concerts of next week will include Rubin Goldmark's overture to "Hilawatha," Beethoven's violin concerto (Mr. Hess violinist), Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D major. There will be no concerts on Jan. 12, 13, for the orchestra will be on its third trip. The programme of the concerts of Jan. 19 and 20 will include Chausson's symphony (first time), Beethoven's piano concerto in E flat major (Miss aus der Ohe pianist) and Glazounoff's "Kremlin" (first time).

Mme. Eames at the Symphony Concert—

From A Tribute to the Band Jan. 1-06

Mme. Eames's voice is the most individual voice among all our eminent singers. It is easy to imagine, in the ripeness of time, a successor to Sembrich with a voice as brilliant and as finely capable of the essential virtues and the glowing ornaments of song. Other singers have had, other singers will have, the youthful freshness, the resonant energy that are among Gadski's best traits. Nordica's is—or was—a dramatic soprano in the full glories of ripe and practised maturity, but a conventional maturity after all. No voice, however, of our time has sounded quite like Eames's, and it flatters us who take our pleasure in that individuality, to fancy that no voice ever will. Her tones, for example, seem singularly disembodied. They convey little sense of a distinct personality behind. They are absolute music of the voice, so to say, writing itself on the air. They give the delight of pure sound. And in those disembodied tones is as singularly crystalline a quality. If sound may be compared to light, the impression as one listens is akin to that of clear autumn sunshine on a still day. Mme. Eames's tones are as effortless, as transparent, clear and shadowless. They fill the ear without sense of beginning or end, of edge or joint, as that autumn sunlight fills the eye. They are curiously translucent. The lights of the composer's melodies, moods and ornament, play through Mme. Eames's tones as through some clear, finely cut and translucent precious stone. When she sang the air from Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte" at the Symphony concert Saturday night, the music seemed now to touch the bright facets of her voice, and again to pour its radiance through the whole clear crystal of it. When she sang Schubert's "Die Allmacht," his inspiration flooded and warmed that crystal. For the moment Schubert's was the pure essence of praise, almost the "music of the spheres" that Rubenstein calculated to make, as though one could calculate such music, and that Schubert made all unwittingly—when it is sung in such tones as Mme. Eames's.

The singer should have been the heroine of the concert. She would, but for Tschalkovsky's "Francesca" and the conductor's and the orchestra's playing of it. They rose high on Friday afternoon. They outstripped themselves Saturday night. They played as though the imaginings that burned in the Russian as he wrote, burned also in them and leaped to full expression. Of the mastery of the medium that made such expression possible, there was properly no thought until the morning after. Add such a reading of such music to "The Death and Transfiguration" that Mr. Gericke gave us in Strauss's tone poem earlier in the season, and to his playing of Siegfried's apotheosis in "Götterdämmerung," and it is time to have done with the complaint that our conductor has not the imagination, the power, the fire that ultra-modern music demands. He has them now by every sign and—what is as much—an orchestra that can achieve all to which they move him. It was good to see the audience call every man of it to his feet. H. T. P.

Mme. Eames of the Metropolitan Opera will be the singer at the tenth pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday night; a new symphony will be played for the first time in America; and an overture by Elgar for the first time in Boston, making altogether a promisingly interesting programme. When Mme. Eames sang here two weeks ago, she denied us Mozart, though she sings the music of no other composer more admirably. Next week, however, she will sing a rondo from his "Cosi Fan Tutti." Her other number—to suit her new largeness of style—is Schubert's "Die Allmacht" in its orchestral setting. Amherst Webber, a young Englishman, is the composer of the new symphony. He came to America first as one of the répétiteurs of the Metropolitan Opera House, and this winter he has been Mme. Eames's accompanist. He has written some pleasant songs, and a little opera in the old Italian style that was sung in London last summer. His symphony, too, has been played in Warsaw. Elgar's overture, "In the South," is the music to which a visit to Italy a year ago last spring inspired him. There is the joy of light and sunshine, after the gray damp of an English winter, in it; musings over the ruins that recall the Italy of Roman emperors and imperial armies, pastoral contrasts and throughout rich and individual instrumentation. The remaining number of the programme is Tschalkovsky's glowing symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini," the only moving and enduring translation of the tale of the lovers of the garden into music. It is more than safe to say that it will outshine all the rest of the programme.

On Thursday evening, in Sanders Theatre, the orchestra gives the third concert of its series in Cambridge. Schumann's first symphony, that Mr. Gericke played so thrillingly a few weeks ago; Liszt's "Tasso," Professor Paine's pagan prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes, and Grieg's concerto for piano in A minor, make the programme. In the concerto, Mr. George Proctor plays the pianoforte part.

ist:

EAMES.

PLAY SYMPHONY NEW TO BOSTON

Herald Dec 3, 1905
Orchestra at Tenth Concert
Gives Work Written a Few Years Ago by Amherst
Webber, an Englishman.

The programme of the 10th concert given last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Symphony Hall, was as follows:
Symphony in C minor.....Webber
Scene and rondo from "Cosi fan tutte" Mozart
"Francesca da Rimini".....Tchaikowsky
Song, "The Almighty".....Schubert
Overture, "In the South".....Elgar

The symphony and the overture were played for the first time in Boston; the symphony, played for the first time in this country, was composed in England about three years ago, and it was performed at Warsaw in October 1904.

Mr. Amherst Webber is an Englishman. He was born at Cannes; he studied music at Dresden and Paris; he took a musical degree as well as the degree of M. A. at Oxford; he has been a repetiteur in London and New York opera houses; he has written an opera, which was produced successfully last June, and when he was about 35 years old he girded up his loins and said to himself: "Lo, I will write a symphony." Nor was there any one to shake his determination.

Few composers have the patience to wait, as Brahms did, till they are 43 before they allow the public to know their first symphony. When we studied music in certain German cities we gazed awestruck at long-haired youths who had composed at least one symphony apiece, and we remember in Munich a singularly gifted being who confided to us after he had put down two or three quartets of beer that he had written three symphonies, each one of them a masterpiece, but for some reason Hermann Levi would not produce any one of them, and he hinted at something revengeful and sinister in the conductor's refusal. The years have slipped away and the dust must now be thick on those inspired manuscripts, if the amiable enthusiasts themselves are not now dust.

The young composer today when he feels urged by the demon within him to write an orchestral work chooses, as a rule, a subject for a symphonic poem. He wishes to paint in tones a legend, heroic episode, moving tale or to translate a picture or a statue or a cathedral into music. (We have often wondered why no one has chosen "The Stock Exchange" for a title, with a generative theme typical of greed, and with a tragic ending, which for dramatic purposes would have more significance than an auriferous apothecia.) But Mr. Webber in spite of his foreign education and associations is an Englishman at heart and naturally conservative. Who has not known young English artists in Paris, resolute against any temptation of the impressionists and making innumerable sketches for "Orpheus and Eurydice" or "Orestes Pursued by the Furies" to be painted in the good old classical manner?

Mr. Webber said of his symphony: It is written so much on traditional lines that any synopsis for the benefit of an audience would be superfluous. A long discussion of the merits and failings of the work itself would also be superfluous, for the symphony is evidently by a man who has melodic fertility and certain symphonic ideas; but his melody is not often distinguished and he is not yet able to carry out fully his ideas or to express them with conviction. In the first movement, for instance, there is thematic material to serve amply a skilful technician's purpose, but in working out this material there is repetition with modifications rather than true and logical development.

There is the intention, the purpose; there are some excellent ideas; there are here and there effective colors and contrasts of colors, but the movement is episodic, the music is at times thin, and it limps. The second movement, which is practically a romance, has a prettiness that recalls to us the favorite exhibition piece of the best pianist in the village where we spent our boyhood. This piece was entitled "Moonlight on the Hudson." It was a sweet thing, and the pianist, a rather elderly maiden with a long curl, took off her rings before she began to play.

The scherzo has the elements of immediate and passing popularity, and in the finale Mr. Webber shows, perhaps too plainly, that he has written exercises in fugue.

We have no sympathy with those who assail a composer because he comes before the public with a first symphony. No doubt Mr. Webber will compose a better one, now that he has heard his first. He is a modest man, and he probably judges his own work more severely today than do they who are not so much interested in it. Let him remember that a distinction may be made between a tune and a melody. Mr. Vernon Blackburn once defined the former as a melody that is over-ripe.

The themes in this symphony are occasionally tunes, and there are whole pages that might well go into an opera. The audience was well disposed, and Mr. Webber bowed in acknowledgment of the applause.

Tchaikowsky, it seems, was not wholly satisfied with his wind-storm music in "Francesca da Rimini," but he expressed his disappointment before he had orchestrated the pages. He composed the fantasia "with love," and he believed that this love for the work had brought success.

The fantasia is familiar to the Symphony audience, but never has it been played here with so much dramatic intensity, and never has it seemed so emotionally impressive. It is not a flawless work, and as a whole it must be ranked below the composer's "Romeo and Juliet," and his fifth symphony; but what a wealth of imagination there is in it! What directness and poignancy of appeal! Two of the chief characteristics of the man are revealed in this music; his grim and murky despair at the thought of the question of all questions; his ineffable tenderness when reminded of the woe of any human being.

The performance of this fantasia was the chief feature of the concert, and it is a pleasure to record the fact that the applause was spontaneous and long continued so that Mr. Gericke was forced to bow again and again in acknowledgment, nor was the audience satisfied until the orchestra had risen from the seats. Conductor and players richly deserved the tribute.

Some months ago President Hadley of Yale University, in giving an honorary degree to Sir Edward Elgar, characterized him in a loud and manly voice as the greatest living musician, not knowing that Mr. Humperdinck would be in New York in December, and might possibly visit New Haven to hold sweet communion with a critic of such force, insight and discrimination. An English musician should not be disregarded and put aside simply because he has been knighted and given honorary degrees. These honors, it is true, have put Elgar in a class to be viewed always with suspicion, but he may yet rise above the inevitable rewards of conventional mediocrity in art.

No work by him that has been performed here explains the extraordinary pother made in England, where many hail him as greater than Richard Strauss, and some speak of him as a modern and improved Bach. In the more important compositions that we have heard there are pages which show an indisputable talent, but there is also much that is inherently commonplace, much that is sentimental, much that is peculiarly dull, dull with an Elgarian dulness. He is certainly skilled in the art of orchestration. His vocabulary is rich and highly colored, and there is often a marked incongruity between the rapid or jejune or maudlin thought and its expression.

This overture, we are told by those near Sir Edward, is intended to suggest the joy of living in Italy with its historic past and its present beauty. The music, then, should be both pictorial and suggestive. According to Mr. Jaeger's analysis, there is the melancholy produced by "contemplating the contrast between the eternal rejuvenescence of nature and the instability of man's greatest and proudest achievements"; the Roman legions enter and do their duty; there is a "lonely shepherd's plaintive song floating toward the serene azure of the Italian sky"; there are many other things, among them a motto-phrase which stands throughout the overture for "Sunshine, the Open Air and Cheery Optimist."

While "In the South" does not deserve the extravagant eulogies provoked by the first performance in London, it nevertheless is an unusually well constructed work, with passages of genuine eloquence. Perhaps the most disappointing episode is that said to be suggested by the thought of the Roman legions—the episode that reminded Mr. Blackburn—who worships Sir Edward—of the famous sentence in Sir Thomas Browne's "Urn Burial."

Here Sir Thomas and Mr. Blackburn himself rose to far more imaginative height than Sir Edward. But Elgar is seldom, if ever, imaginative. He at times has fancy—which is not the same thing. Judging from the purely technical standpoint, this overture is often masterly. Furthermore, it is remarkably euphonic, both in massive effects and in charming detail—as in the episode in which the solo viola was beautifully played by Mr. Ferris.

On the whole this overture is by far the most interesting orchestral work by Elgar that we have heard, not so much from any distinction in thematic material, but from the use of this material and by reason of a breadth and spontaneity of thought that we miss in his other works.

Who, however, hearing the overture, would have thought that Italy was in the composer's mind, had it not been for the assurance given by Elgar's commentators?

The performance was admirable in all respects; but such performances are now the rule, not the exception, under Mr. Gericke's baton.

Mme. Eames sang Fiordiligi's scene and rondo from the second act of "Cosi fan tutte" and Schubert's "The Almighty." She is a lyric, not dramatic soprano and this song of Schubert is not for her. A woman must have a powerful voice, one that is powerful without effort, in elemental nature, and dramatic authority to make this declamation effective.

Her technical performance was better in certain respects than when she sang here recently in concert, yet it was not what we have a right to expect from this singer, and young students hearing her last night could learn by noticing what to avoid.

Nevertheless, her technical shortcomings might have been pardoned or ignored, had she shown an active mind or a sympathetic soul in her interpretation of the Scene and Rondo. There was little or no interpretation. Her performance was unintelligent; it was wellich heartless. The nearer thought of the ancient orator on whose lips icicles formed while he was speaking.

Mme. Eames was heartily applauded.

"Hiccup!"

MUSICAL MATTERS

Emma Eames With Symphony Orchestra.

Amherst Webber's C minor symphony and Sir Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South," were the orchestral novelties of the 10th Symphony program. Mme Emma Eames was the soloist in vocal compositions by Mozart and Schubert. Tchaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia completed the list of selections. Mr Webber is a young English musician who was here a few weeks ago as accompanist with Mme Eames' concert company, and several of his smaller compositions, mainly songs, have been received with favor in this country. The symphony played by our orchestra is new to this country and is

Mr Webber's first attempt at a work on so large a scale. It is in four short movements and, according to the author, "is written so much on traditional lines that a synopsis would be superfluous." The symphony is a creditable piece of work for so young a musician, and although there are frequent thin places in the instrumentation, the scoring generally is effective. There is not much in the first movement that indicates originality in ideas or musical expression; but in the second movement the treatment of the cello part is worthy of special mention, and in fact the string scoring throughout shows considerable skill. The scherzo is rather vague in form, and the finale is excellent not only in outline but in development and instrumentation. Mr Webber has "told his story" pleasingly and is to be congratulated for his good work. The performance by the orchestra was satisfactory, and after each movement the applause was very hearty.

Elgar's overture, "In the South," is a bright and cheery piece of music, suggesting balmy skies, pastoral joys, shepherds and their flocks, some turbulent episodes and a generally exuberant spirit which is illustrated by ever varying tempos and combinations of instruments that make up a brilliant descriptive work. It is delightfully free in form and the elaborate score is filled with exquisite "surprises," given to the different contingents of the orchestra. The orchestra played as if inspired and closed the program in a glorious manner amid showers of plaudits. The somber atmosphere of the "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia was artistically revealed in the interpretation by Mr Gericke's forces.

Mme Eames was in better voice than when she appeared here a few weeks ago and her two contributions showed that the great artist hardly did herself justice at her former recital. She sang the Mozart aria from his almost forgotten opera, "Cosi fan Tutte," with beautiful expression and clarity of tone, although somewhat lacking in warmth. In Schubert's "Allmacht" she was not so satisfactory, for Mme Eames' voice lacks the dramatic quality required to make this song impressive. Aside from that her performance was marked by brilliancy and an almost flawless technical finish. Mme Eames was given demonstrative evidences of appreciation after each selection.

Prof Willy Hess will be the soloist at the concerts this week, the last concerts before the third monthly trip. He will play Beethoven's concerto for the violin. The other works to be performed are Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Brahms' second symphony.

TWO NOVELTIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Contributed by Englishmen to Program — Mme. Eames Appears

Twice — Tchaikowsky Work Superbly Rendered.

The tenth Symphony concert was notable for its two novelties, both, curiously enough, by Englishmen. One was a full-fledged symphony, the work of Amherst Webber, a man whose name had never before been seen on our programs as a composer. The work is frankly a return to the placidity and classicism of the Brahms style; no attempt is made to stun or even to surprise; no strivings for the tumultuous orchestration or the impressionistic tone-color of today's moderns are to be found. The result is pleasing for its very lack of pretension, and it shows Mr. Webber to be a man of taste, a musician of accomplishments and a force that ought to be seriously reckoned with in the musical development of England.

The other Briton, the well-known and over-lauded Elgar, was represented by his overture "In the South." The work might bear any title; it is in no way unmistakably expressive of Italy. It has much beauty, however, some passages of deep and sonorous suggestiveness and is, on the whole, the best specimen of Elgar's industry that has yet come across the ocean.

But spite of the "first-times," the great and overwhelming feature of the concert was the irresistibly emotional and splendidly virtuoso performance of Tchaikowsky's great "Francesca da Rimini" tone-poem. Never has it had such a reading in this city, and Mr. Gericke and the men themselves had to arise and bow to the enthusiasm.

Mme. Eames sang a bit from "Cosi Fan Tutti" and Schubert's "The Almighty." In neither did she appear to any special advantage.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

ad: PROGRAMME.
Amherst Webber, Symphony in C minor.
(First time.)
Mozart, Recitative and Rondo from Act II,
"Cosi fan Tutte."
Mme. Eames.
Tchaikowsky, Symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini."
Schubert, Song with orchestra "Die Allmacht."
Mme. Eames.
Elgar, Overture, "In the South."
(First time.)

When Mr. Webber recently appeared as pianist and accompanist at Mme. Eames' concert we little suspected that he had a symphony up his sleeve. But he has come back to Boston with a composition in the great epic form and has won a good success at the leading symphonic concerts of America. Were the symphony the work of one of our resident composers we should have roseate adjectives flying; but we do not get as deeply excited over the stranger within our gates.

Nevertheless, the new symphony is a worthy addition to the modern repertoire. Mr. Webber has not tried to push beyond the 24 known musical keys; he has not invented a new system of musical vagueness; he has not even discovered any new chords, or dissonances, or progressions; and he employs an orchestra that is quite moderate and conservative.

The first movement makes a good impression. After an introductory lament there enters an agitated chief theme in minor against a gentle subordinate theme in major, in excellent contrast. The closing theme is again in a perturbed and fiery vein, and brings the exposition to a well-marked ending. There is no repeat of this first section; at least none was made on Saturday. The development section was not very remarkable, although it was sorrowful even to the muted-horn point, and the recapitulation was shortened. The coda was especially effective, with some fine augmentation of the figures and an excellent climax. A brief but good Sonata-Allegro.

The slow movement, which came next, seemed the weakest part of the composition. There was some tender conversation between the violins and the violoncellos, but nothing that seemed of long breath or inspired. The scherzo shows an ease in scoring that deserves recognition. There was both impetuosity and originality in this movement, a strong contrast at the trio and an especially fine returning passage.

The finale had a chief theme that seemed as if Mephistopheles were singing his serenade in Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," but this did not weaken the movement. Here one found excellent development extending even to the fugal point, the woodwind, beginning with the bassoon, doing some contrapuntal work that was very clear and interesting.

This finale was the best movement of the entire work, and shows that there is much of promise and already much achievement in the composition of Mr. Webber. There was hearty applause, and the composer was obliged to bow his thanks from the balcony, where he sat.

We are glad to hail a new composer who is neither extreme nor radical, and we shall watch his growth with interest. Such a symphony had a good right to performance in our series, and the music dictionaries must add the name of Amherst Webber to their list.

Mme. Eames appeared to better advantage in this concert than in the recent one given in Boston. She sang the Mozart aria with much sweetness, and seems to have gained in the lower register, for her deep notes were remarkably round and full. But the high notes were not as resonant as of yore, and one suspected her of "saving her voice" all through the aria, although she sang the recitative effectively.

Mme. Eames was never a vocal spendthrift, but the economy when the alt octave was reached was too self-evident. In "bel canto" she was very smooth and tender. Her chief success, however, was made in the Schubert number.

It meant a great deal to arouse the audience to enthusiasm after the tremendous effect of the Tchaikowsky number, yet the artist did this, and did it legitimately. At the end she had reserve force enough to make a very broad and telling climax. She was recalled several times, and floral tributes were also in evidence.

"Francesca da Rimini" was a blaze of orchestral brilliancy plus musical ideas. Such music still causes us to hope that out of Russia there may yet come a physician for our ailing and suffering art of Music. It was not in the obvious effects of howling winds or fierce crashes that the triumph of the work lay, but whether in mighty climaxes or in the simplest solos there was a graphic portrayal of Dante's poem. The utter sadness of Paolo and his love, the brooding melancholy that hung over the doomed pair, from these touches to the roar of infernal tempests, every musical thought was played as if the orchestra were quite in love with the work.

Yet we may single out the passages for flute, for clarinette and for the muted violoncellos as being most nobly performed. At the end the enthusiasm of the public burst forth in a torrent; rarely have we seen such a demonstration at these concerts. After Mr. Gericke had twice acknowledged the plaudits he caused the orchestra to rise and share in the ovation, which then went up to fever heat.

We do not think for an instant that the fact that everybody took such delight in the work is proof that it is weaker music than that which cannot be understood!

Dr. Elgar shrivelled somewhat before the chromatic whirlwinds. His "In the South" is an Italian picture, but unfortunately Berlioz, Richard Strauss and Charpentier had been in Italy before him. When we heard the powerful rumblings and the fortissimo touches of the overture we did not think of ancient legions marching on the Appian Way, we only felt that the Chianti and the Fritto Misto had disagreed with the Englishman.

Even the tender viola theme, well played by Mr. Ferir, could not make headway against the glorious melodic touches of Tchaikowsky. We are certain that, had London heard this work in the same juxtaposition that we did at this concert, there would not have been so much enthusiastic writing about it.

The coda climax was the most effective portion of the composition, as it ought to be, but we scarcely feel inclined to rank this opus with Elgar's set of orchestral variation.

Louis C. Elson.

133

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- RUBIN GOLDMARK. OVERTURE to "Hiawatha."
- BEETHOVEN. CONCERTO in D minor for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA,
op. 61.
I. Allegro, ma non troppo.
II. Larghetto.
III. Rondo.
- RICHARD STRAUSS. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," op. 28.
- BRAHMS, SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 73.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi Andante.
IV. Allegro con spirito.

Soloist:

Professor WILLY HESS.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

PROF WILLY HESS
Soloist at the Boston Symphony Concert on Saturday

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |                  |   |
|------------------|---|
| RUBIN GOLDMARK.  | OVERTURE to "Hiawatha."   |
| BEETHOVEN.       | CONCERTO in D minor for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA,op. 61.I. Allegro, ma non troppo.II. Larghetto.III. Rondo.   |
| RICHARD STRAUSS. | "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," op. 28.   |
| BRAHMS,          | SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 73.I. Allegro non troppo.II. Adagio non troppo.III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi Andante.IV. Allegro con spirito. |

Soloist:

Professor WILLY HESS.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

The 11th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be in Symphony Hall this afternoon. The orchestral pieces will be Rubin Goldmark's overture to "Hiawatha," Richard Strauss' amazing rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Brahms' genial symphony in D major, No. 2. Rubin Goldmark is a nephew of the composer of "The Queen of Sheba," which is now playing at the Metropolitan Opera House, the composer of "Sakuntala" and other overtures, etc. Rubin was born in New York in 1872. He studied there and in Vienna. In 1894 he went to Colorado Springs for his health and directed a conservatory of music. This overture, in which, by the way, there is no attempt to use Indian folk-tunes as thematic material, was played here at a Symphony concert Jan. 13, 1900. Mr. Gericke announced a repetition of it a season or two ago, but for unavoidable reasons the overture was not played. A violin sonata by Mr. Goldmark, who now lives in New York, has been played here at a Kneisel concert.

Mr. Felix Weingartner, conductor, with the New York Symphony orchestra, will give a concert in Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening, the 17th. The programme will be as follows: Mendelssohn's overture to "Fingal's Cave"; Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1; Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony.

Mr. Walter Damrosch, the regular conductor of the New York Symphony orchestra, will give a concert in Symphony Hall on Thursday afternoon, the 18th, when the programme will include: Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 5, Brahms' piano concerto No. 1 (Mr. Joseffy, pianist), Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Parade de Foire and Theme Varié from Lalo's ballet "Namouna." Handwritten: Handl Jan 5-6

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

MR. HESS SURPRISES A SYMPHONY AUDIENCE

A Remarkable Performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto—The Concerts of Next Week and Weeks to Come—Mr. Converse's First Opera—Sembrich in Boston Twenty-Two Years Ago and the Transcript's Impression of Her—A Grist of Musical Miscellany

Unless Mr. Hess is a man of very continuous inspiration, he will hardly play Beethoven's concerto for violin tonight as he played it yesterday afternoon. Not often in his life—it was easy to surmise—has he played as he did then, and certainly we that have watched him for more than a year as the concert-master of our orchestra have never guessed that even at his best such mastery of the power of sound and such feeling for the beauty of it lay in him. The many that have inadequately performed it have made Beethoven's concerto a cause for doubts and fears. Of a Kreisler, a Heerman, or an Ysäye at his best, we may expect it without such trepidation. But when we see our concert-masters week after week sitting at their desk at the head of the first violins, we are prone to forget that they also are virtuosos, though they do not wander every year or two half across the world. We used to do that with Mr. Kneisel until his playing of some concerto reminded us anew of his real worth. We have had hardly time as yet to become so accustomed to Mr. Hess. We are still in a measure discovering him, and there was surprise to heighten the impression—if it were not a Symphony concert sensation would be the word—that he made yesterday. On no Friday afternoon this winter has there been such spontaneous applause, and, much more significantly, such rapt listening as rewarded him.

In solo passages in his orchestral work, and in his own quartet, Mr. Hess has taught us to expect warmth and vigor in his playing. Yesterday they rose to controlled fire that burned the whiter because it was so tempered. The best quality of his tone is its bright life. It might be broader and deeper. Now and then it even misses some of the darker colorings of the music to which it is giving being and voice. But the glow of it is unmistakable and insistent. It sparkled through the rondo that ends the concerto. It touched brilliancy in the ceaseless ornament and elaboration of the opening allegro. It spread over the larghetto like sunshine burnishing the flowing stream of a still river. It is a fine fire, clear and white, not red and smoky. And out of this fire comes a supple and responsive life that makes that tone near irresistible. When Clement played the concerto "for the first time on any stage" in Vienna nearly a hundred years ago, it could hardly have come to him more as a new and living thing than it seemed to come yesterday to Mr. Hess. At moments he touched the virtuoso's uttermost feat, the re-creation of familiar music, and he touched it chiefly by the life that was in his tone.

Like a thing of life, it bent to every curve and figure of the music. Or it flowed over long reaches of broader melody. Or it seemed to leap to meet some cascade of ornament. A hundred tonal tints flashed and sparkled, brightened or faded in it. The intensity and the suppleness of it were equally steady. And always it was transparent. It was like a mirror through which the listener saw Beethoven's music, but a mirror that gave it life and sent back emotion to them that were looking into it. Other violinists have played Beethoven's concerto more broadly, more nobly, if you will, with more of what we like to call the grand style. But there is not one to recall that has played it with such a quivering sense of the life in the music, with such a fine and penetrating fire, as did Mr. Hess. The others, maybe, "interpret" the concerto. He made it alive again with the very breath of life. To do that may even be the finer and the more difficult achievement. For it sinks the man in the music. It has been our custom to reserve the soloist at the Symphony concerts for the supplementary review of Monday. After such a performance as Mr. Hess's was yesterday, it is the orchestra's part of the concerto, though Brahms and Richard Strauss made it, that falls into second place. — H. T. P.

NEW DELIGHTS IN THE OLD MELODIES

Journal — Jan. 8, 1906

Eleventh Symphony Concert Saturday Presented Strauss, Beethoven and Brahms Works.

The eleventh Symphony concert, though devoid of any new thing, had much to please in a serene and happy way. Even Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," that once made old Music Hall audiences sit up and wonder what stuff and nonsense was being uttered by the orchestra, is now "just as easy." And the rest, was absolute placidity.

Goldmark, the younger, wrote his "Hiawatha" overture when he was travelling in the Rocky mountains, we are told. It bears no trace of any impression that the great out-of-doors might have made on a different composer. Coleridge-Taylor, the English negro, did infinitely better in flavor and suggestiveness before he had ever seen America. This work is merely a well made, pleasant overture of no distinction.

The Strauss tone-comedy grows clearer and really more beautiful with each hearing, although Saturday night's performance of it was not equal in spirit and effervescence to that of the Philadelphia orchestra last season under Strauss' own baton.

The peaceful and classic Brahms Symphony in D major made a very deep impression. Mr. Gericke is a master interpreter of the great Viennese, and his orchestra is responsive to his will, whether in this or any other work.

Mr. Hess played the Beethoven violin concerto with admirable care and taste, and was rapturously applauded.

Willy Hess, Symphony Orchestra Soloist.

Stroke ————— Day 7.06
Two Sousa Concerts—Sembrich in a Song Recital.

Kneisel Quartet — Other Events of the Week.

Concert Master Willy Hess was the soloist at the 11th Symphony rehearsal and concert, playing the Beethoven D major violin concerto. The other program numbers were the overture to Goldmark's "Hiawatha," "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss and Brahms second symphony. The Hiawatha music has little of the typical Indian peculiarities of harmony and suggestiveness of rough life in the forest, Goldmark taking a more poetic view of his subject when arranging his tone pictures. It is a cleverly written work, fragmentary in most of its thematic material, some of which is admirably developed, and interesting as a whole. The performance was smooth, the excellence of the crescendo passages in the climax being worthy of special note. The phrases given to the horns were also played with splendid tonality.

Prof Hess has established himself in a prominent position by his playing, his musical endowments having been shown in many ways since he became a member of the orchestra, and his interpretation of Beethoven's great violin concerto further increased his artistic standing in this city. The concerto, with the problematic four D sharps and three cadenzas, is a masterpiece of its kind, and the player who can interpret it in the proper spirit is an artist beyond question. Mr Hess' reading of the first movement was about as satisfying as one could expect to hear, all the ornamentations being given with a musical beauty that left little to be desired as to purity, though a little fuller tone one would have been acceptable at times. In the second movement the pianissimo figurations were never lost, and every shade of the larghetto was shown in exquisite tonal colors. The closing part was, perhaps, the most brilliantly performed, for Mr Hess exhibited an abandon and a confidence in execution that he had not previously shown. The applause with which he was greeted at the close of the performance was so prolonged that the artist was recalled a half dozen times to the stage.

Richard Strauss evidently indulged in some musical pranks when he wrote the "Till Eulenspiegel" piece, for it is full of odd and chaotic measures, rapid changes in tempo, strange modulations and freakish instrumentation, a whimsical tone puzzle that amuses—and that's about all. The proper effect was produced by Mr Gericke's men who, after a splendid performance of the concerto, showed to equal advantage in this merry trifle by the audacious Richard. The Brahms symphony was given impressively.

There will be no Symphony concerts this week, as the orchestra will be away on its third monthly trip. For the next pair of concerts, Jan 19 and 20, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe will be the soloist, playing Beethoven's E-flat major pianoforte concerto. The symphony in B-flat major, by Ernest Chausson, will be played for the first time in Boston, and Weber's "Freischütz" overture and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," will complete the program.

FAMILIAR PIECES GAVE PLEASURE

Hand —————
Symphony Concert Greatly Enjoyed—The Overture to "Hiawatha" Pleasing, but Name Not Inappropriate.

MR. HESS EXCELLENT IN BEETHOVEN CONCERTO

Played with Ease of Accomplished Virtuoso and Taste

of Sound Musician—Reisenauer Recital.

The Boston symphony orchestra gave its 11th concert last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conducted. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "Hiawatha".....Rubin Goldmark
Concerto in D Major, for violin....Beethoven
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".....

R. Strauss
Symphony in D Major, No. 2.....Brahms

This concert, though it was too long, gave great pleasure to many. Mr. Gericke has a peculiar gift for presenting Brahms in the best light, and the symphony chosen last night is one of the composer's most genial works. The Rondo, of Strauss, which, when it was performed here, seemed to many highly respectable and earnest souls the music of a madman, and to some purists the abomination of desolation, now is accepted, yea, enjoyed, and it seems simple after acquaintance with Strauss' "Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote."

Rubin Goldmark is the nephew of his uncle, and he is thus handicapped, for, hearing his music, some watch intently to find traces of the composer of the "Sakuntala" overture, and all are bound to make comparisons. The "Hiawatha" overture was played here about six years ago, but we doubt whether anyone who heard it then remembered a section or even a phrase. The first inquiry after a second hearing is "Why Hiawatha?" As far as the significance or the color of the music is concerned, the piece might better be entitled "Bajazet" or "Nali." There is no suggestion of American forest life, there is no reminder of Lo, the poor Indian. And, by the way, how would any one differentiate in music between American forest life and the forest life of another country? This seems to be a reasonable question. The first thing to be avoided, of course, is any reminder of Seigfried.

Few German composers can escape from the hero when they portray a forest scene today. As soon as they enter the wood the trees begin to weave the old familiar spell, and the hearer expects every moment to see Mime enter and hear the dragon roar. Just as when a modern German composer gives a solo phrase to an English horn, Tristan is discovered on the stage.

Mr. Goldmark does not take us into Siegfried's forest, though now and then we catch glimpses of it, but he gives us little or no suggestion of fresh and free out-door life. His themes and harmonies are oriental in their languor and sultriness rather than occidental. In this respect the mulatto Coleridge-Taylor has fared better in his treatment of Longfellow's poem, but Mr. MacDowell has been more successful in his "Indian" suite, and not because he used Indian folk-tunes for some of his thematic material, but because he had the imagination of the western mind. Mr. Goldmark is an oriental, and his musical expression is that of his family.

Let all thought of "Hiawatha" be dismissed, and the hearer may well find a mild pleasure in the overture, for the music is sonorous and euphonious, there are pleasing themes, there are climaxes, and the workmanship is solid. These qualities are readily taken by some for individuality and imagination. Let us not be misunderstood. The overture was composed when Mr. Goldmark, then not a man of robust health, was 24 years old. It was composed when he was director of a conservatory. The music under these circumstances nevertheless was highly creditable to him. But he is the nephew of his uncle.

Mr. Hess gave an excellent performance of Beethoven's concerto. Some may have wished to hear him in another concerto, and we could easily sympathize with them. It would do Beethoven's concerto no harm to put it on the shelf for several years, as far as these Symphony concerts are concerned. But no one refused to pay Mr. Hess' ready tribute for his performance. He played with the ease of the accomplished virtuoso and with the taste of the sound musician, and his triumph before the audience was complete.

We have heard "Till Eulenspiegel" played with a more marked flow of musical adventure and in a vein of more rollicking spirit. Last night there was once or twice the thought of disconnected episodes and Till taking his pleasure seriously, like Froissart's Englishmen. But with this exception the performance as a whole was orchestrally brilliant. Nor could Mr. Goldmark have complained in any respect, if he had been present, of the interpretation of his overture.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adv. PROGRAMME, Day 8.06

Rubin Goldmark, Overture, "Hiawatha."
Beethoven, Concerto for violin.
Soloist, Prof. Willy Hess.
Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel."
Brahms, Symphony No. 2.

We are glad that Mr. Rubin Goldmark did not think it necessary, in composing his "Hiawatha" overture, to seek out aboriginal themes and label them "Indian melodies." There is really nothing to exploit in the melodies or themes of the red men. Many of them are tribal rather than national music, few of them are attractive, and not one of them is familiar to the auditor, either in contents or in style, as folk-music always ought to be.

We have heard Burton's Indians, have investigated at the Trans-Mississippi exposition, have had the advantage of conference with America's greatest authority on this subject—Dr. Walter Fewkes—and have studied Baker, Fillmore, Cushing, Fletcher and Krehbiel, and believe that interesting as the Indian music may be to the ethnologist, it offers nothing substantial to the musician.

Therefore we are glad to hear a "Hiawatha" who did not present aboriginal figures. More important, however, was the lack of any Indian suggestion of any kind. "Hiawatha" might have been named "Abelard" or "George Washington" without disturbing the auditor's fancy. There was great beauty in the chief theme, and some woodland warbling in the coda, but nothing that very graphically pictured the hero as set forth by Longfellow. It was pleasing, well-formed and musically writing, promising much better things. It is discovered, to be "le neveu de son Oncle," and in this case Uncle Karl overshadows the younger Goldmark, who has, however, done better and more characteristic things than this overture.

The chief triumph of the concert was won by the soloist. After the performance of the Beethoven concerto, Prof. Willy Hess ("Willy" by the way, is not the diminutive of "William") was recalled 5 times with very great enthusiasm. He deserved the tribute. We have heard the concerto given with more breadth, but never with more ease or with better ensemble. The intonation was flawless, and the perfection of the passages in high position and the purity of the difficult phrases in double-stopping were notable. The cadenzas were the acme of brilliancy, and the orchestra throughout supported its chief violinist loyally.

The orchestral peak of the concert was "Till Eulenspiegel," which was performed with a technique that we do not believe any other orchestra in the world could have equalled. It was not made quite as broadly humorous as Strauss gives it, but the jests and gibes were clearly brought out, nevertheless, and the stately pomp of the burghers and phillistines was put in good contrast with the squeaking figure of the arch-rogue, who was as lively as the Irishman's flea.

There is genius in every measure of this work, which is one of the strongest justifications of programme-music in existence. One requires no printed book to follow the chief points of this story—the music tells it all. The shrill mockery of Till, the pomposity of some of his enemies, the wild cries of "catch him!" after one of his pranks, the village dance, the final capture, the sentence to death, the doleful walls of the repentant Till, and his final squeak as his wind is cut off, all of these points are self-apparent and require no warrant from the composer, who has altered the old version which allows Till finally to cheat the gallows.

There was great applause after the performance, and Mr. Gericke and the orchestra deserve the highest praise. Very few can imagine how much of labor such a smooth performance of so difficult a work represented.

Sir Edward Elgar recently stated in one of his lectures that if Strauss chose he could give us one of the greatest of symphonies. We wish that this chief orchestral genius of the present would so choose and leave for a little while his extremes, as represented by the "Domestica" and "Salome," and give to the world one masterpiece in the good old form. When one listens to such a recent work as the second symphony of Brahms one is convinced that the lemon is by no means squeezed dry, that there is much yet to be said in the symphonic form.

The symphony received an authoritative performance in which every beauty was well conserved. Especially the third movement, rather an intermezzo than a scherzo, with its quaint wood-wind passages (not altogether unlike the Pastorale of Bach's

There was an exodus before the last part of this work. Possibly it was not to be considered as an especial "Brahms exodus," for the programme was almost a half-hour longer than usual, and suburbanites have their regular habits. But those who stayed to the end heard a glorious climax to a great work; it was altogether a masterly interpretation of a masterpiece.

Louis C. Elson.

Strauss and Brahms at the Symphony

From : Concert

We are beginning to hear a new Strauss in our orchestral concerts as some years ago we began to hear a new Wagner in our opera houses. The first generation of singing-actors that we heard in Wagner's music dramas were all for the bigness and the vehemence of them, for the large dramatic effect; however, it might be gained, rather than for the musical means. Then came the new generation of singing-actors to show us that it was precisely by these musical means that Wagner was most potent. In the same way the first Strauss that we heard at our orchestral concerts was all hugeness, violence and seeming excess, even to cacophony. You may have the acridness, the poignancy, the occasional grandeur, the mighty striving of his music, our conductors seemed to say to their audiences. The rest—but sometimes we that listened were not so sure that there was a rest. Now we know that there is, and because we know, more and more of us are coming to understand, feel and admire Strauss's music. More than any conductor in America Mr. Gericke has revealed to his audiences the intellectual weight of Strauss's music, the large design and significant proportioning of it, the pictorial effect and the melodic suggestion in it. He gives, though in less degree sometimes than other conductors, the nearly superhuman power of Strauss, but he gives also the subtleties, even the beauties, as the old poetry books used to say, of his music. Therefore he has persuaded us until his audiences last Friday and Saturday heard "Till Eulenspiegel" as comprehensive and impressive music. Clearly there was intelligent musical and emotional response to it instead of the old vague excitement and confused wonder.

Our conductor could hardly have done these things for Strauss had he not an orchestra as quick of musical understanding and as fine in musical discrimination and imagination as he. And it is by these same qualities that when he and it play a symphony of Brahms's as they did the second at the last pair of concerts, that they go to the very heart of it. There is no obscurity, no crabbedness, no lack of unity, none of the outworn reproaches to Brahms's music when they play it. They understand and feel and their audiences with them. More even; they sang their way through the second symphony, and, bright or dark, it could hardly have seemed sadder, purer, more disembodied song.

H. T. P.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

WEBER.

OVERTURE to "Freischuetz."

BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in E flat major.

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM. "Orpheus."

ERNEST CHAUSSON,

SYMPHONY in B flat major.
(First time at these concerts.)

Soloist:

Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE.

something of a handicap (as Napoleon III. discovered) to be "le neveu de son Oncle," and in this case Uncle Karl overshadows the younger Goldmark, who has, however, done better and more characteristic things than this overture.

The chief triumph of the concert was won by the soloist. After the performance of the Beethoven concerto, Prof. Willy Hess ("Willy," by the way, is not the diminutive of "William") was recalled 5 times with very great enthusiasm. He deserved the tribute. We have heard the concerto given with more breadth, but never with more ease or with better ensemble. The intonation was flawless, and the perfection of the passages in high position and the purity of the difficult phrases in double-stopping were notable. The cadenzas were the acme of brilliancy, and the orchestra throughout supported its chief violinist loyally.

The orchestral peak of the concert was "Till Eulenspiegel," which was performed with a technique that we do not believe any other orchestra in the world could have equalled. It was not made quite as broadly humorous as Strauss gives it, but the jests and gibes were clearly brought out, nevertheless, and the stately pomp of the burghers and philistines was put in good contrast with the squeaking figure of the arch-rogue, who was as lively as the Irishman's flea.

There is genius in every measure of this work, which is one of the strongest justifications of programme-music in existence. One requires no printed book to follow the chief points of this story—the music tells it all. The shrill mockery of Till, the pomposity of some of his enemies, the wild cries of "catch him!" after one of his pranks, the village dance, the final capture, the sentence to death, the doleful wails of the repentant Till, and his final squeak as his wind is cut off, all of these points are self-apparent and require no warrant from the composer, who has altered the old version which allows Till finally to cheat the gallows.

There was great applause after the performance, and Mr. Gericke and the orchestra deserve the highest praise. Very few can imagine how much of labor such a smooth performance of so difficult a work represented.

Sir Edward Elgar recently stated in one of his lectures that if Strauss chose he could give us one of the greatest of symphonies. We wish that this chief orchestral genius of the present would so choose and leave for a little while his extremes, as represented by the "Domestica" and "Salome," and give to the world one masterpiece in the good old form. When one listens to such a recent work as the second symphony of Brahms one is convinced that the lemon is by no means squeezed dry, that there is much yet to be said in the symphonic form.

The symphony received an authoritative performance in which every beauty was well conserved. Especially the third movement, rather an intermezzo than a scherzo, with its quaint wood-wind passages (not altogether unlike the Pastorale of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio") was delightful.

There was an exodus before the last part of this work. Possibly it was not to be considered as an especial "Brahms exodus," for the programme was almost a half-hour longer than usual, and suburbanites have their regular habits. But those who stayed to the end heard a glorious climax to a great work; it was altogether a masterly interpretation of a masterpiece.

Louis C. Elson.

Strauss and Brahms at the Symphony

Trans: Concert

We are beginning to hear a new Strauss in our orchestral concerts as some years ago we began to hear a new Wagner in our opera houses. The first generation of singing-actors that we heard in Wagner's music dramas were all for the bigness and the vehemence of them, for the large dramatic effect; however, it might be gained, rather than for the musical means. Then came the new generation of singing-actors to show us that it was precisely by these musical means that Wagner was most potent. In the same way the first Strauss that we heard at our orchestral concerts was all hugeness, violence and seeming excess, even to cacophony. You may have the acridness, the poignancy, the occasional grandeur, the mighty striving of his music, our conductors seemed to say to their audiences. The rest—but sometimes we that listened were not so sure that there was a rest. Now we know that there is, and because we know, more and more of us are coming to understand, feel and admire Strauss's music. More than any conductor in America Mr. Gericke has revealed to his audiences the intellectual weight of Strauss's music, the large design and significant proportioning of it, the pictorial effect and the melodic suggestion in it. He gives, though in less degree sometimes than other conductors, the nearly superhuman power of Strauss, but he gives also the subtleties, even the beauties, as the old poetry books used to say, of his music. Therefore he has persuaded us until his audiences last Friday and Saturday heard "Till Eulenspiegel" as comprehensive and impressive music. Clearly there was intelligent musical and emotional response to it instead of the old vague excitement and confused wonder.

Our conductor could hardly have done these things for Strauss had he not an orchestra as quick of musical understanding and as fine in musical discrimination and imagination as he. And it is by these same qualities that when he and it play a symphony of Brahms's as they did the second at the last pair of concerts, that they go to the very heart of it. There is no obscurity, no crabbedness, no lack of unity, none of the outworn reproaches to Brahms's music when they play it. They understand and feel and their audiences with them. More even; they sang their way through the second symphony, and, bright or dark, it could hardly have seemed sener, purer, more disembodied song.

H. T. P.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

WEBER.

OVERTURE to "Freischuetz."

BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in E flat major.

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM. "Orpheus."

ERNEST CHAUSSON,

SYMPHONY in B flat major.
(First time at these concerts.)

Soloist:

Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE.

140

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN, OVERTURE, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage."

BEETHOVEN. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 5, in E flat major, op. 73.
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio un poco moto.
III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo.

LISZT, SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 4, "Orpheus."

ERNEST CHAUSSON, SYMPHONY in B flat major, op. 20.
I. Lent; Allegro vivo.
II. Très lent.
III. Animé.

(First time at these concerts.)

Soloist:

Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

141

The Symphony Concert and Miss aus der

Ohe Jan. 22, 1906

There was only a faint ripple of applause after the performance of Liszt's "Orpheus" at the Symphony concert on Friday, and there was none too much after the repetition on Saturday night. Mr. Gericke and his men played it sympathetically. His sense of proportion and continuity and their command of an unbroken, undulating tone suited the broad flow of the music, rising in a large crescendo, falling in a long diminuendo. It had not been heard in Boston for ten years, and it was almost as novel as Chausson's symphony. Yet, once again, it seemed the neglected, unheeded waif among Liszt's tone-poems. "Les Préludes" is becoming hackneyed. "Tasso" is firmly established in orchestral repertoires the world over. "Mazeppa" has almost as sure a footing. "The Battle of the Huns" is making its way. "Hamlet" has been decently buried. "Die Ideale" and "Prometheus" have no very strong hold on life. But "Orpheus" is merely neglected, though in it are some of the very same qualities that are turning "Tasso" classic. The design, musical and emotional, is large and simple. The tone-poem begins at the softest, mounts gradually to a swelling climax, falls little by little, and vanishes as softly as it began. Through it Liszt would have the god himself move, coming, going, swaying men and nature by the beauty and the power of his insistent song. Steadily underneath we hear his harp. (We should have heard it the more clearly had there been the second harp that our orchestra often needs.) The design is lucid and imaginative equally as musical structure and emotional utterance. There is Liszt's characteristic rhapsodic vein and his characteristic orchestral pomp. There is almost none of his undue prolixity, or of his sounding emptiness, as though he were filling the pages and waiting meantime for a new idea. The melodies of "Orpheus" seem no less persuasive, and the development of them no less pregnant than they are in some of the symphonic poems that conductors choose oftener when they would put Liszt on their programmes, and that audiences are quicker to applaud. The sweep of "Orpheus" is quite as large and rhapsodic, even if a lyric gentleness, as befits, has replaced the fiery power of "Tasso" or "Mazeppa." None the less audiences are warm to them and cold to the other. If the music itself does not persuade them, print never will. But now and then the hardened reviewer, no less than Mr. Gilbert's unhappy policeman, likes to mother a neglected child.

For foil to Liszt's pomp there was the lyric elegance of Mendelssohn's overture, with its little pictures of a calm and a lively sea—musical watercolors beside Liszt's musical frescoes. And for foil as well to Mendelssohn's lyric and Liszt's rhapsodic vein there was the large and ordered eloquence of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. Miss aus der Ohe and the orchestra played it with a broad tonal splendor, a nobility of accent, a lofty restraint that were of the matter and the manner of the music. It sounded grandiose. It exalted form and instrument. It seemed to fuse and lift pianist and orchestra into its calm power and beauty. In the greatness of the music the listeners forgot the pianist who was imparting it to them. It was her purpose and her reward. It has been often her characteristic distinction.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Adele Aus Der Ohe the
Symphony Soloist.

Mr Tucker's Sunday Concerts
—The Longy Club.

Various Announcements of the Week.

Jan. 21, 1906

Chausson's symphony in B-flat major was the novelty at the 12th Symphony rehearsal and concert. The work was new to this city, though the first performance in this country was by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This was in Philadelphia last December, Vincent d'Indy conducting. It is modern French music, with here and there a touch of the Wagnerian style; a representative work by a disciple of a new school which the resources of the modern orchestra permit to "have its fling" in individuality of expression, some of which are musical problems that no one but the student, expert or devotee can easily comprehend. Chausson's symphony is in three movements, through which the severity of the mood suggested in the first one is quite strictly maintained. The composer delights in chromatic effects, the brass contingent has plenty of prominent passage work that is excellent in matter, and the thematic material is admirably handled, as if after Chausson had found a motif to suit he juggled it among the various groups of instruments. And skilfully it is done throughout the whole piece.

In the second movement, which is very somber as a whole, the arrangement of the musical dialogue is masterly, the numerous short phrases being allotted the different instruments in such a way that they run together and blend admirably. Here the treatment of the horn parts is very effective. In the final movement the new school style of development finds vivid illustration in thunderous crescendos, abrupt changes in tempo and key, extreme contrasts, modulations that are peculiar, to say the least, and in other so-called "surprises" to the ear. No choir in the orchestra is slighted in producing these effects.

The performance was uniformly good. The perfect manner in which the different instrumental groups took up their cues in the second movement deserves special mention, for everything went smoothly. The intricate figures of the last movement, many of them for solo passages, were voiced in perfect harmony, and the ensemble work was of the usual high standard of merit. The symphony is a work of importance as a type of modern composition in which skill in instrumentation, and not the musical matter, is most prominent.

Miss Aus der Ohe appeared as soloist, playing the Beethoven E-flat major piano concerto, Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," and Liszt's poem, "Orpheus," completed the program. Beethoven's noble work was finely interpreted by Miss Aus der Ohe, who, although lacking some of the masculine vigor necessary to compass the breadth of expression necessary for the concerto, nevertheless gave renewed evidence of a pianistic skill which has won for her a rank with the foremost pianists of her sex. The audience cordially greeted the artist and insistently recalled her at the close of her performance.

The Mendelssohn overture and the Liszt poem were each given in a sympathetic manner, the first being specially charming in its suggestions of pleasant voyaging, tranquillity and peaceful sea pictures. The orchestra's part in the concerto was performed in thorough accord with the soloist.

Saturday, Jan. 27, will be the 150th anniversary of the birth of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, naturally a date not to be passed without notice by our orchestra. Consequently, Mr. Gericke heads the 13th program of the season with what is generally acknowledged the greatest of Mozart's symphonies, that in C major, called "The Jupiter." The other selections will be "La Kremlin," a symphonic poem by Glazounoff, first time at these concerts, and Mendelssohn's E minor violin concerto, Miss Marie Hall playing the solo part.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn—Overture: "Sea-Calm and Prosperous voyage."

Beethoven—Concerto for Pianoforte, in E-flat major.

Miss Aus der Ohe, pianist.

Liszt—Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus."

Ernest Chausson—Symphony in B-flat major.

(First time at these concerts.)

The overture was substituted for the "Freischütz" overture, which had been announced. Perhaps it was generosity which suggested the change, for that work had been played on Wednesday, by Weingartner and the New York orchestra, and had made no very strong impression.

We value Mr. Gericke's reading of it quite as highly as the more theatrical one of Weingartner, and technically the work was bound to have been superior. The trumpets did some excellent playing at this concert, and the conventional triumph at "Schon seh' ich das Land!" was quite brilliantly executed.

Concerts Next Week

Next Friday and Saturday Mr. Gericke completes, for the time, the notable series of large ultra-modern compositions that he has been playing at the Symphony concerts for the last month. He began, after the orchestra returned from its January journey to other cities, with Chausson's symphony. Last week came Glazounoff's tone-poem, "The Kremlin." This week we are hearing Mahler's fifth symphony, and for the fifteenth pair of concerts d'Indy's first symphony, "On a mountain air," stands on the programme. It runs in three movements, and it adds a piano, for which the composer has written an elaborate part, to the usual instruments. The symphony is less intricate and intellectual, more readily comprehensible and of more sensuous appeal than the second, which Mr. d'Indy himself conducted for us last December. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, of our resident virtuosi, takes the pianoforte part in it. The programme begins with Haydn's symphony in C major, and between the two symphonies comes Saint-Saëns's concerto in A minor, for violoncello and orchestra. In it, Elsa Ruegger, the Belgian cellist, pleasantly remembered from her previous visit to America, plays the solo instrument. The following week the orchestra pays its monthly visit to New York and the cities southward to Washington and westward to Buffalo.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn—Overture: "Sea-Calm and Prosperous voyage."

Beethoven—Concerto for Pianoforte, in E-flat major.

Miss Aus der Ohe, pianist.

Liszt—Symphonic Poem, "Orpheus."

Ernest Chausson—Symphony in B-flat major.

(First time at these concerts.)

The house-programme gave the old mistranslation of the Mendelssohn title—"Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage." The analytical programme gave it more sensibly as "Sea-calm," etc. There is a big difference between "Calm Sea" and "Becalmed at Sea," and Mendelssohn attempted (rather feebly) to picture Goethe's words,— Dreadful stillness on the waters,

Without motion rests the sea,
And the sailor sees around him
Only flat monotony.
Not a breath of air is stirring;
Solemn silence, as the grave.
In the whole wide, vast horizon,
Moveth not a single wave.

A weaker presentation of Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner"—

Day after day, day after day,
We stuck, nor life nor motion,
As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean.

Which Mendelssohn has made still weaker by some placid and conventional music. There is no part of the musical voyage where the steward or the basin is requisite, spite of the fact that Mr. Gericke managed to draw more out of the introduction than we have ever heard done before. It was a very fine performance of a tepid work. It is by no means such a seascape as "le grand Paysagist" (as Mendelssohn was sometimes called, because of his tone-pictures) brought forth in the "Hebrides" overture, and even the pretty water-picture of "The Fair Melusina" makes a stronger overture than this one.

Schubert and Beethoven have treated this same subject of Goethe in vocal forms, but there seems not to be enough in it to inspire the composer. We wish, however, that some of our great modern colorists would turn their attention to Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner"; that would make a grand topic for a symphonic poem.

The overture was substituted for the "Freischütz" overture, which had been announced. Perhaps it was generosity which suggested the change, for that work had been played on Wednesday, by Weingartner and the New York orchestra, and had made no very strong impression.

We value Mr. Gericke's reading of it quite as highly as the more theatrical one of Weingartner, and technically the work was bound to have been superior. The trumpets did some excellent playing at this concert, and the conventional triumph at "Schon seh' ich das Land!" was quite brilliantly executed.

Not many female pianists can satisfactorily interpret Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, and Miss Aus der Ohe is the chief of the few that are able to do so. Her playing was thorough, earnest and most musicianly in its attention to ensemble. There was surety everywhere, and nowhere was there any attempt at personal display.

There was virility in the first and last movements and the Rondo was bravely attacked and dashingy carried through. The cadenza of the first movement was splendidly worked up. It is interesting to note how Beethoven gradually turned away from the personal exhibition which was involved in this showy part of the concerto, which Mozart had so complaisantly allowed to all artists.

Not satisfied with composing cadenzas for his works, so that the improvising style might be done away with, in his 4th concerto for piano, Beethoven warns the player—"La Cadenza sia corte!"—"Make your cadenza short!" But in this work he unites the orchestra with the piano in such a way that the soloist was forever balked of his chance of interpolating his private fireworks.

The cadenza was generally put in the coda of the work or movement, so that it became merely a means of winning a personal triumph for the player, often at the expense of the composer. Mendelssohn tried to circumvent this point by placing the cadenza in the middle of the first movement of his violin concerto, as will be noticed in the next concert.

To return to Miss Aus der Ohe; she played with vigor, without vehemence; everything was broad, nothing spasmodic; and she was deservedly recalled again and again at the end of the noble work. And how well the composition wears! Much of our modern music is of the sick-room or of the asylum. Oh that we might get back to the musical health of Beethoven!

"Orpheus," by Liszt, gave splendid opportunities to the harp and the oboe, and Mr. Schuecker and Mr. Longy played superbly. But the horns were indecisive once or twice. We have recently noticed a lack of surety once in a while, in this important department of the orchestra. This symphonic poem is not comparable to "Les Preludes." Its vagueness, and its rambling style become tiresome long before its final cadence is reached. It might be well to change its title to "Morpheus."

The Chausson symphony is great at times and padded at others. It does not, on the one hand, attain the glorious figure treatment and the sustained power of the Cesar Franck symphony (the best modern French symphony), nor, on the other, does it have any of the boredom and "claphering with notes" of the D'Indy Symphonie Mathematique.

There are some noble climaxes in the work. All is not clear (on a first hearing) and the first movement seems a musical Corot, a suggestion, an impression, rather than a clear picture, but there is originally and sincere passion in many of its phrases.

146

The second movement seemed big with Fate. It presented gloom and suggested tragedy. Yet it had contrasts of deep tenderness which caused the sombre touches to become the more intense.

Its finale was still intense, and it was something of a triumph that three movements (it has but three) without any real relief of brightness to their earnestness, should yet be far removed from monotony. The chorale-like theme in the finale was very grand, and the development of the 3-noted figure (D, B-flat, A, descending) was carried out with something of the power with which Franck treated a similar 3-noted figure in his symphony.

And a word of compliment is due to the excellent playing of the trumpet in this finale, and above all to the superb manner in which Mr. Gericke interpreted the new work. Not a climax was lost, and the power, intensity and passion were caught up in a manner that must have surprised those who deemed our conductor only "academic." Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON TRAVELER SYMPHONY IN 12TH CONCERT

Miss Adele aus der Ohe was the soloist at the 12th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

In place of the overture to "Der Freischutz," announced for performance, Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," was played. The change was due to the performance of the first named work Wednesday evening by the New York Symphony orchestra. The substituted overture is interesting, but not enthralling.

The reading of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," accentuated all the better qualities of that somewhat feeble work, which has a pompous, brass introduction.

The most interesting work given was Chausson's symphony in B flat major, given for the first time in Boston. This, one of the most pretentious works of this French composer, is euphonious and delightful. It is good music, of the kind that has inherent claims to being exempt from dust blown shelves.

Miss Aus der Ohe gave a spirited performance of Beethoven's concerto for piano in E flat. Pronounced applause was her reward.

TWELFTH CONCERT IS MOST NOTABLE

Symphony on Saturday Night Plays
First Time Her Chausson's B Flat.

Journal Jan. 22, 1906

The twelfth Symphony concert, on Saturday night, was notable chiefly for the first performance here of Chausson's symphony in B flat. This much-discussed work, one of the latest products of "Young France," is not so very radical, after all, nor at all formidable in the hearing.

It is clear, direct, often simply melodious in an appealing way, and it has very much of the accepted symphonic form, with scholarly transitions from one movement to another. Yet there are difficult passages here and there, hard food for the ordinary musical digestion. It wins no popularity at a first hearing, which, of course, may mean very little as to its value. It had all the advantage of a very beautiful and finished performance.

Mendelssohn's old-fashioned, but still beautiful "Calm at Sea and Prosperous Voyage" was read and played with dainty imagery. It is the custom nowadays to jibe at this not over-strong bit of nautical tone-picturing, and yet it does suggest the lazy swell of ocean, the whistling of the wind and the smell of spray. Sea-poems are difficult in music, and a better than Mendelssohn in this particular genre is not easy to find.

Liszt does not shine in his "Orpheus" symphonic poem, and, although the playing of it was dramatic and noble, its effect was small. Adele Aus der Ohe played the well-known Beethoven concerto for pianoforte with much feeling and power.

147

Symphony Hall.

---

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 27, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

[Mozart, born at Salzburg, January 27, 1756.]

MOZART.

SYMPHONY in C major with Fugue, Finale, "Jupiter." (K, 551.)

I. Allegro Vivace.

II. Andante Cantabile.

III. Menuetto: Allegretto: Trio.

IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY. CONCERTO in E minor for VIOLIN, op. 64.

I. Allegro molto appassionato.

II. Andante.

III. Allegretto non troppo. Allegro molto vivace.

GLAZOUNOW.

SYMPHONIC PICTURE in three parts, "The Kremlin," op. 30.

(First time at these concerts.)

Soloist:

Miss MARIE HALL.

nality and sincere passion in many of its phrases.

The second movement seemed big with Fate. It presented gloom and suggested tragedy. Yet it had contrasts of deep tenderness which caused the sombre touches to become the more intense.

Its finale was still intense, and it was something of a triumph that three movements (it has but three) without any real relief of brightness to their earnestness, should yet be far removed from monotony. The chorale-like theme in the finale was very grand, and the development of the 3-noted figure (D, B-flat, A, descending) was carried out with something of the power with which Franck treated a similar 3-noted figure in his symphony.

And a word of compliment is due to the excellent playing of the trumpet in this finale, and above all to the superb manner in which Mr. Gericke interpreted the new work. Not a climax was lost, and the power, intensity and passion were caught up in a manner that must have surprised those who deemed our conductor only "academic."

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON TRAVELER SYMPHONY IN 12TH CONCERT

Miss Adele aus der Ohe was the soloist at the 12th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

In place of the overture to "Der Freischütz," announced for performance, Mendelssohn's overture, "Sea Calm and Prosperous Voyage," was played. The change was due to the performance of the first named work Wednesday evening by the New York Symphony orchestra. The substituted overture is interesting, but not enthralling.

The reading of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," accentuated all the better qualities of that somewhat feeble work, which has a pompous, brass introduction.

The most interesting work given was Chausson's symphony in B flat major, given for the first time in Boston. This, one of the most pretentious works of this French composer, is euphonious and delightful. It is good music, of the kind that has inherent claims to being exempt from dust blown shelves.

Miss Aus der Ohe gave a spirited performance of Beethoven's concerto for piano in E flat. Pronounced applause was her reward.

TWELFTH CONCERT IS MOST NOTABLE

Symphony on Saturday Night Plays
First Time Her Chausson's B Flat.

Journal Jan. 22, 1906

The twelfth Symphony concert, on Saturday night, was notable chiefly for the first performance here of Chausson's symphony in B flat. This much-discussed work, one of the latest products of "Young France," is not so very radical, after all, nor at all formidable in the hearing.

It is clear, direct, often simply melodious in an appealing way, and it has very much of the accepted symphonic form, with scholarly transitions from one movement to another. Yet there are difficult passages here and there, hard food for the ordinary musical digestion. It wins no popularity at a first hearing, which, of course, may mean very little as to its value. It had all the advantage of a very beautiful and finished performance.

Mendelssohn's old-fashioned, but still beautiful "Calm at Sea and Prosperous Voyage" was read and played with dainty imagery. It is the custom nowadays to jibe at this not over-strong bit of nautical tone-picturing, and yet it does suggest the lazy swell of ocean, the whistling of the wind and the smell of spray. Sea-poems are difficult in music, and a better than Mendelssohn in this particular genre is not easy to find.

Liszt does not shine in his "Orpheus" symphonic poem, and, although the playing of it was dramatic and noble, its effect was small. Adele Aus der Ohe played the well-known Beethoven concerto for pianoforte with much feeling and power.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 27, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

[Mozart, born at Salzburg, January 27, 1756.]

MOZART.

SYMPHONY in C major with Fugue, Finale, "Jupiter." (K, 551.)

- I. Allegro Vivace.
- II. Andante Cantabile.
- III. Menuetto: Allegretto: Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY. CONCERTO in E minor for VIOLIN, op. 64.

- I. Allegro molto appassionato.
- II. Andante.
- III. Allegretto non troppo. Allegro molto vivace.

GLAZOUNOW.

SYMPHONIC PICTURE in three parts, "The Kremlin," op. 30.
(First time at these concerts.)

Soloist:

Miss MARIE HALL.

MISS MARIE HALL
Who will appear at Carnegie Hall this afternoon

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

MOZART AND GLAZOUNOFF AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Russian's "Kremlin" for the First Time—Coming Concerts—News of the Day Trans. Jan. 27, 1906.

Mozart, with his unpretending symphony in C-major, that an after generation called his "Jupiter" symphony, began Mr. Gericke's programme yesterday afternoon. Glazounoff's frankly pretentious "Symphonic Picture in Three Parts: The Kremlin" ended it. The apt and elegant Mendelssohn made a slender bridge between the two with his concerto for violin in which Miss Marie Hall, very warmly and deservedly applauded, played the solo part with particular simplicity of feeling and graceful and shimmering tone. The world over, conductors have been making their "commemorative" programmes for the Mozart anniversary that falls today. Most of them, it is safe to say, have followed the conventional way in such things—one of Mozart's last symphonies, a concerto with a virtuoso to play it, the overture to one of the operas, and a fragment or two, instrumental or vocal, to round the list. Mr. Gericke, by a fortunate flash of originality, has seemingly preferred to honor Mozart by comparison or rather contrast. A short programme contained his "Jupiter" symphony and Glazounoff's "Symphonic Picture;" yet two compositions—and both genuinely music—could hardly be farther apart. Mendelssohn's concerto, after all, was not a bridge. It was only a resting place and much nearer to Mozart than it was to Glazounoff.

A band of Russians and a Russian conductor might doubtless have made more of Glazounoff's "tone-pictures" than did Mr. Gericke and our orchestra. Its playing of them was steadily vivid and moving, but such music as Glazounoff and some of his brethren write is still primitively racial, and there are traits in it that stir their countrymen and find expression through them as they cannot through any cosmopolitan body of cultivated virtuosi. Mozart's symphony, on the other hand, was ideally played. A few weeks ago, when the companion symphony in G-minor was on the programme, the ear detected, or fancied it detected, a slight sharpness of accent that lessened Mozart's perfect roundness of tone and a slight over-precision that similarly diminished his supple elasticity. There were no such specks on the performance of the "Jupiter" symphony. The orchestra gave out a flawless body of fluent tone. The quality of it was often the quality of pure song. Mr.

Gericke's balancing and proportioning of it was as near to perfection as even such a band and such a conductor may come. Every undulation of melody, every leap of some passing figure, every glint of rhythm, and every tonal shading came spontaneously, pliantly, completely. Pure beauty and suppleness of tone, pure felicity and animation of execution could hardly have gone further. Before the first movement had finished we listeners were ready to believe in the perpetual youth of Mozart. Music, existing for the sake of its own beauty in substance and form, could not have sounded fresher and more alive. Perhaps there was a touch of sentiment in all of us for the moment from conductor and players through the elect ladies of the parquet to the humblest occupant of the "rush seats." Somehow it was in the atmosphere that Mozart should sound altogether fascinating and altogether beautiful again. He did. You listened so as to say in long breaths, and you were surer than ever that it was Keats that wrote the motto, to this symphony, twenty-odd years afterward, in his ode to a Grecian urn. The particular line seems trite, to put in cold type. It did not seem so, if it happened to leap to mind under the charm and joy of this performance of the "Jupiter" symphony.

The chairs on the stage filled. The omniscient programme book ran through a long list of instruments from "three flutes, one interchangeable with piccolo," to bass drum, cymbals and gong, and we listeners were face to face with Glazounoff, the Kremlin and the festival that he has imagined within its gates for musical portrayal. (Mendelssohn had come and gone in modest, gentleman-like fashion. It was Mozart, who knows neither time nor fashion, that ears were still hearing.) Then came pompous music, festal music, pictorial music, richly colored and keenly varied—half an hour of it. And through all that time it was semi-barbarian music. For these Russians of the Russians—Glazounoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Liadoff and the rest—are still semi-barbarians who have mastered the use of a set of emotional edged tools. The fully civilized West gave them those tools—the expressive resources of music—and taught them by example and precept how to employ them. Then these semi-barbarians looked about for material to which they could turn the means that the West had given them.

They cast their eyes to the East, and they embodied its gorgeous and palpitating picturesqueness in such music as Rimsky-Korsakoff's familiar "Scheherazade." Or they searched their own sensitive and changeable temperament. In their moments of despair they found such music as Tchaikovsky's piercing slow movements, and in their moments of riot such as his reeling finales, smoking with the fumes of vodka. Or they heard the folk tunes, listened to the legends, bent to the dances, or watched the rivers and plains and shrines of their own Russia, and into "tone poems," fantasies, ballets and all sorts of free and pictorial forms went the musical ideas and the musical moods that this contemplation inspired. It is the composer who has flowered in the cultivation of the West, like Strauss or d'Indy, who may not easily invent vivid and striking melodies. These Russians have them at their fingers' ends. They may take them from folk song or they may imitate such melodies in their own inventions. The cultivated composer inclines naturally to make music by intellectual process. The semi-barbarians of Russia are hot and spontaneous with feeling. He tempers his instrumental coloring as subtly as he may. They are all for gorgeous profusion of line and ornament, for loud pomp and glow. His musical palette is chiefly shades, theirs almost all primary colors.

Glazounoff's "symphonic picture" utilizes and blends many of these traits. "The Kremlin" is delineative music, though less seemingly of the moods that the palace might inspire than those of a pompous and popular festival, passing within it. There is Oriental flavor once and again in the music, for the Kremlin is a palace of the gorgeous East that happens to stand in snowy Moscow. The thematic bases of the music are usually folk-tunes or invented imitations of them. The treatment is warmly and poignantly imaginative and thick and glowing with instrumental colors. The bolsterous din and rhythm of the crowd streaming through the gates, or the sonorous coming of the welcomed prince, alternate with some fitful vision that takes form in Oriental harmonies or in broad and mysteriously sombre ecclesiastical progressions. The composer's means to this delineation are full, sure and keen. The crowd dances, sings, riots, loses its breath, vanishes even in the first "symphonic picture." It is a half-barbarian crowd set, if one likes, in such a large barbarian fantasy as is the Kremlin itself. Solemn rite and churchly procession, heavy with mystery and magnificence, resound through the second "tone-picture," and against its deepest suggestion Glazounoff throws the inevitable tinkle of Oriental rhythms and instrumental coloring. For the third "picture" hear the crowd striding and shouting to greet its prince. He comes in tonal opulence and brilliance. They rejoice in shrill or sonorous din.

Glazounoff's imagination is large and hot. He commands his musical resources with unwavering surety. He heats them, he overwhelms them, rather than bends them to his emotional and pictorial ends. His "symphonic picture" is a huge and glowing splotch of tonal colors. The Kremlin is such an architectural splotch. Therefore, his music presumably gains its end, but it is as semi-barbarous as the pile that impelled him to write it. And after Mozart.

H. T. P.

TRIBUTE TO MOZART BY THE SYMPHONY

Journal — Jan. 29, 1906

The thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra fell upon Jan. 27, the 150th anniversary of the birth of Mozart, and in recognition of the occasion the great symphony in C major with fugue finale, popularly known as the Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony, was played. Miss Marie Hall was the soloist and was heard in the well known Mendelssohn concerto in E minor for violin, op. 64. "The Kremlin," styled a Symphonic picture in three parts, by Glazounoff, was given its first performance by the orchestra.

The Symphony was played splendidly. Mr. Gericke evidently was imbued with the spirit of the occasion and never did the great work receive a more sympathetic reading.

Miss Hall was heard to fine advantage in the Mendelssohn concerto. There are few great violinists who have visited Boston who have not taken a hack at this time-honored composition. There are splendid opportunities in it for the virtuoso, and Miss Hall improved them all. She was given an ovation at the conclusion of the concerto.

The "Kremlin" is a big, sonorous composition. It is an effort to depict peasant revelry, religious feeling, and the pomp and ceremony of Russian life. The three parts are styled Popular Feast, In the Monastery, and Entrance and Meeting of the Prince. The second part is by far the most impressive. It teems with religious coloring mingled with something of the Orient.

Miss Hall at the Symphony Concerts

Two months ago Marie Hall, the violinist, then newly arrived in America, gave two recitals here. She was known only by report from London and New York, and those reports had not kindled the curiosity of our distrustful public. Miss Hall's audiences were dolefully small, and she played with almost a pathetic resolution to win them. Friday and Saturday she returned at the Symphony concerts. Each audience heard her eagerly and recalled her time and again with genuinely hearty and spontaneous applause. Boston had discovered her, and probably when she gives a third recital here next month the discoverers will flock to hear her. The moral needs no pointing—especially for managers and virtuosos. Apparently there is only one way to our public for the newcomer—through the Symphony concerts. Yet Miss Hall was as excellent a violinist at her recitals as she was on Saturday evening, and she deserved as much to be "discovered" in November as she did in January. She had, indeed, come to America with a very stable reputation behind her. In exactly the same fashion, half the musical part of the town is asking itself now why it did not go to hear Weingartner. Yet that eminent conductor was not altogether unknown to fame before he alighted at the South Station.

Mendelssohn's concerto that Miss Hall played at the Symphony concerts confirmed in her all the finer traits that her recitals first disclosed. Her technique is supple and sure, seemingly uncalculated and unforced mastery. The tone, like the tone of all this new Bohemian school of violinists, is of singular evenness, pliancy and fineness. It is never large and rarely deep, but throughout it keeps a shimmering brilliance and delicacy of texture. It always undulates, and it is always lucently clear. For such a quality of tone and such technical mastery Mendelssohn might almost have written his concerto. It is a delicate show piece in the first movement, never obtrusive, elegant when it is most bent on virtuosity. There is grace in it to the smallest ornament. So Miss Hall played it and with a simplicity that made the music fresh again. Her tone sang gently in the slow movement, and in the last it had all the rhythmic point and piquancy that Sevcik infuses, somehow, into his pupils. It was good to hear the concerto so sympathetically and understandingly played for what it really is, naively here, wistfully there, brilliantly when the music bade, lightly always and always with appropriate elegance. It sounded spontaneous again, because those are the qualities that have given it lasting life. To turn it strenuous is to make it old-fashioned. Evidently Miss Hall has discriminating musical insight.

H. T. P.

Trans. Jan. 29, 1906

MUSICAL MATTERS

Marie Hall, Violinist,
at the Symphony.

Mme Szumowska's Piano
Recital Tomorrow.

Various Musical Happenings of the Week.

Globe — Jan. 28, 1906

A graceful and wholly appropriate tribute to the genius of Wolfgang Mozart, the great composer, was paid this week on the 150th anniversary of his birth, by the 13th Symphony orchestra rehearsal and concert; the place of honor on the program being given to the magnificent "Jupiter" symphony in C major, with fugue, written by the maestro in 1788 when he had few friends save Frederick William of Prussia. The stately nobility of the work received a dignified treatment at Mr Gericke's hands wholly in keeping with its character.

The grand outpouring of a soul suffering keenly from its unwelcome surroundings is here put into exquisite music. The second or "andante" movement, is arranged also for organ, and is heard in churches sufficiently often to make it familiar to many. The opening theme of four measures in the finale is one quickly recognized as having been used by many composers of ecclesiastical music, from Bach, Handel and Beethoven down, as well as by Mozart himself in other compositions, notably in the "Sanctus" of his "Mass in C."

Mr Hess, concertmeister, ably conducted the lovely Mendelssohn E minor concerto for violin, in which the soloist was the young English virtuoso Miss Marie Hall, always heard with pleasure. It was just a year ago (to be exact Jan 29, in Jordan hall) that Fritz Kreisler played the same concerto with masterly skill; and it is high praise to say that Miss Hall's scholarly reading bears favorably the comparison. Both Kreisler and Miss Hall are unimpeachable in their interpretations, bringing to bear upon the subject a sweeping power carrying everything, for the time being, before it. The method of the two artists in playing the second as well as a part of the third movement was very different, yet both was sufficiently skilful and individual to be delightful. In Miss Hall's reading the "appassionato" movement was a thing of memorable worth.

Glazounoff's "Symphonic picture" of "The Kremlin," filled with brazen suggestions of haunting bell-tolling and other weird sounds in and about this historic place of sumptuous mystery and barbaric Russian splendor.

It was treated with marked attention to its suggestions of princely feasts, processions and religious rites—the monastery theme being wonderfully brought out by the temple gong and vivid oriental coloring. The last movement was splendid with brass wind orchestration, and fittingly closed a program of great interest and beauty.

The 14th symphony rehearsal and concert will witness again the skill in pianoforte playing of that excellent musician, Mr Harold Bauer, whose Schumann concerto will undoubtedly be given splendidly, as so noble a composition deserves to be. A special feature of the program will be a "first time" symphony, "Number 5," by Gustav Mahler, and the Beethoven "Egmont" overture will be included in the program.

SYMPHONY PAYS HONOR TO MOZART

At 13th Concert the 150th Anniversary of Musician's Birth Is Observed—Modernity of Master's Music.

MISS MARIE HALL IN MENDELSSOHN WORK

"The Kremlin" an Unfamiliar Russian Musical Picture Is Given—Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony Heard.

Herald Jan. 28, 1906.

The programme of the 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given in Symphony Hall last evening, was as follows:

Symphony in C major, "Jupiter,".....Mozart
Violin concerto.....Mendelssohn

Symphonic picture, "The Kremlin," Glazounoff
Mozart was born at Salzburg Jan. 27, 1756. The "Jupiter" symphony was played last night to celebrate the 150th anniversary of the birth of the wondrous boy.

It is meet and proper that such anniversaries should be celebrated with pomp and ceremony. In this life that is "so daily," as Jules Laforgue complained, a life of tomorrow rather than of today, we are inclined to patronize the ancient worthies who in their own period were very modern, or to speak jauntily of them as bores, with their works of "only historical interest." Mozart has not escaped. Many concertgoers yawn at his name and wonder why such men as Richard Strauss and Vincent d'Indy can praise him with glowing cheeks. They suspect this attribute of worship to be a pose. Remind them of the fact that to such widely different characters as Rossini, Chopin, Tschaiakowsky, Brahms, the musician of musicians was Mozart, and they say lightly, "There's no accounting for tastes; surely you do not pretend to maintain that Mozart is a man of this generation."

No, Mozart was neither a symbolist nor a pessimist. He was not a translator of literature, sculpture, or painting into music. His imagination was not fired by a metaphysical treatise. He simply wrote music which came into his head and disquieted him until it was jotted down on paper. He did not go about nervously seeking for ideas. His music is never the passionate cry, never the wild shriek of a racked soul. His music is never hysterical, it is never morbid. It is seldom emotional, as we necessarily and unhappily understand that word today. Perhaps for these reasons it is still modern, immortal and not merely on account of the long and exquisite melodic line, fitting, inevitable background, delicate coloring. Music that is only the true voice of a particular generation is moribund as soon as it is born.

Not long ago in Paris the G minor symphony of Mozart and Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" were played at the same concert, and Mr. Louis Laloy, a bitter foe of formulas, a singularly sensitive and aggressive radical in his tastes and opinions, was struck by a certain artistic similarity in the two works that are of a different character, for the symphony is purely abstract and the prelude is descriptive. He found a similarity in the "candid grace of inspiration, in the natural logic of the thought," and also in the quality of tonal effects and in the orchestral color, "which is all luminous, an orchestra in which not a note is lost, where everything has its value and charms the ear before it speaks to the heart; divine sportiveness, paradisaical visions, music full of the sun and of enchantment." And he asked this significant question: "Is not the purest art that which ignores all suffering?"

In this country we do not know Mozart's music in its perfection. The three operas that are performed are heard in a huge theatre where the charm of the music quickly evaporates, where the musical fluid cannot enwrap the hearer. "Don Giovanni," "The Marriage of Figaro," "The Magic Flute," should be performed in a small opera house with a little, but careful chosen orchestra, with singers of sensuous voices trained admirably in the old style, with a stage so arranged that there need not be tedious waits between groups of arias or ensembles. The symphonies are played in vast concert halls by swollen orchestras, with wood-wind instruments doubled in the hope to balance the force of strings. Only the chamber music of Mozart is heard under favorable conditions. And yet how potent, how irresistible is Mozart's music a century after it occurred to him.

Think of the men and women, mere creatures of a legend or a librettist, who are now flesh and blood, who are better known to us, through Mozart's musical characterization, than are our highly respectable neighbors in the block. Donna Anna, the most superb woman in all opera; Donna Elvira, Zerlina, the heroic Don Giovanni, whose true character is questioned as eagerly as that of Hamlet; the Countess and Susanna and Cherubino—compare Mozart's Page with the Cherubino of Beaumarchais—that jealous and intriguing gentleman, the Count, Antonio the gardener; Pamina, Papageno. Then there are the two Coquettes with their delicious music in "Così fan tutte"—an opera, alas, that is not in the repertory of our opera companies. Even the more fantastical creatures, the Statue of the Commander with his tread, that strikes terror to the stoutest soul; the Queen of Night with her attendants—they are so definitely fantastical that they are real. We think of them. We know them by Mozart's music.

And this music, whether it vitalizes stage characters or is absolute as in the three famous symphonies and the chamber works, is as the music on Prospero's isle: "Sounds and sweet airs that give delight and hurt not." The analyst may find pleasure in praising the unsurpassable workmanship, which is akin to the spontaneity of natural phenomena; he may marvel at the simplicity of plan and expression; the simplicity that is the despair of interpreters, for it is the touchstone of their own art or artificiality—and Mozart himself, when he told his Emperor that his opera had just the right number of notes anticipated the judgment of time; but he is still far from explaining the peculiar and ineffable tenderness of this music that caresses and soothes and comforts.

The serenity, the classic suggestion of emotion without the distortion that accompanies passion would grace a tragedy by Sophocles or a comedy by Congreve. Mozart's music is essentially Grecian, yet now and then it reminds one of Watteau. Hazlett said of it that it should seem to come from the air and return to it; but he characterized it with finer appreciation when he said without mention of Mozart's name: "Music is color without form; a soul without a body; a mistress whose face is veiled; an invisible goddess." For form with Mozart is the form of fire, which, according to Plotinus, surpasses other bodies in beauty "because it obtains the order of form; for it is the most subtle of all, bordering as it were on an incorporeal nature." And for this reason Debussy is the spiritual brother of Mozart, moderns both, yet classics.

Miss Marie Hall made her first appearance at these concerts. She played the too familiar concerto of Mendelssohn, although, as we are informed, she would fain have played Tschaiakowsky's, for virtuosos have their specialties. Miss Hall has given two recitals here, but she was heard last evening to much greater advantage, for, in addition to certain technical accomplishments, she displayed an individuality that was not before this so fully recognized. There was an indisputable charm in her performance, nor was the fascination merely in the quality of tone.

She was not so successful in the andante as in the first movement and in the finale, and, curiously enough, there was more sentiment in the song episodes of the first movement as she played them than in the deliberately sentimental andante. Yet she was individual throughout, nor was there, as is so often the case with young violinists, especially women, the constant suggestion of a pupil just escaped from the master and endeavoring to follow faithfully his rules and precepts. Miss Hall gave much pleasure and the audience was correspondingly grateful.

Glazounoff's "Kremlin" was performed here for the first time and we have no record of a previous performance in this country. The composer calls his work a symphonic picture. There are three sections. The first, "Popular Feast," might serve as music for a spectacular ballet. The second, "In the Monastery," is by far the most effective section, by reason of its oriental ecclesiastical character, the solemnity of its chants, the orchestral effects which are at times bizarre. The score of the third movement, "Entrance and Meeting of the Prince," calls for a brass band which should be placed at a distance from the orchestra. There was no band last night, but we doubt whether its absence was of serious injury to the music, which, without patriotic or national significance to outsiders, seemed boisterously ineffective.

This music might well suit a national or local festival. It might serve as an illustrative accompaniment to tableaux vivants with gorgeous stage setting and costumes, but as concert music, with the possible exception of the second section, it is disappointing. There is nothing of the wild imagination that characterizes Glazounoff's "Stenka Rasine," which is by far the most original work of this composer that has been heard here.

The symphony was beautifully played. Mr. Gericke took great pains with "The Kremlin," and the performance was brilliant whenever the music allowed brilliance. There are apparently two Glazounoff's—the young man who had enthusiasm and glowing fancy, the composer of "Stenka Rasine," and the older man of fatal fluency who writes either sonorous ballet music or symphonies after an approved model. In the second section of "The Kremlin" there are suggestions of the earlier Glazounoff; the other movements reveal the composer of glittering and unmeasuring music for spectacular shows.

st:

BAUER.

MOZART'S BIRTH HONORED AT SYMPHONY.

Boston American
His 'Jupiter' Is Played Superbly, and Marie Hall Wins Triumph.

By Kent Perkins.

From Mozart to Glazounow! From the elegance, sprightliness and classic beauty of Vienna to the barbaric tumult of Tartar and Cossack! From the refinement of civilization in its fairest flower to the savagery of the Mongol horde in its gusty brutishness! That was the leap that Mr. Gericke and his orchestra asked their hearers to take last night at Symphony Hall in celebration of the 150th birthday of Mozart!

Though the abysmal fall was somewhat eased with the playing of Mendelssohn's brilliant and charming violin concerto in E minor, op. 64, by Miss Marie Hall, the plunge was so violent that the audience seemed hardly to know whether to like it or not. No more effective means could be taken, however, to show by contrast the noble refinement and vernal beauty Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and no more striking method could be employed to exhibit the startlingly frank barbarism of the Russian character as portrayed in Glazounow's symphonic picture, "The Kremlin."

The orchestra never voiced the tripping delicacy and the fluent tracery of Mozart with more consummate skill and it is hard to believe that the beautifully melodious song of the andante was ever sung more exquisitely than it was last night. This movement roused the audience to fervid enthusiasm and it was realized that Mozart's memory had been fittingly honored.

Miss Hall, a slip of a girl, so slender and lithe that it did not seem possible she could have the physical strength to last through the concerto, which has been made familiar by most of the great violinists that have appeared here, fairly astonished her hearers by the strength, fullness and shimmering beauty of her tone and by the grace and abounding spirit of her expression. She was rewarded with a whirlwind of applause and shouts of approval that forced her to come forward four times, and it looked for a while as if the people would break all Symphony bounds and demand an encore.

With the classic cadences of Mozart and Mendelssohn still lingering in their ears the audience was hurled into the seething, strident, bombastic fierceness of "The Kremlin," which had its first symphony concert performance.

Of course, the orchestra played the piece superbly. Yet there was of necessity a bit too much elegance in its work, a spirit of chastened refinement that belongs to civilization and of which the symphony artists could not be expected to divest themselves so suddenly, if they ever could do it.

It requires an orchestra of Russians properly to picture the rude festival folk song themes of the first movement, the ecclesiastical mood of the second or "monastery" part, with its chant that savors of abject fear and the horror of the "Dies Grae" rather than the adoring or triumphant note we are familiar with in the Western Church, and only Muscovite musicians can really touch the blare, the blatant, brazen oriental bombast of the third part, where the "Entrance and meeting of the Prince" are figured forth.

Mr. Gericke is to be thanked for the Glazounow "picture," and it is to be hoped more Russian music will be heard in Symphony Hall, even if his artists fail to become real Cossacks, for the music of no nation is so characteristic, so illuminating in portraying a people's spirit as is that of the Slav. Listen to Glazounow, to Tschalkowsky, to Rimsky-Korsakoff and you will hear the titanic, savage forces that are clashing in Russia to-day and you will get a vivid realization of the dreadful chaos out of which a new civilization is forming. You will more clearly understand why czarism is doomed and why Russia must be drenched in still more blood before it reaches the light.

14TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Harold Bauer, pianist, was the soloist of the 14th Symphony concert last evening, and the programme was as follows:
Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, op. 54.....Schumann
Symphony No. 5.....Mahler

The feature of the concert apart from the soloist was the first performance in this city of Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony. The composer is one much discussed in Europe at the present time, and he has written many large works for orchestra in the most ultra-modern spirit. The symphony, so designated, but it is one in name only, is a series of musical pictures in three parts. The first in two sections, one a funeral march, a most effective, yet fantastic, bit of orchestral scoring. The second section is more vague, and is much less of interest. Part two is a scherzo that in portions suggests a waltz movement that is very "taking," and if carried out in this vein would become immensely popular. But the end of this movement is not so satisfactory, although scored in a highly original manner.

Part three has for its first section an adagietto that is the gem of the work, melodic and highly poetic in conception. A superb bit of orchestral tone color. The finale begins with a fugal exposition of an interesting theme and the contrapuntal development is exceedingly clever, leading to a most brilliant climax. As a whole, the symphony impressed greatly and the performance was masterly in every way.

Mr. Bauer was heard at his best in the poetic concerto of Schumann, and the work received an interpretation that was memorable, being also an ideal exhibition of subjective pianism. The pianist received an immense ovation and numerous recalls, and he deserved them fully.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Adm! SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart—Symphony in C major. "Jupiter."
Mendelssohn—Concerto for Violin.

Soloist, Miss Marie Hall.

Glazounoff—Symphonic Poem, "The Kremlin."

The Jupiter symphony was upon the programme in honor of the 150th anniversary of the birth of Mozart. It was better than giving a "Mozart Programme," which would have become tiresome. Music is an Art that is more changeable than any other and pictures the emotional and the psychological character of its age; its shifting character is its greatest element of strength.

It is therefore only natural to state that, admire Mozart as we may, he does not come as close to us as Tschalkowsky, or Richard Strauss, while a whole concert devoted to his music would be no more delightful than an entire programme made up of readings from Richardson or Spenser.

But the single symphony was entirely delightful, and again proved its title to being the broadest and noblest orchestral work of the 18th century. We begin to doubt if there is as good an interpreter of Mozart in this country as Wilhelm Gericke; he made the "Jupiter" manly and sturdy, as if it were a forerunner of the "Heroic" that came 16 years later. There was much applause consequent upon the work, showing that the public are still deeply interested in a good Mozart number, well performed.

After this Mr. Hess took the baton and led a brilliant performance of the Mendelssohn violin concerto. This work occupies the neutral ground between popular and classical music; it is not intense, as Bruch's G minor concerto, nor complex as Brahms' concerto, nor symphonic as the great Beethoven concerto, but it combines melody and technique in such a suave and graceful manner that it pleases public, classicist and performer alike, and it becomes the favorite visiting card of many a good violin soloist.

Miss Marie Hall was excellent in the work, best in the first 2 movements, but very brilliant in the finale also. Her broad tone and free bowing, her clear intonation, even in the highest positions or in harmonics (there are only a few "natural" ones in the work) were very effective. The cadenza, which Mendelssohn slyly placed in the middle of the first movement, to avoid having too much of the personal triumph in the work, was without flaw.

But there was something greater than this, which appealed to the musician; it was the sympathetic vein in which the beauties of the first two movements were revealed. We suspect that Miss Hall is greater than this concerto, that she can do deeper and nobler work. However that may be, she certainly made a tremendous success with it on Saturday, arousing the public to something like a frenzy of enthusiasm, and being recalled again and again.

One feels impelled to give to her the title that was once applied to Norman-Neruda,—"Die Geigen Fee!"—"The Fairy of the Violin!"

The Kremlin has about as much history interwoven in its stones as the Tower of London itself. It was conceived in barbarism, steeped in slaughter, and has been the scene of assassination even in most recent days. Under the foundation of the Kremlin of Nijni-Novgorod it is said that they buried a living woman, in conformance with pagan custom, and the Moscow Kremlin has scarcely been less terrible in its Oriental savagery.

This Orientalism, this barbaric splendor, Byzantine superstition and religious pomp have all been translated into boisterous tones by Glazounoff. Russia is teaching the world a lesson as regards nationality in Music; the motto,—"Para Domoi"—"Let us get Home,"—expressing the ardent desire to get away from foreign influence, which made Grieg Norwegian and Smetana Bohemian in their musical expression, finds its fullest application in Russia to-day, and even the noisy and bacchanalian touches were graphic and gave a new flavor to the concert. In this case it was not necessary to scratch the Russian to discover the Tartar, for the latter stood clearly revealed.

The Greek Church theme of the second movement was another new flavor. Those who have read Hatherly's book on "Byzantine Music" have some idea of the weird melodies that exist in this field, and, in spite of the great advance made by Bortniansky, the Russian Palestrina, the foundation of much Muscovite religious singing is to be sought for in these.

The Finale was as boisterous as the beginning. Like Tschalkowsky's "1812" explosion, this work attempts to portray a great popular festival and stops at nothing to achieve its end. It was tubas and trombones to the front most of the time. Nor was it unpleasant to hear,—for once; one felt that it was a true picture even if rather a repulsive one, and it appealed to one's curiosity, if no deeper.

Mr. Gericke had evidently prepared the work with much care, and he led it with a commendable abandon. The brasses blew until their lips were almost bleeding, and the violins played brilliant figures that were almost lost in the tumult. The 10 minutes' walk in the corridors became, at this concert, a Rubicon that separated civilization from barbarism; from Tennyson to Gorky could not have been a greater leap.

Louis C. Elson.

BAUER REDRESSES THE WRONGS OF HUMANITY.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.

OVERTURE to Goethe's "Egmont" op. 84.

SCHUMANN.

CONCERTO in A minor for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, op. 54.

- I. Allegro affettuoso.
- II. Intermezzo—Andantino grazioso.
- III. Allegro vivace.

GUSTAV MAHLER.

SYMPHONY in C sharp minor, No. 5.

PART I.

- I. Dead March. With measured step. With great precision. Like a funeral train. C sharp minor.
- II. Stormily restless. With utmost vehemence. A minor.

PART II.

- III. Scherzo. With force but not too fast. D major.

PART III.

- IV. Adagietto. Very slow. F major.
- V. Rondo. Finale. Allegro. D major.

First time at these concerts.

Soloist:

Mr. HAROLD BAUER.

The Piano is a Mason and Hamlin.

BAUER REDRESSES THE WRONGS OF HUMANITY.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.

OVERTURE to Goethe's "Egmont" op. 84.

SCHUMANN.

CONCERTO in A minor for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, op. 54.

- I. Allegro affettuoso.
- II. Intermezzo—Andantino grazioso.
- III. Allegro vivace.

GUSTAV MAHLER.

SYMPHONY in C sharp minor, No. 5.

PART I.

- I. Dead March. With measured step. With great precision. Like a funeral train. C sharp minor.
- II. Stormily restless. With utmost vehemence. A minor.

PART II.

- III. Scherzo. With force but not too fast. D major.

PART III.

- IV. Adagietto. Very slow. F major.
- V. Rondo. Finale. Allegro. D major.

First time at these concerts.

Soloist:

Mr. HAROLD BAUER.

The Piano is a Mason and Hamlin.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Feb 5 1906

Beethoven—Egmont Overture.

Schumann—Piano Concerto in A minor.

Mr. Harold Bauer, Pianist.

Mahler—Symphony in C sharp minor. No. 5.

If "Freedom shrieked when Kosziusko fell" (and possibly he fell upon her toes) she also shrieked in the "Egmont Overture" when the Netherlands won their liberty. Beethoven was a democrat to the heart's core, and always at his strongest when writing about the emancipation of mankind, as witness the finale of the 9th symphony and this overture.

One felt the advance in orchestration in listening to this overture, for when it was written the first violins arose in indignation against the passage near the end which took them up to four-lined "C," while at this concert the passage was as easy as possible for our musicians. The piccolo, however, might have screamed a little louder in those final whip-snap runs. But the performance was on the whole an excellent one and the Gericke reading most earnest and unaffected.

Mr. Hess now took charge of the orchestra and gave an excellent reading of the Schumann concerto. With Mr. Harold Bauer as the pianist one need scarcely be told of the result,—it was something glorious. Yet the orchestration is almost infantile compared with the great modern works; but Brahms and Schumann, with their monochromatic tone-coloring tower above Mahler or Berlioz, because great musical thoughts are always more powerful than great musical scoring.

To us this Schumann concerto was one of the greatest musical delights we have had in a long time, and the public seemed to be of the same mind, for there was deep attention and frenzied applause.

Mr. Bauer played the work in strong and manly fashion; there was more of the Florestan than the Eusebius side of Schumann in the interpretation, but that was no fault, and there was sufficient of romance in the second movement. There was a surety in the playing of this great soloist which had its peculiar charm, and the climaxes were worked up with splendid breadth.

The cadenza of the first movement was superbly played. Altogether, therefore, the work, the conductor, and the soloist, deserved the very great applause which followed the end; Mr. Bauer was recalled over and over again. Then the audience rested and tried to gather strength for the Mahler symphony.

The fifth symphony of the prolific Mahler made the public sit up. No one could drink it in with dreamy delight or in a relaxed frame of mind. Yet it was intensely dramatic and deeply interesting. Boston owes hearty thanks to Mr. Gericke for this introduction to one of the most significant works of the present. It displays a distinctly greater command of thematic material than can be found in the D'Indy symphony,—No. 2.

If Mahler is occasionally dissonant, frequently complex, we feel that the idea presented sometimes demands this expression; yet this complexity is often carried too far. Like Strauss, Mahler can write beautiful melody when he wishes, and there is something more tangible in this symphony than in many of the celebrated puzzles of the modern school.

The opening movement with its Funeral March was tremendously impressive, stronger than anything that we can remember in the most modern school except the "Death and Transfiguration" of Strauss. Even Franck's symphony (the very best of the latterday French school) paled beside it, while the other Gallic productions simply shrivelled up. It began with a figure that recalled the fanfare of Mendelssohn's Wedding March, but it soon struck out in an individual path. The solo trumpet was constantly at work and Mr. Kloeppel played nobly.

It was immediately noticeable that this composer did not deliberately seek for ugliness or asceticism. He brings in changing melodies and has a long theme harmonized in mellifluous sixths, which our modern ascetics would avoid as if they were poison. The wild tumult and fierce combat that followed was very impressive, and had the composer revealed a definite plot (a "programme-music" story) we imagine that the movement would at once capture the public.

But Mahler prefers not to give a definite picture; he wishes each auditor to thrill with his own chosen emotion; he writes "absolute music," in which we are at liberty to wreath our own fancies around the tones. Yet every part of the symphony suggests some striking and dramatic plot. Beethoven once wrote at the head of the first great piece of programme music—the Pastoral symphony,—"Mehr ein Bild der Empfindungen als Malerei" ("more a picture of impressions than a painting") but this "Mahlererei" suggests both.

After the great threnody with which the work began there came a glorious theme upon the cello. But now the faults of the Mahler system began to reveal themselves. The movement was prolix. There were so many sharp contrasts that they began to pall. The orchestra alternately roared and whispered to the audience. The movement was constantly theatrical without a theatrical plot to sustain it. It was fragmentary, and even the most striking ideas were not carried to any discernible conclusion.

Yet there was much skill displayed everywhere; there was canonic effect, contrapuntal treatment of most learned kind, and, after a long series of explosions, there came a grand chorale, or at least the outline of one. The movement was played with a superb abandon, and the "nuances" which are so important, were given flawlessly. We begin to suspect Mr. Gericke of orchestral greatness. He has never risen to such a height before, exquisite as his detail work has been. The whole performance was a great triumph for him and his orchestra.

The next movement, a Scherzo (but with 2 Trios) showed the merits and defects of Mahler vividly. There were delicious dance themes that were smothered in complexity. One melody overlaid another in such a way that they all seemed to neutralize each other.

Again the contrasts were most theatrical and sometimes seemingly uncalled for. It was as if all the dancers in the ball-room had cramps. It was difficult to perform and difficult to follow. A little further along this path and all of our performers and some of the auditors will need to seek some Sanatorium for mental repose.

The 1st and 4th movements were the most intelligible and most beautiful parts of the long work. The latter, an Adagietto for strings, gave a little repose to the over-worked audience. The exquisite melody of the violins, taken in augmentation in the violoncellos, was a touch of real music, as we understand it, and from the first notes to the long-drawn-out appoggiatura at the close, there was evidence of ability to compose in the most intelligible and charming manner.

The finale gave evidence of contrapuntal skill above everything else. There was a tremendous amount of fugal writing that made the violins earn their salary thoroughly. Amid all the complexity there was a rustic flavor that was not without its effect.

Mahler here seems to be a second Bruckner (who was his teacher) plus theatrical touches which are not to be found in the older composer's works. Yet we gathered more inspiration from the simply scored concerto of Schumann, with its direct appeal to heart and brain, than from all this tremendous effort of a contrapuntal and orchestral giant.

We feel as if Music were upon the wrong path. The whole effort of the ultra-modern composer seems merely to discompose the auditor; to puzzle, to weary, to crush him. In the older days Music was a divine stimulant to what was best in him, to exalt him, and sometimes even to please and refresh him. That Mahler can write beautiful themes is evident. That he chooses to treat them with the utmost complexity, is, we think, a defect. What is the sense of using Music to make life so hard for the orchestral player, for the public, and for the reviewer?

Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY GIVES MAHLER'S WORK

Highly Fantastical Fifth Symphony
Performed for the First Time in Boston.

Journal Feb. 5, 1906

Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, called "The Giant," was performed for the first time in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the fourteenth concert Saturday night. It is a stupendous work, the creation of a composer who cares not for tradition or anything else, but who seeks and gets almost exaggerated musical expression for his ideas without regard to instrumental limitations.

It is a noble work and not one the average student would love at first hearing. Its violence and vehemence, its abruptness, harsh contrasts and seemingly unreasonable demands upon individual and ensemble performers make it too much for immediate digestion. The symphony is in five movements, programmed without the usual tempo instructions in Italian, the warnings and instructions being translated so that all may understand and heed. The first movement is a funeral march, military in the extreme, with an exquisite "trio." The second is wildly emotional, a fitting setting to "Inferno." The scherzo has a refrain, a beautiful slow waltz, while the fourth movement in F major adagietto is very sensuous. The finale is disappointing. Throughout the symphony is fantastical and in the hands of a less competent orchestra would prove impossible. Mr. Gericke was enthusiastic and read the work with rare grace and artistry. It was given a brilliant performance.

Harold Bauer, pianist, gave an exquisite and perfectly artistic performance of Schumann's concerto in A minor. Beethoven's Egmont overture opened the concert.

A SYMPHONY BY MAHLER FOR THE FIRST TIME

Trans 743.06

A Notable Performance at the Symphony Concert—Mahler's Traits as the Music Revealed Them—His Unique Command of Instrumentation and His Use of It—Concerts and Recitals of Next Week—The Cecilia's Programme—Coming Concerts

The Mahler whom we in Boston heard yesterday in the first of his symphonies to be performed here seemed hardly the Mahler whose music has been so eagerly championed and so bitterly condemned these last eight years in Germany and in Austria. Audiences have hissed and squalled at one or another of his five symphonies—they can still on occasion take their music very demonstratively in Germany—and audiences have applauded and cheered them. Some reviewers have slighted them and scorned the composer. Others have extolled them rapturously, and placed Mahler himself almost side by side with Richard Strauss. There have been Mahler "banquets," where the chief course was vehement and laudatory speechmaking, and there have been angry protests to every conductor who has ventured, if only for curiosity's sake, to put a symphony by Mahler on his programmes. As for the musical world outside of Germany and Austria, it has been told to weariness that these symphonies were of extraordinary length and that they required extraordinary forces to perform them. There are more important and interesting things about them. But the fifth of Mahler's symphonies, that Mr. Gericke put on his programme, hardly bore out even these premonitory warnings. Report had declared that to perform it required an hour and a half. In fact, it lasted fifty-five minutes, perhaps ten or fifteen minutes longer than does an ordinary symphony of large dimensions, but it held the interest of the audience to the end, with fewer desertions than are usual at the afternoon concerts and with no visible signs of weariness. The introductory pages of some of Mahler's earlier symphonies do ask an enormous and intricate orchestral and choral apparatus. In this fifth he has been content with a full modern orchestra, ample in its wood-winds and horns and in its subordinate instruments. Perhaps the new version of the score which Mahler himself prepared only two months ago and which Mr. Gericke used accounts for these surprises.

Moreover, while the symphony was steadily interesting and now and then boldly individual and strikingly impressive, there was nothing portentous, so far as a single hearing might disclose, in its matter or its manner. In no sense did it seem "epoch-making," "revolutionary," "gigantic"—we are quoting assorted German epithets—or "impudent." Like most ultra-modern and highly individual music, it will provoke very different opinions in different hearers; but it warrants very scantily either the ecstatic admiration or the savage attacks that it and Mahler's other symphonies have excited and maintained overseas. Perhaps from openness of mind, much hearing in sympathetic performances and from an even and discriminating musical temper, we at the Symphony concerts have come to take the ways of ultra-modern music more or less for granted. Usually they interest us; sometimes they move us in their kind—yet they seem to madden some of our brethren—and no farther away than New York.

Mahler, for example, used the sanctified symphonic form very freely and loosely. He condenses or extends it; he modifies, varies and reshapes it according to his imaginative purpose, ideas and sensations and the musical expression that he would give them. But the Medean and Persian lawgivers did not fix the symphonic form unalterably. (A few hidebound pedants have done that in their stead.) And the beginning and the end of a form, in music or in any other art, is to give fullest and clearest expression to the individual ideas and imaginings behind. If the composer or the artist in general have them in him to express, he will shape the form to his needs, while the significance and the power of these ideas and the beauty and appeal of these imaginings will justify all his freedom. Contrast the eloquence and range of the later quartets of Beethoven, for example, with the ordered tinkle of Haydn's. Yet both are nominally of the same musical form. So Mahler, in this fifth symphony has moulded prescribed forms to his intellectual and emotional purpose. Sometimes he departs far and freely from them. Sometimes he follows them more or less closely. Do his ideas and imaginings and the expression of them justify the departure? The expression, as it seems to us, certainly does. It is something—nowadays, when we are all restless—to be musically interesting in any form for fifty-five consecutive minutes.

Mahler's themes in his fifth symphony and in his fourth which was played in New York fifteen months ago, lack, like most themes in ultra-modern music, frankly melodic character. They do not sing as Mozart's or Schubert's sing. They are the embodiment of thoughtfully evolved musical ideas rather than the impulsive upspringings of spontaneous musical temperament. They have not the splendid finality and inevitability of Beethoven's, for example. We moderns—and Mahler with the rest of us, hollow-eyed enthusiast though he is—do not affirm anything with such majestic surety. Mahler's themes, like Strauss's in his "tone-poems" or d'Indy's in his symphonies, are the fruit of intellectual process and selection for expressive ends. Strauss's are individually poignant and acrid; d'Indy's are individually fine and haunting; Mahler's, in this symphony have an individual big-ness and breadth that promise large, fruitful and moving development and expression. They sound like the themes of no other composer.

Mahler, however, no more develops his themes in the old sense of enrichment, enlargement and illustration than do Strauss, and especially d'Indy theirs. Rather, he varies them and reconstructs. He divides and subdivides them, so to say, and treats each fraction with ingenuity and imagination. Sometimes he seizes a suggestion buried in them; again he pursues some remote modulation; yet again—for the music is full of such contrasts—he is content with some almost obvious implication in them. In this treatment of his themes he is masterful and fertile. His polyphony seemed hardly as intricate as Strauss's or as subtle as d'Indy's, but it is as firm and pliant of intellectual and technical grip and as unflagging in invention. Like them he catches and shapes new and strange harmonies—sometimes irresistibly. If the man were less sincere, he would seem now and then to pursue the bizarre for its own sake—to make the Philistines sit up champing, even as Strauss likes to make them. But Mahler is of another cast of mind. To himself—and to the world, if he chose—he can probably give a definite reason for his most daring and perplexing modulations. However much we that listen fail to grasp their purpose, that purpose was clearly in his mind.

Not from Mahler's themes or from his treatment of them, still less from his variations of established forms, spring what power and beauty there are in his music as this fifth symphony disclosed it. Their source, as it seemed equally in the immediate listening and in the subsequent reflection, is a command of instrumentation and an imagination in it that is unique and almost marvellous. Schubert's passion found voice in his melodies; Beethoven's in the magnificent march of his symphonic movements; Brahms's in austere contemplation. d'Indy finds its voice in fine and disembodied subtleties of tone; Strauss's in the painting and the unrolling of superb musical canvases. There is passion in Mahler too, hot, deep, passion. There is intellectual force as well. His instrumentation is the voice of both. Thereby he is a twentieth-century Berlioz.

This instrumentation is not merely the technical mastery, the acquired suggestiveness of the practised, meditative and watchful conductor. It seldom betrays the careful reflection behind and the ingenious calculation of the effect before as Strauss's often does. It is not, seemingly, the result of long striving and searching and polishing for the apt, the precise, the ultimate instrumental word as is d'Indy's and Debussy's. Doubtless all these processes have contributed to it, but Mahler does not often let our ears hear them. Rather in him is something very like a genius for instrumentation, for the power of it, for the beauty of it. Time and again, in the fifth symphony, he makes his instrumentation amazingly intricate, yet the euphony of it delights the ear. Equally he can give it a naive and lovely simplicity. He can make a single instrument or a group of instruments flash like tongues of fire. Some of his instrumental backgrounds are like tonal mosaics of very delicate and wholly harmonious colors and of perfect jointure. There are details in his instrumentation that sound almost as inspirations. He has a painter's sense of comparative instrumental "values." His themes and his treatment of them take significance to the mind, shape to the fancy and appeal to the emotions chiefly through the instrumental coloring of them. The rhythmic depth and force, "as of a funeral march" in the first movement of the symphony; the rhythmic charm and caress of the laendler that makes the third; the impetuous restlessness of the second; the lyric sweetness of the fourth; the exhilarating sweep of the last, lie chiefly, as it seems to us, in the power and the beauty—almost the genius—of the instrumentation. By it, more than by any other capacity of music, he discloses ideas, imparts mood, compasses atmosphere, clothes his imaginings. What these would be naked the sympathetic listener neither knows nor cares. The instrumental investiture is enough. Often it is finely poignant or vividly pictorial. Almost always it is irresistibly sensuous. Of such instrumentation our conductor and our orchestra are past masters. They overcame the endless difficulties with which Mahler, who seems to write for an orchestra of Mahlers, achieves his end. Yet we that listened barely saw or felt them.

We have written of Mahler's symphony as of "absolute" music, because it is as such that most of those that listen to it are likely to hear it. "May programmes perish from the earth" was his toast at a supper in his honor. Yet he made them, though without detail, or permitted others to make them, and with infinite detail, for some of his earlier symphonies. There is a little "programmatic" suggestion in the few directions to conductor and band ("Stormily restless—with utmost vehemence," for example), that he prefixes to each movement of this fifth symphony. No doubt there was a programme—or more properly a definite succession of poetic ideas—in his mind as he wrote. There is in the last analysis, as Mr. Newman was saying a few weeks ago in this column, behind all music that is emotionally potent. In his fourth symphony Mahler was indeed writing measurably delineative music. In the fifth there is no hint of such purpose that the average imaginative listener can readily detect. No more is it music that would suggest the stress and strain and turnings and twistings of some intellectual conflict of ideas as does d'Indy's in the symphony that he conducted here. Mahler's is music of mood and passion. Often it summons the power and the beauty of ordered, imaginative and impassioned sound. Doing so, as often it kindles the mind and stirs the emotions. Thus it brings intense sensations. Within the limits palpably set by the composer, the listeners may give those sensations what color and significance they will. H. T. P.

MUSICAL MATTERS

First Performance Here of Mahler's Symphony.

Marie Hall's Farewell Recital
---Cecelia Society.

Concerts of Interest During the Week.

Globe — Feb. 4, 1906

Mr Harold Bauer was the soloist at last week's Symphony rehearsal and concert, playing the piano part in Schumann's A minor concerto. The program opened with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and closed with Gustav Mahler's C sharp minor symphony, a bone of musical contention offered for the first time in this city. The distinguished pianist has so firmly established himself in the good graces of the music-loving public, and his high standard of interpretation has been so consistently maintained, that when it is said Schumann's work was performed by Mr Bauer in a thoroughly sympathetic manner it is readily understood that the beauties of the concerto were delightfully revealed by the gifted soloist. Aside from the splendid contrasts in thematic material and the brilliant playing of the elaborate coda in the first part, there is no need to reiterate praise for the artist whose skill has seemingly conquered about all the secrets of the keyboard. In the second movement and at the allegro his arpeggios and chord runs in the numerous piano and pianissimo passages were the acme of delicate finger work. That Mr Bauer is popular was shown by the generous receptions and later by the recalls to the platform.

Considerable interest has been awakened in the C-sharp minor symphony, by Gustav Mahler, a Bohemian composer whose works have been a fruitful theme for discussion in Germany. This symphony, the fifth, verified the reports of dissensions and variations in opinion regarding it, for it is as fantastic, incoherent and overwhelmingly discordant in the main as any one of the latter-day compositions heard at our concerts in recent years, not forgetting Richard Strauss in his wildest flights of imagination.

The piece is really "gigantic" in its dimensions and requires a very large orchestra, according to the composer, to do justice to the work. There are five parts and Mahler supplies no argument, merely directions such as "with measured step like a funeral train," "stormily," "scherzo," "very slow," etc, leaving the auditor to judge of the import of the music and invent an analysis to suit.

Mahler evidently is a masterhand at instrumentation, for the score bristles with difficulties for the executants, and the bizarre measures are thickly strewn throughout the whole piece. Much of it sounds chaotic, yet the intervals in which the composer shows comparative lucidity in treatment of his themes are melodic and give brief glimpses of a rich imagination that soon runs riot in dissonants and inharmonic utterances. Out of this tumultuous composition may be selected for praise, and likewise enjoyment, the scherzo, which, in the greater part, is beautifully written, especially for the strings. The pizzicato effect was given splendidly by this contingent.

To commend the performance must be largely a matter of form, based upon the usual high grade of work by our orchestra. The horn passages in the first part sounded clear and euphonious and the various attacks appeared to be taken promptly. The "restless" suggestions were vividly shown and the scherzo, as has been mentioned, was played admirably and made the best impression of any portion of the symphony. There were fortissimo passages a-plenty, which doubtless emphasized in proper form the writer's ideas and the wielders of the instruments of percussion labored faithfully and well to bring about desired results.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was performed in the proper spirit, the brilliant finale going with notable dash. The orchestra gave Mr Bauer splendid assistance in the concerto, and in the Mahler symphony it evidently acquitted itself to the satisfaction of Mr Gericke.

The name of Vincent d'Indy will appear on the program of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, as Mr Gericke will present the Symphony, No. 1, for piano and orchestra on a "Mountain Air." At its former performance in this city Mr Bauer was the pianist. At its performance this week the pianist will be Mr Heinrich Gebhard. The first number on the program will be Haydn's symphony in C major; the second will be Saint-Saens' concerto for cello, in A minor. The soloists will be the Belgian cellist, Miss Elsa Ruegger.

MAHLER'S FIFTH SYMPHONY GIVEN

First Performance Here of His Colossal Work at the 14th Symphony Concert Last Evening.

A COMPOSITION OF LENGTH AND STRENGTH

Mr. Bauer's Delightful Performance of Schumann's Piano Concerto "The Pipe of Desire" at Popular Prices.

The programme of the 14th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"....Beethoven
Concerto in A minor for piano...Schumann
Symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5...Mahler

This concert was one of unusual interest. Mr. Gericke conducted the great overture without attempting to find in it effects that the composer did not imagine or contrive; he let the music speak for itself; he did not interrupt the flow of the main movement by changing deliberately the tempo at the appearance of the heavy chords, which are by some supposed to typify the Duke of Alva or Spanish oppression in the Netherlands. There have been German post-Wagner conductors who were sad offenders in this instance, Franz Wuellner, for instance. Mr. Gericke did not sentimentalize by means of impertinent slackening the pace and so-called "interpretation" of measures without special significance, and thus was his reading the more effective.

Mr. Harold Bauer gave a very musical and charming performance of Schumann's concerto. There was an exquisite sense of proportion; there was both poetic expression and suggestion, and in the last movement, which is rhythmically often a stumbling block to many, he played with an apparent simplicity that would have deceived any one not acquainted with the peculiar difficulties. The concerto displayed Mr. Bauer at his best, and all in all his performance is to be ranked with his memorable one of Cesar Franck's quintet with the Kneisels a few seasons ago. Mahler's first symphony was produced in 1894, if not in 1891. Each symphony excited in turn hot discussion. The composer was by some hailed a genius; by others he was mocked as a madman. Now the term "madman," as applied to one that has departed from the conventions or invented something new in art, has lost any peculiar significance of reproach. Disraeli frankly admitted that he was on the side of the angels; the student of musical history can well afford to run the risk of espousing the cause of the madmen. Mahler has his band of wild-eyed partisans, his pamphleteers, who, no doubt, have done him harm. His foes have served him. His five symphonies have been played in German cities; they have been frantically applauded and fiercely hissed; his first symphony has been played even in London (1903), but no one of his important works had been heard in Boston before last week. The first performance in this country of any symphony by Mahler was that of the fourth, in New York, in 1904. The fifth was performed at Cincinnati March 25, 1905. These performances and those of last week in Boston have been the only ones in America.

Conductors have had a reasonable excuse for not producing the second and the third, which demand an extraordinarily large orchestra. The second, also, calls for solo voices and mixed chorus; the third for a solo contralto, female chorus, and boy choir. The two symphonies are very long—the second consumes an hour and 40 minutes. Furthermore, the technical difficulties are great.

Thanks Due to Mr. Gericke for Producing Mahler's Work.

Mr. Gericke therefore deserves hearty thanks for producing one of Mahler's symphonies, producing it with the infinite care in preparation that is characteristic of the man. The production of a work of such huge dimensions, a work peculiar in structure and in its musical speech, does not contribute necessarily to the immediate popularity of a conductor. There are concertgoers who do not like to hear new music unless it makes a direct appeal to them in ways that are obvious, familiar, approved. They do not wish to exert themselves mentally at a concert.

Like Polonius, they are for a jig or a tale of bawdry, or they sleep. Or, fortified with scraps of pedantic information, they turn deaf ears to that which is new, as did the Mastersingers hearing Walther's free rhapsodic song. Vexed, bored, sometimes dimly conscious that there is something in the music which is strangely beautiful or great, and that in the course of time they, too, may understand and enjoy it, their vanity is piqued at the moment, and they either leave the hall, unwilling to confirm their suspicions, or they remain in sullen silence to show courage, as well as disapproval.

The conductor and the orchestra have rehearsed with the utmost patience and with anxious care. Extra rehearsals have been called. The hearer jauntily pronounces a snap judgment: "The symphony does not mean anything. I couldn't make anything out of it. Why does Mr. Gericke put such stuff on the programme?" But is this fair to composer, conductor, orchestra? We all remember how Cesar Franck's great symphony was at first regarded here as the abomination of desolation; how Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," when it was first played here, was ranked as a slap in the face from a lunatic or a charlatan; yet last season both symphony and symphonic poem were repeated "by request," listened to with grateful attention and applauded tumultuously.

There is no programme for Mahler's fifth symphony, and the composer abhors analytical notes. He wishes the audience to hear his music, not to read about it while it is playing. This music needs no programme. It is eloquent in itself.

It has been said that life in Vienna influenced its moods; that the opening dead march was suggested by the military funerals in Vienna; that the scherzo, a Laendler, is characteristically local in spirit; but Mahler's mighty dead march with its episode of shrieking and heaven-defying grief is universal music, and the dance was an expression of joy or of religious feeling centuries before Austria was a marquisate, centuries before the Sultan Soliman laid siege to the Kaiserstadt with his army of 200,000 men. Fortunately for Mahler, the characteristics of his symphony are not merely local.

The movements that will make a direct appeal to the average audience are the dead march, the second movement, or rather the section of it that contains the second theme announced by the cellos and the fourth movement, an exceedingly poetic adagio with themes of rare beauty, especially beautiful in these days when too many themes are purely of cerebral invention. The portions of the Scherzo which are frankly in slow waltz time will please those who do not at one hearing appreciate the significance of the ideas that are tributary to the main waltz themes, or the surprising technical skill displayed in the treatment of the motives. The Rondo Finale is not as a whole so impressively sonorous as the other movements, although the use of the choral which has already appeared in the second movement is most effective.

No Two Persons Hear Music in One and the Same Way.

Music which reaches the heart as well as the nerves and the brain is of all music the most difficult to describe so that a reader who did not hear it can understand in some degree why the emotion of the composer made its irresistible way. Purple phrases and resounding rhetoric may be a sanitary relief to the writer, but they do not convince the reader who had not the opportunity of being moved. It should also be remembered that no two persons, intelligent and sensitive though they may be, hear music in one and the same way. Each is "reminded by the instruments," but that which is awakened in the breast of each is seldom, if ever, the same.

Mahler has been reproached for his poverty of thematic invention. The reproach, as far as this symphony is concerned, is unjust. The simplicity of some of the themes is the simplicity that marks genius. The rich beauty of some of them is enhanced by the spontaneity. The dramatic stab of other themes is equally spontaneous. Nor is there any suspicion of insincerity in the treatment of these themes. Whether the mood, be one of grim resignation, wild despair, naive joy in mere existence, contemplation of beauty in nature or in woman, or whooping exultation, it is never feigned, never forced. The hearer knows that Mahler himself had these mighty or whirling or calm and solemn thoughts and expressed them in his own grandiose or passionate or excited manner. The personality as well as the individuality of this music is overpowering.

The reminiscence-hunter has driven the hunter after forbidden intervals and progressions out of the field, and he will find the happiness peculiar to his kind in detecting here a few measures that suggest thoughts in Beethoven's Ninth, and here a cry that sounds for a moment as though it had been wrenched from Berlioz, and there the Kundry theme from "Parsifal," but in a long work of such amazing originality in conception and execution, such reminders serve a purpose; they entertain those who are unable to find anything else in the symphony that deserves their approbation.

Orchestral technic in this period, when expression is reckoned as of more importance than thought, runs in the streets, as Goethe said of talent. There are a few passages in the symphony that are scored thickly, harshly; yet they make their way, and the instrumentation as a whole is strikingly sonorous, while there are many instances of remarkably individual orchestral expression. The finale on the whole is orchestrally perhaps the least interesting; yet the music itself is potent; it recalls that music heard by De Quincey in an opium dream, the music that suggested to him the "undulations of fast gathering tumults * * * multitudinous movements, infinite cavalcades, tread of innumerable armies." It is music of a mighty preparation; nor does the choral at the end disappoint the expectation.

Music That Is Human Even When Most Fantastical.

This music of Mahler has blood in it. It is human even when it is most fantastical. Its extravagance in expression is titanic, but never incredible. It contains an elemental quality that is often confounded by the super-refined with coarseness; the display of native strength that alarms all feeble folk and all the genteel; this quality is found in nearly all the great in art, from Aeschylus to Thomas Hardy, from Bach to Tchaikowsky. It is never to be confounded with downright vulgarity which is always inartistic, while this peculiar coarseness is heroic whether it be found in Victor Hugo or Verdi, in Henry Fielding or in Wagner. You find it in Shakespeare, Cervantes, Rabelais. You find it in Beethoven and Michael Angelo.

This symphony has blood and tears, frantic joy and wild despair; it also has the saving quality of humor, as in the scherzo. Mahler has expressed his thoughts in a heightened musical speech of the richest harmonic, contrapuntal and orchestral vocabulary. After two hearings, it is an amazing work, full, as is nature, of inequalities, no doubt, but it is the symphony of no ordinary man and no ordinary musician. Long as it is, it rivets the attention from the beginning to the end, and last night the great majority of the audience listened gladly to a new and compelling voice.

The performance was one of extraordinary brilliance, one of which both Mr. Gericke and the orchestra may well be proud. The orchestra was one of virtuosos controlled by the intelligence and the will of a leader who had made the Symphony his own. To particularize is always invidious, yet it may be allowed for once to praise especially the manner in which the first trumpeter performed his arduous and formidable task.

Such a symphony should not be heard once and then put away for a season. It should be heard at two or three concerts in succession, and then impressions might be turned into firm convictions.

Mahler at the Symphony Concert

The second performance of Mahler's symphony on Saturday evening renewed and confirmed the impression that, so far as it discloses him, he is a twentieth-century Berlioz. In matter and in manner it is grandiose. He rears a huge musical structure and seeks to give each detail in its due place and significance. Yet the end leaves the listener with the impression that the structure has not reached the breadth and the height of Mahler's imaginings or each detail burned or caressed as he would have it. Elemental passions and moods, jostling, jarring, striving, choking each other one instant, leaping over each other at another, but always at highest pitch, always fantastical and always striving for fuller expression, fill this structure. The very hugeness of the composer's imaginings, the very intensity of them stand in their own and the composer's way. When they attain to as full expression as Mahler can give them there are moments of such power as those that end the symphony, of such transporting beauty as that of the adagio and of such deep and lambent plethoric impression as that of the "dead march" at the beginning. The strife and torture of other parts of the symphony Mahler lifts sometimes to a wild agony that Berlioz might have envied.

Side by side with all these go on one hand imaginative play with the dance. (Recall the glorified waltz and the masque at the Capulets' in Berlioz's symphonies. Or on the other, measure after measure that seems inchoate striving, muddy obscurity or unimpressive distortion. It is the dramatic and poetic rather than the purely musical quality of Mahler's themes that most impresses the listener. It is not the purely musical development of them, but the emotional and dramatic appeal of his variations and transformations of them that give them significance. They tell as parts of a huge vision in which death and love, despair and elation, agony and resolution pass before the beholder's eyes, rather than as parts of a musical fabric. Yet Mahler, like Berlioz, chooses an established form, and in a measure regards it. Above all it is in the instrumental investiture that Mahler most expresses all that he is imagining, and would put into tones. In his instrumentation he touches power and brings beauty. By that instrumentation he most seizes and aways his hearers.

All these are the traits of Mahler and in higher or lower degree Mahler has them. Now he outstrips the Frenchman; now he lags behind. Often the musical resources and conditions of 1905 give him the advantage over Berlioz struggling with those of 1830. But the impression that Mahler's fifth symphony under Gericke was upon some of his hearers very like that which Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" made the other day under Weingartner. The one conductor matched the other in imaginative grasp of the music and communicating power to impart it with its fullest force to his hearers. That even in Tschalkovski's "Francesca" have Mr. Gericke and our orchestra given such intense sensations. And "Francesca" is pastime, technically, beside this fifth symphony. H. T. P.

Drawn Feb. 6. 1906

der melody, were really welcome.

month another of her songs from the German and the Scotch songs whom one thorough in its beautiful quality, under excellent conducting the other evening expression with melodies whose charm which will always find art. The artist sufficient a very inferior accompaniment—Sigwart zu Eulenburg who had accompanied this season.

that week brought them, "Penthesilea," the latter composer's popularity in Munich with which his

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN.

SYMPHONY in D major (B. & H. No. 2.)

- I. Adagio; Allegro.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto: Trio.
- IV. Allegro spiritoso.

SAINT-SAENS.

CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO and ORCHESTRA, in A minor, No. 1, op. 33.
Allegro non troppo.—Allegretto con moto.—Come prima.

VINCENT D'INDY.

SYMPHONY on a MOUNTAIN AIR, for ORCHESTRA and PIANOFORTE, op. 25.

- I. Assez lent, modérément animé, un peu plus vite, etc.
- II. Assez modéré, mais sans lenteur.
- III. Animé.

Soloist:

Miss ELSA RUEGGER.

Mason and Hamlin Pianoforte.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

well be proud. The orchestra was one of virtuosos controlled by the intelligence and the will of a leader who had made the Symphony his own. To particularize is always invidious, yet it may be allowed for once to praise especially the manner in which the first trumpeter performed his arduous and formidable task.

Such a symphony should not be heard once and then put away for a season. It should be heard at two or three concerts in succession, and then impressions might be turned into firm convictions.

Mahler at the Symphony Concert

The second performance of Mahler's symphony on Saturday evening renewed and confirmed the impression that, so far as it discloses him, he is a twentieth-century Berlioz. In matter and in manner it is grandiose. He rears a huge musical structure and seeks to give each detail in its due place and significance. Yet the end leaves the listener with the impression that the structure has not reached the breadth and the height of Mahler's imaginings or each detail burned or caressed as he would have it. Elemental passions and moods, jostling, jarring, striving, choking each other one instant, leaping over each other at another, but always at highest pitch, always fantastical and always striving for fuller expression, fill this structure. The very hugeness of the composer's imaginings, the very intensity of them stand in their own and the composer's way. When they attain to as full expression as Mahler can give them there are moments of such power as those that end the symphony, of such transporting beauty as that of the adagio and of such deep and lambent pictorial impression as that of the "dead march" at the beginning. The strife and torture of other parts of the symphony Mahler lifts sometimes to a wild agony that Berlioz might have envied.

Side by side with all these go on one hand imaginative play with the dance. (Recall the glorified waltz and the masque at the Capulets' in Berlioz's symphonies. Or on the other, measure after measure that seems inchoate striving, muddy obscurity or unimpressive distortion. It is the dramatic and poetic rather than the purely musical quality of Mahler's themes that most impresses the listener. It is not the purely musical development of them, but the emotional and dramatic appeal of his variations and transformations of them that give them significance. They tell as parts of a huge vision in which death and love, despair and elation, agony and resolution pass before the beholder's eyes, rather than as parts of a musical fabric. Yet Mahler, like Berlioz, chooses an established form, and in a measure regards it. Above all it is in the instrumental investiture that Mahler most expresses all that he is imagining, and would put into tones. In his instrumentation he touches power and brings beauty. By that instrumentation he most seizes and sways his hearers.

All these are the traits of Berlioz and in higher or lower degree Mahler has them. Now he outstrips the Frenchman; now he lags behind. Often the musical resources and conditions of 1905 give him the advantage over Berlioz struggling with those of 1830. But the impression that Mahler's fifth symphony under Gericke was upon some of his hearers very like that which Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" made the other day under Weingartner. The one conductor matched the other in imaginative grasp of the music and communicating power to impart it with its fullest force to his hearers. That even in Tchaikovsky's "Francesca" have Mr. Gericke and our orchestra given such intense sensations. And "Francesca" is pastime, technically, beside this fifth symphony. H. T. P.

der melody, were really lcome.

onh another of her songs from the Ger-sh and the Scotch
gers whom one thor-
a its beautiful quality,
under excellent con-
bly the other evening
ing expression with lodies whose charm
hich will always find
art. The artist suff a very inferior ac-
-Sigwart zu Eulen-
who had accompa-
this season.

that week brought em, "Penthesilea,"
the latter composer
pularity in Munich
y with which his

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN.

SYMPHONY in D major (B. & H. No. 2.)

I. Adagio; Allegro.

II. Andante.

III. Menuetto: Trio.

IV. Allegro spiritoso.

SAINT-SAENS.

CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO and ORCHESTRA, in A minor, No. 1, op. 33.

Allegro non troppo.—Allegretto con moto.—Come prima.

VINCENT D'INDY.

SYMPHONY on a MOUNTAIN AIR, for ORCHESTRA and PIANOFORTE, op. 25.

I. Assez lent, modérément animé, un peu plus vite. etc.

II. Assez modéré, mais sans lenteur.

III. Animé.

Soloist:

Miss ELSA RUEGGER.

Mason and Hamlin Pianoforte.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

well be proud. The orchestra was one of virtuosos controlled by the intelligence and the will of a leader who had made the Symphony his own. To particularize is always invidious, yet it may be allowed for once to praise especially the manner in which the first trumpeter performed his arduous and formidable task.

Such a symphony should not be heard once and then put away for a season. It should be heard at two or three concerts in succession, and then impressions might be turned into firm convictions.

Mahler at the Symphony Concert

The second performance of Mahler's symphony on Saturday evening renewed and confirmed the impression that, so far as it discloses him, he is a twentieth-century Berlioz. In matter and in manner it is grandiose. He rears a huge musical structure and seeks to give it due place and significance leaves the listener with the impression that the structure has not reached the height of Mahler's each detail burned or caressed have it. Elemental passion jostling, jarring, striving, other one instant, leaping over at another, but always at always fantastical and always fuller expression, fill this with very hugeness of the compositions, the very intensity of their own and the composer's they attain to as full expression can give them there are more power as those that end the such transporting beauty as adagio and of such deep and torial impression as that of "march" at the beginning. The torture of other parts of the Mahler lifts sometimes to a level that Berlioz might have envied.

Side by side with all these go imaginative play with the dissonance the glorified waltz and the "Capulets" in Berlioz's symphony the other, measure after measure inchoate striving, muddy obscurative impressive distortion. It is and poetic rather than the quality of Mahler's themes that presses the listener. It is no musical development of the emotional and dramatic appeal tions and transformations of the them significance. They tell a huge vision in which death and and elation, agony and resolution the beholder's eyes, rather than of a musical fabric. Yet Mahler chooses an established form of measure regards it. Above all instrumental investiture that expresses all that he is im would put into tones. In his tion he touches power and beauty. By that instrumentation he moves sways his hearers.

All these are the traits of Berlioz and in higher or lower degree Mahler has them. Now he outstrips the Frenchman; now he lags behind. Often the musical resources and conditions of 1905 give him the advantage over Berlioz struggling with those of 1830. But the impression that Mahler's fifth symphony under Gericke was upon some of his hearers very like that which Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" made the other day under Weingartner. The one conductor matched the other in imaginative grasp of the music and communicating power to impart it with its fullest force to his hearers. That even in Tchaikovsky's "Francesca" have Mr. Gericke and our orchestra given such intense sensations. And "Francesca" is pastime, technically, beside this fifth symphony.

H. T. P.

ELSA RUEGGER.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN.

SYMPHONY in D major (B. & H. No. 2.)

I. Adagio; Allegro.

II. Andante.

III. Menuetto: Trio.

IV. Allegro spiritoso.

SAINT-SAENS.

CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO and ORCHESTRA, in A minor, No. 1, op. 33.

Allegro non troppo.—Allegretto con moto.—Come prima.

VINCENT D'INDY.

SYMPHONY on a MOUNTAIN AIR, for ORCHESTRA and PIANOFORTE, op. 25.

I. Assez lent, modérément animé, un peu plus vite, etc.

II. Assez modéré, mais sans lenteur.

III. Animé.

Soloist:

Miss ELSA RUEGGER.

Mason and Hamlin Pianoforte.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

ELSA RUEGGER,

A young cellist who has made a favorable impression on American audiences

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adm — PROGRAMME. Feb 12/1906
Haydn—Symphony in D minor.
St. Saens—Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, A minor.
Soloist, Miss Elsa Ruegger.
D'Indy—Symphony on a Mountain Air. Piano and Orchestra.
Pianist, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.

The Haydn symphony received an excellent reading and performance. In the slow movement there were a few dramatic touches that seemed but tepid beside the effects that we are accustomed to in these Mahlerian days. We have supped full of horrors, and Haydn's theatrical points seem almost like an endeavor to paint a battle-scene with a pot of cold cream. Even his picture of Chaos ("Creation") and his thunder storm ("The Seasons") do not arouse anything deeper than the curiosity of the auditor; his tempests seem but sprinklings of rose-water.

But when he remains his own jovial and melodious self he has a charm that does not fade. Therefore the finale of this symphony, with its drone bass, its hearty rusticity, and its genial tunes, was the most pleasing and most effective part of the work, and the slow movement, in which more powerful things were attempted, the weakest.

We believe, when posterity has accomplished its shifting, that Saint-Saens will rank with the best of the French composers of the last half of the 19th century. His 20th century compositions show a little falling off, possibly due to age, or to having written too much. It seems more difficult to write a great cello concerto than one for the piano or the violin; at all events there is no cello concerto which rises to the rank of the violin concertos of Beethoven, or Brahms, or Bruch, or even Mendelssohn, while there are a dozen piano concertos which excel the best cello concertos ever composed,—and we reckon St. Saens' work among these latter.

Miss Ruegger bestrides her violoncello with more mastery than ever before. Her intonation is always secure even in the most trying passages of double-stopping; her broad tones in C-string work were commendable; and above all there was a sympathetic quality that deserved warm praise. She rose to the brilliancy of the finale in excellent shape, overcoming its technical difficulties with artistic ease.

The orchestra, too, was very effective in this work, and Mr. Hess gave good support to the soloist. Our present concert-meister is proving himself a conductor of good rank. The orchestra has much to do in this concerto. St. Saens has not made it a violoncello solo with accompaniment. The orchestral parts are not mere background, but even the transitions and returning-passages become integral parts of the work. At its end there was great applause, and Miss Ruegger was recalled 3 times with much fervor.

D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air," for piano and orchestra, is a much more intelligible and a much more beautiful work than that Symphonie Mathématique with which he followed it. Mountain air is known to be good for consumptives and asthmatics, and it seems also to be good for those suffering from tonal complications. The work is not classed as a piano concerto. The piano part is sunk in the ensemble far more than it would have been in a Chopin, Schumann, or Liszt concerto, but scarcely more than is the case in large portions of Brahms' second, or Beethoven's Fourth or fifth concertos.

Mr. Gebhard deserves much praise for his surety of performance, although occasionally we found the instrument too prominently in the foreground.

The use of piano as a definite orchestral color is by no means new, but it has never been very successful. Glinka and Berlioz were the first to use it thus, and, in later times St. Saens and our American composer, Van der Stucken, have employed the piano as an integral part of the orchestra, but the instrument does not blend well with the orchestra when thus employed; when used as a foil, a contrasted color, in solo work, it is much more successful.

There is an immense amount of thematic development in this work. It does not much matter if the mountaineer could no longer recognize his own melody, so long as the musical auditor could trace it through its various transformations. The intellectuality of M. D'Indy is not tiresome, in slicing up this theme, and the transformations do not seem so labored or so ascetic as the figure treatment in his second symphony or his string quartette.

The presentation of the mountain air upon the English horn in the first movement, and the viola in the second, gives a variety that is very agreeable; both instruments picture dreamy melancholy, yet the string and wind tone afford sufficient contrast. There are strong climaxes in the work, and the finale is a wild revelry such as Bizet could have given gloriously, in fact it suggests the Carillon of that composer's "Arlesienne." It gives more of the Bourree effect than of the Tarantella, although it finally presents a touch of the latter rhythm.

A word of praise may be interpolated here for good playing on the horns. A short time ago their playing seemed insecure and their tones sometimes "broke," but in the Mahler symphony, and in this work, they have done some difficult playing perfectly.

We found the symphony more interesting on a second hearing than at first, and this is but natural in so complicated a development of figures and themes. Nevertheless we still feel that the direction which D'Indy and some others are taking, towards the extreme of complexity, is an error, a sort of musical "imperial madness."

Such men as Mahler, Strauss, D'Indy, or Loeffler, begin by attaining a mastery over their orchestral forces that causes everything to seem possible to them. Then

ELSA RUEGGER,

A young cellist who has made a favorable impression on American audiences

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Haydn—Symphony in D minor.

St. Saens—Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, A minor.

Soloist, Miss Elsa Ruegger.

D'Indy—Symphony on a Mountain Air. Piano and Orchestra.

Pianist, Mr. Heinrich Gebhard.

The Haydn symphony received an excellent reading and performance. In the slow movement there were a few dramatic touches that seemed but tepid beside the effects that we are accustomed to in these Mahlerian days. We have supped full of horrors, and Haydn's theatrical points seem almost like an endeavor to paint a battle-scene with a pot of cold cream. Even his picture of Chaos ("Creation") and his thunder storm ("The Seasons") do not arouse anything deeper than the curiosity of the auditor; his tempests seem but sprinklings of rose-water.

But when he remains his own jovial and melodious self he has a charm that does not fade. Therefore the finale of this symphony, with its drone bass, its hearty rusticity, and its genial tunes, was the most pleasing and most effective part of the work, and the slow movement, in which more powerful things were attempted, the weakest.

We believe, when posterity has accomplished its shifting, that Saint-Saens will rank with the best of the French composers of the last half of the 19th century. His 20th century compositions show a little falling off, possibly due to age, or to having written too much. It seems more difficult to write a great cello concerto than one for the piano or the violin; at all events there is no cello concerto which rises to the rank of the violin concertos of Beethoven, or Brahms, or Bruch, or even Mendelssohn, while there are a dozen piano concertos which excel the best cello concertos ever composed,—and we reckon St. Saens' work among these latter.

Miss Ruegger bestrides her violoncello with more mastery than ever before. Her intonation is always secure even in the most trying passages of double-stopping; her broad tones in C-string work were commendable; and above all there was a sympathetic quality that deserved warm praise. She rose to the brilliancy of the finale in excellent shape, overcoming its technical difficulties with artistic ease.

The orchestra, too, was very effective in this work, and Mr. Hess gave good support to the soloist. Our present concertmaster is proving himself a conductor of good rank. The orchestra has much to do in this concerto. St. Saens has not made it a violoncello solo with accompaniment. The orchestral parts are not mere background, but even the transitions and returning-passages become integral parts of the work. At its end there was great applause, and Miss Ruegger was recalled 3 times with much fervor.

D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air," for piano and orchestra, is a much more intelligible and a much more beautiful work than that Symphonie Mathématique with which he followed it. Mountain air is known to be good for consumptives and asthmatics, and it seems also to be good for those suffering from tonal complications. The work is not classed as a piano concerto. The piano part is sunk in the ensemble far more than it would have been in a Chopin, Schumann, or Liszt concerto, but scarcely more than is the case in large portions of Brahms' second, or Beethoven's Fourth or fifth concertos.

Mr. Gebhard deserves much praise for his surety of performance, although occasionally we found the instrument too prominently in the foreground.

The use of piano as a definite orchestral color is by no means new, but it has never been very successful. Glinka and Berlioz were the first to use it thus, and, in later times St. Saens and our American composer, Van der Stucken, have employed the piano as an integral part of the orchestra, but the instrument does not blend well with the orchestra when thus employed; when used as a foil, a contrasted color, in solo work, it is much more successful.

There is an immense amount of thematic development in this work. It does not much matter if the mountaineer could no longer recognize his own melody, so long as the musical auditor could trace it through its various transformations. The intellectuality of M. D'Indy is not tiresome, in slicing up this theme, and the transformations do not seem so labored or so ascetic as the figure treatment in his second symphony or his string quartette.

The presentation of the mountain air upon the English horn in the first movement, and the viola in the second, gives a variety that is very agreeable; both instruments picture dreamy melancholy, yet the string and wind tone afford sufficient contrast. There are strong climaxes in the work, and the finale is a wild revelry such as Bizet could have given gloriously. In fact it suggests the Carillon of that composer's "Arlesienne." It gives more of the Bourree effect than of the Tarantella, although it finally presents a touch of the latter rhythm.

A word of praise may be interpolated here for good playing on the horns. A short time ago their playing seemed insecure and their tones sometimes "broke," but in the Mahler symphony, and in this work, they have done some difficult playing perfectly.

We found the symphony more interesting on a second hearing than at first, and this is but natural in so complicated a development of figures and themes. Nevertheless we still feel that the direction which D'Indy and some others are taking, towards the extreme of complexity, is an error, a sort of musical "imperial madness."

Such men as Mahler, Strauss, D'Indy, or Loeffler, begin by attaining a mastery over their orchestral forces that causes everything to seem possible to them. Then each succeeding composition is pressed by them further along the thorny road, in an endeavor to outvie all other composers and all their own preceding compositions.

Strauss was not content to stop with his great "Death and Transfiguration" or "Till Eulenspiegel," but must needs picture a Brobdignagian household in a foolishly named "Sinfonia Domestica," and then an opera that seems on the portico of the madhouse, and he will undoubtedly try to advance (?) still further, since Mahler and the pack are at his heels.

D'Indy achieves this masterful "Mountain Air Symphony" and immediately urges his muse beyond it, taking, in his string quartette, 4 notes which Beethoven developed sensibly for a few phrases in his Pastoral Symphony (the first 4 notes of the first-movement) and juggling with them an hour, and giving a degree of note-figuring in his second symphony that places Arithmetic far above Poetry.

Loeffler shows his orchestral power, and his poetry, too, in "The Death of Tintagiles," and feeling his orchestral strength, plunges into every morbid subject that he can discover, discarding everything except glow of tone-colors in his later works. And, as some find these things different from all that has gone before, as they only half-understand them, and the bitter flavor is new to their jaded palates, they hail these abnormal things as great.

We must wait with patience the revolution; we must abide the coming of a great orchestral tone-master who will bring Music to a more rational, a less eccentric path. Meanwhile, we ought to be thankful that our mad geniuses are so extreme, for it will make the illness shorter.

Louis C. Elson.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Two Soloists Heard at the Symphony.

Elsa Ruegger and Heinrich Gebhard Assisting Artists.

Haydn's D major symphony, the cello concerto in A minor by Saint-Saens, with Miss Elsa Ruegger as soloist, and D'Indy's symphony on a mountain air, Mr Heinrich Gebhard playing the piano part of the latter work, made up the program for the 15th Symphony rehearsal and concert in Symphony hall. It is seldom that a woman elects to become a cellist, the violin or piano being more in her line; yet Miss Ruegger has many times given evidence here and elsewhere that she made no mistake in her choice, for the young artist's work is of the highest merit and ranks with cellists of the sterner sex who have world wide reputations. The Saint-Saens' concert does not call for the deepest emotional expression, simple themes elaborately figured and contrasted forming the greater part of the three movements. Miss Ruegger played the work splendidly throughout, her fingering being very true and the lights and shades showing skilful bowing. The intricate jumps in chord passages were managed admirably, the notes being clear and void of the too familiar rasping sound, and the whole interpretation was brilliant and melodic and displayed the young woman's splendid qualities in most favorable light. Miss Ruegger's reception was most flattering in warmth and spontaneity.

The D'Indy symphony is charming in character and suggests little or nothing of the later works by the French composer. The plaintive little mountain air that runs through the three movements is cleverly apportioned to the different contingents including a piano, which is treated as part of the orchestra, and there are delightful combinations of piano and harp in the first and third parts. The second movement is stately in character, the other two lighter and more lively, although the liberal use of the wood winds almost continually emphasizes the pastoral character of the composition.

Mr Gebhard performed his part excellently, always retaining the proper relation to the other instruments, although at times the piano appeared a silent and unnecessary factor on account of the orchestral preponderance. The horns in the second part were in splendid harmony and the piano figurations here were also delightfully introduced. The various groups of instruments played in perfect unison and the whole work was so thoroughly enjoyable that it partly effaced in some minds the D'Indy of the present day.

The program opened with a standard interpretation of the Haydn symphony, which though old-fashioned in spots is still a grand work. The orchestra, under Mr Hess, played its part in the cello concerto in thorough accord with the soloist, Miss Ruegger.

The orchestra will be away this week on its fourth trip. The program for Feb 23 and 24 will include the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz," Rubinstein's D minor piano concerto, Mr Ernest Hutcheson of Baltimore, soloist, and Mahler's fifth symphony, the latter given by request.

Boston Transcript

324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1906

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

CONTRASTS OF A CENTURY AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

From Haydn to d'Indy by Way of Saint-Saens—Mahler's Symphony to Be Repeated—Concerts of the Week and the Month to Come—A New Pianist

A symphony by Haydn, a concerto for violoncello by Saint-Saens, with Miss Ruegger to play the solo part, and d'Indy's fantasia, variations, or symphony, as he chooses to call it, "on a French mountain song," made the programme at the symphony concert yesterday afternoon. It leaped from 1795 to 1886 in the two symphonies, pausing at 1872 for the concerto. It embraced as well the music of three widely different men in as widely different styles. It may be worth while to try to fancy each of them as he sat down to the writing of that music.

Haydn, released from his service to Prince Esterhazy in Vienna, had made a contract with Salomon, the London manager, to write so many symphonies and other pieces, and to "preside" at the performance of them. Never before had he earned so much for his work. Never had Vienna honored him as London was now honoring him. Never had fresh surroundings and a general sense of well-being so stimulated him, though probably he was not directly conscious of the stimulation. So he wrote this symphony in D major for Salomon's concert on the 4th of May, 1795, with never so much as a thought that an orchestra would be playing it overseas in America on the 9th of February, 1906. Probably he took no thought of anything but his "job," as he calls it in his diary. He invented his melodies. He developed them and figured them according to his fancy, feeling, and the taste of the time. He bent his chosen form to his needs, with no thought again that he was broadening and remodelling it for his successors. The symphony "sounded." Now it was placid. Now it was sprightly. It would gratify Salomon. Probably it would please the audiences that heard it. He had put into it what fancy and feeling and scholarship there were in him. He had touched it even with the new elasticity and dignity of life and spirit that the change in his circumstances had brought him. After all, he was only a maker of music, a weaver of patterns in tones for the sensuous pleasure those patterns might give. He was a craftsman, working industriously and rather affectionately at his craft. What feeling his love for it kindled in him went into the music. So did the animation of his own spirit. It happens that the weaving of patterns in tones gives very much the same sensuous pleasure in 1906 as it did in 1795. Perhaps even that pleasure may be heightened by the warmth of mood, the felicity of accent, the fluent melody and the grace of ornament with which Mr. Gericke and his men played this same symphony yesterday. But Haydn was no prophet of the future. He was much too busy with an agreeable present.

Seventy-four years later Saint-Saens duly set himself to the writing of a concerto for violoncello. No virtuoso, so far as records go, had commissioned him to write it, and there was none whom he was eager to oblige. It is hard to believe that any composer, in these days, ever wrote such a concerto from an irresistible and pursuing impulse. If he did, the impulse must have fainted and nearly vanished in the actual process. But the making of such a concerto is a part of the whole duty of a rounded composer if he is to leave a becoming assortment of baggage behind him. Symphonies, "tone poems" and operas are his vocation, perhaps even concertos for violin or piano. When he writes for 'cello it is rather a scholarly avocation. Saint-Saens took thought of the limitations and capabilities of the chosen instrument. Steadily he subdued himself to those limitations; now and then he illuminated those capabilities. He took thought also of the orchestral part of the concerto, that it should serve the solo 'cello and yet be interesting in itself. Scholarship and practice rather than imaginative individual invention suggested his musical material and his treatment of it. The result was well-made music, skilfully suited to its purpose, always in good taste, more interesting than much that has been written for the 'cello, and holding its place in the repertory for the instrument these thirty years. It is music for its own sake as much as Haydn's symphony, but it is the music of scholarship and reasoned purpose rather than the outflow of spontaneous talent and temperament.

D'Indy has long loved mountains, bare and rude mountains. Out of them his family came. To them he likes to return. In those mountains he heard a melody, that young girls sang full-throated. It caught his ear, kindled his fancy and dwelt in it. There was suggestion in it to his musical imagination. He felt in the imaginings it lighted some of the moods that the mountains awakened in him. Here was matter for musical thought and expression. He chose his form and named it a symphony, with the mountain song linking the three movements that compose it and providing the material for them. More properly it is a fantasia, and very reasonably it is a set of variations on a large scale of the mountain song. He added a piano to the usual symphonic orchestra. Often he joined or contrasted harp and piano that he might express his musical ideas and suggest the emotions behind the more clearly and precisely.

172

Then d'Indy in his turn took thought, deep, sedulous, ingenious thought. Out of that thought came variation upon variation of his chosen mountain song, and subtle development of the musical material in it. Steadily, however, these variations and these subtleties served feelings that were not purely musical. Perhaps, here and there, listening imaginations kindled by a spark from the composer's might hear the breath, soft or fierce, of mountain winds, catch the clear glint of mountain sunshine, feel the cool calm of wooded rustling valleys, or the stable might of cliffs and slopes above. There should be something of the wildness, the loneliness, the grip and weight and rest of mountains in the music. The listener should hear the voices of the full-throated girls in their wistful song and their dances on a Saint's Day festival. Thought should shape the contents of the symphony; feeling color it, after its kind, and every needful instrumental voice give it expression. Learning and ingenuity should be but the aids to these ends, and in the finished symphony should be intellectual, emotional and sensuous design, contents, and expression as in some poem in tones.

Haydn, Saint-Saëns, and d'Indy each in turn accomplished his purpose. To each of them Mr. Gericke and our orchestra, with Miss Ruegger in the concerto and Mr. Gebhard in the piano part of the symphony gave understanding and imaginative expression. Music it all was, but music that curiously ranged and contrasted the old, the new, and the mediocrity that sits between. H. T. P.

D'INDY WORK BY SYMPHONY

Traveller — Feb. 6/12

Two symphonies and a concerto made up the programme of the 15th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Saturday night. Miss Elsa Ruegger, 'cellist, was the soloist for Saint-Saëns' concerto in A minor, while Heinrich Gebhard was at the piano during the performance of Vincent d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air," for orchestra and piano. Haydn was represented by his symphony in D major.

D'Indy's recent presence as a visiting conductor of this orchestra made the performance of his symphony doubly interesting. While the symphony is not comparable with the one in B flat major of the same composer, it is a work of merit. It contains more of the elements that make for "popularity" than does the D'Indy symphony just referred to, which probably will be

15TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the 15th Symphony concert at Symphony Hall last evening was as follows:

Symphony in D.....Haydn
Concerto for violoncello.....Saint-Saëns
Symphony on a "Mountain Air," with piano obligato, Op. 25.....D'Indy

Elsa Ruegger was the soloist, and the pianist in the D'Indy symphony was Heinrich Gebhard. The Haydn symphony, although more appropriate nowadays for a small orchestra in a medium-sized hall, was given in a manner that was highly pleasing to the audience. The symphony by D'Indy was the feature of the concert, and this was its second performance here in Boston, the first, with Harold Bauer as the assisting pianist, being nearly four years ago.

It is difficult to preserve recollections of such a work as this, heard only once, and with a lapse of several seasons intervening. The central themes are folk songs heard among the Pyrenees, and they are characteristic and pleasing. The structure is apparently not so complex and learned as the second symphony of this composer, heard under his direction last December, but is more pleasing and comprehensive to the average listener. The piano part is prominent, and occasionally the symphony assumes more the work of a concerto. The whole is a work of much character, imagination and ingenious in treatment. The performance was exquisite in detail, and Mr. Gebhard contributed much toward the success of the general presentation.

Miss Ruegger returns after an absence of some four years, with added technical equipment, and played with a maturity as to artistic interpretation that was lacking on former occasions. Her performance was marked also by a tone that was fairly powerful, and there was great applause, as well as several recalls, as a reward for her admirable work. There will be no rehearsal and concert this coming week.

ranked in time to come a world's masterpiece. The worked played Saturday night is "nearer the ground," so to speak, and is more melodious. Mr. Gebhard met all the requirements of the score with ample artistic resources.

The Haydn work is in the usual style of this composer. The melodies are more or less frank and always agreeable, and the entire composition is distinguished for its delicacy. In this and the other symphony Mr. Gericke led his band with great care.

Miss Ruegger made her third appearance at a symphony concert in Boston, and was rewarded by prolonged applause. She played with discretion and restraint.

There will be no concert this week, the orchestra being on its fourth trip for this season. At the next concert, Feb. 24, Mahler's fifth symphony will be repeated, in accordance with requests.

D'INDY AND HAYDN CONTRASTED AT SYMPHONY.

Broad Jump Is Taken by Mr. Gericke and His Players from 18th Century Elegance to Modern French Music

By Kent Perkins.

Again Mr. Gericke and the Symphony Orchestra took a long musical leap last night at the fifteenth concert of the season in Symphony Hall. It was a jump from the melodious Eighteenth Century elegance of Haydn in his Symphony in D Major (B. & H., No. 2), to Vincent d'Indy, the ultra-modern Frenchman. A stepping stone midway in this broad space was furnished by a Saint Saëns' concerto in A Minor, No. 1, for violoncello and orchestra, op. 33. Miss Elsa Ruegger was the solo 'cellist.

The hall was crowded, but many regular Symphony patrons were not present and their seats were occupied by substitutes. Whether this was due to a lack of interest in D'Indy or the absence of a renowned soloist would be hard to determine. Perhaps both causes were operative.

If it were possible for a Symphony concert to be uninteresting this one would have been so, but like the famed beverage of Kentucky, all Symphony products are good, though some are better than others. The level, unmoving beauties of Haydn were sounded with charming nicety and all the expressiveness that they were capable of receiving. Miss Ruegger was received with warm friendliness and was called out thrice after the concerto.

The D'Indy piece was given with consummate skill and sympathy. It was his symphony based on a mountain air for orchestra and piano and the Symphony artists were efficiently aided in the interpretation of the work by Heinrich Gebhard, who was at the piano. D'Indy is a lover of the mountains. He speaks of them with deep affection. He lives much among them. Consequently when he takes a peasant melody of the lofty hills and uses it as the basis of a musical phantasy, as in the symphony of last night, the result is infused with much more sincerity and is less marred by pervading affectation than are most of his musical efforts.

The mountain melody that he uses is a simple, sweet little song with a plaintive lilt. It runs through the whole work and is adorned with many beautiful harmonic decorations. It is not swamped by the variations that are built upon it. D'Indy allows it to be heard in its full length most of the times when it appears, and consequently, the work as a whole does not give the impression of being a jumble of more or less harmonious sound that much of his music does. The little mountain song makes it coherent and human.

There is none of the composer's alleged "intellectuality" in the work. There are suggestions of lofty sunlit peaks, of mountain vistas, of forest mystery, of storm beaten cliffs of glittering starlight in high altitudes and of a rollicking peasant festival. Therefore on the whole the symphony seems like real music, and that too of a more than ordinary character, and is not merely a chaotic succession of orchestral stunts.

There will be no Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday, as the orchestra will be on tour. At the sixteenth pair of concerts in the following week Gustav Mahler's symphony No. 5, which was produced a week ago, will be repeated by request and will be heard with great

SYMPHONY TO PLAY D'INDY COMPOSITION

Distinguished Frenchman's
First Big Work Will Be Heard Next Week.

LOCAL MUSICAL NEWS.

The name of Vincent d'Indy will again appear on the Symphony programmes, for on next week, Friday afternoon and evening, the Symphony orchestra, with Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, will play the distinguished Frenchman's first symphony, for orchestra and piano, "On a Mountain Air." This work has already been heard in Boston, having been played in April, 1902, with Harold Bauer at the piano. It is by all odds the best-liked and most popular of d'Indy's compositions, and when played in New York this season by the New York Symphony orchestra it attracted most favorable notice.

The symphony is in three parts. It was composed in 1886 and performed for the first time at a Lamoureux concert in Paris on March 20, 1887, with Mme. Boddes-Pene at the piano.

Two other numbers will figure on the programme. The first will be Haydn's symphony in C major (B & H No. 7), and Saint-Saëns' concerto for the violoncello, No. 1, in A minor.

The soloist will be Miss Elsa Ruegger, the popular Belgian 'cellist.

175

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

WEBER.

OVERTURE to the opera "Der Freischuetz."

RUBINSTEIN.

CONCERTO in D minor, No. 4, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, op. 70.

- I. Moderato.
- II. Moderato assai.
- III. Allegro assai.

GUSTAV MAHLER.

SYMPHONY in C sharp minor, No. 5.

PART I.

- I. Dead March. With measured step. Like a funeral train. Suddenly faster, passionately, wildly. A tempo. C sharp minor.
- II. Stormily restless. With utmost vehemence. A minor.

PART II.

- III. Scherzo. With force but not too fast. D major.

PART III.

- IV. Adagietto. Very slow. F major.
- V. Rondo. Finale. Allegro. D major.

Repeated by request.

Soloist:

Mr. ERNEST HUTCHESON.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

WEBER.

OVERTURE to the opera "Der Freischuetz."

RUBINSTEIN

CONCERTO in D minor, No. 4, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, op. 70.

- I. Moderato.
- II. Moderato assai.
- III. Allegro assai.

GUSTAV MAHLER.

SYMPHONY in C sharp minor, No. 5.

PART I.

- I. Dead March. With measured step. Like a funeral train. Suddenly faster, passionately, wildly. A tempo. C sharp minor.
- II. Stormily restless. With utmost vehemence. A minor.

PART II.

- III. Scherzo. With force but not too fast. D major.

PART III.

- IV. Adagietto. Very slow. F major.
- V. Rondo. Finale. Allegro. D major.

Repeated by request.

Soloist:

Mr. ERNEST HUTCHESON.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Wilhelm Gericke, Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Who Has Resigned

[Photo by Chickering.]

GERICKE RESIGNS AS CONDUCTOR OF THE SYMPHONY

Will Leave the Boston Orchestra at End of Present Season.

HAD BEEN OFFERED
THE POST FOR 1906-7

Agreed Under Certain Conditions, Which Were Not Accepted.

WHO WILL SUCCEED
HIM NOT ANNOUNCED

Mr. Gericke Says That He Is Planning to Return to Europe.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke has resigned his position as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. His resignation will take effect at the end of this season, the 25th of the organization. The last concert of the season will be on April 28.

There have been rumors of late, especially in New York, to the effect that the orchestra would have a new conductor next season, and a music journal of New York named not long ago Mr. Vincent d'Indy as the coming man. This prophecy fell on deaf ears, for Mr. d'Indy is not a conductor by profession; his time is devoted to composition and the supervision of the Schola Cantorum, in which he is much interested. He was invited to conduct certain concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra this season solely as a prominent representative of the modern French school, and not as a virtuoso or a routine conductor.

Inasmuch as these rumors, at first vague, began to assume a more definite shape, a reporter of The Herald called on Mr. Gericke yesterday afternoon at his home in Brookline. Mr. Gericke received the reporter and when he was asked whether there was any foundation for the reports concerning his resignation and his consequent return to Europe, he courteously gave the desired information.

It appears that Mr. Gericke was offered an engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the season of 1906-1907. After due reflection he informed Maj. Henry L. Higginson that he would accept the offer on certain conditions, which he named. These conditions did not meet with Maj. Higginson's approval. Mr. Gericke therefore felt obliged to decline the offer. The correspondence between Maj. Higginson and Mr. Gericke was closed early this week.

The news of Mr. Gericke's resignation will be heard by the lovers of music in this city, and it is not too much to say throughout musical America, with sincere regret; but this is not the time to speak at length of his unwearied devotion to the duties of his position, of his high ideals, of his invaluable services to musical art.

Mr. Gericke, conductor of the court opera of Vienna and of the Gesellschaft's concerts of that city, was invited in 1884 to be conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He accepted the invitation, and began his duties in October of that year. He resigned his position in the spring of 1889. Then came Mr. Nikisch (1889-1893) and Mr. Paur (1893-1898). Mr. Gericke was again invited to be the conductor, and he has held the position since the fall of 1898. Thus at the end of this season he will have been the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 13 years.

In answer to a question about his plans for the future, Mr. Gericke said that he should return to Europe. (The orchestra, at the end of this season, will have given at least 111 concerts.) Mr. Gericke had nothing to say about his successor, who he might be.

LEADER GERICKE GETS AN OVATION

Journal — July 26. 06

The warm and remarkably long-continued applause that greeted Mr. Gericke when he appeared upon the stage at Saturday evening's Symphony concert was testimony to the personal esteem in which he is held and to the general regret among music lovers that after a few more concerts he will be seen here no more. Conductors will come and go, but it is doubtful if any will ever head our orchestra who will "wear" better, month in and month out than Gericke.

The great event of the evening was the repetition of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, heard here for the first time only a few weeks ago. The colossal work compels no less of admiration than before. It is an astounding new voice in art, a magnificent outpouring of a great man's heart. It may be iron music, for the most part, but the iron is magnetized. One may deride its savage cacophony, call it the wild outburst of musical madness, but no one can fail to sit up and hear its message. Therein is its essential difference from the formally abstruse and supernaturally dull symphony of Vincent d'Indy's, over which so much Boston discussion has recently raged. This work has all varieties of expression, from the overpowering splendor of pathos in its first movement to the supreme loveliness of its adagietto. The performance was again extraordinarily fine and compelling.

Weber's "Freischütz" overture was played with supreme finish and care, but it made little or no emotional effect. Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, the soloist, gave Rubinstein's D minor piano-forte concerto with brilliant and fluent technique, although he lacked something in the more poetic passages of the noble work.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Sixteenth of Season's Symphony Concerts.

Tucker's Sunday Chamber Concerts—Operatic Society.

Hammerstein Grand Opera—Current Gossip.

Globe Feb. 23-1906

For the program of the 16th Symphony rehearsal and concert Mr Gericke repeated the long and difficult Mahler symphony No. 5, first played here three weeks ago; Mr Ernest Hutcheson was soloist in Rubinstein's fourth piano concerto and the concerts opened with the overture to Weber's "Der Freischütz." Since the puzzling Mahler composition was first heard here the orchestra has introduced the work to New York and there appears to be many men of many minds about the meaning, importance and coherence of this form of musical utterance; the resulting criticisms being, as usual, widely at variance as a rule. As to the length, wealth of thematic material and skill in orchestration opinions are a unit; but aside from these points there is little unanimity shown in the notices of the performance.

Possibly Mr Gericke gave a smoother interpretation yesterday than at the earlier performances, which would be quite natural by reason of his men being more familiar with the score; but it did not appear to be any more effective, the contrasts were no more pronounced and the riot of dissonants sounded about the same. It was a "gigantic" work when revealed three weeks ago and a second hearing impresses the auditor with the sense that it will become one of the standard numbers in the repertory of big orchestras.

The scherzo and the first movement, the "Dead March," again appeared to give the greater satisfaction of the five divisions. The horn phrases in the first part were of beautiful tonality, a repetition, possibly improved a bit, of the former performances, and in the dainty scherzo the strings were notably good in the pizzicato measures. The necessary energy was displayed in the fortissimo passages to make them effective, yet the vagueness of the work remained despite the skill shown in its interpretation.

The soloist was Mr Ernest Hutcheson, a pianist, who is well and favorably known, his contribution being the piano part of Rubinstein's D minor concerto. Mr Hutcheson delivered the pompous opening phrases with impressive force and showed commendable finger dexterity in the long coda and cadenza. The poetic nature of the second movement was admirably indicated, and in the final movement there was plenty of dash and celerity, though lacking some in clarity, in his execution. His work was thoroughly pleasing and deserved the plaudits with which he was greeted at the close of his performance. The orchestra provided the usual reliable assistance, and in the Weber overture gave renewed evidence of its skill in ensemble work which made the familiar number very enjoyable.

Two novelties will be given at this week's concerts, Mr Frederick Converse's musical setting of Keats' ballade, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," and Ernst Boehe's symphonic poem, "Odysseus Ausfahrt und Schiffsbruch." The soloist will be Mr David Bispham, who will be heard in the Converse selection, an aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," and an old English song, Mendelssohn's overture, "The Fair Melusina," and the second symphony by Richard Strauss will complete the program.

An "Orchestral Trip" Feb. 12-06

"There will be no concerts next week," said the programme at the Symphony concert Saturday night, "the orchestra will be making its February trip." And after the last climax of d'Indy's symphony, conductor and band disappeared from view here in Boston not to return to their own stage for a fortnight. Where do they go and what do they do meantime? Early Sunday evening they leave Boston for Philadelphia. There they arrive Monday morning. Monday evening they give a concert in the old Academy of Music. Tuesday morning they go to Washington. There in a theatre at the unusual hour of 4.30, they give a concert Tuesday afternoon. Two reasons dictate the unusual hour. The only presentable concert rooms in Washington are the auditoriums of the theatres. Therefore the concert must take place in the afternoon, so that it may not interfere with the regular evening performance. The hour, 4.30, suits the convenience of the officials and clerks in the departments of the Government, and they make a large part of the audience. The same evening the orchestra turns back to Baltimore, and there on Wednesday night it gives the third concert of the trip. Immediately afterward it leaves for New York. There it arrives Thursday morning, and on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon it gives concerts in Carnegie Hall. Between whiles, on Friday evening it appears in Brooklyn, and since the Academy of Music there was burned, in a "Baptist Temple."

These six concerts are the regular routine of each of the monthly trips. Sometimes they end with the matinée on Saturday in New York, and the orchestra returns that evening to Boston. Of late, however, it is becoming the custom to add a concert or two on Monday or Tuesday evening of the next week in some small city, like Hartford or Albany or Poughkeepsie, that the band visits only occasionally. On the present trip, for example, the orchestra leaves New York next Sunday morning for Buffalo, and there it gives a concert on Monday evening. The next morning it starts eastward, halting at Troy for a concert on Tuesday evening. Immediately afterward, it departs for home, and on Wednesday it is back here again in time for rehearsals for the next pair of regular concerts.

It is Mr. Gericke's strict rule to make his programmes for these concerts in other cities from music that we in Boston have already heard in the regular course of the season. Usually there is some variation in the programme for each of the six or eight concerts abroad, but often the material for them comes largely from the two concerts that the orchestra has given at home in the fortnight preceding its departure. Sometimes, however, the music chosen has been played here earlier in the series. As with the music, so with the soloists. Sometimes the same singer or virtuoso appears at each of the concerts of the trip. Sometimes two or three are distributed through them. But almost invariably they have previously assisted at the concerts at home. Here, for example, are the programmes for the trip that begins today:

Philadelphia—
Weber: Overture, "Freischütz."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Violoncello.
Mahler: Symphony No. 5.
Soloist, Miss Elsa Ruegger.

Washington—
Beethoven: Overture, "Egmont."
Schubert: Unfinished Symphony.
Schumann: Concerto for Pianoforte.
Tchaikovsky: "Francesca da Rimini."
Soloist, Mr. Harold Bauer.

Baltimore—
d'Indy: Symphony for Orchestra and Pianoforte.
Mendelssohn: Concerto for Violin.
Mahler: Adagietto from Symphony No. 5.
Tchaikovsky: "Francesca da Rimini."
Soloist, Miss Marie Hall.

New York—
Beethoven: Overture, "Egmont."
Schumann: Concerto for Pianoforte.
Mahler: Symphony No. 5.
Soloist, Mr. Harold Bauer.

Brooklyn—
Weber: Overture, "Freischütz."
Schubert: Unfinished Symphony.
Schumann: Concerto for Pianoforte.
Tchaikovsky: "Francesca da Rimini."
Soloist, Mr. Harold Bauer.

New York—
Haydn: Symphony No. 2 (B. & H.).
Mendelssohn: Concerto for Violin.
d'Indy: Symphony No. 1, for Orchestra and Pianoforte.
Soloist, Miss Marie Hall.

Buffalo—
Goldmark: Overture, "In the Spring."
Aria.
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Violoncello.
Wagner: Bacchanale, from "Tannhäuser."
Songs with Pianoforte.
Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 4.
Soloists, Miss Edyth Walker and Miss Elsa Ruegger.

Troy—
Beethoven: Overture, "Egmont."
Schumann: Concerto for Pianoforte.
Wagner: Bacchanale, from "Tannhäuser."
Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 4.
Soloist, Mr. Harold Bauer.

D'INDY'S MUSIC AT THE SYMPHONY

Elsa Ruegger, 'Cellist, Plays Saint-Saëns' Concerto and Haydn's No. 2 Opens Concert.

Journal Feb. 12, 1906

Haydn's D minor symphony, written for an orchestra of forty, was given at the fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night by a complete modern band of ninety or more performers, the wood wind being doubled to balance the big aggregation of strings. The exquisite composition did not suffer for the enlargement served to bring the work in its entirety from the small hall for which it was intended to the big auditorium.

There is a difference of opinion concerning the advisability of performing a work like this of Haydn's by use of a large orchestra in a large hall. The symphony was given, of course, a superb, scholarly and thoroughly adequate performance.

Miss Elsa Ruegger, cellist, was soloist. She played Saint-Saens' concerto in A minor, a short, thoroughly enjoyable piece, in which Miss Ruegger displayed a bigger tone than formerly, together with perfect technique. She was recalled four times.

D'Indy's symphony, "on a mountain air for orchestra and pianoforte," was the third number. Heinrich Gebhard was mentioned as pianist, although the piano is but an ensemble instrument in the work. The harp player's name was not programmed, yet he with his instrument was fully as important in the symphony. The solo instrument in the work is apparently the horn, but as the symphony is purely orchestral the performers are not mentioned except the pianist, probably because he sits conspicuously in front. The symphony is noble and at times inspiring, richly orchestrated and played in Mr. Gericke's most happy mood.

HEAR SYMPHONY ON MOUNTAIN AIR

Earlier Work of D'Indy One of Numbers on Programme at Fifteenth Concert of the Boston Orchestra.

THIRD APPEARANCE OF
MISS RUEGGER, SOLOIST

Haydn Symphony That Has Brought in Money Also Performed—Miss Hall's Last Violin Recital.

The programme of the 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2) Haydn
Concerto in A minor No. 1 for 'cello.....

Saint-Saens
Symphony on a mountain air for orchestra and piano, No. 1.....D'Indy

Haydn himself was well pleased at the first performance of this symphony. The concert was a brilliant one. Brigida Banti, the singer, who enchanted all that heard her, who lived gayly and died in the poorhouse; Anne Marichelli, who by her will left a sum of money to Napoleon Bonaparte; Viotti, the violinist, and the great oboist, Ferlendis, who then made his first appearance in London, and two singing men of renown were the soloists. It was Haydn's last benefit concert in the city where he was highly honored. He entered in that note book in which he entered many curious observations and reflections: "I took in this evening 4000 gulden (about $2000); one can make as much as this only in England." Furthermore, the orchestra on this occasion numbered about 60. The orchestra of the first six concerts was made up of about 40.

The Herald has before this discussed the injury done the symphonic music of Mozart and Haydn by performances in a great hall by modern orchestras, in which the wind instruments are doubled in the hope of obtaining a just balance with the great band of strings. It has also referred to the attempt of some in Germany to play this music under more favorable conditions. Thus Reznicek, who has been conducting concerts of old music in Berlin, gives them in a comparatively small hall and with a small orchestra. And so in London when Mozart's birthday was celebrated last month by the Concert-Goers' Club in Bechstein Hall with Mr. Wood as conductor, the symphony in E flat, composed when Mozart was 8 years old, the introduction to "Bastien and Bastienne," composed when he was a few years older, the ballet music from "Idomeneo," the great symphony in G minor and some other pieces were played by an orchestra of only 36.

It would be an interesting experiment to hear in this city a symphony by Haydn or Mozart played in Jordan or Chickering Hall by a small orchestra of picked men. But in the present apathetic condition of the Boston musical public it would be prudent to defer the experiment.

The symphony played last night stood the unreasonable test of a huge hall much better than others of Haydn and the performance was one abounding in vitality and at the same time one of most careful finish in the details.

The intense admirers of the ultra-modern French school, which has been so recently discovered by them that they have the furious and iconoclastic zeal of recent converts, are ready to sneer at Camille Saint-Saens and to class him with the periwigged. They forget there was a time when Saint-Saens himself was looked on as a dangerous radical, a disturber of established order and pleasant, confident dreams. They blind themselves to Saint-Saens' great merits, to his talent that is akin to genius: his calm mastery of technique, his exquisite sense of proportion, his clearness, his logical arrangement of musical thought, the artful simplicity and effectiveness of his orchestra.

It is true that he has probably said his say, that his latest works have little true life; it is also true that his music was never deeply emotional; but his best works—and they are not few—are strikingly individual in their lucidity and elegance. This 'cello concerto, for instance, has distinction, and there are charming pages, as those of the minuet, which is the very essence of Saint-Saens. It also has the merit of being short—a great merit in a 'cello concerto, for a little 'cello in solo goes a long way. Miss Ruegger played in the fitting spirit, and displayed both tone and general artistry.

D'Indy no longer calls his "Wallenstein" a symphony; and his symphony "Jean Hunyadi" (1876), was thrown overboard by him long ago. There is a difference of almost 20 years between the composition of the symphony on a mountain air and that of the symphony in B flat major which, played here under the composer's direction, irritated certain highly estimable persons who, to use the cant of the period, are not wholly "in touch with the modern musical movement."

When this symphony on a mountain air was produced here about four years ago, with Mr. Bauer as the pianist, it gave great pleasure to many, and we are inclined to think that it will for some years to come enjoy greater popular favor than the superb work which will in due time be ranked as one of the great symphonies of the world. The reasons for this present preference are not far to seek, for the music of the first symphony has elements of immediate popularity. The fact that a pianist is seen at work excites the attention of those interested in a soloist rather than in a conventionally scored symphonic work, and their name is legion; yet the pianist is here no more a soloist than the oboist or the English horn player. Indeed, it is a pity that the piano was placed last night in a dominating position, for this position, no doubt unavoidable, gave one unacquainted with the character of the work the idea that the symphony might be a thinly disguised concerto, whereas it is nothing of the kind; the piano is an instrument in ensemble.

Again, the chief melody, which as treated by D'Indy at times bears a curious resemblance to Bruant's canaille ditty, "a la Villette," and the tributary themes are more obviously melodic than those of the second symphony, and the treatment of them is franker. It may also be said that the harmonic speech of D'Indy is here more in accordance with familiar musical usage; that there is more of superficial interest; and that the peasant and boisterous jollity of the finale makes an immediate effect on the nerves.

D'Indy has more than once looked to the hills for inspiration, and at times in this symphony he dwells among them. The atmosphere is often that of the cool mountains, and there are suggestions of nature that are of fragrant and of outdoor beauty. The first two movements contain passages that are contemplative and serene; yet the hearer, though he stands with the composer above the every-day and garish world, is not lost in the clouds, nor does he find, as in some of D'Indy's compositions, the air too nipping and eager.

There is much pure and noble music in this symphony, and the fine taste of the composer keeps him from vulgarity in the finale where it would be easy, almost permissible, to be extremely vulgar—both rhythmically and orchestrally. The orchestration throughout is rich and sonorous, and it is especially rich in discretion. Mr. Gebhard played well his part, and the performance in general was one of the highest poetic excellence. Mr. Gericke conducted with gusto and spirit and the imagination displayed in his interpretation was in full sympathy with that of the composer.

GERICKE RESIGNS FROM SYMPHONY.

Because Wilhelm Gericke and Henry L. Higginson could not agree on certain terms concerning the former's contract as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1906-07, Mr. Gericke has handed in his resignation to take effect at the end of this season. It is rumored that Mr. Vincent D'Indy is to be the new conductor.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

Boston Orchestra Will Give 16th Public Performance—Bispham

Will Sing.

The 16th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, will take place in Symphony Hall this afternoon. The overture to "Der Freischuetz" will be played for the 13th time at these concerts and those who heard Mr. Weingartner's concert will be interested in any possible difference in the readings of the overture. Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, now of Baltimore, will play the piano part of Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. This will be Mr. Hutcheson's second appearance here with the orchestra. At the request of many, Mahler's fifth symphony, which made such a deep impression a few weeks ago, will be repeated.

The concerts of next week will be of unusual interest. Mr. Frederick S. Converse's ballad for baritone and orchestra, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci" (Kats' poem) will be performed for the first time in public, with Mr. David Bispham as the singer. The ballad was composed in 1902, and it is in the nature of a symphonic poem with voice part. Mr. Bispham sang it here with piano accompaniment at a private concert March 29, 1903. He will sing next week the once celebrated aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling" and the old English song, "Drink to Me, Only with Thine Eyes." Ernst Boehe's symphonic poem, "Ulysses' departure and shipwreck," will be played here for the first time. It is the first of a cycle of symphonic poems based on the Ulysses legend. The composer, who is about 25 years old, lives at Munich. The programme will also include Mendelssohn's overture to the legend of "The Fair Melusina," and Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasy "From Italy."

STEINBACH TO CONDUCT?

Signs That He May Be Gericke's
Successor

Changing Plans, He Sails for Boston
Tomorrow

A Mature German with a Notable Career

His High Reputation as a Conductor of the Classics

Of all the more distinguished conductors in Germany none has seemed to those that knew the field there and the work here, so likely to succeed Mr. Gericke with the Symphony Orchestra as Fritz Steinbach of Cologne. As long ago as last autumn, when hints of Mr. Gericke's retirement began, there were plausible predictions that Steinbach would be the new conductor, and now there is reason to believe that negotiations with him are in progress, and so far advanced that he is on his way to Boston to continue them. Mr. Steinbach is leaving Liverpool tomorrow on the Cymric, which sails directly to Boston. She is due here on Saturday, March 17, or Sunday, March 18. A week later on Friday, March 23, and Saturday, March 24, Mr. Steinbach is to conduct at two concerts of the Philharmonic Society in New York. Visiting conductors to that orchestra usually have two or three rehearsals with the band, beginning on the Tuesday or Wednesday preceding the concerts. Thus Mr. Steinbach would have two or three days to spend in Boston.

The particular reason for believing that he has an important errand here is the fact that, to come to Boston, he has suddenly altered the arrangements that he made originally with the Philharmonic Society. Pressed by work at home, he wished to spend as few days as possible on the journey and in New York. He intended to travel on a fast German ship and reach New York only on the Tuesday or Wednesday preceding his concerts there, and to return as soon as his work was done. Now he has changed all these plans. He will sail for Boston direct, by a comparatively slow ship, and he will spend a day or two here, apparently, before he goes to New York. Now, too, he gives no intimation of a hasty return to Germany.

Steinbach is a man of vigorous middle age, with a strong, smooth face and a quietly commanding presence. For twenty years he has been a conductor in Germany, first at the opera at Mayence, then with the court orchestra at Meiningen, and now with the noted Gurzenich Orchestra at Cologne. In recent years, as "star" conductors have become the musical fashion, he has paid visits to other cities in and out of Germany, and his reputation is now European. In London, in particular, he has been warmly liked. His coming to the Philharmonic Society for a pair of concerts will be his first visit to America. Usually he has been applauded almost equally as a conductor in the classics, which he cultivates especially, and in ultra-modern music. When he last appeared in London, Mr. Baughan, one of the most judicious of English reviewers, wrote of the concert in the Daily News:

"Herr Fritz Steinbach is now so well known that his performances hardly require detailed criticisms. Yet there was much that was suggestive in his conducting of the second symphony of Brahms. Herr Steinbach and his Meiningen Orchestra first made us see what a wealth of dramatic and emotional feeling there is in Brahms's music, which so often has been called dull and dry. The English admirers of the composer accepted Herr Steinbach's readings from the first without as much as the faintest show of resentment that the traditional British performances had been broken. Brahms at one time of his life had had a good deal to do with the Meiningen Orchestra, and so it was supposed that Herr Steinbach's readings must have been inspired by the composer himself. I very much doubt if that really was the case. At any rate, I have heard on good authority that much of Herr Steinbach's interpretations are peculiar to himself, and are against the Meiningen tradition. But a composer is not always the very best judge of how his music should be played, or, at any rate, he is not always able to give an orchestra a just idea of what he really wants. To me it seems that Herr Steinbach's expressive conducting of the Brahms melody and the vigor he gives to music which is too often made dull and lifeless are very characteristic of the composer. The most satisfying performance of the afternoon was that of Richard Strauss's 'Til Eulenspiegel.' There is no need to tell admirers of the composer that the Humoreske is not merely humorous, but in its own way as serious a symphonic poem as 'Zarathustra.' Herr Steinbach's reading brought out this aspect of the work with more sharpness than I remember to have heard before. At the same time, the rhythm and the orchestration were so finely chiselled that the composition sounded clearer and more connected than usual."

From another source comes a little summary of Steinbach's career and a hint at his reputation as a conductor of the classics. Steinbach bears a cumbersome title, which was given to him by the Grand Duke of Saxe-Meiningen when he was in his service, so as to enable him to gather and command all the available musical forces in the grand duchy on festival occasions. He is a grand-ducal-general-musik-direktor, and was Von Bülow's successor as court conductor at Meiningen, whither he went in 1886. There he remained until 1903, when he was called to Cologne as municipal conductor and head of the Cologne Conservatory of Music, succeeding Franz Wüllner. Steinbach is a native of the Duchy of Baden, and was born in 1855. He studied at the Leipsic Conservatory, and carried off the Mozart prize. Thence he went to Vienna, and as a pupil of Nottbohm laid the foundations for his special excellence in the conducting of the classics. He is not a champion of the modern tendencies in music so much as he is a classicist with peculiarly strong leanings toward Beethoven and Brahms. "To Nottbohm," said Steinbach in an interview in The Musical Times of London, last year, "I owe almost everything."

Young Steinbach displayed unmistakable talent for composition, but soon abandoned it for conducting. In 1880 he was appointed conductor of the Municipal Theatre at Mayence, and he held the post until called to Meiningen to be Von Bülow's successor. "It was in this capacity," says The Musical Times, "that he laid the foundation of his fame as a conductor of the classics, and more especially of Brahms. He had made the acquaintance of Brahms some time previously, for it was he who had recommended Steinbach to Nottbohm. The close friendship between the composer and the young conductor continued till the end of Brahms's life. Not a year passed without their meeting. In the summer Steinbach would visit his friend at Vienna or at Ischl, and every winter Brahms travelled to Meiningen to hear the court orchestra discourse Bach for his special delectation. Thus we may assume that Steinbach's peculiarly unconventional readings, so full of life and feeling, of Brahms's symphonies and other works, must have had the composer's fullest approval."

And here, finally, is a note from a correspondent in Germany, who has often heard Steinbach, about some qualities in his conducting: "His command over the orchestra is remarkable. He is overflowing with energy, and holds his men with a grip of iron. I shall never forget the effect his conducting produced here a few years ago at the Joachim sixtieth jubilee. An orchestra of two hundred picked performers had been brought together, in which there were one hundred and twenty string players, all of the Joachim school. Joachim himself said that never in all his life had he heard such an orchestra; and it was the conducting of Steinbach, as well as the size and excellence of the band that produced such remarkable results. His symphony concerts at Cologne are among the best in Germany. He gets the very best out of his men, and makes them play with wonderful brilliance and warmth of tone." At Cologne, moreover, between his orchestra, the conservatory, a choral society, and his own visits to other cities, Steinbach has had as much and as taxing work as the conductorship of our orchestra, with its hundred concerts each season and its monthly journeys, would require of him. He has flourished under it.

STEINBACH NOT FOR SYMPHONY

Story That Cologne Music Director-General Is Coming to Lead Boston Orchestra Emphatically Denied.

The New York Times stated yesterday that "there are circumstances which, put together, would seem to indicate that the next conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be Fritz Steinbach, who is coming from Cologne to conduct the last concert this season of the Philharmonic Society. Herr Steinbach is music director-general at Cologne, and his services there are arduous. So are those of the Boston conductor, but American salaries are considerably larger than those paid even to music directors general, and it may be that Mr. Higginson, who refused to give Mr. Theodore Thomas $14,000 a year when he went to Chicago, will now be willing to put up that amount or something like it to secure the services of as well known a conductor as Herr Steinbach."

The Tribune names circumstances that point to the "likelihood" of Mr. Steinbach's engagement here and adds: "There is much significance also in the fact that Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston orchestra, used to occupy the same place under Herr Steinbach in Cologne."

This article is signed "H. E. K.," the initials of Mr. Henry E. Krehbiel, the music critic of the Tribune.

The Herald states on the best of authority that there is no foundation for the article that appeared in the Tribune.

Mr. Steinbach is not seriously considered as the successor of Mr. Gericke, and there are no negotiations of any nature whatever with Mr. Steinbach. The Herald is also authorized to say that the statement "Mr. Higginson refused to give Mr. Theodore Thomas $14,000 a year when he went to Chicago" is wholly false.

Fritz Steinbach, whose name has thus been used, was born at Gruensfeld, in Baden, on June 17, 1855. He studied at Leipzig and also with his brother Emil, who was conductor at Mayence, where Fritz was second conductor from 1880 to 1886. From 1886 to 1902 he was conductor of the Meiningen orchestra, and in 1902 he was called to Cologne to conduct the Guersnich concerts and direct the music conservatory of that city. He is a conservative musician, who has composed highly respectable chamber music. As a conductor he is best known as an interpreter of Brahms.

Mr. Gericke's Successor and "The Rising Market"

The writers about music in New York have been as warm in just praise of Mr. Gericke, apropos of his retirement, as have ours in Boston. Now, like the rest of us, they are speculating about his successor. One has predicted Weingartner, apparently because he is the most eminent conductor who has visited America; and another chooses Dr. Muck of the Berlin opera because he will soon be disengaged. Others prefer, more wisely, to survey the field and consider the conditions which are likely to influence the choice. One of these, beyond doubt, is the steady increase, actual and expected, in conductors' salaries. Of this "rising market," and of its influence upon orchestral music in America, Mr. Krehbiel writes very sensibly in the Tribune as follows:

"When Mr. Gericke came to America his salary was looked upon in some circles as princely, and there were few conductors in Europe who did not envy him his position. But a great change has taken place since then. Conductors have become 'star' performers in the eyes of the public, and Mr. Nikisch, who was Mr. Gericke's immediate successor in Boston, is now earning in Europe more than twice the sum each year that Mr. Higginson paid him. The policy of engaging a different conductor for each concert, which was followed for a time in Berlin, and has now become the rule in Vienna, London and other capitals, as well as in New York, has tended to increase the importance of the men who could catch popular attention, not only in the eyes of the directors of concert organizations, but also in their own, and the demands of the 'stars' have gone up proportionately. As an illustration, it is reported that Mr. Safonoff has set his figure as conductor of the Philharmonic Society in New York at $20,000 a year, with a set term of three years. Mr. Weingartner has finished the first portion of an engagement for three terms with the New York Symphony Orchestra and an auxiliary committee, for which he is paid $12,000 for conducting sixteen concerts. It is said that Mr. Mengelberg of Amsterdam, Mr. Fiedler of Hamburg, Mr. Schuch of Dresden and other European celebrities, when consulted on the subject of an American engagement, all mentioned figures as an annual salary, for which the best of their predecessors much less than a generation ago would have gladly worked for nearly a decade."

Such financial expectations, Mr. Krehbiel believes, will have much to do with the choice of Mr. Gericke's successor. Yet, he continues, "with all its prestige and success in its native city and elsewhere, the Boston Orchestra is not a money-making institution. It cannot be one under existing conditions. The orchestras of Philadelphia, Chicago and Cincinnati and the New York Symphony Orchestra, with its Weingartner attachment, live only because of large contributions by enthusiastic admirers of orchestral music, of the personality of the imported conductor, or of the cities in which they live. The policy successfully carried out for three years by the Philharmonic Society is also dependent upon the public spirit of a few rich men. But this thing cannot go on. Orchestras cannot count on such benefactions forever. The Pittsburgh orchestra seems to be in the throes of dissolution. Under the best of conditions as they have prevailed with reasonable salaries, no orchestra has been self-supporting except the Philharmonic Society, whose members do not depend upon their concerts for a living, but take the proceeds in payment of their services, whether they be $25 or $200 each for the season.

"It is not likely that any of the permanent orchestras in the cities mentioned will ever be freed from the danger of collapse until they become really permanent through the operation of generous and permanent endowments. To meet the growing demands of the 'star' conductors will only hasten the time of dissolution. A conductor, like every other artist, is worth what he can draw. The time is not come as yet when any one of them can take the place in popular admiration of the solo singer and instrumentalist who provides the variety in concert schemes that audiences still crave. This has been demonstrated in New York this season with Weingartner's concerts. If the successor of Mr. Gericke, who earned every cent of his salary, is to be a high-priced 'star,' days like those of Mr. Higginson's early trials will return to that generous and artistic-minded gentleman."

BISPHAM TO SING CONVERSE BALLAD

At 17th Symphony Rehearsal Today "La Belle Dame Sans Merci" Will Be Given for First Time in Public.

Herald ———— Feb. 2, 1906

The 17th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, will take place this afternoon in Symphony Hall. The programme is one of unusual interest. Mendelssohn's overture to the legend of the Fair Melusina is the first number. Mr. Frederick S. Converse's "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," a ballad for baritone and orchestra, will be performed here for the first time in public. Mr. Bispham will be the singer. He sang the ballad with piano accompaniment at a St. Botolph Club Sunday concert, March 29, 1903.

The first performance with orchestra in public was last night in Providence, R. I., at a Boston symphony concert, with Mr. Bispham as the soloist. The text is the original version of Keat's famous poem. Mr. Converse composed the music in 1902. It is in the nature of a symphonic poem with voice part. There are extended orchestral interludes expressive of the moods of the text.

Mr. Bispham will also sing the well known aria from Marschner's "Hans Heiling." Ernest Boehe's "Departure and Shipwreck of Ulysses," from a cycle of four orchestral episodes based on incidents in the voyages of the hero, will be played here for the first time. The music tells of Ulysses, exulting after the fall of Troy, his longing for his wife Penelope, the joyful setting-sail and the shipwreck due to the wrath of Neptune. The composer, about 25 years old, lives in Munich, where he was born. The son of a Bavarian military officer, he was educated for the army, but he determined to be a musician. He has composed two songs with orchestral and groups of songs with piano accompaniment.

Richard Strauss' "From Italy," a symphonic fantasia in four movements, will be the final number.

The programme of the 18th concert, March 9 and 10, will be as follows: Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala"; a violin concerto in C minor by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze (first time here), played by Mr. Henri Marteau; Debussy's prelude to Mallarmé's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Schubert's symphony in C major, No. 7. Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss, was born in Vienna. Since 1892 he has been professor of harmony at the Geneva Conservatory, and thus a colleague of Mr. Marteau, to whom the concerto is dedicated. He has composed operas, orchestral music, cantatas, songs, piano pieces.

Mahler at the Symphony Concert

The second performance of Mahler's symphony on Saturday evening renewed and confirmed the impression that, so far as it discloses him, he is a twentieth-century Berlioz. In matter and in manner it is grandiose. He rears a huge musical structure and seeks to give each detail in its due place and significance. Yet the end leaves the listener with the impression that the structure has not reached the breadth and the height of Mahler's imaginings or each detail burned or caressed as he would have it. Elemental passions and moods, jostling, jarring, striving, choking each other one instant, leaping over each other at another, but always at highest pitch, always fantastical and always striving for fuller expression, fill this structure. The very hugeness of the composer's imaginings, the very intensity of them stand in their own and the composer's way. When they attain to as full expression as Mahler can give them there are moments of such power as those that end the symphony, of such transporting beauty as that of the adagio and of such deep and lambent pictorial impression as that of the "dead march" at the beginning. The strife and torture of other parts of the symphony Mahler lifts sometimes to a wild agony that Berlioz might have envied.

Side by side with all these go on one hand imaginative play with the dance. (Recall the glorified waltz and the masque at the Capulets' in Berlioz's symphonies. Or on the other, measure after measure that seems inchoate striving, muddy obscurity or unimpressive distortion. It is the dramatic and poetic rather than the purely musical quality of Mahler's themes that most impresses the listener. It is not the purely musical development of them, but the emotional and dramatic appeal of his variations and transformations of them that give them significance. They tell as parts of a huge vision in which death and love, despair and elation, agony and resolution pass before the beholder's eyes, rather than as parts of a musical fabric. Yet Mahler, like Berlioz, chooses an established form, and in a measure regards it. Above all it is in the instrumental investiture that Mahler most expresses all that he is imagining, and would put into tones. In his instrumentation he touches power and brings beauty. By that instrumentation he most seizes and sways his hearers.

All these are the traits of Berlioz and in higher or lower degree Mahler has them. Now he outstrips the Frenchman; now he lags behind. Often the musical resources and conditions of 1905 give him the advantage over Berlioz struggling with those of 1830. But the impression that Mahler's fifth symphony under Gericke was upon some of his hearers very like that which Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" made the other day under Weingartner. The one conductor matched the other in imaginative grasp of the music and communicating power to impart it with its fullest force.

to his hearers. That even in Tschalkovski's "Francesca" have Mr. Gericke and our orchestra given such intense sensations. And "Francesca" is pastime, technically, beside this fifth symphony.

H. T. P.

MAHLER'S GIANT SYMPHONY IS COLOSSAL.

American — July 4.06
Great Work of Eccentric German Composer Is Produced Here for First Time.

HAS RARE BEAUTIES AND SUDDEN SHOCKS

By Kent Perkins.

Mr. Gericke delights in two kinds of Symphony programmes—those in which harmony of style prevails from beginning to end and those where vivid contrasts are exhibited. When he introduces a new composer or a new "school" of music, he employs contrast to aid his hearers to appreciate readily the characteristic attributes of the novelty.

Last night he made a brilliant audience at Symphony Hall acquainted with Gustav Mahler, about whose head ever since it appeared above the surface of modern German music a fierce war of invective and praise has been waged.

From Athens to Coney Island.

It was as if Mr. Gericke first took the throng to Athens as a musical Cook's guide and displayed the classic majesty and serene beauty of the Acropolis, letting them wander at will about the Parthenon and the temple of the Wingless Victory and then whisked the crowd off to Coney Island on Saturday night.

Beethoven's majestic overture to Goethe's "Egmont" and Schumann's concerto in A minor op. 54, with Harold Bauer as the soloist, furnished the magic atmosphere through which Athens glistened. Mahler conjured up Coney.

The orchestra and Mr. Bauer lent powerful aid in the transformation scene. The "Egmont" music was played with a sympathetic nobility of expression that is beyond praise. Mr. Bauer surpassed himself in the delicious sweetness of his tone, his masterly command of the instrument and his artistically restrained power. His playing roused intense enthusiasm.

After hearing Mahler's Fifth Symphony, by which the composer was introduced here for the first time, one can easily understand why he is both execrated and lauded, why he is hissed by one part of his audiences and showered with extravagant plaudits by another. Mahler is a Teuton through and through; so are his divided audiences. For those who take music as seriously as some people do religion there is justification for both cabages and laurel wreaths in last night's symphony, and doubtless his other works are like this one in wide variety. Consequently he is both cursed and blessed.

Truly a Gigantic Work.

The piece is called the "Giant Symphony" and with reason. It is huge in all its proportions, in the required size of the orchestra, in variety of instruments, in its length, in the fertility of imagination displayed in conception and development and in the immensity of the shocks by which one is made at least to sit up and take notice, whether he likes the jolts his nerves receive or not.

Its framework and its themes are distinctly Germanic. There are many beautiful melodies and many glorious harmonies. Its novelties and idiosyncracies lie mainly in the strange and surprising ways in which the deep basses of brass, wood-wind and strings are used and the queer frills with which many of the harmonies are fringed by ingenious use of percussion instruments.

What surprises and sudden contrasts he employs! In the midst of a swimming melody dressed out in a full-voiced harmony that carries one along as easily and sonorously as does Sousa at his best, something seems to go wrong, and a "little German band" in a tenement backyard could not make a more hopeless mess of things.

Again you say: "Ah! here we are in the class with Schumann. Could anything be more exquisite than this lyric!" when, bing! you are dropped into the middle of a New York crowd drowning the chimes of Trinity with fishhorns on New Year's eve.

Part II. is for the most part a beautiful Scherzo in waltz time and movement. The people were carried away with the grace and daintiness of it last night, when without warning they were pitched apparently into the train shed of the South station with all the trains starting at once for everywhere on the wrong tracks. It was so realistic that dozens of suburbanites seized their wraps and started for the door.

With all his eccentricities and bizarre effects Mahler is worth hearing and his "New music" has this advantage over the extreme "new" French music as exemplified by D'Indy: it is human.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adv: 3477 PROGRAMME. 1906

Weber.....Overture to "Der Freischütz"

Rubinstein.....Concerto in D minor, Op. 70

Soloist, Mr. Ernest Hutcheson.

Mahler.....Symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5

When Mr. Gericke came forward to begin the concert there was applause so continuous and prolonged that it seemed as if every auditor wished to impress him that Boston is sorry for the fact that he is going away. At the end of the overture also the plaudits were so emphatic that it was evidently another personal tribute. This is but just, yet we feel that Boston will not fully recognize what it loses until some time in the future.

Some time ago Mr. Gericke confidentially informed the present writer that this would probably be his last Boston season, and we have therefore watched, for the last four months, with especial care, to note whether this was because of failing power or the great fatigue caused by the fearful exigencies of the modern school. We have found our conductor not only vigorous and active, but greater than at any previous epoch in his career.

His programmes have been anything but conservative, and the most difficult of modern works have been interpreted with as much effect as those classical numbers which appeal more especially to Mr. Gericke's taste. The discipline and technique of the orchestra (due to Mr. Gericke more than to any other) have never been better than at present.

Among the names prominently spoken of in connection with the future conductorship are Fritz Steinbach and Gustav Mahler. The position of the latter, in Austria, has recently become rather shaky. Yet we do not believe that the Vienna musical despot would be tolerated in Boston for a single season.

As regards the reading of the overture it was not so exaggerated as the Wein-gartner interpretation of a few weeks ago, yet it was amply dramatic and struck us as being decidedly more effective. One cannot distort Weber's theatrical touches into anything like the dramatic force of a Berlioz or Strauss, and any effort to do so is wasted.

One can cordially praise the interpretation which Mr. Hutcheson gave of Rubinstein's fourth piano concerto. There was a lack of emotional power in the slow movement, but this was amply atoned for by the excellent ensemble, the careful shading and the perfect surety of other portions of the work. Mr. Hutcheson was recalled several times and he fully earned the popular verdict. That the piano was often prominently in the foreground must be charged to Rubinstein rather than to his interpreter.

The work is unequal and ranges from inspiration to padding. Its first movement is strong enough in spite of its great length, and its great climax in the coda of double octaves was most brilliantly given by Mr. Hutcheson. This exhibits the leonine quality which was in Rubinstein when at his best.

The slow movement is but a thinly disguised piano solo, but, if one does not demand the true concerto structure and effect, it is popular and melodic. The finale exhibits Rubinstein at his worst, for it is wholly manufactured and artificial music. It is the master of routine work making a deliberate display of his wares. But, after all, this is not the only prominent concerto which falls off in its third movement. Even Beethoven managed to fade out somewhat in topping off with such an energetic rondo.

And we had Mahler again! We shudder to think of the possibility of some of the modern works being played to us until we understand them. We cannot say that the work gained on a second hearing. The element of surprise had worn off and the fierce contrasts and sudden "sforzandi" did not seem more effective than at the first performance. We again felt (spite of Mahler's avowed opposition to definite programme-music) that such theatrical music demands an explanation, requires a definite story.

The first movement, the Adagietto (of which the "etto" is a misnomer) and the superbly contrapuntal finale are the best parts of the work, and if Mahler had broken the four-movement rule on the side of brevity instead of prolixity (there are five movements), and had called his work a "Festival Symphony," it might be a welcome addition to the standard repertoire.

We cannot quite appreciate the need of choking off every melody in its infancy, in the manner which is pursued by Mahler. Nor can we quite discover the "raison d'être" of such overwhelming difficulties as the ultra-moderns insist upon peppering their works with. We have had this fact borne in upon us by a recent examination of the piano score of Strauss' "Salome," which sets a new stunt for the acrobats of the present to surpass. To illustrate where Music, hellish hag (certainly no longer "Heavenly Maid"), has arrived, we may give a few points of the work, which Mahler, Reger and others must now try to surpass.

The chromatics in "Salome" begin with the second note of the score. At times we find the bass in a flat key and the other harmonies in sharps (not in enharmonic unity either), so that the Scriptural precept—"Let not thy right hand know what thy left hand doeth,"—is given a new meaning. All rhythms are interwoven, with a strong predilection for 5-4 and 7-4.

As regards tonality, it has gone so far that it is utterly unnecessary for Strauss to give any key signature to his music, although he still follows the old custom in this.

It is impossible to know whether one is playing true or false, and any misprints could not be detected by any known musical rule. The libretto is a compound of Lust, stifling perfumes and blood, and cannot be read by any woman or fully understood by any one but a physician. Kundry's pleadings with Parsifal, which we once thought rather too strong for decency, are icy and chaste in comparison with the love-making of Salome.

Intermingled with this, of course, are strokes of genius. The lofty denunciations of Jochanaan, the squabbling disputes of the five Jews with their conflicting dogmas, the dramatic figure treatment, the inflexible reiteration of Salome,—"Ich will den Kopf des Jochanaan!"—and the wonderful Dance of the Seven Vells, which we will undoubtedly soon hear in our symphony concerts, these are all lightning flashes of the musical Jupiter Tonans.

188
But the path is wrong and no one seems to stop long enough to ask—'Whither?' There will be no questioning, but Mahler will sit down at his desk and see if he cannot out-Herod Herod, or rather out-Salome Salome. He has already got a new effect by beating kettle drums with rods instead of drumsticks, and in the symphony of Saturday we heard the xylophone, with which Mr. Gericke was forced to replace the striking of blocks of wood which Mahler suggested.

Meanwhile Wagner's "Music of the Future" has become the music of the past, and he is much too simple for the modern neurotic. The new flat is—"In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou hear thy Music!"— and the perspiration of the auditor is much less than that of the conductor and the musicians.

Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY IN NEW YORK.

(Special Dispatch to the Sunday Herald.)

NEW YORK, Feb. 17, 1906. It was a pleasing, but not a highly important programme that Mr. Gericke presented in Carnegie Hall this afternoon at the Boston Symphony orchestra's fourth matinee. Haydn's D major symphony, the 12th of the "Salomon" set; the Mendelssohn violin concerto and D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air," for orchestra and piano, made up the list. Miss Marie Hall, violinist, and Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, were the soloists.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 3, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN.	OVERTURE to the Legend of "The Fair Melusina," op. 32.
F. S. CONVERSE.	BALLADE for BARITONE SOLO and ORCHESTRA, op. 12. "La Belle Dame sans Merci" (after the Poem by Keats.) (First time at these concerts.)
ERNST BOEHE.	THE FIRST of FOUR EPISODES for ORCHESTRA. "Ulysses' Departure and Shipwreck," from "The Voyage of Ulysses," op. 6. (First time at these concerts.)
MARSCHNER.	ARIA for BARITONE, "Upon that Day," from "Hans Heiling."
RICHARD STRAUSS.	SYMPHONIC FANTASIA, op. 16. "From Italy." I. On the Campagna. II. Amid Rome's Ruins. III. On the Shore of Sorrento. IV. Neapolitan Folk-life.

Soloist:

Mr. DAVID BISPHAM.

But the path is wrong and no one seems to stop long enough to ask—"Whither?" There will be no questioning, but Mahler will sit down at his desk and see if he cannot out-Herod Herod, or rather out-Salome Salome. He has already got a new effect by beating kettle drums with rods instead of drumsticks, and in the symphony of Saturday we heard the xylophone, with which Mr. Gericke was forced to replace the striking of blocks of wood which Mahler suggested.

Meanwhile Wagner's "Music of the Future" has become the music of the past, and he is much too simple for the modern neurotic. The new flat is—"In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou hear thy Music!"— and the perspiration of the auditor is much less than that of the conductor and the musicians.

Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY IN NEW YORK.

[Special Dispatch to the Sunday Herald.]

NEW YORK, Feb. 17, 1906. It was a pleasing, but not a highly important programme that Mr. Gericke presented in Carnegie Hall this afternoon at the Boston Symphony orchestra's fourth matinee. Haydn's D major symphony, the 12th of the "Salomon" set; the Mendelssohn violin concerto and D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air," for orchestra and piano, made up the list. Miss Marie Hall, violinist, and Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, were the soloists.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 3, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN.	OVERTURE to the Legend of "The Fair Melusina," op. 32.
F. S. CONVERSE.	BALLADE for BARITONE SOLO and ORCHESTRA, op. 12. "La Belle Dame sans Merci" (after the Poem by Keats.) (First time at these concerts.)
ERNST BOEHE.	THE FIRST of FOUR EPISODES for ORCHESTRA. "Ulysses' Departure and Shipwreck," from "The Voyage of Ulysses," op. 6. (First time at these concerts.)
MARSCHNER.	ARIA for BARITONE, "Upon that Day," from "Hans Heiling."
RICHARD STRAUSS.	SYMPHONIC FANTASIA, op. 16. "From Italy." I. On the Campagna. II. Amid Rome's Ruins. III. On the Shore of Sorrento. IV. Neapolitan Folk-life.

Soloist:

Mr. DAVID BISPHAM.

BISPHAM SINGS WITH SYMPHONY

Traveller ——— Mich 5.06
Famous Baritone Joins Orchestra
in Composition by Converse.

Instead of presenting two or three long works, as has been the order at most of the concerts recently, the Symphony orchestra, Saturday night, gave five of such length that the concert took but little more than the usual time. Two were heard for the first time at these concerts.

Proximity made the performance of Frederick S. Converse's ballade for baritone and orchestra, "La Belle Dame sans Merci," with David Bispham as the soloist, of most interest. This symphonic poem by the professor of music at Harvard was written to Keats' lines.

The music contains passages of exquisite poetry and beauty, such as the fairy music. But the music of the dream lacks the horror-inspiring and awesome atmosphere demanded by the lines. The orchestral part is preferable to the music for the voice. Mr. Bispham sang well and the ballade as a whole is well worth hearing.

The other work new to Boston, Ernst Boehe's "Departure and Shipwreck of Ulysses," is the product of a man of 23, whose work on which his musical reputation finally will rest will not be done for many years, probably. This is, perhaps, as well, for the first number in the cycle on the Grecian hero is by no means a work of exciting genius. It is euphonious and that, perhaps, is the best that may be said of it, for thematic originality and strong handling of musical tools are mostly absent.

"From Italy," a symphonic fantasia, written by Richard Strauss about 20 years ago, was interesting as showing how Strauss' later genius has evolved, and how much higher he has attained in his flight.

An aria from "Hans Helling," Marschuer, by Mr. Bispham, and the overture to "The Fair Melusina," Mendelssohn, completed the programme. The orchestral work throughout was excellent.

A SYMPHONY CONCERT OF MANY LEGENDS

Traveller ——— Mich 3.06
Mr. Converse's New Ballad—Boehe and Homer Make a Tone Poem—A Week of Chamber Concerts—The Musical Calendar—"The Pipe of Desire" Again

The first phrases of Mendelssohn's overture, "The Fair Melusina," with which Mr. Gerlicke began yesterday, seemed to foreshadow the warm, clear, untaxing pleasure the Symphony concert was to give to the end. They were imagined with felicity and developed with grace. The mermaid-Melusina, enticing to mortal lovers when her silver-gray scales are hidden, swam through them. They had Mendelssohn's concise elegance, his euphony, and his transparent nicety of feeling. They charmed spontaneously. Of course he soon began to fall away. Try as he may, he seldom keeps his best level for long. By the time the amorous count was wooing the mermaid, the music ceased to touch the fancy so brightly. Mendelssohnian commonplace a little shadowed it; there were patches of elegance only. But Mendelssohn was quick to recover himself. Time and again the charm returned not only of the music as music, but of legend gently told and even of Melusina's watery, wavy elfland.

So Mendelssohn in the thirties wove his music about mediæval legends. Next Mr. Converse wove his of 1906 about another mediæval tale. Keats retold it, even before Mendelssohn discovered the Fair Melusina—the tale of the haggard knight who walked by the withered sedge on the songless lake, who had ridden with the wild-eyed lady of "the kisses four" and seen the wan pageant of her ghostly lovers—the fair woman who is merciless. There is an introduction, melancholy of mood, wan of tonal color, hollow of tonal substance—like the thin clear light of a gray autumn afternoon. There are ominous drum taps. Then the singer begins the ballad. His tones, the piping oboe, and the pale insistent strings summon the picture of lake and knight. The singer's voice tells his tale. The orchestra keeps it a tale of phantoms—vague, remote, emptied. The walling oboe, the hollow woodwinds, the darkening strings, the faint high tinkle of the harp make atmosphere. But human once was one of the phantoms and human was his passion. The orchestra evokes it, now in warm, undulating, enticing climax, now with a grewsome shrillness, then in restless modulations, again in broken splinters of tone. Steadily the music clings equally to the large mood and the vivid details of the verse. There is an elfin flicker, for example. The train of ghostly lovers passes swift and wan—phantoms again of passion. There is the chill sharp awakening. And the knight walks again by the melancholy lake in the thin light.

Oftenest Mr. Converse seems to treat the singer as one more instrument added to his orchestra. His tones narrate and give the clew, while the instruments impart the mood, bring the atmosphere and color the imagined picture. Throughout the ballad is vivid music. The contour and contents of melodies, modulations and rhythms; instrumental combinations and tints serve the single purpose of expression. Behind is the understanding that chooses wisely what music may express and heighten, and the imagination that kindles to the matter and the means until it fuses both into one whole. The large mood and the pregnant detail are equally within Mr. Converse's grasp. His command of his orchestra—explicit, supple, suggestive—steadily serves some imaginative purpose. He is developing an instinct for the incisive and the persuasive phrase. And the range of his imagination and of his power of expression widens. Here with Keats's ballad he is writing the music of phantoms that once were warm with passion. The listener feels both. The ghosts tell in tones their own wan tragedy, and the music is at once picture and speech, a little tone-poem side by side with Keats's, rather than "after" it.

Then the mediæval legends yielded to Greek. Ernst Boehe is a young composer of Munich who is hardly twenty-five years old and who was not that when he wrote his four "episodes for orchestra" out of Ulysses's voyages as the Odyssey tells them. Homer may yet be the fashion among German composers. Bunge has made a whole cycle of operas out of that same Odyssey, though only in Dresden do audiences take much and abiding joy of them. Now Boehe reads it, thinks of his orchestra and quickly sets pen to music paper. Perhaps he has read as a boy reads—it is the only way to read Homer. Only a young imagination would send the victorious Greeks clattering, clumping, shouting, up to the walls of Troy as Boehe does in his music, or start them so lustily on their homeward voyage. Reading Homer has long been a perilous pastime for young poets. It makes them wish to say similar things of their own. Perhaps it will soon be as dangerous for young composers.

Boehe, however, is writing a tone-poem. There must be what the analysts sometimes call "a slow section." There it is in a trice—Ulysses musing upon Penelope awaiting him in the lordly house at Ithaca, longing, constant. Better still, when his ship goes to wreck that melody of Penelope shall be as a musical life-preserver, and float Ulysses through tumultuous seas of tone. Being young, which is no reproach, and also modern, Boehe asks a very large orchestra, and he scores for it with what in these days of youthful orchestral virtuosi, we shall soon be calling academic brilliance. Sometimes he succeeds in making his "tone-picture." He has even his moments of individuality in his tonal-coloring, but not so often in his melodies. Yet the fresh wind of youth does blow through the music, and that is the breath of the Odyssey—and the mere eagerness of it is buoyant to hear.

Not even yet were we done with legends of creatures of earth and elfland. There is one behind Marschner's moribund opera, "Hans Heiling," the gnome king who loved the princess, and from it Mr. Bispham sang that air, beloved of baritones, in which Hans with a pretty suavity likens the love that is burning in him to the tortures of hell and similar distressing things. It is operatic agony of an elder day, intended to be sung agreeably with more heed of the audience in front than of any legend (or torture) behind. It is fair to take it for what it is and to say that Mr. Bispham sang with what little sensuous quality remains in his voice, with admirably clear enunciation, keen understanding and expression and as rounded phrases as a certain stiffness of tone permitted. It was as unsensuous singing in tonal quality as it was intelligent and imaginative in everything else. Of such, too, was his singing of Mr. Converse's ballad, but there he had short phrases oftener than a flowing melody. As for the orchestra, it had been as a perfect instrument that was human besides. It continued so through Richard Strauss's "Italian" fantasia; but that and other music of Italian inspiration deserves a little article to itself.

H. T. P.

MUSICAL MATTERS

David Bispham Heard at the Symphony.

The American composed, Mr. F. S. Converse, was represented on the 17th Symphony program by his ballade for baritone solo and orchestra, op. 12, which is a musical setting for Keats' poem, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci." Mr. David Bispham, the soloist, also sang the baritone aria, "Upon That Day," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Heiling." The remaining numbers were Mendelssohn's overture to "The Fair Melusina," the first of four episodes for orchestra, from "The Voyage of Ulysses," first time here, and Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasia, "From Italy." In selecting the Keats poem for musical illustration Mr. Converse chose a lyric full of emotional contrasts and one that evidently appealed to his imagination as a combination of the earthly and mysterious to which he could give vivid expression through instrumentation that would suggest the various ideas set down in the ballad. This he has succeeded in accomplishing in a way that shows him to be gifted with the art of musical language in a broad sense, for within the past three or four years his compositions have been frequently heard in this city and their value has been indorsed by Mr. Gericke and other prominent musicians.

Although the vocal portion is consistently a part of Mr. Converse's scheme the orchestration is so full that the omission of the solo would scarcely be noticed, especially if the program supplied the words. The story of the fairies and the unfortunate knight is told in vigorous style, Mr. Converse showing the moods of the text quite convincingly, though at times the chaotic episodes appear to be carried to excess, as if the composer took delight in cross modulations and peculiar combinations in progression.

But it is splendidly scored, and although Mr. Bispham did not quite do justice, musically, to the vocal part, he sang with great expression and dramatic warmth, and the work was greeted with many signs of appreciation. Mr. Bispham's voice sounded husky. Probably it has been overtaxed this season, and, aside from the display of his usual skill in tonal coloring, his singing was not up to his past standard. He was more satisfactory in the Marschner aria than in the Converse music.

Boeche's "Ulysses" number, played here for the first time, is one of those seething, tempestuous and anon tranquil sea pictures of a subject that has often been used, and in this instance, at least, handled with considerable skill. The orchestra in this and the Converse work showed ensemble playing of the highest order and responded perfectly to Mr. Gericke's baton, when the slightest uncertainty in attack would have turned a smooth performance into one of disastrous results, the nature of the pieces being so largely inharmonic.

The Mendelssohn overture opened the program in a delightful manner. The Strauss fantasia, which shows the fiery Richard in his youthful and gentler vein, went well. The third movement was a triumph for the strings, and the final movement was given with splendid sonority and brilliancy.

The French violinist, Henri Marteau, will be the soloist this week. He will play for the first time here a C minor concerto for violin and orchestra by Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss composer. The orchestra numbers will be the overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Schubert's C major symphony.

Sincere regret will be felt by music-lovers of the whole country over the resignation of Mr. Gericke from the Symphony Orchestra. The superstitious will say it is because this is his 13th year of leadership. Record Feb 23 1906

LEGENDS TOLD ON VIOL STRINGS

Landscape Also Shares Programme of Seventeenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW WORKS HEARD FROM TWO COMPOSERS

Numbers by Converse and Boeche Presented by Conductor Gericke—Rudolph Ganz to Be Heard.

Herald — Feb. 4, 1906

The programme of the 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture to "The Fair Melusina".....Mendelssohn
La Belle Dame Sans Merci, ballad for baritone and orchestra.....F. S. Converse Ulysses' Departure and Shipwreck.....Boeche
Aria from "Hans Heiling".....Marschner
"From Italy," symphonic fantasia.....R. Strauss

The music of this concert was illustrative of landscape and legend. Mendelssohn, the charming landscapist, is not so poetical in the "Melusina" overture as in the "Fingal's Cave," yet there are delightful glimpses of the water in which the mermaid-woman disported herself, and there is the suggestion, as Schumann put it, of "fables of the life far down in the watery abyss," of treasure which the sea has snatched from land-dwellers, of submarine castles and strange rulers and women for whom mortals pine and waste away if by chance they see them.

Mr. Converse wrote his music to Keats' "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," about four years ago. He himself describes it as in the nature of a symphonic poem with voice part: "there are extended orchestral interludes expressive of the moods of the text." The ballade was first performed in public last Thursday night at Providence, R. I., with Mr. Bispham, baritone, at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps it would have been better if Mr. Converse had written a ballade or symphonic poem without a voice part, and left the hearer to his own imagination, aided by the remembrance of the poem. There are verses of such haunting beauty and exquisite melody that any deliberate addition of music, note against syllable, does not enhance the glory of the text, which serenely bids defiance to the composer, who, if he unites an orchestral piece of surpassing power and wild imagination and entitles it "Kubla Khan," or "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," does not apparently attempt to vie with the poet after the manner of an ingenious interlinear translator. It is hard to imagine music for the voice that would express even approximately the spirit or the form of Shelley's famous lines to the skylark or of some of Swinburne's early poems and ballads.

It is true that Mackenzie wrote a purely orchestral ballade, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," but who remembers five measures of it, although it has been played twice at these concerts? Sir Alexander Mackenzie is a sound musician, a man of parts, yet who instinctively associates his name with that of Keats? We can think of only one line that must irresistibly have appealed to Mackenzie, as a thrifty Scot: "The squirrel's granary is full."

Furthermore Mr. Converse is happier in writing for the orchestra than for the human voice. He has shown this in his "Pipe of Desire." He makes his effects easier with orchestral instruments; his orchestral diction is more expressive and dramatic.

Now there is much that is truly poetic in Mr. Converse's ballade. The fairy music, the measures that suggest the appearance and the wiles of the Lady met in the Meads, is often finely imaginative; for instance the treatment of the orchestra in the verse beginning: "She took me to her elfin grot." On the other hand the music of the dream, in which the knight saw the pale and warning kings, and princes too does not fully express the horror of the scene; there is not blood-chilling spectral quality. The mood of the poem is well established at the beginning; the ending is effective, but in the love music there might well be more sensuousness. John Keats was a sensuous being. If his poems do not give ample proof of this, his letters show it and at times unpleasantly, for the expression of this sensuousness is that of prying Cherubino rather than that of a strong man.

The strength of Mr. Converse's ballade is in its orchestral thought, and the voice part, although Mr. Bispham last night declaimed it with evident feeling, does not contribute materially to the expression of the poet's mood or to the description of the detail.

Mr. Bispham revived the old air dear to all honest and dishonest German baritones. The music is now as old-fashioned as is the text itself. Yet Marschner in his day was reckoned an advanced romanticist and there is no doubt but that Wagner borrowed sundry ideas and formulas for his "Lohengrin" from Marschner's "Templer und die Juedin." Mr. Bispham sang the air as we have often heard it sung in Germany, i. e., chiefly with gusto.

Ernest Boeche, whose "Departure and Shipwreck of Ulysses" was played here for the first time, is a young gentleman of Munich. His father, an army officer, naturally thought that his son would follow his example; instead of which, as Judge Boompotter would say, with a noble disregard of logical sequence and grammatical construction, the wretched youth deliberately turned musician.

Boeche three or four years ago wrote this piece, the first of four orchestral episodes based on incidents in the adventurous life of the wily and much enduring Ulysses. It was his first important work, although among the preceding songs two with orchestra had attracted some attention. It is said that the prevailing mood of the majority of his songs is one of sadness and that he sought for verses that drip melancholy. Meditating an orchestral work he be-thought himself of Ulysses, the hero of many long forgotten operas and also of Bungert's operatic tetralogy. The cycle is now complete: "Departure and Shipwreck of Ulysses," "Circe's Isle," "Nausicaa's Lament," "Ulysses' Home-Coming."

These episodes—at least two of them—have been played in many German concert halls, and the composer is looked on by some as a coming man, if he has not actually arrived. It is hard to see why the episode performed here last night should make either a sensation or his reputation. It is perhaps surprising that a man of 23 years should show an intimate knowledge or orchestral resources. Passages in this work sound exceedingly well, as far as mere sound is concerned. When the musical thought itself is examined it does not stand even a moderate test. The themes are common, without any marked individuality, and their treatment is seldom harmonically or contrapuntally effective. The themes have been labelled carefully by Boeche's first teacher, Dr. Louis, but Ulysses in this music is a sorry hero, and his companions march to a brass band as firemen at a country muster. Penelope, or—to speak by the card—the thought of Penelope, is not an appealing theme.

If there is talk about musical portraiture of the sea, Mr. Boeche might study to advantage the score of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and "Sadko," or that of Paul Gilson's remarkable work, or that of Debussy's third nocturne. Old Neptune may blow lustily on all the trombones at once in Boeche's music; the ocean in its fury is hardly suggested. Without the programme published in the score for concert use, there would be little thought of angry wave and cruel expectant rocks. The music is all on the surface. Its brilliance is cheap veneer. Yet something might be expected from this young orchestral technician if he had exposed original ideas, even if they were extravagant and alive with the reckless enthusiasm of youth.

Richard Strauss, conservative, became associated with von Bülow and Alexander Ritter, and he wrote "From Italy" after he had listened to their urgent and radical words; but there is little of the Strauss of today in this music composed about 20 years ago. He says that through Ritter he came to understand Liszt and Wagner; but his acquired knowledge is shown only timidly and at long intervals in this fantasia. The third movement is pleasantly pictorial. And in the finale the well known tune of Denza does yeoman's service. But compare for a moment this work with "Don Juan," which came soon after. With "Don Juan," "Macbeth"—which has not been performed here—and "Death and Transfiguration"—the true Strauss came into the world to stir up strife and dissension, to win his way by mighty thoughts audaciously expressed. "Educational" or "historical" concerts are as a rule boring; yet it might serve a purpose if extracts from Strauss' Symphony in F minor and "From Italy," and the symphonic poems "Death and Transfiguration" and "Heldenleben" were played in one concert.

Who knows whether Boeche, now chiefly concerned in decoration, and perhaps led by the daily sight of the Glyptothek and the Pinakothek, those lonely temples shivering in a Munich fog, to set music to Grecian legends, may not in time evolve musical thoughts, strong, beautiful, and his own? Wagner had done nothing at 23 years of age to be compared with this music of Boeche, and if it be said that Boeche is fortunate in coming after Wagner, it should not be forgotten that Beethoven and Berlioz had done much before "Rienzi" came into the mind of Wagner.

The performance of the orchestra was most excellent throughout. Mr. Gericke was warmly greeted; the new works and Mr. Bispham were applauded with more than perfunctory courtesy.

Journal Feb. 24, 1906

Next week's symphony program will attract particular interest by the presence on it of two important novelties, one by an American and Bostonian, the other by a Muenchner. The first will be a ballade for barytone and orchestra, a setting of Keats' "La Belle Dame sans Merci," by Frederick Converse. Mr. Converse has been very prominent in the public eye of late because of his opera, "The Pipe of Desire," which met with such general approval when recently performed in Jordan Hall. The ballade is a considerably earlier work, having been written two or three years ago, but this will be its first performance at the symphony concerts. The other novelty is a symphonic poem called "Odysseus Ausfahrt und Schiffbruch," by Ernst Boeche. The other orchestral numbers will be Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasia "Aus Italiens," which has not been played here for six years. The solo artist will be David Bispham, one of the most popular of American barytones. In addition to the Converse ballade he will sing "An Jenem Tag," from Marschner's "Hans Heiling," and an arrangement of "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes."

FELIX WEINGARTNER MAY SUCCEED GERICKE

Record Feb 23 1906

Who Has Resigned As Leader of Boston's Famous Symphony Orchestra

Now that Wilhelm Gericke's announcement of his resignation as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra has opened the lips of those who had been pledged to silence, it may be stated that Gericke's determination to leave was made at the opening of the present season and has been known to his intimates all winter.

That attempts have recently been made to change his decision is true, but Gericke had made up his mind to return to Europe and, it is whispered, was not wholly disconsolate when Maj. Higginson informed him that his imposed conditions for remaining another season could not be approved.

While neither Maj. Higginson nor Mr. Gericke will discuss the probable successor of the latter it is said that Felix Weingartner has been approached and has agreed to consider the matter carefully.

WEINGARTNER IN FIRST RANK.

Paul Felix Weingartner in Europe is reputed among the first rank of living conductors. He was born in Zara, Dalmatia, June 2, 1863, and was educated in the Gymnasium at Gratz, studying music at the same time with W. A. Remy. His first Ops. were published in 1880. After that he studied at the Leipzig conservatories, winning the Mozart prize, and he also studied under Liszt at Weimar, where his first opera, "Sakuntala," was produced. This was in 1884.

Until 1889 he was conductor at theatres at Königsberg, Danzig and Hamburg. In 1891 he became second kapellmeister at the Berlin court opera house, but ill health compelled him to retire in 1897, he retaining, however, the post of conductor of symphony concerts of the Royal orchestra. From 1898 he has lived in Munich as conductor of Kaim concerts.

He is the author of 22 ops. and also of a number of books. An opera of his called "Genesius" was produced in Berlin Nov. 15, 1892, but was so hostilely received that it was withdrawn after the second performance, but afterward produced elsewhere with success. He is regarded as a composer whose writing and music is fin de siècle.

FELIX WEINGARTNER

Mr. Gericke was invited in 1884 to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He accepted the invitation, and began his duties in October of that year. He resigned his position in the spring of 1889. Then came Mr. Nikisch (1889-1893) and Mr. Paur (1893-1898). Mr. Gericke was again invited to be the conductor, and he has held the position since the fall of 1898. Thus at the end of his season he will have been the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 13 years.

BISPHAM APPEARS WITH SYMPHONY

Journal
Orchestra Gives an Artistic Interpretation to a Rather Archaic Overture From Mendelssohn.

That Mendelssohn still has power to charm by the extreme delicacy and beauty of his music at its best was proven anew by the favor given his "Melusina" overture, which started things at Saturday's Symphony concert. Few bars of imaginative music have a greater poetic appeal than the wavering, flickering loveliness of the opening phrases of the overture. The work as a whole sags in the middle, and is getting to sound rather old-aged. But its moments of rare fascination are yet enough to warrant its occasional production, particularly when it can come to the ear in the form of such delightful playing as our orchestra gives it.

An "episode for orchestra," "Ulysses' Departure and Shipwreck," by Ernest Boehe, made its debut at these concerts. Needless to say, it is in the ultra-modern style of tone-painting, heavy with big daubs of color and as a rule cleverly orchestrated. Yet it appears to signify little except the noise that must have attended the aquatic smash-up of the Greek hero. In a word, it is uninspired and uninspiring.

David Bispham sang a new Converse work for voice and orchestra, a setting of Keats' "La Belle Dame Sans Merci." It is quite characteristically Converse; that is to say, it has a rather vague and uninteresting vocal part accompanied by an orchestral dress of richness and clear-cut musicianship. Mr. Bispham sang it with artistic feeling, but his voice is now not especially warm nor pleasing. In the Marschner aria from "Haus Heilings" he covered his defects better and was highly interesting and effective.

At the last was Richard Strauss' early work, the symphony "From Italy," not heard here recently. Though it shows the beginning of the real Strauss, it is not essentially suggestive of the land of the olive. It is good music, with a grip of its own, but it is chiefly valuable as showing what a loss to the world there would have been had Strauss never gotten beyond its style.

Italy According to Strauss

The ultra-modern composers are creating a new Italy in their music. Every one of them has sensations that cry for expression when he first visits it, and nearly every one puts them forthwith into tones. Elgar had an Italian holiday two or three years ago, and then and there he wrote his overture, "In the South," that Mr. Gericke played a few weeks ago. Richard Strauss, who loves Italy, saw and felt it first twenty years ago, and as soon as he was back at Munich, wrote his symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," that ended the Symphony concert on Saturday. Two movements are the suggestions of the desolate quiet of the Campagne, and of the shimmering, lapping sun-kissed sea of the Bay of Naples. Another musing on the memorials of the Cæsars' Rome; the fourth rollicks with Neapolitan street songs. Recall the imaginative material of Elgar's overture—the sheer joy of Italy, the march of Roman armies, the haunting sadness, with all its brightness, of an Italian landscape in the spring. In both is a new sort of musical impressions of Italy and a new sort of expression for them. Not so long ago, the Italy of most composers was a land of an incessant tarantella, with occasional pauses in which a shepherd piped a pastoral tune, or a mule-train wound up a slope with tinkling bells, or, maybe, a lover thrummed a serenade. Even Charperitler, sensitive modern though he is, could find little more for his impressions of Italy. Strauss and Elgar are opener-eyed and more imaginatively minded. They, like true moderns and with true poetic instinct, have felt the appeal of Italian landscape, and colored their music with the moods that it evokes. They have felt the persistent and contrasting appeal of a mighty past—one of the strongest and deepest of Italian impressions—and sought to mirror it in their music. Both have widened and refined the musical material with which the moods of Italy overflow. Both have begun the emancipation of music about Italy from tinkle and tarantella. It is artistic work, worth the doing. It is a shining example to young composers. It has made music about Italy fresh and stimulating again. It is one more musical channel for imagination and expression that the ultra-moderns—bless them—are widening and deepening.

From

H. T. P.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Concerto in C minor for violin.....
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun,".....
Symphony in C major.....Debussy

When the overture to "Sakuntala" was first played in Boston, it became immediately popular, as the story goes; it was heard often and with delight, and it seemed as though it would take the place of the overture to "William Tell," though we have not been able to find the record of any performance of "Sakuntala" on the organ. There was much talk here as in Europe about its oriental sultriness, languor, and sensuousness, its swooning harmonies and lush orchestration.

Smells of all the sunburnt south,
Strange spice and flower, strange savor of crushed fruit,

And perfume the swart kings tread underfoot
For pleasure when their minds wax amorous,
Charred frankincense and grated sandalroot.

A reader of the criticisms of 25 or 30 years ago would infer, if he did not know the overture, that Goldmark had paraphrased in music the "Ananga-Ranga" or the "Kama-Shastra," or even "The Scented Garden" or some other improving eastern treatise. Hearing the overture today does not suggest such musical eroticism, but the work is still listened to with great delight, and it is not unlikely that it will be the one to carry down the composer's name safely through many years of the present century. For there is more than "local color" in this music. "Local color" may or may not be a musical illusion. Weber, the critic some years ago of the Temps in Paris, boldly declared there was no such thing in itself. He went too far; but how does a New Englander know what oriental color in music really is if he has not heard the music of the east in the east, and surely he would not be reminded if he sojourned in India of Goldmark's music by the music he heard there. We have been taught to believe that the employment of certain scales and harmonies and rhythms and instrumental combinations give oriental color, and when we hear music written according to this formula we say decisively: "Ah! How oriental!" And a native of India hearing the same music might say in reply: "Not a bit like it."

But Goldmark's overture is sensuous and dramatic, well constructed and original. The sensuousness and dramatic force are contagious.

ny Hall.

1905-06.

NY ORCHESTRA.

KE, Conductor.

NCERT.

CH 3, AT 8, P. M.

amme.

E to "The Fair Melusina."

for BARITONE and ORCHESTRA.
time.)

IC POEM, "Odysseus Ausfahrt und
" time.)

th ORCHESTRA.

is Heiling."

e only with thine eyes."

No. 7. "In Italy."

Soloist:

Mr DAVID BISPHAM.

PHOTO COPYRIGHT BY A. DUPON

HENRI MARTEAU, VIOLINIST

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 10, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |                  |  |
|------------------|--|
| GOLDMARK.        | OVERTURE to "Sakuntala," op. 13.   |
| JAQUES-DALCROZE. | CONCERTO in C minor, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, op. 50.I. Allegro con ritmo.II. Largo.III. Finale quasi fantasia (Allegro appassionato.)(First time at these concerts.) |
| DEBUSSY.         | PRELUDE to Stéphane Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun."   |
| SCHUBERT.        | SYMPHONY in C major, No. 7.I. Andante: Allegro, ma non troppo.II. Andante con moto.III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio.IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.                      |

Soloist:

Mr. HENRI MARTEAU.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

PHOTO COPYRIGHT BY A. DUPON

HENRI MARTEAU. VIOLINIST

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 10, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |                  |   |
|------------------|---|
| GOLDMARK.        | OVERTURE to "Sakuntala," op. 13.  |
| JAQUES-DALCROZE. | CONCERTO in C minor, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA,op. 50.I. Allegro con ritmo.II. Largo.III. Finale quasi fantasia (Allegro appassionato.)(First time at these concerts.) |
| DEBUSSY.         | PRELUDE to Stéphane Mallarmé's Eclogue, "TheAfternoon of a Faun."   |
| SCHUBERT.        | SYMPHONY in C major, No. 7.I. Andante: Allegro, ma non troppo.II. Andante con moto.III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio.IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.                         |

Soloist:

MR. HENRI MARTEAU.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Globe
Henri Marteau, Soloist at Symphony Concert.

Plays for the First Time Here Dalcroze's Violin Concerto.

Piano Recital by Arthur Rubinstein—Gossip.

The novelty of the 18th Symphony program was Dalcroze's C minor concerto for violin and orchestra which Mr Henri Marteau played for the first time in this city, the original performance having been given by the same artist about five years ago in Geneva. The work is dedicated to Mr Marteau, and both he and Dalcroze are connected with the conservatory at that place. The other selections chosen by Mr Gericke were Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," Debussy's prelude to Mallarme's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Schubert's grand C major symphony. A very long program, and many in the audience left before the close of the concert and missed the wonderful finale of the Schubert number. Dalcroze's concerto is in three movements, the orchestration fairly bristles with difficulties for the soloist as well as the band, and the boldness of some of the instrumental combinations and the fullness of the solo score, in which also are found unusual melodic forms, makes the work very interesting. With such a performance as that given by Mr Marteau and the orchestra all the merits of the composition received due recognition. The interpretation was one long to be remembered with pleasure.

Although Mr Marteau has not been heard with the Symphony orchestra for a dozen years his frequent appearances here in concerts and recitals have shown him to be a virtuoso of high rank and his fame in this country and abroad is well deserved. He has made the concert going public acquainted with many violin compositions by musicians comparatively unknown and his repertory probably covers as wide a field in musical literature as any contemporary artist. In the Dalcroze concerto Mr Marteau shows about every phase of violin mastery that is known. In the first movement, and part of the third, the chord phrases are so numerous that the physical demand, aside from the bowing, is very taxing. In the second part there are contrasting theme episodes that require double finger work of the most facile nature and the "stumbling blocks" in the last movement only permit surmounting by an artist of Mr Marteau's skill.

Mr Marteau's performance was singularly effective and sympathetic as soon as he "got into the mood," which mood was not apparent for the first few minutes. Then he gave an exhibition of virtuosity that was nearly flawless. Whether it was the rather novel character of the work, the splendid playing of the soloist and the orchestra, or the combinations of the three, that aroused the enthusiasm of the audience it would be difficult to determine; but whatever the cause the result was an outburst of applause that indicated warm appreciation of a spirited and artistic interpretation of a meritorious work. Mr Marteau was recalled and recalled to the platform.

Under the direction of Mr Hess the orchestral support in the concerto was inspiring and wholly adequate in every way in its companionship with the solo artist. Mr Gericke led the other selections; and very satisfactory was the "Sakuntala" overture and the dainty and fantastic Debussy prelude. Of the interpretation of the magnificent seventh symphony by Schubert general praise is due.

The orchestra will be away this week on its fifth trip. The program for the 19th rehearsal and concert will include the overture to "Tasse," D'Harcourt; Liszt's E flat piano concert, Mr Rudolph Ganz soloist; E. A. Mac Dowell's symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine" and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

MUSICAL MISCELLANY

MORE AND JUST PRAISE FOR GERICKE

Le Gallienne Turns Wagner Into Poetry—
The Philadelphia Orchestra Polls Its Audience for a Final Programme—Some Interesting Results—Another Operatic Rebellion—Musical News

Next week, on the final "trip" of our orchestra for the current season, Mr. Gericke will be making his last appearances as conductor in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. The audiences at the monthly concerts in these cities are as steadfast in attendance and almost as intimate with conductor and band as are ours, each week, at home. They have been so for years, except in Washington, and they are the flower of the musical public of each city. There is every sign that they will show their regard for Mr. Gericke as they take leave of him, and from Baltimore come reports of a more substantial token of it than applause and wreaths. Meanwhile, since his approaching retirement became known, the musical reviewers of these cities have been writing warm and just praise of him. None has been so sincere and so discriminating toward both the conductor and his men as has Mr. Aldrich of the New York Times. He wrote there last Sunday:

"What the Boston Orchestra is Mr. Gericke has made it. The character it has had as an artistic instrument and the style of its performance are as they are because they have been moulded exactly by his ideals and methods. High ideals and strenuous methods they have been. He has never spared his men any of the pains and labor that he considered requisite to obtain the exact effect he was aiming at in any work, in any passage, in any single bit of orchestral color or phrase or adjustment of tonal balance. But neither has he spared himself. A 'passion for perfection,' it has been well said, has been at the foundation of Mr. Gericke's work as an orchestral conductor, and he has wreaked himself upon the Boston Orchestra to make it what he would have it. Greater technical perfection in the playing of an orchestra it is vain to seek, but there is something finer, subtler, more elusive than technical finish in orchestral performance that Mr. Gericke has given the Boston Orchestra; the perfect euphony, the perfect balance, the exact adjustment of the color and quality of every phrase, so that there shall be just so much of one instrumental color, just so much of another, and the resultant mixture shall be the precise one that belongs to the harmony of the whole."

"Mr. Gericke has been charged with sacrificing spirit, breadth, and the fiercer sonorities of modern orchestral music in his anxiety to keep this sort of quality. Whatever it may have been once, it is now an unjust charge. Especially in the later years of his work here, he has shown a continually increasing sympathy with compositions of the modern schools of music, has played them frequently, and with fine enthusiasm and devotion. Who will not say that Mr. Gericke's performance of Strauss's 'Don Quixote,' for instance, for the first time in New York, was not superior in almost every respect to the performance the composer himself gave of it not long afterward? Besides all its other excellencies, it had the very important one that the orchestra did not break down in the middle. This is something, and it is something that has always been felt to belong to the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Gericke—its absolute certainty, its unquestioned perfection of preparation. When it plays a piece it is able to do it as Mr. Gericke intends, and until it is able to, this piece is not played."

"It has been said, also, that Mr. Gericke has exhausted his men and overburdened and worried them with rehearsals, with endless repetitions and stoppings. Perhaps; but the result of it has been that these same men have played as scarcely another body of the kind in the world can play; that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is absolutely perfect in its way. And that, too, is something. Another conductor would have done differently, would have got other kinds of effects, would have accomplished another order of results; but—to return to the original proposition—as it is now, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the product precisely of Mr. Gericke's strenuous, unwearied activities. Those who are grateful for its achievements must express their gratitude first of all to him."

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Goldmark—Overture to "Sakuntala."
Jaques-Dalcroze—Violin Concerto, C minor.
Soloist, M. Henri Marteau.
Debussy—"The Afternoon of a Faun."
Schubert—Symphony in C major.

And a mighty long programme it was! It began brilliantly with the Goldmark overture, which was applauded to the echo. Again and again Mr. Gericke was obliged to bow his acknowledgements. We imagine, however, that this exceptional enthusiasm was in part a personal tribute to Mr. Gericke. The public seem to delight in showing him their appreciation of his past services. It may be added that these services were never more thorough than at present; he seems in the very zenith of his powers.

Mr. Hess deserves especial praise for the manner in which he interpreted the new Swiss concerto. It was a difficult composition to conduct and it received adequate performance both in the orchestral and the solo parts. Mr. Henri Marteau has broadened in style since we last heard him and his performance was praise-worthy in the highest degree.

Such massive G-string work, such perfect double-stopping, such pure harmonics (in the finale of the slow movement) one can seldom hear. The audience went into frenzies of delight and recalled the great artist over and over again at the end of the composition. And this triumph was the more remarkable when one considers that the work itself was not of a popular sort.

In fact this new violin concerto is another of those bizarre attempts to wake up weary critics by unheard-of combinations. No one may object to liberty of form in a concerto.

After all, the concerto is the freest expression of the sonata-form, and even the precise Mozart, who founded the classical form of concerto, made occasional deviations, while Liszt led the concerto into the rhapsodical vein almost a half century ago. Therefore M. Jaques-Dalcroze has "carte blanche" to use any form he wishes in concerto-writing. But the oddity of the orchestration, the strange progressions, the fearfully abrupt contrasts, made the composition one of the modern music puzzles.

It was marked "First time at these concerts," and a witty auditor remarked that he would be happier if it had stated "Last time at these concerts." Yet we suspect that there is more to the work than at first sight appears. We should be glad to hear it again if only to solve our doubts.

While the first, general impression was unfavorable, we found some points of remarkable beauty and skill in the concerto. The gloomy, portentous, restless fugue, in the first movement, beginning on the bassoons and running through the wood-wind and the brasses until it permeates the whole orchestra, was one strong point. The beauty of the passages on the muted strings was another. The contrasts of the slow movement were effective, and so was the clumsy "brusquerie" of parts of the finale.

And there was very much figure treatment. Let no one suppose that our ultra-modern school lacks intellectuality. On the contrary, the mental exercise is pushed as far as it was in the 15th and 16th centuries, when Music and Mathematics were twin sisters. Figure treatment is constantly in evidence in this concerto, as it is in the works of D'Indy, Mahler, Reger, "ed id genus omne."

Yet we cannot say that this "Marteau" hit the nail on the head by making his "rentree" with this work, for it has all the prolixity of the long-winded latter-day composers. Nowadays a Sinfonietta takes an hour in performance, and a full-blooded symphony or concerto extends into infinity.

The grace of Debussy made a good foil to the pleasant sour of this violin work, and we yielded more to its romantic charm than ever before. Yet this forlorn Faun ought not to have appeared on this particular programme. Its "afternoon" extended too far into the evening. Even without this interesting zoological specimen the programme would have been an hour and three-quarters in length.

Finally Schubert like a poultice came to heal the blows of Jaques-Dalcroze. To think that once upon a time Vienna rejected this C major symphony as being too intricate to understand and too difficult to be played! Mahler is avenging Schubert by giving Vienna symphonies that are twice as hard and not half as melodious. We wonder if tune-writing were again obligatory in Music whether the most prominent of our living composers could compete with Schubert.

It is seldom that one witnesses an exodus during a performance of a Schubert work, but on this occasion the prolixity had been extreme and for once Schubert's "divine length" seemed excessive, wherefore there was a long procession towards the doors at the end of the Andante, and the grand finale, with its development of that powerful figure of four ponderous knocks, was listened to by only the faithful old guard which may be bored but never surrenders. The performance of the symphony was an especially fine one. Louis C. Elson.

RUDOLPH GANZ.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

MARTEAU REAPPEARS AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A New Concerto by Dalcroze and a Symphony of Schubert—Few Concerts Next Week—The Musical Calendar—News of the Day Trans. N.Y. 10.1906

By all accounts that courtly mind, that genial and polished imagination that lived as Addison, was never much or pleasantly stirred by music! If only it had been, and if the days of its activity were these days of ours, the concert of yesterday afternoon would have set it to a new account of "The Pleasures of the Imagination," and we should have the acute and expert sympathy needed to describe to us how perfect was the pleasure that was given to us who heard the music of yesterday afternoon.

For there some hundreds of us, fleeing from a wet and dreary world without, had hurried in to warmth and cheer and music. And if never before had it been set forth what music is really for, then there it was most plainly put before any that chose to remark it—in the rush of enchanting sound within, and its two hours of grateful interruption to the rush of wind and snow outside. Outside, the cold and pelting elements; inside, Debussy with his quiet wood and faun, and the sunshine of Schubert. Outside, the cold hard world that we find with our raw feelings every day, that beats us and baffles us, that is filled with haggling competitors, uses us ill and deprives us of all that we want. Inside, the world of make-believe, where yearning sees itself satisfied, where joy is celebrated and fun is real, where the ills of the world are at least in fancy righted and we who have suffered them are soothed in their imagined banishment. That is what music is for—to set our imagination on horseback, as it were, that for a too brief hour or two it may gallop away from the vexed world of reality and arrive at whatever heaven it selects.

For such retreat yesterday Mr. Gericke had prepared one of those programmes with which of late months he has been regularly astonishing his followers. They have searched the literature for orchestra, have found the new thing of eternal worth, have found things new among the eternal old, have mixed all these so that contrast should add light to their shining. Yesterday there was Goldmark with busy strings, businesslike horns and drums, a collection of irreproachable platitudes to deliver, and a general tendency to illustrate that famous line in one of Milton's famous sonnets. And why, till we have made seemly disposal of hat and coat and have safely put the hard world behind us, should there not be some honest maker of music who also shall serve though he only stand and wait? Goldmark went to prepare a way for Debussy.

And a remarkable performance we had of Debussy's faun music, sunny, sylvan, dreamy, full of indefinable yearning, and worthy the sacrifice of anything needed to prepare its way. Of misty pool it sings, and of the thrill that misty pool gives one who suddenly and excitedly discovers it on mounting a little hill. Of quiet, subdued sunset and evening stillness Debussy discourses, and of the mystery they spread over the mind. But most he can convey that ineffable longing that has settled over everything human at some time or other. It may come at any time—in the night, when the imagination is horribly alone with itself. It may come when you are caught in the thickest of crowds. Haply it is faltering and comes but seldom. But most it steals upon you out of green woods or gray sky—a yearning vague as the sky, a wish of the vexed imagination to be larger than itself, to occupy a lot larger than the human—and for the rest indescribable, except as Debussy describes it. Flute and Mr. Gericke, orchestra and Debussy, sang that yesterday till wood and sky were there, and the faun and his pipe, to personate you and all that you felt and would say if you could. It was a notable performance.

For ending to the programme there was Schubert's unending great symphony in C, whose length is heavenly, said Schumann, and whose themes are like heavenly guests. Themes of ravishing beauty Schubert has there put upon the paper, certainly, and in inexhaustible bounty, and arranged in a pattern that has symmetry along with its largeness, coherence along with bulk. Its design is immense. There is but one thing this is like in the effect it gives. Your man who walks along the street is accustomed to the quick rhythms of street sounds—the swift click of the street-car wheel on its rail, the rapid striking of a clock, the tattoo of his own heels on the flags. Set him a lubber on an outgoing ship and he gets a tremendous impression as the vessel leaves the harbor, and there begins to come the long, slow, regular, steady heave of the waves against the side. The second one brings him to notice. The third establishes the rhythm, and his whole system of thought has to accommodate itself to this new pulse, slow, agonizingly slow, that staggers him with his first sense of the immensity of things and the irresistible force of their procession. There is something of the same sense of largeness and majesty in Schubert's symphony. It moves with a Jove-like, stately leisure. It looks out upon the world and speaks with the repose and contentment of a god, for whom time does not exist and who speaks and does as he wills. It takes all the time it chooses to its charming, and half the wonderful spell that it exerts is the very deliberateness of the exertion. Mr. Gericke in playing it played it with perfect yielding to its first exaction—he gave it design. He made it what it is, an Alhambra melted into music—a structure of vastness, overlaid with intricately and endlessly graceful detail.

These things made large enjoyment, and yet salient in them stood the appearance of Mr. Marteau, to fiddle with our orchestra for the first time since 1893. So long an absence made him important before he made himself charming. The charm he created for himself, moreover, by the force of his personality and his art, and without great aid from the music of Mr. Jaques-Dalcrose, whose concerto he had brought along to play. Jaques-Dalcrose, the information goes, is interesting because he is Swiss—the first of his country to make much music. Of Swiss extraction he is, but of Viennese birth. And the Alps, it must be said, have lost much height in going down into Austria. How much of the charm of the Helvetian's tunes were Marteau and how much Jaques-Dalcrose makes a delicate point in metaphysics—which will be neglected to nobody's sorrow. For the rest, the concerto seems, at least on first hearing, made up of some fustian, much honest buckram and patches of real cloth-of-gold. For much of the time it kept Mr. Marteau from being Marteau. It busied him with very careful and delicate and amazing execution of sixths and thirds and octaves that left the eye dry and the hearer's throat unchoked by sobs. It kept Mr. Marteau, much of the time, mounting Alpine steeps of arpeggios, icy cold. But the mountain song did break forth, and then we heard Mr. Marteau.

And the tone of Marteau! Kubelik's violin has the hard, glittering voice of success. Always from youth it has had the easy way of the wonder-child, and its tone sings that—a calm acceptance of the rapture stirred by its wonder, and a feeling and a comprehension for nothing else. Outside its feeling and comprehension the world goes on, occasionally busy with other things than wonder-children, full of people who toil and fail, full of other people who pity failure and lift it up. And all that and more is in Marteau's tone. And if you want to hear your immediate world, that gives you a struggle to live, that baffles you and hurts you and yet gives you friends and sunsets and all the rest of life—if you want to hear all that reduced to the single voice of a violin, go and hear Marteau play.

B. K.

HENRI MARTEAU,
1892 ~ VIOLINIST

HENRI MARTEAU,
1904.

MUSIC TRICKERY MARKS CONCERTO

Unusual Orchestral Combinations in Accompaniment to Henri Marteau's New Violin Offering.

HEARD AT EIGHTEENTH
SYMPHONY CONCERT

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" Also on the Programme—Mr. Stojowski's Piano Recital in Steinert Hall.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Concerto in C minor for violin.....
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun,".....
Symphony in C major.....Debussy

When the overture to "Sakuntala" was first played in Boston, it became immediately popular, as the story goes; it was heard often and with delight, and it seemed as though it would take the place of the overture to "William Tell," though we have not been able to find the record of any performance of "Sakuntala" on the organ. There was much talk here as in Europe about its oriental sultriness, languor, and sensuousness, its swooning harmonies and lush orchestration.

Smells of all the sunburnt south.
Strange spice and flower, strange savor of crushed fruit,
And perfume the swart kings tread underfoot
For pleasure when their minds wax amorous,
Charred frankincense and grated sandalroot.

A reader of the criticisms of 25 or 30 years ago would infer, if he did not know the overture, that Goldmark had paraphrased in music the "Ananga-Ranga" or the "Kama-Shastra," or even "The Scented Garden" or some other improving eastern treatise. Hearing the overture today does not suggest such musical eroticism, but the work is still listened to with great delight, and it is not unlikely that it will be the one to carry down the composer's name safely through many years of the present century. For there is more than "local color" in this music. "Local color" may or may not be a musical illusion. Weber, the critic some years ago of the Temps in Paris, boldly declared there was no such thing in itself. He went too far; but how does a New Englander know what oriental color in music really is if he has not heard the music of the east in the east, and surely he would not be reminded if he sojourned in India of Goldmark's music by the music he heard there. We have been taught to believe that the employment of certain scales and harmonies and rhythms and instrumental combinations give oriental color, and when we hear music written according to this formula we say decisively: "Ah! How oriental!" And a native of India hearing the same music might say in reply: "Not a bit like it."

But Goldmark's overture is sensuous and dramatic, well constructed and original. The sensuousness and dramatic force are contagious.

Mr. Marteau has not been heard at these concerts since 1893. He was then in his 19th year, and he won all hearts by the charm of his youthfulness and the warmth and the enthusiasm of his performance. He has since visited the city from time to time, and the constant development of his art has been apparent.

Last night he played a concerto unknown here, except possibly to violinists, who may have wondered at its difficulties. Jaques-Dalcrose, a Swiss, born at Vienna, composed it and dedicated it to him. The concerto is inherently a virtuoso work, a show piece. Its form is free and unconventional, free to the verge of recklessness. That the composer has technic and also a vivid sense of orchestration is indisputable, but in composing it his aim seems chiefly to have been to provide a formidable task for the violinist and to make the audience sit up. With the exception of a beautiful song-episode just before the introduction of the fugal section in the first movement—this song-episode is repeated—and the second, an idyllic movement, which has delightful moments and true mood, the concerto for effect depends on orchestral trickery.

Unusual and surprising combinations of instruments certainly keep the hearer's attention diverted. Sudden contrasts in rhythm and emotion keep him on the jump. But there is little inherent strength or beauty of thought in the work with the exception of the passages above named. The work as pure music seems rambling, disjointed, inconsequential. We doubt whether a second hearing would change this impression, for an audience is surprised only once. When the surprise is known in advance, there is then opportunity for examining carefully the cheap cause of the surprise. The combination of a snare drum and a fiddle, for example, is not necessarily heroic or beautiful.

Mr. Marteau gave a remarkable virtuoso performance of this virtuoso concerto. The task was a most difficult one, and it is not surprising that the violinist's intonation, especially in the first movement, was occasionally impure. It would be ungracious to insist on this point, for as a whole Mr. Marteau's playing was one of extraordinary merit, one characterized by the finest technical and aesthetic qualities. His tone is not so luscious as when he first visited us, but it has a virility and a breadth that have come with the years, and he now displays a maturity and authority of conception and interpretation that, with his virtuosic ability, made him among the great violinists.

It would have been better for the balance of the programme if the exquisite prelude of Debussy had come after a more solid and substantial work. On the other hand the performance of the prelude showed the difference between a true and rare artist, a man with the most poetic thoughts, a composer of unusual imagination, with an equally uncommon gift of expression, and a musician with a knack at orchestration, an experimenter with instrumental combinations and contrasts. How logical, how inevitable was this music of Debussy after that of Jacques-Daleroze! Why should we not now be as familiar with Debussy's "Nocturnes" as with the prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"? The third nocturne does not necessarily require a female chorus. Then there is a still later work, "The Sea," which should be heard here.

The concert ended with the performance of Schubert's symphony, which is still among those that are truly great. The work of the orchestra was excellent last evening. Mr. Gericke's masterly reading of the symphony is well known; Goldmark's overture was performed superbly, and Debussy's prelude was read and played with the indispensable grace and poesy.

MARTEAU PLAYS NEW CONCERTO

Head of Violin Department at Geneva Conservatory Will
Be Heard Today at 18th Public
Symphony Rehearsal.

Herald — March 9, 1906

The 18th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, will take place in Symphony Hall this afternoon. The concert will begin with Goldmark's familiar "Sakuntala" overture. Mr. Henri Marteau, who has not played at a symphony concert since 1893, will introduce a new violin concerto by Emile Jaques-Daleroze, new in this city. The composer was born at Vienna, though he is of a Swiss family. He studied music in Vienna and Paris, and since 1892 he has been instructor in harmony at the Geneva Conservatory, where Mr. Marteau has been for some years at the head of the violin department.

Jaques-Daleroze has composed operas, orchestral pieces, chamber music and cantatas, but he is perhaps better known in Europe by his many Swiss songs. The concerto was first played a few years ago by Mr. Marteau, to whom it is dedicated. It is described as a singularly original work.

The programme will also include Debussy's exquisite prelude to Mallarme's great symphony in C major.

The orchestra will be on its last trip the 16th and 17th. The programme of the 23d-24th will be as follows: d'Harcourt's overture to the opera "Tasso" (first time here); Liszt's piano concerto No. 1 in E flat (Mr. Rudolph Ganz, pianist); MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lancelot and Elaine" and Beethoven's symphony No. 8.

MARTEAU PROVES HIMSELF THE ARTIST

Faultless and Coherent Performance of Daleroze With the
Symphony.

Journal — March 12, 1906

The unusual violin concerto by the Swiss composer Daleroze and its strong and masterly performance by Henri Marteau were the chief features of Saturday's Symphony concert. The work is immensely impressive at a first hearing. It begins in extraordinary fashion with huge masses of orchestral color and bold, broad sweeps on the lower strings of the solo instrument. This first movement, spite of its departure from old models, is thoroughly coherent and well made. The slow section displays rare beauty somewhat in the modern French style of mysticism, and the finale is a species of musical revelry that is at once attractive and artistic. The concerto as a whole is a welcome addition to the literature of the violin.

Mr. Marteau, whom Boston has known and liked ever since his days of youthful precocity, is now a man of 32. He always had talent and technical richness; he now adds the breadth and inspiration of a player in his prime, and his interpretation of the Daleroze work was as finished and superb a performance as one need care to hear.

All the other portions of the concert were more or less familiar; even Debussy's exquisite tone dream, "The Afternoon of a Faun," now seems like an old friend so quickly has its beauty made its way. Needless to say its performance by the orchestra was at the very acme of refined and delicate technique. Goldmark's "Sakuntala," overture, too, that beautifully colored piece of orientalism, was played faultlessly. As for the Schubert C major Symphony, its charm and classic appeal are still as potent as ever. It was read with loving care by Mr. Gericke, while the players gave to it their most spontaneous art.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 24, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

D'HARCOURT,	OVERTURE to the opera "Tasso." (First time.)
LISZT,	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA in E flat major, No. 1. Allegro maestoso.—Quasi adagio.—Allegretto vivace.— Allegro animato.—Allegro marziale animato.—Presto.
MACDOWELL,	Two SYMPHONIC POEMS, "Lancelot and Elaine." (after Tennyson), op. 25.
BEETHOVEN,	SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93. I. Allegro vivace e con brio. II. Allegretto scherzando. III. Tempo di menuetto. IV. Allegro vivace.

Soloist:

MR. RUDOLPH GANZ.

The Piano is a Mason and Hamlin.

that, with his virtuoso ability, rank him among the great violinists.

It would have been better for the balance of the programme if the exquisite prelude of Debussy had come after a more solid and substantial work. On the other hand the performance of the prelude showed the difference between a true and rare artist, a man with the most poetic thoughts, a composer of unusual imagination, with an equally uncommon gift of expression, and a musician with a knack at orchestration, an experimenter with instrumental combinations and contrasts. How logical, how inevitable was this music of Debussy after that of Jacques-Dalcroze! Why should we not now be as familiar with Debussy's "Nocturnes" as with the prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"? The third nocturne does not necessarily require a female chorus. Then there is a still later work, "The Sea," which should be heard here.

The concert ended with the performance of Schubert's symphony, which is still among those that are truly great. The work of the orchestra was excellent last evening. Mr. Gericke's masterly leading of the symphony is well known; Goldmark's overture was performed superbly, and Debussy's prelude was read and played with the indispensable grace and poesy.

MARTEAU PLAYS NEW CONCERTO

Head of Violin Department at Geneva Conservatory Will
Be Heard Today at 18th Public
Symphony Rehearsal.

Herald — March 9, 1906

The 18th public-rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, will take place in Symphony Hall this afternoon. The concert will begin with Goldmark's familiar "Sakuntala" overture. Mr. Henri Marteau, who has not played at a symphony concert since 1893, will introduce a new violin concerto by Emile Jaques-Dalcroze, new in this city. The composer was born at Vienna, though he is of a Swiss family. He studied music in Vienna and Paris, and since 1892 he has been instructor in harmony at the Geneva Conservatory, where Mr. Marteau has been for some years at the head of the violin department.

Jaques-Dalcroze has composed operas, orchestral pieces, chamber music and cantatas, but he is perhaps better known in Europe by his many Swiss songs. The concerto was first played a few years ago by Mr. Marteau, to whom it is dedicated. It is described as a singularly original work.

The programme will also include Debussy's exquisite prelude to Mallarmé's

"Afternoon of a Faun" and Schubert's great symphony in C major.

The orchestra will be on its last trip the 16th and 17th. The programme of the 23d-24th will be as follows: d'Harcourt's overture to the opera "Tasso" (first time here); Liszt's piano concerto No. 1 in E flat (Mr. Rudolph Ganz, pianist); MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lancelot and Elaine" and Beethoven's symphony No. 8.

MARTEAU PROVES HIMSELF THE ARTIST

Faultless and Coherent Performance of Dalcroze With the
Symphony.

Journal — March 12, 1906

The unusual violin concerto by the Swiss composer Dalcroze and its strong and masterly performance by Henri Marteau were the chief features of Saturday's Symphony concert. The work is immensely impressive at a first hearing. It begins in extraordinary fashion with huge masses of orchestral color and bold, broad sweeps on the lower strings of the solo instrument. This first movement, spite of its departure from old models, is thoroughly coherent and well made. The slow section displays rare beauty somewhat in the modern French style of mysticism, and the finale is a species of musical revelry that is at once attractive and artistic. The concerto as a whole is a welcome addition to the literature of the violin.

Mr. Marteau, whom Boston has known and liked ever since his days of youthful precocity, is now a man of 32. He always had talent and technical richness; he now adds the breadth and inspiration of a player in his prime, and his interpretation of the Dalcroze work was as finished and superb a performance as one need care to hear.

All the other portions of the concert were more or less familiar; even Debussy's exquisite tone dream, "The Afternoon of a Faun," now seems like an old friend so quickly has its beauty made its way. Needless to say its performance by the orchestra was at the very acme of refined and delicate technique. Goldmark's "Sakuntala," overture, too, that beautifully colored piece of orientalism, was played faultlessly. As for the Schubert C major Symphony, its charm and classic appeal are still as potent as ever. It was read with loving care by Mr. Gericke, while the players gave to it their most spontaneous art.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 24, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

D'HARCOURT,	OVERTURE to the opera "Tasso." (First time.)
LISZT,	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA in E flat major, No. 1. Allegro maestoso.—Quasi adagio.—Allegretto vivace.— Allegro animato.—Allegro marziale animato.—Presto.
MACDOWELL,	Two SYMPHONIC POEMS, "Lancelot and Elaine." (after Tennyson), op. 25.
BRETHOVEN,	SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93. I. Allegro vivace e con brio. II. Allegretto scherzando. III. Tempo di menuetto. IV. Allegro vivace.

Soloist:

MR. RUDOLPH GANZ.

The Piano is a Mason and Hamlin.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

EARLY MACDOWELL AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Ganz Plays Liszt's Concerto with Tempered Brilliance—A New Overture—The Choral Art Society in Old Madrigals—Bauer's Farewell—Other Concerts to Come—Musical News

The grievous and irreparable fate that has stricken Mr. MacDowell in the ripening maturity of his powers has quickened curiosity about his music and esteem for it. Now, when he will write no more, we that profess an interest in serious music are lamenting him as the composer of just distinction that we should have hailed ten years and more ago—the composer, in fact, that Germans and Englishmen discovered at his true worth before some of us, his countrymen, did at home. MacDowell clubs are spreading knowledge and appreciation of his work; Mr. Hamlin Garland is much in earnest in the matter; and conductors are putting MacDowell's music on their programmes. Yet by its intrinsic force of imagination and its individual qualities of expression it was making its way, and will make its way, without any of these extraneous aids which the composer himself in his sincere and reliant heart but lightly esteemed. Moreover, it is not in his music for orchestra—hardly even in the "Indian suite," which excels all that went before, or in the piano concertos—that his most characteristic qualities run finest and shine clearest. They are in some of his songs and some of his piano pieces—most of all in his "Heroic" and his "Keltic" sonatas. Curiously, too, it is his earlier orchestral pieces that the conductors are oftenest choosing, and MacDowell's power to impart his imaginings as he himself saw and felt them, gathered strength and fineness slowly. Always his expression through an orchestra was individual, but for long it fell short of what he willed. The other day in New York it was the orchestral fragments, "The Fair Alda" and "The Saracens," that Mr. Damrosch chose for performance. And yesterday at our Symphony concert, it was "Lancelot and Elaine" that Mr. Gericke picked. Now all this music MacDowell wrote twenty years ago, when he was a very young man, and his friends recall how in later days he smiled gently at it as "youthful."

Persuade one's self as one may—and it is a time when one would think and write most warmly of MacDowell's music—the poetic and imaginative contents of "Lancelot and Elaine" and the musical expression of them do falter. Once and again, there is a poignant and vivid melody like the measures for the oboe that suggest Elaine, but soon the musical picture wavers or turns cloudy. There are passages in the tournament music and in the music of Lancelot's overthrow that catch the voice and glamor of chivalry, only to become halting or misty. There are details of exquisite imagination and of very felicitous expression in the close of the tone-poem as the dead Elaine, "as though she smiled" drifts past Lancelot's eyes. But they are details only, though it is easy to add twenty more, some very subtle and others very poignant. Elsewhere the music wavers. By some curious and evasive sympathy, under such a performance as Mr. Gericke and his men gave of it, the listener half catches the fine intensity of mood and clear delicacy of understanding that Tennyson's poem awoke in MacDowell. As often he wholly feels that the composer cannot put what he would into his tones. The design that should be fine and clear blurs vaguely. The atmosphere that should pervade becomes fitful and obscure. The composer's poetic sensibility expresses itself oftenest and most vividly only in poignant or subtle details. The music is very seldom quite sure, quite final. Rarely does it summon unerringly the image that it would raise and transport the hearer with it, as Wagner does, for example, in the twenty measures of "Parsifal" through which the knights troop along the forest. Perhaps, however, some of this vagueness lies in the musical evasiveness of the Arthurian legends themselves. They have fascinated many a composer—Chausson for example—as they did MacDowell. Then when he would put them into tones, they have evaded him. Somehow they seem musically bodiless. Yet Tennyson isolated them, as the chemists say, in his verse, and MacDowell was more than half a poet too. Perhaps, he of all composers has come nearest to such achievement in his "Sonata Eroica" with its sub-title of "Arthur, flower of kings."

The rest of the concert was brilliancy rampant. In New York poor MacDowell had his orchestral fragments thrust beside Beethoven's eighth symphony, and yesterday "Lancelot and Elaine" stood over against it again. And that symphony is all quick surety of invention and expression. The themes, the development, the figures spring to life before the listener's very ears. The mere ardor of it transports. The high spirits of it smite. For the instant you forget that music could ever falter or blur—it must go irresistibly onward, as Mr. Gericke and the band played it, rippling up details and ornament out of the broad rush of the whole. The wind of fancy, almost a gale of it, blew through the music.

D'Harcourt's overture to his opera of "Tasso," the new music of the afternoon, went on and on, too; but it was a shallow stream, if it was turbulent now and then, and its brilliancy was altogether thin and superficial. How amiable the life of this Monsieur Le Comte d'Harcourt must be—"man of property," as the programme book respectfully called him—with the writing of music and the performing of it for his pastimes! He has mused on the formal neatness of Saint-Saëns, the long-drawn sweetness of Massenet and the hollow tonal pomp of Meyerbeer and his children. He knows the ways of the Opéra at Paris. And poor old Barbier, librettist to Gounod ages ago as it now seems, made him a libretto out of the story of Tasso, and Mr. Gericke, chronically hard pressed for new overtures that are even presentable, found d'Harcourt's and played it. Steadily it "sounded"—now pompously, now stridently, now in amorous or repining cantilena. There was much ingenious workmanship in it. There was some brilliancy of tone. It had intelligence. But there was not a real melodic idea or a real musical emotion. Tasso, poet, courtier, lover, madman, leaps out of Liszt's tone-poem. The glow of his time is over him. D'Harcourt's Tasso is an operatic tenor, striding down to the footlights to salute his Leonora—and the audience—with a romanza. He is as amiable as the count himself.

Liszt's first concerto as Mr. Ganz and Mr. Gericke played it had genuine brilliancy, but a curiously tempered brightness. A pianist, if he have the inspiration, imagination and power, may play the concerto as though it were a magnificent impromptu, a glorious improvisation that catches up the orchestra with it and sweeps the audience into it, until virtuoso, band and listeners are drunk with the music. Or, if he choose, he may play it as Mr. Joseffy does, shifting with the nicest hand a delicate kaleidoscope of soft tonal tints—the glaring and torrential Liszt subdued to half-lights in a windless chamber. Mr. Ganz and Mr. Gericke have found a third way. Their Liszt was all brilliancy, but it was cool, calm, ordered, detached. There was no heat of fiery improvisation in it. Neither was there an unduly soft and shadowed radiance. Pianist and conductor kept the coolest heads in the world. The one was master of his instrument and the other of his band. There were melting fusings, sparkling contrasts and clear and pliant interplay of piano and orchestra. There were the nicest and the surest modulations and adjustments of tone. Mr. Ganz and Mr. Gericke grasped the whole design, the large moods, the smallest detail and the merely momentary fancies of the music. They were intelligence personified. They were masterful with an unerring mastery. They made the music as brilliant as the stars on a clear autumn night—and as impersonal.

H. T. P.

MUSICAL Hohe MATTERS

Rudolph Ganz, Soloist
at the Symphony.

Second of the Season's Concerts
by Choral Art Society.

Bauer's Farewell Recital—
Preludes and Echoes.

D. Harcourt's overture to the opera, "Tasso" was the orchestral novelty on the Symphony program last week; Mr Rudolph Ganz made his debut at these concerts as soloist in Liszt's E-flat major piano concerto, Mr E. A. MacDowell was represented by his symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine" and Beethoven's eighth symphony completed the list. The "Tasso" overture is composed of brief excerpts from the opera and gives hints of various episodes in the story without attempting to utilize new thematic material to any great extent. Melodies of the opera are merely suggested, there is no extended development and the work is clearly an overture and not specially intended as a program piece. It was given an effective interpretation, the homogeneous work of the orchestra being up to its usual standard.

Liszt's piano concerto at the hands of Mr Ganz was a brilliant and refined performance, despite the almost monotonous character of the solo part. His finger work was charmingly crisp and delicate in the opening and closing portions, very tender, yet perfectly clear, in the legato passages in the slow movement. His pianissimo playing was notably distinct and the perfect accord between soloist and orchestra made the performance one fully deserving the enthusiastic plaudits given at the termination. Mr Ganz gives a recital here this week which will afford further opportunity to judge of his abilities as a pianist.

"Cut is the branch that might have grown full straight, and burned is Apollo's laurel bough," is the touchingly appropriate couplet on the program page referring to Mr MacDowell's intention to write an opera on an Arthurian legend, a purpose never to be consummated by reason of the sad affliction which has closed his career as a composer. Mr MacDowell's poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," is generally accepted to be a musical picture of scenes in which the knight, Guinevere and Elaine figure, closing with the well-known incident pictured as "the dead steered by the dumb." The plaintive nature of the work, as a whole, and the beautiful orchestration with its many contrasting motifs, make a very appealing composition and the sad associations connected with the performance made the piece sound unusually impressive. It was magnificently played. And the grand Eighth symphony of Beethoven was also a fine example of ensemble work. The audience was lavish with plaudits for Mr Gericke, as well as the orchestra and soloist.

Mrs Hissen de Moss will be this week's soloist, singing arias from Handel's oratorio, "Joshua" and Mozart's "Magic Flute." The orchestral selections will include Bach's D major suite, Busoni's "Geharnische" suite, and Brahms' Fourth symphony.

NEW OVERTURE Handel BY D'HARCOURT

Played for First Time in Boston at the 19th Symphony Concert—Is Prelude to the Opera "Tasso."

MR. GANZ'S BRILLIANT
LISZT PERFORMANCE

Virtuoso and Permanent Conductors Are Compared—A Note on Orchestral Euphony
—Coming Concerts.

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Rudolph Ganz was the pianist. The programme was as follows:

Overture to the opera, "Tasso".....D'Harcourt
Piano concerto in E flat major.....Liszt
Symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," MacDowell
Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven
The overture was played here for the first time. It is a prelude to an opera in which Tasso and his Leonora are the hero and heroine and the ending is, of course, tragic. There is little of merit in the overture; there is no wailing note; there is little to put a hearer in the fitting mood. On the contrary, much of the music is of a festal nature, and the chief theme of the main section of the overture has an operetta character. Perhaps Count d'Harcourt takes his operatic sorrows gayly. He is a man who has studied seriously, and, as an organizer and conductor of concerts, he has shown a fine taste and a high purpose in the selection of programmes. He has evidently a certain facility in scoring, but what he scores in this overture is commonplace.

The musical thought is superficial, and its brilliance is a jingle or simply decorative. Mr. Gericke, as is his custom, took the utmost pains with the performance. Perhaps either one of the symphonies of d'Harcourt would give a more favorable idea of his musical nature, but something whispers low that the experiment would be a risky one. Yet it is pleasant to think of a French count of wealth doing the best he can in art.

There is now a pathetic interest in MacDowell's music, but the interest need not be wholly one of sentiment. The composer told us a few years ago that he purposed to rewrite "Lancelot and Elaine," for he was by no means satisfied with it; that the music as he remembered it was "full of horns, horns, horns, nothing but horns." Yet there are some who prefer this symphonic poem to his "Indian" suite and find it more emotional and imaginative. The question, how closely MacDowell followed in music episodes in Tennyson's poem need not be discussed. The musical contents are more to the purpose than is any accurate transliteration of literary thought, and however MacDowell himself judged his work, there is much that is both beautiful and poetic in the music.

The "tournament" scene was no doubt inevitable by reason of a needed contrast, but it is the weakest part of the symphonic poem, which, composed about 20 years ago, has the freshness, the spontaneity, the enthusiasm of early manhood. It was a pleasure to hear the poem again, and to hear it, as the composer himself would wish, in a concert given without the slightest thought of deliberate boosting of American composers. MacDowell believed that if a composition written by an American is good enough to be played it should be put on a programme made up without reference to patriotism or chauvinism; it should stand by the side of works of composers with French, German, Russian or Scandinavian names. And this is the only opinion for an American composer to hold if he wishes to maintain his personal dignity and that of the art he serves.

We heard on Friday afternoon the Philharmonic concert in New York led by Mr. Steinbach and the impression made by him with the orchestra under necessarily unfavorable conditions was recorded in The Herald of yesterday morning. Last night we heard the Boston Symphony orchestra led by Mr. Gericke. The Philharmonic has been without a permanent conductor for three years. Foreign conductors have been imported and they chose programmes which they believed would best display their own most pronounced characteristics as orchestral leaders. Little by little the Philharmonic audience has had its taste debauched until now, by the confession of some of the best friends of the orchestra, the listeners go to Carnegie Hall simply to be thrilled. If the conductor does not thrill them, if he does not make them sit up, they are restless, they yawn, or they leave the hall. The more sensational of the conductors exert their spell only for a season. The dram that intoxicated in 1904-5 is as slippery-elm tea in 1905-6. Furthermore the orchestra suffers without the discipline of a permanent conductor.

It suffers in perfection of ensemble; in the proportions of expression, in rhetoric, in euphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a great many more concerts in the season and it has been for several years under a most accomplished and indefatigable disciplinarian. Mr. Gericke is much more than a disciplinarian, but the first duty of a conductor is to drill his men, however loudly they may protest, until they have absolute mechanical proficiency, until the orchestra is a superb virtuoso. Last night the exquisite sense of proportion, the inimitable euphony, the virtuoso qualities of this rare orchestra were never so fully appreciated by The Herald as after a hearing of the long-established Philharmonic orchestra, with its honorable record of concerts.

The "virtuoso" conductor who asks and receives great sums for his peculiar "interpretation" of a celebrated work is an interesting and exciting apparition, and it is a good thing for orchestra and audience that he occasionally visits us and raises the vibrations of the hearers to an extremely high and nervous pitch. The man who by his steady and intelligent labor and by his indomitable will brings his orchestra to such a state of perfection that 24 concerts in a season are a delight to ear and understanding is, after all, the true orchestral leader that works for musical righteousness. Orchestral technic is quickly lost where there is not eternal vigilance. The "virtuoso" conductor may excite wonder for three or four concerts, but how about the other concerts in the long series?

Mr. Rudolph Ganz gave a brilliant performance of Liszt's concerto, which does not lose in brilliance with the passing years. His performance was on a higher plane than that of the magic worker exulting in strength and speed. It was thoughtfully considered; it was musically eloquent. He did not arrogantly call attention to his bravura; he did not show his physical power by brutal assaults on the keyboard. The concerto was presented as an organic whole, and episodes seemed natural and necessary. Technically and esthetically Mr. Ganz's playing was individual, charming, and impressive. The appreciation of the audience was expressed in no uncertain or perfunctory terms.

MARIE HALL TELLS HER IMPRESSIONS OF BOSTON

One of Mr. Gericke's Farewell Speeches—
The Ways of "Star" Conductors with the
Admiring Ladies That Raise Funds for
Them—More About d'Indy's New Tone
Poem—The Summer Operas at Munich
and Baireuth

Marie Hall, the young English violinist, who played in America from November through February, and whom we in Boston remember pleasantly for her recitals here, is at home in London again. The moment after a singer, virtuoso or conductor returns to Europe from a first visit to America, it is the custom nowadays to interview them as to their impressions of their tour. Miss Hall gave hers interestingly and freshly with the nervous eagerness that is in all that she does. In the course of them she heaped fiery coals on our Bostonian heads by paying us compliments in return for our indifference to her except when she played with the Symphony Orchestra. The London Daily News sets down her talk; and here and there it is pleasantly youthful. It also illuminates the work that a virtuoso has to do, and the fatigues he (or she) must endure on an American tour:

"America is a delightful place, and the people are charming—wonderful—lovely. But for four months and a half I have been on a whirl, just one long, great whirl, with little intervals in which I played, and big intervals in which I was shaken by the hand and made the most glorious fuss of. This is the first time in all that while that I have been able to be really still if I wanted to. And now I am so glad, that I can't be still when I might be!

"Where I haven't been to I shall never be able to recollect without looking at the list of places. I've been to New York, Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, Washington, Portland, Baltimore, St. Paul, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Pittsburg, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Kingston, Newark—oh! and a lot of other places. My first concert at New York was on Oct. 28, just after I had landed; my last was on Feb. 28, just before I sailed. But it was not a circular tour. I have been darting backwards and forwards. I was at New York eleven times, at Boston five, at Chicago five times, at Philadelphia twice, and so on. How we stood the rushing about without being ill I don't know. I have travelled all night, played at an afternoon concert, and then rushed on to play at another concert hundreds of miles away in the evening. You do things like that in America. I played at Portland one evening, travelled immediately after the concert to Montreal, arrived at eight o'clock next morning, was at a rehearsal at ten and played at a concert at four and left for Boston at seven and reached there at nine next morning, had a concert at half-past two and went on at five to New York, arriving there at seven in the morning to play that same afternoon. Even that gives you no real sort of idea; because I can't tell you how many thousand people who in those four days were so kind as to insist on shaking me by the hand at least twice, nor of the number of newspaper reporters who insisted on hearing my views upon every imaginable subject under the sun, including all my likes and dislikes.

"But it was all awfully jolly. To live in America you must either be an American, or be buoyed up with a sustaining, glorious hope of becoming one. No one, otherwise, could live there for long without being cut off in his bloom by premature old age. I calculated one night that I should run through my span, and pass out as a centenarian, in about two years. And yet, I was sometimes in doubt whether there were any Americans except in Boston and thereabouts. In New York, for instance, I fancy nobody is quite a real American yet. If I asked anybody I met, 'Are you an American?' the answer was always, 'Well, yes, but not exactly, quite, altogether, American all the same'—and the explanation was that he or she, or the father or mother, was born in Germany, or Ireland, or somewhere, not in America. At present all the American men are in such a hurry to become Americans that they make themselves perfect slaves, they work so hard. Nowhere have I seen men have so universal a passion for making money, and so universal a content in seeing their wives spend it. I am sure it is true that America is run by its women; at any rate, if the men do run it, they do so only for the women's sake. The men go about shabbily dressed, and work from early morning till late at night, even though they are millionaires. But they certainly do love music.

"Every large town has its symphony or philharmonic orchestra, and they give very fine music. I have played with all the best, and many of them are most excellent. The Symphony Orchestra at Boston is, I think, the very best I have ever heard. Boston is musically far ahead of the other towns I visited, and is certainly, I should say, on a par with any other place in the world. But, speaking generally, America is not yet quite so musical as England. I do not see how it could be yet. The country is too young for that. But it will be musical. It has the love and the desire. At present, though, the American characteristic enters somewhat into its musical taste. For instance, a piece like Tchaikovsky's '1812' appeals to New York far more than something sweet and delicate would. They like something big, with plenty of sound. It seems more for their money. Chicago approximates nearer to Boston. Sousa is perfectly typical of the American taste. They must have plenty of 'go.' Wagner is a cult. Strauss is little heard of.

"So far as I could see, however, America is not doing so much as it might for the popular cultivation of music. It has not the cheap schools that we have, nor are there popular concerts or any at which some of the seats are cheap. So great is the demand for concerts that high prices can be charged, and the people throng to them. Of the people themselves no one could praise them too highly. They are most generous-hearted and overwhelm you with kindness. Everywhere I was invited to countless houses, and found it most embarrassing, for everybody would treat me as if I were some kind of goddess."

After Mr. Gericke had appeared for the last times in New York, a week ago, some of his friends there entertained him at supper, and in the course of it he made a very sincere little speech to them—a speech which is at once the measure and the portrait of the man and the conductor. One of the company writes of it this way: "At the close of two hours of delightful and friendly companionship, Mr. Gericke said his words of good-by to the men who had met to do him honor, by telling the following story: 'Many years ago in Vienna I heard Heinrich Esser conduct Flotow's opera "Stradella." I had at that time the contempt of the young men of my school for this particular school of Italian music. As the opera proceeded I found to my astonishment that Esser was giving the score the same careful interpretation that he would give to one of the great works of music. After the opera was over I met him and expressed my astonishment, and asked him to explain how he could treat so trivial a work with so much respect. I have never forgotten his reply: "My friend," he said, "whatever I have to do I try to do with honesty and sincerity." This,' continued Mr. Gericke, "made a deep impression upon me, and I have ever since endeavored to make it my rule of conduct in my professional life."

Next 4 of Concerts Next Week

Mr. Busoni's "Chivalric" suite for orchestra is to be played for the first times in America at the twentieth pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. "Geharnischte," Mr. Busoni calls the suite in its German title—"In Harness," as the chroniclers used to say of the mediæval knights—and in the music he has sought to reflect something of the glamor and glory of their knighthood, as poets and romancers have pictured it. The other orchestral numbers of the programme are Brahms's fourth symphony, of which Mr. Gericke is a master, and Bach's suite in D major, which should reveal all the beauty of the string choir of our band. Mrs. Hissem de Moss is the singer for the two concerts, in the "Queen of the Night's" second air from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and "O, Had I Jubal's Lyre," from Handel's "Joshua"—both music that will show her skill in coloratura.

In this country, where own by the English and
No. 4, in w and different artists entertained
rosch pre-man, Gus-ch, Arthur Richard nand von harjes W. bin Goldham. Dr.
er.
drillon" ("Cinderella")
equal the performances
when Signor Sonzogno mounting, it is never-ance. In "Cendrillon" is! Anyone who has
als under his guidance

212
 to Carnegie Hall simply to be thrilled. If the conductor does not thrill them, if he does not make them sit up, they are restless, they yawn, or they leave the hall. The more sensational of the conductors exert their spell only for a season. The dram that intoxicated in 1904-5 is as slippery-elm tea in 1905-6. Furthermore the orchestra suffers without the discipline of a permanent conductor.

It suffers in perfection of ensemble; in the proportions of expression, in rhetoric, in euphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a great many more concerts in the season and it has been for several years under a most accomplished and indefatigable disciplinarian. Mr. Gericke is much more than a disciplinarian, but the first duty of a conductor is to drill his men, however loudly they may protest, until they have absolute mechanical proficiency, until the orchestra is a superb virtuoso. Last night the exquisite sense of proportion, the inimitable euphony, the virtuoso qualities of this rare orchestra were never so fully appreciated by The Herald as after a hearing of the long-established Philharmonic orchestra, with its honorable record of concerts.

The "virtuoso" conductor who asks and receives great sums for his peculiar "interpretation" of a celebrated work is an interesting and exciting apparition, and it is a good thing for orchestra and audience that he occasionally visits us and raises the vibrations of the hearers to an extremely high and nervous pitch. The man who by his steady and intelligent labor and by his indomitable will brings his orchestra to such a state of perfection that 24 concerts in a season are a delight to ear and understanding is, after all, the true orchestral leader that works for musical righteousness. Orchestral technic is quickly lost where there is not eternal vigilance. The "virtuoso" conductor may excite wonder for three or four concerts, but how about the other concerts in the long series?

Mr. Rudolph Ganz gave a brilliant performance of Liszt's concerto, which does not lose in brilliance with the passing years. His performance was on a higher plane than that of the magic worker exulting in strength and speed. It was thoughtfully considered; it was musically eloquent. He did not arrogantly call attention to his bravura; he did not show his physical power by brutal assaults on the keyboard. The concerto was presented as an organic whole, and episodes seemed natural and necessary. Technically and esthetically Mr. Ganz's playing was individual, charming, and impressive. The appreciation of the audience was expressed in no uncertain or perfunctory terms.

MARIE HALL TELLS HER IMPRESSIONS OF BOSTON

From Ind. 24.1906
 One of Mr. Gericke's Farewell Speeches—
 The Ways of "Star" Conductors with the
 Admiring Ladies That Raise Funds for
 Them—More About d'Indy's New Tone
 Poem—The Summer Operas at Munich
 and Baireuth

Marie Hall, the young English violinist, who played in America from November

through February, and whom we in Boston remember pleasantly for her recitals here, is at home in London again. The moment after a singer, virtuoso or conductor returns to Europe from a first visit to America, it is the custom nowadays to interview them as to their impressions of their tour. Miss Hall gave hers interestingly and freshly with the nervous eagerness that is in all that she does. In the course of them she heaped fiery coals on our Bostonian heads by paying us compliments in return for our indifference to her except when she played with the Symphony Orchestra. The London Daily News sets down her talk; and here and there it is pleasantly youthful. It also illuminates the work that a virtuoso has to do, and the fatigues he (or she) must endure on an American tour:

"America is a delightful place, and the people are charming—wonderful—lovely. But for four months and a half I have been on a whirl, just one long, great whirl, with little intervals in which I played, and big intervals in which I was shaken by the hand and made the most glorious fuss of. This is the first time in all that while that I have been able to be really still if I wanted to. And now I am so glad, that I can't be still when I might be!

"Where I haven't been to I shall never be able to recollect without looking at the list of places. I've been to New York, Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, Washington, Portland, Baltimore, St. Paul, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, Pittsburg, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Kingston, Newark—oh! and a lot of other places. My first concert at New York was on Oct. 28, just after I had landed; my last was on Feb. 28, just before I sailed. But it was not a circular tour. I have been darting backwards and forwards. I was at New York eleven times, at Boston five, at Chicago five times, at Philadelphia twice, and so on. How we stood the rushing about without being ill I don't know. I have travelled all night, played at an afternoon concert, and then rushed on to play at another concert hundreds of miles away in the evening. You do things like that in America. I played at Portland one evening, travelled immediately after the concert to Montreal, arrived at eight o'clock next morning, was at a rehearsal at ten and played at a concert at four and left for Boston at seven and reached there at nine next morning, had a concert at half-past two and went on at five to New York, arriving there at seven in the morning to play that same afternoon. Even that gives you no real sort of idea; because I can't tell you how many thousand people who in those four days were so kind as to insist on shaking me by the hand at least twice, nor of the number of newspaper reporters who insisted on hearing my views upon every imaginable subject under the sun, including all my likes and dislikes.

"But it was all awfully jolly. To live in America you must either be an American, or be buoyed up with a sustaining, glorious hope of becoming one. No one, otherwise, could live there for long without being cut off in his bloom by premature old age. I calculated one night that I should run through my span, and pass out as a centenarian, in about two years. And yet, I was sometimes in doubt whether there were any Americans except in Boston and thereabouts. In New York, for instance, I fancy nobody is quite a real American yet. If I asked anybody I met, 'Are you an American?' the answer was always, 'Well, yes, but not exactly, quite, altogether, American all the same'—and the explanation was that he or she, or the father or mother, was born in Germany, or Ireland, or somewhere, not in America. At present all the American men are in such a hurry to become Americans that they make themselves perfect slaves, they work so hard. Nowhere have I seen men have so universal a passion for making money, and so universal a content in seeing their wives spend it. I am sure it is true that America is run by its women; at any rate, if the men do run it, they do so only for the women's sake. The men go about shabbily dressed, and work from early morning till late at night, even though they are millionaires. But they certainly do love music.

"Every large town has its symphony or philharmonic orchestra, and they give very fine music. I have played with all the best, and many of them are most excellent. The Symphony Orchestra at Boston is, I think, the very best I have ever heard. Boston is musically far ahead of the other towns I visited, and is certainly, I should say, on a par with any other place in the world. But, speaking generally, America is not yet quite so musical as England. I do not see how it could be yet. The country is too young for that. But it will be musical. It has the love and the desire. At present, though, the American characteristic enters somewhat into its musical taste. For instance, a piece like Tchaikovsky's '1812' appeals to New York far more than something sweet and delicate would. They like something big, with plenty of sound. It seems more for their money. Chicago approximates nearer to Boston. Sousa is perfectly typical of the American taste. They must have plenty of 'go.' Wagner is a cult. Strauss is little heard of.

"So far as I could see, he is not doing so much as it is popular cultivation of music in the cheap schools that we there popular concerts or any of the seats are cheap. demand for concerts that be charged, and the people Of the people themselves praise them too highly. generous-hearted and over kindness. Everywhere I countless houses, and found passing, for everybody would I were some kind of goddess

After Mr. Gericke had a last times in New York, a of his friends there entertained him at supper, and in the course of it he made a very sincere little speech to them—a speech which is at once the measure and the portrait of the man and the conductor. One of the company writes of it this way: "At the close of two hours of delightful and friendly companionship, Mr. Gericke said his words of good-by to the men who had met to do him honor, by telling the following story: 'Many years ago in Vienna I heard Heinrich Esser conduct Flotow's opera "Stradella." I had at that time the contempt of the young men of my school for this particular school of Italian music. As the opera proceeded I found to my astonishment that Esser was giving the score the same careful interpretation that he would give to one of the great works of music. After the opera was over I met him and expressed my astonishment, and asked him to explain how he could treat so trivial a work with so much respect. I have never forgotten his reply: "My friend," he said, "whatever I have to do I try to do with honesty and sincerity." This,' continued Mr. Gericke, "made a deep impression upon me, and I have ever since endeavored to make it my rule of conduct in my professional life."

213

Ind. 24.6 Concerts Next Week

Mr. Busoni's "Chivalric" suite for orchestra is to be played for the first times in America at the twentieth pair of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. "Geharnischte," Mr. Busoni calls the suite in its German title—"in Harness," as the chroniclers used to say of the mediæval knights—and in the music he has sought to reflect something of the glamor and glory of their knighthood, as poets and romancers have pictured it. The other orchestral numbers of the programme are Brahms's fourth symphony, of which Mr. Gericke is a master, and Bach's suite in D major, which should reveal all the beauty of the string choir of our band. Mrs. Hissem de Moss is the singer for the two concerts, in the "Queen of the Night's" second air from Mozart's "Magic Flute" and "O, Had I Jubal's Lyre," from Handel's "Joshua"—both music that will show her skill in coloratura.

Another Dinner. Ind. 21.1906

After last Saturday's Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall, two score friends of Mr. Gericke entertained him at a meal in the Café Martin. Walter Damrosch presided, and at the tables there sat beside the chairman, Gustav Schirmer, Rudolph Schirmer, Frank Damrosch, Arthur Whiting, Lawrence Abbott, Alexander Lambert, Richard Aldrich, H. E. Krehbiel, Rafael Joseffy, Ferdinand von Inten, David Mannes, Henry Harkness Flagler, Charles W. Clark, Marshall Kernochan, Richard Dixey, Rubin Goldmark, Charles E. Sampson, Dr. Edward K. Dunham, Dr. Baumfield, Paul Warburg and Charles A. Brewster.

WILHELM GERICKE
Who will leave the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the season

Departure of Mr. Gericke

N.Y. Times, March 4, 1906    ❧ ❧ ❧
Technical and Artistic Perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Due to Him---Question of His Successor.

NEW YORK is concerned, with Boston, in the departure of Mr. Gericke from the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of this season. New York is a faithful and enthusiastic supporter of this orchestra, and its interest in the conductor is only less than its interest in the problems concerning the conductors of its own orchestras. It is needless to say that Mr. Gericke's departure will be a cause of great regret among the attendants upon the Boston Orchestra's concerts in New York, and that the appointment of his successor is a matter of intense interest to them.

What the Boston Orchestra is Mr. Gericke has made it. The character it has had as an artistic instrument and the style of its performance are as they are because they have been molded exactly by his ideals and methods. High ideals and strenuous methods they have been. He has never spared his men any of the pains and labor that he considered requisite to obtain the exact effect he was aiming at in any work, in any passage, in any single bit of orchestral color or phrase or adjustment of tonal balance. But neither has he spared himself. A "passion for perfection," it has been well said, has been at the foundation of Mr.

Gericke's work as an orchestral conductor, and he has wreaked himself upon the Boston Orchestra to make it what he would have it.

Once before he resigned his place, after five years' labor, and returned to Vienna with shattered nerves. He came back in 1898, after nine years, but nothing had changed in Mr. Gericke's methods; and if anything had changed in the meantime in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he set himself to work, undismayed and resolute, to change it back again.

❧ ❧ ❧

Greater technical perfection in the playing of an orchestra it is vain to seek, but there is something finer, subtler, more elusive than technical finish in orchestral performance that Mr. Gericke has given the Boston Orchestra; the perfect euphony, the perfect balance, the exact adjustment of the color and quality of every phrase, so that there shall be just so much of one instrumental color, just so much of another, and the resultant mixture shall be the precise one that belongs to the harmony of the whole. Mr. Gericke has been charged with sacrificing spirit, breadth, and the fiercer sonorities of modern orchestral music in his anxiety to keep this sort of quality.

Whatever it may have been once, it is now an unjust charge. Especially in the later years of his work here, he has shown a continually increasing sympathy with productions of the modern schools of music, has played them frequently, and with splendid enthusiasm and devotion. Who will not say that Mr. Gericke's performance of Strauss's "Don Quixote," for instance, for the first time in New York, was not superior in almost every respect to the performance the composer himself gave of it not long afterward? Besides all its other excellencies, it had the very important one that the orchestra did not break down in the middle. This is something, and it is something that has always been felt to belong to the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Gericke—its absolute certainty, its unquestioned perfection of preparation. When it plays a piece it is able to do it as Mr. Gericke intends, and until it is able to, this piece is not played.

It has been said, also, that Mr. Ge-ricke has exhausted his men and overburdened and worried them with rehearsals, with endless repetitions and stoppings. Perhaps; but the result of it has been that these same men have played as scarcely another body of the kind in the world can play; that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is absolutely perfect in its way. And that, too, is something. Another conductor may have done differently, may have got other kinds of effects, may have accomplished another order of results; but—to return to the original proposition—as it is now, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the product precisely of Mr. Gericke's strenuous, unwearied activities. Those who are grateful for its achievements must express their gratitude first of all to him.

❧ ❧ ❧

The question of his successor, as is the question of the conductor for the Philharmonic Society, is a very difficult one. The simple fact is that most of the greatest of European conductors could not or would not come at all, and that those who would demand sums that are beyond all reason. A singer at the Opera House is not—for any length of time—in receipt of a cachet greater than the money he or she can draw into the house. But the moneys that orchestral conductors are asking are more than can be driven into the concert halls under any circumstances. If they are paid, it means a certain deficit. If a public-spirited backer or committee of backers has met deficits for a series of years, they may be supposed to have done so in the expectation of some day "getting out of the woods." If the conditions are such that permanent financial gloom is the inevitable outlook, deficits are likely to become wearisome. Nobody has as yet come forward with an endowment ample to meet such deficits and intended to supply what the public is not expected ever to supply.

❧ ❧ ❧

Will Mr. Higginson secure some young man of great talent without a great name and bring him over to make his place and his success in this country? It would seem to be the most promising suggestion, if the conditions can be met, both for Boston and for New York. But it is a very difficult one. How find an unknown young man of great talent? How be sure of him if you have found him? The accounts seem to indicate that Chicago has succeeded in this, in getting Frederick A. Stock to succeed Theodore Thomas; but there will be no chance to experiment and test in the case of Boston. Such experiment as has been made by the Philharmonic was unsuccessful—for it is more than probable that if young Dr. Kunwald had done better at his trial a month ago he might now be under consideration as the next Philharmonic conductor.

An "Official" Statement as to Our Orches-

Trans. tra Jan. 8, 1906

The rather curious statement that follows was printed yesterday in several of the New York newspapers. It has to do with the policy of our orchestra, and it comes, they say, "with official sanction" from Boston: "The last pair of concerts (in New York) were distinctly of a special order, having been devoted entirely to modern French music, under the personal direction of Mr. Vincent d'Indy. While critical opinion regarding this music is by no means unanimous, the management is thoroughly content with the result of the experiment, for the bringing of Mr. d'Indy to this country gave an unusual fillip of interest to the season. But it is necessary to correct an impression which seems to have become more or less general that the coming of Mr. d'Indy meant the beginning of a new policy in the management of the orchestra, and that 'guest' conductors will be a feature of every season. This is not at all true. So far as can be seen the policy of the orchestra in the future will be the same as that of the past. The success of the orchestra has proved conclusively that the best results are obtainable only when a band works continuously under one conductor. It is possible, in case there should be another school of composition as distinctive and special as that of the 'younger' Frenchmen, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would invite its chief exponent to conduct a series of its concerts in this music, as it did Mr. d'Indy. But the idea of having special conductors, even one in a season, has never been entertained." In Boston the impression that this statement seeks to remove is certainly "less general." No one here, so far as we know, has ever even surmised that, because the management of our orchestra has once entertained a guest of honor and made the occasion as notable as possible, it was about to plunge into the jealous quest and competition for "star" conductors. That is an affair of inferior bands that have to build up their public or that cannot hold the audiences that they once had. Moreover, it was as a composer, and not as a conductor, that Mr. d'Indy visited us.

MR. GERICKE'S FAREWELL.

The Last Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Season.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York series was given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. There was a very large audience, and the occasion was recognized as one of special and regrettable import, in that it was Mr. Gericke's last appearance as conductor of the famous orchestra in this city. Mr. Gericke conducted in a fashion that will be remembered as representing his best, and his men seconded him in every possible way in giving a performance of splendid spirit, finish, and euphony.

The orchestral numbers were all familiar. They began with the overture to "Der Freischütz," which was read without any attempt at emphasizing the effects which modern conductors love to make in this piece, but yet with great spirit and dramatic contrast. Goldmark's glowing "Sakuntala" overture followed, in which Mr. Gericke's tempos are somewhat faster than those of some other conductors in this piece. The symphony was Schubert's in C, whose heavenly lengths had not been unfolded in a New York concert hall for several years, and which were heard with manifest delight. It was a performance that warmed the hearts of all the lovers of Schubert's wonderful music, in which every beauty was brought out with consummate art and with a full appreciation of the supremely poetic and imaginative spirit of the work. It was a delight to hear all the instrumental touches so perfectly presented—from whom else shall the oboe theme in the Andante be heard so exquisitely blown?

Mr. David Bispham was the soloist and sang a ballad by Frederick S. Converse, a setting for baritone voice and orchestra of Keats's poem, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," a work in which the composer has given more to the orchestra than to the voice that declaims the verses, making it a symphonic poem with a voice part and relying upon the orchestra to present the moods of the poem. He has written some strikingly descriptive music, orchestrated with distinction. As to its success in heightening and extending the power of the poet's words, there may be some doubt; and upon this must rest the success the musicians attempt. Mr. Bispham also sang the air, "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's opera, "Hans Helling," and in both he did some violence to the text through his distortion of the vowel sounds.

There was great and long continued applause for Mr. Gericke, who was again and again called out; and finally, when the audience would not go, he came to the front and spoke a few words, expressing his gratitude for the sympathy and kindness that had been extended to him in New York, and saying that he could never forget it. He had previously acknowledged much applause after the performance of the earlier numbers on the programme, and had shared it with his men by making them twice rise in a body to acknowledge it.

The Last Orchestral "Trip"

The Symphony Orchestra left town Sunday evening for its last series of concerts, for the present season, in other cities. As usual, it goes, in order, to Philadelphia (Monday), Washington (Tuesday), Baltimore (Wednesday), New York (Thursday and Saturday) and Brooklyn (Friday), and Mr. Gericke will be making his last appearance in each of those cities as conductor. A week from today the orchestra plays in Bridgeport for the first time in any of its "trips," and on the following night it gives a concert in Hartford. Then it returns home. On the programmes of seven of the eight concerts Mr. Gericke has put a classical symphony, either Beethoven's or Schubert's, for his leavetaking, and at one of the concerts in New York he is to give Mr. Converse's ballad, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," for the first time there. At four of the eight concerts Mr. Marteau plays with the band in the new concerto by Dalcroze that we in Boston heard last week. Here are the programmes in detail:

At Philadelphia, March 12—
Bach: Suite No. 3, in D major.
Jacques-Dalcroze: Concerto for Violin.
Claude Debussy: "The Afternoon of a Faun."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, "Eroica."
Soloist, Henri Marteau.

At Washington, March 13—
Beethoven: Symphony No. 2.
Jacques-Dalcroze: Concerto for Violin.
Wagner: Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser."
Weber: Overture, "Freischütz."
Soloist, Henri Marteau.

At Baltimore, March 14—
Goldmark: Overture, "Sakuntala."
Jacques-Dalcroze: Concerto for Violin.
Claude Debussy: "The Afternoon of a Faun."
Schubert: Symphony No. 7, in C major.
Soloist, Henri Marteau.

At New York, March 15—
Bach: Suite No. 3, in D major.
Jacques-Dalcroze: Concerto for Violin.
Claude Debussy: "The Afternoon of a Faun."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 3.
Soloist, Henri Marteau.

At Brooklyn, March 16—
Mozart: Symphony in G minor.
Dvorak: Concerto for Violoncello.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 3.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.

At New York, March 17—
Weber: Overture, "Freischütz."
Converse: Ballade for Baritone and Orchestra.
Goldmark: Overture, "Sakuntala."
Marschner: Aria from "Hans Helling."
Schubert: Symphony No. 7.
Soloist, Mr. David Bispham.

At Bridgeport, March 19—
Weber: Overture, "Oberon."
Aria.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 2.

Aria.
Liszt: Symphonic Poem, "Tasso."
Tchaikovsky: Variations from Suite No. 3.
Soloist, Miss Charlotte Maconda.

At Hartford, March 20—
d'Indy: Symphony for Pianoforte and Orchestra.
(Mr. Gebhard.)
Mendelssohn: Concerto for Violin.
Wagner: Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser."
Wagner: Overture, "Tannhäuser."
Soloist, Mr. Willy Hess.

The Berlin correspondent of the Musical Courier having within a short period heard three famous orchestras—the Boston Symphony, the Lamoureux in Paris, and the Berlin Philharmonic—makes these comparisons: N.Y. Post Feb 20 1904

It seemed to me that the Boston band was not as good as it used to be. The strings, especially, seemed weaker than formerly. There was a lack of sonority and brilliancy. The woodwind was magnificent, especially the first oboe. I know of but one other man in the world who equals him—Guidé of the Ysaye Orchestra in Brussels. The playing of the Bostonians, under Gericke, was very finished. There were great precision of attack, exquisite phrasing, as of one man, and other tokens of excellent discipline. There was, however, a lack of spontaneity and fire. The Boston Orchestra can easily rank as one of the five or six significant orchestras in the world, but those hyper-enthusiasts who proclaim it to be the greatest go too far. The Lamoureux organization also is an orchestra of the first rank. It is well balanced. I was especially pleased with the subdued quality of the brass. The German orchestras are nearly always too heavy in the brass. The woodwind produced a sweeter quality of tone than the local Philharmonic. The French strings were more sensuous and of a finer quality, but not so brilliant as the German. The rhythm of the Parisians was pronounced. The orchestra that satisfied me most, all in all, was the Berlin Philharmonic. This is due, no doubt, in a large measure to Nikisch, who is a far greater conductor than his Boston and Paris colleagues. Nikisch magnetizes the orchestra to a man; he controls them with a will of iron. He is in no sense a mere time beater. He pays little attention to petty details, but he throws onto his canvas a picture bold and strong in outline, of many and brilliant lines, characteristic, full of poetry and passion. Nikisch is by far the most poetic of living conductors. He has in his veins also the fire of his native Hungary. That is why the Berlin orchestra, under his baton, satisfied me more than the others.

One of the disappointments of the musical season has been the failure, once more, of Mr. Joseffy to give a concert in New York city. Perhaps he will relent and play, after all. In the meantime, he is the proud possessor of a letter from Saint-Saëns, in which that great composer says in regard to the new Joseffy "School of Advanced Playing": "It is really marvellous to discover so much that is new in a field which seemed exhausted by innumerable harvests."

The newest variety of gossip about Mr. Gericke's successor runs that we are to have a temporary conductor for a season or two, and then a permanent one who will not be free, until then, from his present engagements. Trans. Mel. 15, 1906

FRITZ STEINBACH
Conductor of the next Philharmonic C

Gericke and Higginson.

The real reason for the resignation of Wilhelm Gericke as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not the refusal of Colonel Higginson to raise the conductor's salary $3,000 yearly—as has been whispered about in New York by certain irresponsible music reporters. No such refusal ever emanated from Colonel Higginson, for the very simple reason that no such demand was ever made by Mr. Gericke. The real reason for the resignation of that gentleman was this: With the expiration of Gericke's long contract this spring, Colonel Higginson did not find himself in a position to renew Mr. Gericke's engagement in future for more than one year at a time, and was willing to retain him on that basis and to make a contract from season to season. Mr. Gericke, in justice to himself, could not accept such an arrangement, and held out for a contract that would cover five years, or, at the least, three. Colonel Higginson remaining obdurate on the point of not binding himself further ahead than one year, Mr. Gericke was compelled, much to his regret, to tender his resignation. There was no break of any kind between the conductor and the owner of the orchestra, and at no point of the negotiations did the discussion become acrimonious or even warm. Mr. Gericke and Colonel Higginson parted with mutual expressions of good will and hearty sympathy. This statement comes to THE MUSICAL COURIER from a high official source, and may be accepted as the authoritative reason for the departure of Wilhelm Gericke from Boston.

STEINBACH MAY LEAD SYMPHONY

Eminent Conductor's Landing in Boston Gives Rise to Rumor
About Town.

Journal ————— Mel. 17/1906

On board the White Star liner Cymric, which is expected to arrive at Charlestown from Liverpool and Queenstown some time this afternoon, will be Fritz Steinbach, the distinguished musical conductor. Mr. Steinbach is accompanied by his wife.

Fritz Steinbach is one of Europe's best-known conductors. He has led orchestras in nearly all the European capitals at various times, and though best known as a conductor of opera has had much success in concert work. He is coming to America to conduct several concerts for the New York Philharmonic, following the fashion set by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in inviting distinguished foreign composers to lead certain concerts.

The fact that Mr. Steinbach intends to land in Boston gives rise to the rumor that he will visit Col. Higginson, with a view to succeeding Mr. Gericke as conductor of the Boston orchestra. Symphony Hall sends out a positive denial that Steinbach has been invited to meet Mr. Higginson, nor is it likely that he will be selected as leader of the orchestra. Steinbach, although a good conductor, is not considered among the half dozen greatest in the world, and it is from one of these that the conductor is likely to be selected.

Wanted--Symphony Rehearsal Ticket
For remainder of season. State location and price. Address C.G.H., Boston Transcript.
(A):

Trans. Mr. Gericke Makes a Speech

Last evening in Philadelphia Mr. Gericke began the series of concerts with our orchestra in which, in half a dozen cities outside Boston, he is making his last appearances as conductor. According to a special telegram from Philadelphia, he was very warmly received as he came upon the stage of the Academy of Music. After each number of the programme there was more than the usual applause. At the end of the concert the audience rose throughout the hall, recalled the conductor again and again, until finally he spoke a few sentences of thanks and leavetaking. In all probability it was Mr. Gericke's first speech to an audience in all the thirteen years that he has spent in America.

ELLISON VAN HOOSE
TENOR

FRITZ STEINBACH
Conductor of the next Philharmonic C.
Gericke aud Higginson.

The real reason for the resignation of Wilhelm Gericke as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not the refusal of Colonel Higginson to raise the conductor's salary $3,000 yearly—as has been whispered about in New York by certain irresponsible music reporters. No such refusal ever emanated from Colonel Higginson, for the very simple reason that no such demand was ever made by Mr. Gericke. The real reason for the resignation of that gentleman was this: With the expiration of Gericke's long contract this spring, Colonel Higginson did not find himself in a position to renew Mr. Gericke's engagement in future for more than one year at a time, and was willing to retain him on that basis and to make a contract from season to season. Mr. Gericke, in justice to himself, could not accept such an arrangement, and held out for a contract that would cover five years, or, at the least, three. Colonel Higginson remaining obdurate on the point of not binding himself further ahead than one year, Mr. Gericke was compelled, much to his regret, to tender his resignation. There was no break of any kind between the conductor and the owner of the orchestra, and at no point of the negotiations did the discussion become acrimonious or even warm. Mr. Gericke and Colonel Higginson parted with mutual expressions of good will and hearty sympathy. This statement comes to THE MUSICAL COURIER from a high official source, and may be accepted as the authoritative reason for the departure of Wilhelm Gericke from Boston.

STEINBACH MAY LEAD SYMPHONY

Eminent Conductor's Landing in Boston Gives Rise to Rumor
 About Town.

Journal ————— Mich. 17/1906

On board the White Star liner Cymric, which is expected to arrive at Charlestown from Liverpool and Queenstown some time this afternoon, will be Fritz Steinbach, the distinguished musical conductor. Mr. Steinbach is accompanied by his wife.

Fritz Steinbach is one of Europe's best-known conductors. He has led orchestras in nearly all the European capitals at various times, and though best known as a conductor of opera has had much success in concert work. He is coming to America to conduct several concerts for the New York Philharmonic, following the fashion set by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in inviting distinguished foreign composers to lead certain concerts.

The fact that Mr. Steinbach intends to land in Boston gives rise to the rumor that he will visit Col. Higginson, with a view to succeeding Mr. Gericke as conductor of the Boston orchestra. Symphony Hall sends out a positive denial that Steinbach has been invited to meet Mr. Higginson, nor is it likely that he will be selected as leader of the orchestra. Steinbach, although a good conductor, is not considered among the half dozen greatest in the world, and it is from one of these that the conductor is likely to be selected.

Wanted--Symphony Rehearsal Ticket
 For remainder of season. State location and price. Address C.G.H., Boston Transcript.
 (A):

Trans. Mr. Gericke Makes a Speech Mich. 12. 1906

Last evening in Philadelphia Mr. Gericke began the series of concerts with our orchestra in which, in half a dozen cities outside Boston, he is making his last appearances as conductor. According to a special telegram from Philadelphia, he was very warmly received as he came upon the stage of the Academy of Music. After each number of the programme there was more than the usual applause. At the end of the concert the audience rose throughout the hall, recalled the conductor again and again, until finally he spoke a few sentences of thanks and leavetaking. In all probability it was Mr. Gericke's first speech to an audience in all the thirteen years that he has spent in America.

ELLISON VAN HOOSE
TENOR

Post. March 25, 1906

19TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Rudolf Ganz, pianist, was the soloist of the nineteenth Symphony concert last evening, and the following was the programme presented:

Overture to "Tasso".....D'Harcourt
Concerto for piano in E flat.....Liszt
Symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine".....MacDowell

Symphony No. 8, in F major.....Beethoven

The "Tasso" overture was new to this city. The opera was first given at Monte Carlo three years ago. The overture is pleasing music, often brilliant, and effectively scored.

Eugene D'Harcourt, composer of "Tasso," is a French musician of whom little if anything is known in this country, excepting to a very few. Somewhat over 50 years of age, he is living in Paris, and has been active for many years there, either giving concerts, composing music in many forms or writing articles on musical subjects. He is one of abundant means, and unlike many eminent composers, his life has been cast for the most part in pleasant places. None of his works have become known here, and the overture heard at this concert is believed to have been given for the first time in this country, as well as in this city. It was most effectively performed, as was also Mr. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine," a most imaginative work, and one that deserves more frequent performances, for it has not been heard here for over seven years.

Mr. Ganz made an exceedingly favorable impression on his first appearance at these concerts. He has a superb technique, a sympathetic tone quality, and apparently temperamental qualities, possessed by few of the younger pianists. He played the showy Liszt concerto with overwhelming brilliancy, ease of manner and authoritative grasp that gained him an immense ovation and many recalls. He is one of the best pianists heard here for some time, and his recital on Monday afternoon will be awaited with much interest.

SYMPHONY GIVES NEW OVERTURE

"Tasso," by a French Nobleman,
Programmed — Rudolf Ganz,
Soloist, Aroused Enthusiasm.

A new overture by a rich French nobleman, more than a mere dilettante in his art, was an interesting feature of the nineteenth Symphony concert. Count

D'Harcourt, when he wrote his opera, "Tasso," was, of course, impressed by the tragic nature of his theme, and yet his overture sounds no prevailing note of gloom or sorrow. It does not prepare the hearer for an opera of large and elemental passion; perhaps purposely it is intended to put one into a mood of pomp and circumstance, and then let the onmarch of tragedy make its own special appeal. At any rate, the noble gentleman has produced something that is eminently respectable, rather tinkling and smooth as to its orchestral colors, and uninspiring so far as any deep emotions go. It arouses no special desire to hear the whole opera.

MacDowell's "Lancelot and Elaine" symphonic poem, the fruit of his early and perhaps unsettled years, still holds its own as a piece of imaginative beauty. After the French count's superficiality, it sounded like the clear call of a nature filled to the brim with poetry and bubbling over with the spirit of enthusiastic youth. MacDowell, stricken down, will compose no more—and great is the loss to American art—but what he has done already is still vital and seems likely long to remain so. The tone-poem was played sympathetically and with rare perfection—rare except to this orchestra, that is.

The soloist was Rudolf Ganz, and he chose Liszt's sparkling and sonorous E flat concerto. It was just the vehicle for his special gift, that of brilliant and crisp technique and a dashing style. He made the hackneyed work nobly impressive once more and aroused merited enthusiasm.

Beethoven's jovial Eighth Symphony brought the concert to a close, full of simple beauty. Its performance was admirable in every way.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

D'Harcourt—Overture to opera "Tasso." First time.

Liszt—Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1, for pianoforte and orchestra.

Mr. Rudolph Ganz, Soloist.

Macdowell—"Lancelot and Elaine." Symphonic Poem (after Tennyson). Op. 25.

Beethoven—Symphony, No. 8, in F major, Op. 93.

The concert was one of more than ordinary interest, and the programme excellently balanced. The presence of a new soloist, the performance of a new work, and the repetition of a great native composition combined to make the occasion noteworthy. D'Harcourt's "Tasso" overture, after an apparent start in the vein of modern dissonance, changed its character almost at once and displayed the most suave melodic style.

Its themes were attractive. Its orchestration always effective, if not strikingly powerful, and the many "cantilena" passages most pleasingly melodious. If the work had a fault, it leaned too much toward the light and popular vein. But this tendency is not a bad one, at present; for many modern composers have misled us into the idea that music is meant only to paint melodramatic subjects in glaring colors, or solve ethical problems with a hundred and twenty instruments. Be virtuous and you must be unhappy, according to the code of the dissonance-mongers; and a partial return to the simpler style is certainly welcome.

The great Liszt concerto, with its earnest opening and its serene beauty, afforded Mr. Ganz an excellent introduction to our concert. Liszt's fame as a composer is of comparatively recent growth, but rests upon a sure foundation. The excessive embroidery of notes in his piano solos and transcriptions drew attention first to his technical attainments, though it was part of a definite plan, which has been alluded to as the orchestration of the pianoforte.

The best of his larger works, however, remain monuments of expressive power, and grow by repeated hearing. Mr. Ganz is a young Swiss composer of some note, now settled in Chicago. He gave the Liszt work with excellent command of expression though inclined to over-sentimentalize a trifle at first. He showed himself possessed of the utmost technical facility, and displayed excellent discretion in making it a means rather than an end. The many recalls he received were no more than his due.

"Lancelot and Elaine" proved itself a masterpiece. If Macdowell rates it less high than his later works, because of its descriptive programme tendencies, the public may not agree with him. The symphonic poem has become the chief modern form, and its very essence depends upon the programme idea. This does not necessarily imply deliberate tone-painting, such as the "Don Quixote" variations of Strauss, but may mean a more general picture of moods and feelings suggested by a well-chosen title.

Music is the language of emotion, not of description, and the subject of this work gives ample scope for the portrayal of beauty and chivalry without the need of minute explanatory details. The many phases of the poem are depicted with a master hand, and the work will hold its rank with the very best of its kind in all lands.

Incidentally, the orchestra gave it a rendering that seemed absolute perfection. Mr. Gerlicke's long training has given the orchestra a technical proficiency that enables him to obtain the most exquisite effects of delicacy in shading. Such readings as that of the Macdowell work last Saturday, or the "Tod und Verklärung" earlier in the season, are veritable triumphs, and prove that mere blatancy is not the only method, nor even the best, in rendering the great modern works.

The eighth symphony, which brought the evening to a joyous conclusion, gave further evidence of orchestral excellence, and the clean-cut phrasing of the instruments brought fresh laurels to performers and conductor.

Arthur Elson.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 31, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BACH.

SUITE for ORCHESTRA, in D major.

- I. Overture,
- II. Air.
- III. Gavotte.
- IV. Bourrée.
- V. Gigue.

HANDEL.

AIR, "Oh, had I Jubal's Lyre" from the oratorio
"Joshua."

BUSONI.

"GEHARNISCHE" SUITE: second orchestral suite, No. 2, op. 34. A.

- I. Prelude.
- II. War Dance.
- III. Funeral Monument.
- IV. Onset.

(First time at these concerts.)

MOZART.

ARIA, "The Pangs of Hell," from the opera, "The Magic Flute."

BRAHMS.

SYMPHONY No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Andante moderato.
- III. Allegro giocoso.
- IV. Allegro energico e passionato.

Soloist:

Mrs. MARY HISSEM DE MOSS.

Symphony Concert

Music of lightness were a desideratum, certainly, at this end of a symphony season which Mr. Gericke has crowded with important works, that have piqued curiosity and excited interest and given pleasure, truly, albeit with some tax on the intellect. And lightness Mr. Gericke very properly sought, and achieved, with his programme of yesterday afternoon. Bach began it with the suite containing, for one thing, the Air, upon which everybody dotes, and much pleasant music else.

Bach, the man prodigiously fecund of ideas. If we could but borrow some of John Tanner's method with himself, how many of us might not be got to make some rather shocking confessions of what we really, in our very inmost souls, think of Bach. Would not many of us—emboldened to frank and fearless speech—put Bach down as a man who might well have kept better watch of his pen? It seemed never to rest with comfort to itself. It had mastered, with almost over-great completeness, the mechanism of music. Wherever it trod vegetation sprang up in its footprints—some of this flowers, and some of it—not. Whatever it wrote it preserved. It is we who listen who have to perform for ourselves as we hark, a service that a keener editorial sense in Bach might have saved us the performing. We have to weed Bach's garden for ourselves, so to say, and wade through wastes of vegetation sometimes, to arrive at the flowers. These are Tanneresque sentiments, and the Suite of yesterday provoked their utterance chiefly by differing from others of Bach's compositions that do invite such complaints of their composer. The Suite of yesterday was all brightness, sweetness, humor and grace. Light and sweet were the arias that Mrs. Hissem de Moss sang out of Handel and Mozart. And Busoni had loosed the rein on his powers of burlesque in the Suite we had of his making. Only Brahms, at the end, was permitted to be tender and grave, and a little downcast, in his Symphony in E minor, number four.

Mrs. de Moss has a voice and a method that are light and airy. She seems to be most at her ease in the things of lighter sentiment and manner, and she wisely indulges her instinct to cleave to such things mainly. The aria she sang from Handel's "Joshua," and the "Pangs of Hell" from the Magic Flute, are both in this vein. And so all these matters came together yesterday afternoon to obliterate every flaw from her perfectly agreeable singing.

Busoni waxes very gay in his Suite—perhaps more spirited than refined. And there seem spaces in his merrymaking where he forgets the saving quality from which wit is reputed to obtain its soul. Here and there, just in spots, and for but a flash of a moment, the fun prolongs itself till it ceases to realize its intentions, and forgets that sweetness is the only quality that can endure being long drawn out. But Busoni's is droll music and quite gay enough all the while that it lasts.

But Brahms—Brahms the tender, the grave, and slightly melancholy in his Fourth Symphony. Time was when Brahms was thought an extreme and advanced man, exalted, cold, unreachably high on his pinnacles of mystery and speculation. It promptly became the fashion to roll the eyes toward the ceiling when Brahms was played. To dote on Brahms was to proclaim one's self an extremely superior person. By now Brahms has become how intimate and understandable! His chill and recondite daring has become how warm and simple!

This is because we have lived and learned to understand Brahms; we have come abreast of him and have mastered him. It is also because we have listened to Strauss and D'Indy, Debussy and Reger. The world has walked beyond Brahms, as it will walk beyond Strauss, and as we shall look back upon the tempestuous music of Strauss and think it as primitive and tame as the once revolutionary Wagner has become.

And what is all this but a testimony to the great minds we have today? The complaint is that we just now have no great minds in music or in anything else. But when did any present ever have any great mind? And were not Beethoven and Wagner in their time denounced for their abstruseness and eternal experimentalizing, even as Debussy and Strauss are berated for the self-same offences now? It may be no positive proof, but it affords at least grounds for suspicion, that the men we are sending out of our own day into the future may not there deport themselves so ill as many of us think they will.

But this is far from the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon, and its matchless performance of the symphony by Brahms. Mr. Gericke gave it romance, and its slow movement he invested with the tenderness that always finds Brahms at his best.

B. K.

Symphony Concert

Music of lightness were a desideratum, certainly, at this end of a symphony season which Mr. Gericke has crowded with important works, that have piqued curiosity and excited interest and given pleasure, truly, albeit with some tax on the intellect. And lightness Mr. Gericke very properly sought, and achieved, with his programme of yesterday afternoon. Bach began it with the suite containing, for one thing, the Air, upon which everybody dotes, and much pleasant music else.

Bach, the man prodigiously fecund of ideas. If we could but borrow some of John Tanner's method with himself, how many of us might not be got to make some rather shocking confessions of what we really, in our very inmost souls, think of Bach. Would not many of us—emboldened to frank and fearless speech—put Bach down as a man who might well have kept better watch of his pen? It seemed never to rest with comfort to itself. It had mastered, with almost over-great completeness, the mechanism of music. Wherever it trod vegetation sprang up in its footprints—some of this flowers, and some of it—not. Whatever it wrote it preserved. It is we who listen who have to perform for ourselves as we hark, a service that a keener editorial sense in Bach might have saved us the performing. We have to weed Bach's garden for ourselves, so to say, and wade through wastes of vegetation sometimes, to arrive at the flowers. These are Tanneresque sentiments, and the Suite of yesterday provoked their utterance chiefly by differing from others of Bach's compositions that do invite such complaints of their composer. The Suite of yesterday was all brightness, sweetness, humor and grace. Light and sweet were the arias that Mrs. Hissem de Moss sang out of Handel and Mozart. And Busoni had loosed the rein on his powers of burlesque in the Suite we had of his making. Only Brahms, at the end, was permitted to be tender and grave, and a little downcast, in his Symphony in E minor, number four.

Mrs. de Moss has a voice and a method that are light and airy. She seems to be most at her ease in the things of lighter sentiment and manner, and she wisely indulges her instinct to cleave to such things mainly. The aria she sang from Handel's "Joshua," and the "Pangs of Hell" from the Magic Flute, are both in this vein. And so all these matters came together yesterday afternoon to obliterate every flaw from her perfectly agreeable singing.

Busoni waxes very gay in his Suite—perhaps more spirited than refined. And there seem spaces in his merrymaking where he forgets the saving quality from which wit is reputed to obtain its soul. Here and there, just in spots, and for but a flash of a moment, the fun prolongs itself till it ceases to realize its intentions, and forgets that sweetness is the only quality that can endure being long drawn out. But Busoni's is droll music and quite gay enough all the while that it lasts.

But Brahms—Brahms the tender, the grave, and slightly melancholy in his Fourth Symphony. Time was when Brahms was thought an extreme and advanced man, exalted, cold, unreachably high on his pinnacles of mystery and speculation. It promptly became the fashion to roll the eyes toward the ceiling when Brahms was played. To dote on Brahms was to proclaim one's self an extremely superior person. By now Brahms has become how intimate and understandable! His chill and recondite daring has become how warm and simple!

This is because we have lived and learned to understand Brahms; we have come abreast of him and have mastered him. It is also because we have listened to Strauss and D'Indy, Debussy and Reger. The world has walked beyond Brahms, as it will walk beyond Strauss, and as we shall look back upon the tempestuous music of Strauss and think it as primitive and tame as the once revolutionary Wagner has become.

And what is all this but a testimony to the great minds we have today? The complaint is that we just now have no great minds in music or in anything else. But when did any present ever have any great mind? And were not Beethoven and Wagner in their time denounced for their abstruseness and eternal experimentalizing, even as Debussy and Strauss are berated for the self-same offences now? It may be no positive proof, but it affords at least grounds for suspicion, that the men we are sending out of our own day into the future may not there deport themselves so ill as many of us think they will.

But this is far from the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon, and its matchless performance of the symphony by Brahms. Mr. Gericke gave it romance, and its slow movement he invested with the tenderness that always finds Brahms at his best.

B. K.

Concerts Next Week

César Franck, the first time this season when Mr. Gericke has been conducting, has a place on the programme for the twenty-first pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. Then the third and the fourth movements of his suite, "Psyche," will be played—the former for the first and the latter for the second time here. Originally Franck wrote "Psyche" as a symphony for orchestra and chorus. He did not follow the classic legend, but chose rather to regard Eros and Psyche as disembodied and idealized passions and aspirations. The first movement pictures the slumber of Psyche. Then in the second, the zephyrs bear her to the gardens of Eros. In the third the passion of the pair mounts and subsides. The fourth, which the orchestra played under Mr. d'Indy last December, portrays the happiness of the lovers, now ecstatic, and now calm. "Eros and Psyche," says the programme book, "do not appear as individuals. The orchestra interprets their feelings, and for this reason; the two are in this poem not individuals. Franck, forgetting the legendary personages, looks on them as symbols of the human soul and supreme love. Music, absolute music without words, because its notes do not have a definite meaning, is of all the forms of art the most adequate expression of these immaterial realities. The orchestra translates the longings, the regrets, the final joy of Psyche, and it is easily to be seen that the whole work is charged with the spirit of Christian mysticism." The other new music on the programme is the introduction to the third act of "Der Pferfertag," an opera by Max Schillings, the young German composer, whose music is steadily making its way at home and abroad. The symphony in Schumann's fourth, and Mr. Gericke is at his best in Schumann's music. The concerto is Goldmark's for violin, with Jaques Hoffmann, of the first violins, to play the solo part.

For the orchestra's concert for the benefit of its Pension Fund tomorrow evening, at eight, comes the second Wagner programme of the year, and, thanks to the choruses of the Apollo and the Thursday Morning Clubs, two numbers appear on it that are seldom heard outside their place in their respective operas. The Apollo Club has given its services for the scene in the sanctuary of the Grail from the first act of "Parsifal," and the Thursday Morning Club is to assist in the spinning scene from the second act of "The Flying Dutchman." In it Mrs. Hissem de Moss is to sing Senta's ballad, and the concert begins with the overture of the opera. Mrs. de Moss will also sing Elisabeth's prayer from the third act of "Tannhäuser," and the orchestra will play the long introduction that pictures Tannhäuser's pilgrimage. The other excerpts from the music-dramas are Richter's arrangement of Siegfried's ascent to Brunnhilde's rock and his journey to Gunther's hall, and the prelude and closing scene from "Tristan." And it is very little of Wagner that we have heard in our theatres and at concerts this season.

Henry L. Higginson will tender a farewell benefit concert to Mr. Gericke in Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening, April 24. This will be done as a mark of appreciation for the long and faithful service of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will give an opportunity to his many friends in Boston to testify to the high esteem in which they hold the eminent musician. While it is true that Mr. Gericke will conduct the Symphony concerts on April 27 and 28, this benefit concert will be his formal farewell to Boston, for his friends are by no means limited to the regular subscribers of the Symphony concerts. Full particulars regarding the program will be given later. The sale of tickets will open at Symphony Hall on Friday, April 13, but mail orders, accompanied by checks, may be sent to C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall, from now on.

SINGS ENGLISH WITH SYMPHONY

Mrs. De Moss Delights Audience
With Old Classics—Freak
Music on Program.

Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss sang from Handel's "Joshua" the aria, "Oh, Had I Jubal's Love" and "The Pangs of Hell" from Mozart's "Magic Flute" at the Symphony concert Saturday night. She used the English word version and the result was satisfactory. She is a pleasing singer, although her voice is perhaps a trifle light for so large a hall.

Brahms' E minor symphony was presented to Mr. Gericke's most gracious mood, which expression may well be accepted as a synonym for perfection. A freak number was Busoni's "Geharnischte" suite for orchestra, played for the first time here. It is freakish throughout, with little to interest beyond the appreciation of the hard work of the players.

John Sebastian Bach's D major suite for orchestra opened the program.

MRS. DE MOSS AT THE SYMPHONY

Sings for the First Time at These Concerts and Delightfully—Not a Mere Disclaimer.

NEW "GEHARNISCHE" SUITE BY BUSONI

Work Characteristic of the Author—Moments When He Almost Succeeds in Establishing a Heroic Mood.

Herald — April 1, 1906

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss, soprano, sang for the first time at these concerts. The programme was as follows:

Suite in D major, No. 3.....Bach
"Oh, Had I Jubal's Love".....Handel
"Geharnischte" Suite (first time).....Busoni
Symphony in E minor, No. 4.....Brahms
Bach, Brahms and—Busoni! Here are three "B's" with a vengeance.

The wonder is that Busoni, a close student of Bach and a transcriber for the piano of many of his works, has not learned to lead the various voices in his own orchestral compositions with greater ease and with more effect.

This "Geharnischte" suite is characteristic of Busoni. The word means "armored," "in harness"; it also means "vigorous," "defiant." Busoni as pianist and composer suggests the defiant knight impatient to rush on the foe—and this foe, alas, is Beauty. The chief feature of his piano playing is aggressiveness. He does not coax, woo, persuade, charm. A piece of music composed for the piano interests him as long as it contains great difficulties to be mastered. He is happiest when he arranges for an audience a formidable, stupendous, time-defying programme. He has uncommon precision and accuracy in the dissection of a work; he can play very fast and with amazing loudness; he can be brilliant, but his brilliance is as coldly remote as that of the northern lights.

A recital by Busoni reminds one of the verses in Nahum: "The noise of a whip and the noise of the rattling of the wheels and of the prancing horses and of the jumping chariots. The horse man lifteth up both the bright sword and the glittering spear; and there is a multitude of slain and a great number of carcases."

Not that he is for a moment a poseur. The pity of it is that he is terribly in earnest. He is profoundly unhappy because there are no technical problems for him as a pianist to solve, no difficulties for him to conquer. He is the Alexander of pianists.

And therefore he contrives transcriptions that may possibly baffle others; he unites a concerto for piano, orchestra and chorus, a work that consumes an hour or possibly an hour and a half in performance; he has the mania of composing.

Mr. Anatole France says of contemporaneous literature that it has two deadly sins, avarice and pride. "We are dying from pride. We know enough. We are skilful, curious, restless, bold. We still know how to write, and if we do not reason so well as our forefathers, we perhaps feel more keenly. But pride kills us. We wish to astonish, and this is all we do wish. There is only one praise that touches us, that which asserts our originality; as though originality were something desirable in itself; as though there were not bad as well as good originality."

These words of France may be applied to certain contemporaneous composers, and in part to Busoni. We remember Busoni's "Tone Poem," played at one of the Symphony concerts a dozen years ago, and we also remember the consternation of the hearers. The piece was scored for all the instruments of percussion, and also other instruments, and, as Mr. Apthorp used to say in the programme books, it defied technical analysis. Early this season Mr. Gericke produced a "comedy overture" by Busoni. It was as light as a boiled New England dinner.

In the "Geharnischte" suite, composed in 1895, revised in 1903, and first performed Dec. 1, 1904, at Berlin, we recognize certain characteristics of Busoni, the pianist, and the truth of Anatole France's saying. The suite is in four movements: "Introduction," "War Dance," "Funeral Monument" and "Onset." Each movement is dedicated to a musical friend in Helsingfors where Busoni once lived as a teacher.

When Mr. Busoni plays the piano he generally plays the thoughts of others. In this suite the thoughts are chiefly his own. It would be cruel to others even to hint that he had their thoughts in mind. What a poverty of melodic invention there is in this music! How weak the average phrase! And any phrase that gives promise is quickly tortured out of shape. Passing over the scrappy first movement, we come to the war dance. First there is an unmeaning unison; then comes a chromatic and wholly incongruous tune for the trumpet, and then there is music that is fit only for a tangle-tangle hall. Do such strains recall to mind the savage dance of old Finnish warriors? The music given to the Cambodgians in "Wang" has much more character.

In the third movement Busoni evidently had in his mind an impressive musical scheme. There are moments when he almost succeeds in establishing a heroic and sombre mood, but his thoughts are fugitive and scattering; he has not the skill to build his monument with scanty or abundant material.

And, pray, what could any one do, however great his constructive skill, with the foolish themes in the finale?

There is constantly the too evident desire to do something that is original and great, when the composer has not mastered the essential elements of technique. There is no more true color in his orchestral combinations than in his piano playing. The figures given at times to the strings when the other instruments are busy—and busy to no purpose—might come from some instruction book. It would be a waste of time to point out the lack of genuine thematic development, a lack which is not atoned for by any brilliant or beautiful or heroic impressionistic pages.

The "Geharnische" suite came between the works of two masters of musical architecture. It is true that with the flight of years only the first two movements of Bach's suite have vital interest today, and that the structural ability of Brahms far exceeded his emotional thought and expression. But it is not necessary to judge Busoni's suite by such works; it would have seemed equally futile and jejune had it been sandwiched between the overture to "The Bronze Horse" and a symphony by a lesser man than Brahms.

The air by Bach was finely read. The pace was a fortunate one and the interpretation was refreshingly free from sentimentalism. Mr. Gericke did all that was possible for the "Geharnische" suite, and he led the symphony in a musically eloquent spirit, not after the manner of an imported "Brahms specialist" who feels it his duty to instruct the audience.

Mrs. de Moss sang "Oh, Had I Jubal's Lyre" from Handel's "Joshua"—for Handel wrote other oratorios than the "Messiah" although the Handel and Haydn Society has apparently forgotten the fact. How pleasant it was to hear English sung at a Symphony concert, especially as enunciated by Mrs. de Moss! For after all English is the language that is spoken in business and at home by the great majority of the Symphony audience. It is the language in which the New Englander buys, sells, prays, quarrels, lies, makes love. It is the language of Marlowe and Shakespeare, Shelley and Keats, Collins and Poe, Tennyson and Swinburne. Poets in their singing-ropes have not disdained it.

Yet American-born singers seem ashamed to use it, possibly because nine-tenths of them have never learned to enunciate it clearly and pronounce it correctly in song. It is true that the Rev. Thomas Morell, who served more than once as Handel's librettist, was not an inspired bard. He preached sermons and Englished the classics; he sang a good song, told a good story, dressed shabbily and was always in debt, but he was not a "boss poet," to borrow Artemus Ward's phrase, and Morell's contemporaries flouted his verses. Nevertheless, Mrs. de Moss sang an air with English words, as Mr. Bispham recently sang "La Belle Dame Sans Merci" of Keats and Converse in English, so this season may well be set apart for this fact and for the extraordinary brilliance of many of the concerts.

Mrs. de Moss, one of the few highly accomplished American sopranos now on the concert stage, sang Handel's air delightfully, with the appropriate purity and fleetness of expression. She was less successful as a whole in the bravura aria of the mysterious Queen of Night, yet for the most part she sang it well. It was a pleasure to hear once more a singer at a symphony concert, not a mere declaimer, not a woman of "dramatic intensity" and little vocal art, not a Wagnerphone.

Journal Mch. 31, 1906

Henry L. Higginson will tender a farewell benefit concert to Mr. Gericke in Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening, April 24. This will be done as a mark of appreciation for the long and faithful service of Mr. Gericke as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will give an opportunity to his many friends in Boston to testify to the high esteem in which they hold the eminent musician. While it is true that Mr. Gericke will conduct the Symphony concerts on April 27 and 28, this benefit concert will be his formal farewell to Boston, for his friends are by no means limited to the regular subscribers of the Symphony concerts. Full particulars regarding the program will be given later. The sale of tickets will open at Symphony Hall on Friday, April 13, but mail orders, accompanied by checks, may be sent to C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall, from now on.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Rarely is a more attractive program of excerpts from Wagner's operas and music dramas arranged than that which will be played by the Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening at the second Pension Fund concert. With the exception of the "Flying Dutchman" overture and the prelude and finale of "Tristan and Isolde" the selections are not often put on concert programs, and as Boston has had very little Wagner this winter since Mr. Conried has passed it by, this concert will be all the more welcome. "The Spinning Chorus," from the second act of "The Flying Dutchman," has been made possible through the generosity of the Thursday Morning Club in volunteering its services for the concert, and the same is true of the Grail scene from the first act of "Parsifal"—the more impressive of the two Grail scenes—for here the Apollo Club has given its services. In conjunction with "The Spinning Chorus" Mrs. Hissem de Moss, who is the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts, will sing Senta's ballade. The introduction to the third act of "Tannhauser," followed by "Elizabeth's Prayer," which Mrs. de Moss will sing, will make another attractive and unusual number, for the introduction, which contains some of Wagner's biggest moments, is seldom found on a concert program. The selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" have been on Symphony programs from time to time.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The 20th Symphony program had for soloist Mrs. Hissem de Moss, who has been quite prominent in the local musical world of late, her singing with the Cecelia, Handel and Haydn, Apollo and other organizations being highly commended and her work giving great satisfaction because of the diversified abilities shown by the artist. She sang with the orchestra the soprano arias, "O, Had I Jubal's Lyre," from Handel's oratorio, "Joshua," and "The Pangs of Hell," from Mozart's "Magic Flute." Busoni's orchestral suite, "Geharnische," was played for the first time at these concerts and Bach's D major suite for orchestra and Brahms' fourth symphony completed the selections. Mrs. Moss has a high soprano voice, flexible, brilliant and light and admirably suited to bravura work, for her execution is very smooth and true, and she shows her artistic training by the skilful manner in which she uses the mezzo voice, an accomplishment that is all too rare even with some of our most famous singers. Handel's brief aria was delivered with considerable fervor, and although Mrs. Moss was lacking in dramatic strength to fully illustrate the text, the sweetness of her song was undeniably attractive. In the pyrotechnics of the Mozart aria she was excellent, with but a shade of deviation from the pitch in the high staccato phrases. Mrs. Moss was received with great favor.

The Busoni suite is in four movements, each one dedicated to a friend and titled in turn, "Prelude," "War Dance," "Funeral Monument" and "Onset." The name "Geharnische" conveys little meaning as to the character of the music or the relation of one part to the other, for the word has several synonyms. Despite its peculiar character the composition is quite interesting, in spots, the boldness and barbaric tone of the introduction being a capital example of instrumental juggling as a theme is passed about in the different choirs of the band. The brasses deserve particular praise for uniformly good tone. The "War Dance" has a chromatic motif that is rather odd in character, also a batch of unison phrases for strings in forte that is very effective. Both of these were played with splendid verve. The somber third part and the impetuous fourth received characteristic treatment. The brass instruments are very prominent in the score, and this part of the orchestra certainly maintained its high standard in every way.

The five movements of Bach's D major suite and Brahms' E minor symphony, straightforward good music, were played with the usual finish and interpretative skill expected of this great orchestra. In the Bach number the beautiful quality and unity of performance by the strings, which have the bulk of the work to do, again demonstrated the great proficiency of the body. The melancholy and passionate nature of the Brahms symphony was perfectly preserved, making its interpretation very impressive. Mr. Gericke's receptions of late have been exceedingly cordial, and yesterday and Friday were not exceptions.

This week's program will have for a novelty the introduction to the third act of "Der Pfeifertag," an opera by Max Schillings. Cesar Franck will be represented by two movements from his "Psyche," which have already been played here. The symphony will be Schumann's No. 4 in D minor. Mr. Jacques Hofmann of the orchestra will be the soloist in Goldmark's A minor violin concerto. George April 1, 1906

A Benefit to Mr. Gericke

Mr. Henry L. Higginson has proposed a benefit concert to Mr. Gericke as an appropriate honor to the conductor and his work here before he finally leaves us. Mr. Gericke has accepted Mr. Higginson's proffer, and the concert will take place just before the end of the season, on Tuesday evening, April 24, in Symphony Hall. The programme will be announced in due course, but it is a small matter beside the opportunity that the concert will give us, who have made Mr. Gericke's audiences so many years, an opportunity to join in a benefit to him. When Mr. Higginson offered it he was speaking not only for himself but for the whole public of the Symphony concerts and for those outside it who know that the Symphony Orchestra is one of the glories of our city and that it is Mr. Gericke, with Mr. Higginson's steadfast support, who has made it such. The proposal was an expression of wide and genuine feeling that the conductor, with all his sincere modesty, could not refuse. When we applaud at the Symphony concerts, the composer, the orchestra, and the conductor divide our appreciation. At the concert for Mr. Gericke's benefit it will be all his own. A few weeks ago, when he took leave of the other cities that he has visited each winter, Philadelphia, Baltimore and New York all did him much honor. Then he was appearing in the regular course of the winter's concerts. Three weeks hence he will be appearing at a benefit of his own, in his own city, with the public that knows and appreciates him better than any other. And it is a public that has especial reason at the moment to honor him. Never in all the years of his work here have his powers seemed so large, supple and keen as they have through the present musical year. Never have they flowered into finer or ampler achievements, and never have his audiences been warmer or more sincere in appreciation of them. It is for us of the public to translate, at this benefit concert, all that we have said to each other of Mr. Gericke into open admiration that he may feel as warmly and genuinely as do we. His part he has been doing week after week, season after season. At last we are to have for the first time a particular and exceptional opportunity to do ours.

Leans. Mch. 30, 1906
Soloist:

IFOR SALE—SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TICKET

For balance of season, on floor, Q 2, $26. Address T.B.F., Boston Transcript. (A):

MRS. DE MOSS ON SYMPHONY STAGE

Will Sing for First Time with the Boston Orchestra at To-day's Rehearsal—Revival of Bach Suite.

Herald — March 30, 1906

The 20th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, will take place in Symphony Hall this afternoon. The programme will include these orchestral works: Bach's Suite in D major, No. 3; Busoni's "Geharnischte" suite (first time here), and Brahms' symphony in E minor, No. 4. The suite by Bach—the one with the famous air played by all violinists and cellists—was first performed here in the seventies at a Theodore Thomas concert. It has not been played at a Symphony concert for several years. Mr. Gericke had much success with it on the recent trip. The suite contains an overture, air, two gavottes, a bourree and a gigue. One of the gavottes will be omitted at this concert.

Busoni's suite was first performed in Berlin at one of his orchestral concerts late in 1903, but the music was written some years before and then revised. The suite is in four movements, and each one is dedicated to a composer or musical friend in Helsingfors, where Busoni once taught, and where he married. The movements are as follows: Introduction, war dance, funeral monument and Onset. "Geharnischte" means armored, in harness, cap-a-pie; but it also means "defiant."

Mrs. Hissem de Moss will sing for the first time at these concerts. She is a Kentuckian by birth, and she studied chiefly in Cincinnati, where she lived until, in 1900, she went to New York. She has sung in Boston at concerts of the Handel and Haydn, Cecilia, Apollo societies and on other occasions. Her selections are: "The Pangs of Hell," sung by the Queen of Night in Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and "Oh, had I Jubal's Lyre," from Handel's "Joshua." Mrs. de Moss will sing at the pension fund concert next Sunday night Wagner's "Ballad of the Flying Dutchman" and Elisabeth's prayer in "Tannhaeuser."

The programme of the concerts on April 6 and 7 will be as follows: Prelude to act. III. of Max Schillings' opera, "Der Pfeifertag" (first time here); Goldmark's violin concerto (Mr. Jacques Hoffmann, violinist); two movements, "Cupid's Garden" and "Psyche and Cupid," from Cesar Franck's "Psyche," and Schumann's symphony in D minor, No. 4.

MAHLER PICKED TO CONDUCT THE SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra Said to Be After Director of Vienna Imperial Opera House to Succeed Gericke, but Latter May Remain.

Journal — March 31, 1906

New York, March 30.—According to advices received here today from Vienna, Gustav Mahler, now conductor of the Imperial Opera House in Vienna, is to be the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Mahler will not be at liberty, however, to come here until a year from next October. It has been announced that the orchestra's plans will not be divulged until after the farewell concert of Wilhelm Gericke on April 24.

It is probable that Fritz Steenbach, in spite of his denials, will come for this interregnum. The possibility that Mr. Gericke may still be engaged for another year is by no means excluded from some consideration. If Col. Higginson will accept his terms Mr. Gericke will be able to remain.

The decision of Felix Weingartner not to return to the New York Symphony Orchestra next winter is closely connected with Gustav Mahler's call to Boston. Mr. Weingartner will, in accordance with present plans, be called to Munich to succeed Felix Mottl at the Prinz Regent's Theater there. Mr. Mottl is expected to be the successor of Mahler in Vienna.

Gustav Mahler, who composed, among other well known works, the symphony in C sharp minor, studied in the schools of Iglau and Prague. In 1877 he went to Vienna to continue his general studies at the university of that city, and also to study music at the Vienna Conservatory, where he became a pupil of Anton Bruckner. In order to earn a living, he was obliged to leave Vienna, and in 1880 he began his career as a conductor of operas. He served in this capacity in Hall, in upper Austria, at Laibach, at Olmutz, and he was afterward for some time at Cassel. He went to Prague and distinguished himself by performances of Wagner's "Ring," symphonies by Bruckner, and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. At Leipzig Mahler

GERICKE MAY STAY WITH SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(Continued From First Page.)

and Arthur Nikisch were fellow opera conductors. In 1888 he was appointed opera director at Budapest and he soon made that opera house famous throughout Europe.

Gustav Mahler,

He was called to Hamburg to be the first conductor of the Hamburg City Theater, and there he remained from 1891 to 1897.

In 1897 he took the place of Wilhelm Jahn as conductor of the Vienna opera, and soon after his arrival he was also appointed a director of the opera. He still holds these positions. He succeeded Hans Richter as conductor of the Philharmonic concerts of Vienna for a few years. He is the author of the opera "Die Argonouten," "Ruhezahl," a fairy opera, "Lieder eines Fahrenden Gesellen," and a number of songs.

MUSICAL MATTER.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Adv.

Bach—Suite for Orchestra, in D major.
Handel—Air, "O, had I Jubal's Lyre," from the oratorio "Joshua."
Soloist, Mrs. Mary Hissem De Moss.
Busoni—"Geharnischte" Suite: second orchestral suite, No. 2, op. 34. A. I. Prelude. II. War Dance. III. Funeral Monument. IV. Onset. (First time at these concerts.)
Mozart—Aria, "The Pangs of Hell," from the opera, "The Magic Flute."
Mrs. Hissem de Moss.
Brahms—Symphony No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.

It was a hopeful sign that Bach and Brahms received the most applause in this concert, spontaneous and hearty applause that showed that the public still appreciates symmetry of design and melody. The Bach Suite had, however, one of the defects of the old school. The presentation of all the movements in the same key becomes irksome in these modulatory times. It is probable that this course was forced upon Bach by the avoidance of the tempered scale upon keyed instruments, inculcating a habit of restricted modulation which seems strange to the modern auditor.

We may remember, however, that it was Bach himself who broke these fetters, for his "well-tempered clavichord," presenting a free use of all the 24 major and minor keys (Part I.—1722, Part II.—1742), was the musician's Declaration of Independence.—"We hold that all keys are created free and equal!"

It was the beautiful "air" of this Suite that won the chief applause, causing the conductor to bow several times and finally to order his string orchestra to rise and join him in obeisances. And it is a noble tune. How any one who is familiar with this tune, or the air for the G string of the violin, or "Around thy tomb here sit we weeping," can say that Bach was unmelodic, passes comprehension. He had a loftiness of tune that no other composer achieved.

The suite was finely played and its three dances reminded the auditor that our symphony form is descended from dancing. Here is the genealogy:—a contrast of dances begat the partita, the partita begat the suite de dances, the suite begat the sonata and symphony. The cycle forms of music owe much to Terpsichore, and they also owe something to Spain (a debt which is not acknowledged in the musical histories), for many of the chief dances of the suite had their origin among the Moors and Spaniards, and the southern country sent its instrumental forms into France, and thence into northern Europe, in very early times.

Mrs. Hissem De Moss sang the Handelian selection with great agreement, with easy flexibility and with admirable phrasing. One might have demanded more breadth however. She was recalled at the close of the aria. In the succeeding number, "The Pangs of Hell," she was very brilliant in the staccato passages, although she flatted decidedly in the highest register. As this flattening, however, was exactly a semi-tone each time it may have been an intentional alteration of the passage to avoid the highest notes. Mrs. De Moss was recalled with much enthusiasm after this number.

252

After the Bach suite there came a suite of very different order. Mr. Ferruccio Busoni has proved himself such a great student of Bach that we may assume that if he adopts the ultra-modern vein in his compositions he does it from choice and not from any inability to work in the accepted shapes. We can only say therefore that we wish he had kept to the musical highway and not struck off through the brambles.

The suite was intended as a "Heroic" composition, dealing with military heroism much as Strauss and Beethoven have done, but the word "Heroic" having been over-used in music Mr. Busoni took refuge in the less usual term of "Harnessed," used in the sense that Shakespeare applies it in the last act of "Macbeth":—

"At least we'll die with harness on our back." It is a Mahleresque work. It employs a tremendous orchestra and Mr. Busoni shows great brilliancy in laying on his tone-colors. There are even glimpses of attractive melody, but they remain only glimpses, for these tuneful infants are promptly strangled after the most modern manner.

The war-dance might have applied to Ojibwa Indians quite as well as to armored knights, while at the beginning of the "funeral monument" the long rumblings of the contra-bassoon suggested a dissatisfied cow rather than the tomb. But here, too, there were some very strong contrasts and many dramatic touches. The final assault (and battery) was a finable offence, considering that Strauss had already achieved trouble enough upon the battlefield.

Sherman once said—"War is Hell"—and this sounded like it. Yet the galloping steeds in the beginning of the movement and the march-like themes were not altogether without their effect.

While we emphatically do not like the school, we demand for Busoni the same respect that is accorded to other modern dissonancists. The more we get of this rambling, difficult, "impressionist" school, the better, for the fever will have sooner run its course. By-and-bye, when most of the conductors have suffered nervous collapse, and all the musicians are killed by extra rehearsals, matters will quiet down again and Music resume her normal path.

We were delighted when the long Andante of the Brahms symphony received enthusiastic applause. That cool, calm opening phrase, in its peculiar "major-minor" mode, came like a lotion to bruised ears. But we begin to believe that the final "Passacaglia" variations are too long in spite of their great ingenuity. Brahms (like Beethoven) had such tremendous skill in varying a theme that it often led him too far.

Oh, it is excellent to have a giant's strength, But it is tyrannous to use it like a giant.
Louis C. Elson.

SINGS ENGLISH WITH SYMPHONY

Mrs. De Moss Delights Audience
With Old Classics—Freak

Music on Program.

Journal Apr. 2, 1906

Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss sang from Handel's "Joshua" the aria, "Oh, Had I Jubal's Love" and "The Pangs of Hell" from Mozart's "Magic Flute" at the Symphony concert Saturday night. She used the English word version and the result was satisfactory. She is a pleasing singer, although her voice is perhaps a trifle light for so large a hall.

Brahms' E minor symphony was presented to Mr. Gericke's most gracious mood, which expression may well be accepted as a synonym for perfection. A freak number was Busoni's "Gehornische" suite for orchestra, played for the first time here. It is freakish throughout, with little to interest beyond the appreciation of the hard work of the players.

John Sebastian Bach's D major suite for orchestra opened the program.

SUNDAY EVENING, APRIL 1, at EIGHT

1906

Concert

by the

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

In aid of its

PENSION FUND

Assisting

Mrs. HISSEM DE MOSS

Miss LILLA ORMONDE

JOHN F. DANIELS

SULLIVAN A. SARGENT

THE THURSDAY MORNING CLUB

THE APOLLO CLUB

selection with most agreeable voice, with easy flexibility and with admirable phrasing. One might have demanded more breadth however. She was recalled at the close of the aria. In the succeeding number, "The Pangs of Hell," she was very brilliant in the staccato passages, although she flatted decidedly in the highest register. As this flattening, however, was exactly a semi-tone each time it may have been an intentional alteration of the passage to avoid the highest notes. Mrs. De Moss was recalled with much enthusiasm after this number.

After the Bach suite there came a suite of very different order. Mr. Ferruccio Busoni has proved himself such a great student of Bach that we may assume that if he adopts the ultra-modern vein in his compositions he does it from choice and not from any inability to work in the accepted shapes. We can only say therefore that we wish he had kept to the musical highway and not struck off through the brambles.

The suite was intended as a "Heroic" composition, dealing with military heroism much as Strauss and Beethoven have done, but the word "Heroic" having been over-used in music Mr. Busoni took refuge in the less usual term of "Harnessed," used in the sense that Shakespeare applies it in the last act of "Macbeth":—

"At least we'll die with harness on our back." It is a Mahleresque work. It employs a tremendous orchestra and Mr. Busoni shows great brilliancy in laying on his tone-colors. There are even glimpses of attractive melody, but they remain only glimpses, for these tuneful infants are promptly strangled after the most modern manner.

The war-dance might have applied to Ojibwa Indians quite as well as to armored knights, while at the beginning of the "funeral monument" the long rumblings of the contra-bassoon suggested a dissatisfied cow rather than the tomb. But here, too, there were some very strong contrasts and many dramatic touches. The final assault (and battery) was a finable offence, considering that Strauss had already achieved trouble enough upon the battlefield.

Sherman once said—"War is Hell"—and this sounded like it. Yet the galloping steeds in the beginning of the movement and the march-like themes were not altogether without their effect.

While we emphatically do not like the school, we demand for Busoni the same respect that is accorded to other modern dissonancists. The more we get of this rambling, difficult, "impressionist" school, the better, for the fever will have sooner run its course. By-and-bye, when most of the conductors have suffered nervous collapse, and all the musicians are killed by extra rehearsals, matters will quiet down again and Music resume her normal path.

We were delighted when the long Andante of the Brahms symphony received enthusiastic applause. That cool, calm opening phrase, in its peculiar "major-minor" mode, came like a lotion to bruised ears. But we begin to believe that the final "Passacaglia" variations are too long in spite of their great ingenuity. Brahms (like Beethoven) had such tremendous skill in varying a theme that it often led him too far.

Oh, it is excellent to have a giant's strength, But it is tyrannous to use it like a giant.
Louis C. Elson.

SINGS ENGLISH WITH SYMPHONY

Mrs. De Moss Delights Audience
With Old Classics—Freak
Music on Program.

Journal Apr. 2, 1906
Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss sang from Handel's "Joshua" the aria, "Oh, Had I Jubal's Love" and "The Pangs of Hell" from Mozart's "Magic Flute" at the Symphony concert Saturday night. She used the English word version and the result was satisfactory. She is a pleasing singer, although her voice is perhaps a trifle light for so large a hall.

Brahms' E minor symphony was presented to Mr. Gericke's most gracious mood, which expression may well be accepted as a synonym for perfection. A freak number was Busoni's "Gehornische" suite for orchestra, played for the first time here. It is freakish throughout, with little to interest beyond the appreciation of the hard work of the players.

John Sebastian Bach's D major suite for orchestra opened the program.

SUNDAY EVENING, APRIL 1, at EIGHT

1906

Concert

by the

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

In aid of its

PENSION FUND

Assisting

Mrs. HISSEM DE MOSS

Miss LILLA ORMONDE

JOHN F. DANIELS

SULLIVAN A. SARGENT

THE THURSDAY MORNING CLUB

THE APOLLO CLUB

.. Wagner Programme ..

Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."

Spinning Chorus and Ballade from Act II., "The Flying Dutchman."

Introduction and Prayer from Act III., "Tannhäuser."

Selections from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods."

---

Grail Scene from Act I., "Parsifal."

Vorspiel and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde."

---

---

I. SPINNING CHORUS AND BALLADE, ACT II., "THE FLYING DUTCHMAN."

Chorus of Maidens.

Hum, hum, hum, good wheel, be whirling,
Gaily, gaily turn thee round!
Spin, spin, spin, the threads be twirling,
Turn, good wheel, with humming sound!
My love now sails on distant seas;
His faithful heart for home doth yearn;
Couldst thou, good wheel, but give the breeze,
My love would soon to me return!
Spin, spin, spin we duly,
Hum, hum, wheel, go truly! Tra la ra, etc.

Mary.

Ah! duly, duly are they spinning!
Each girl a sweetheart would be winning!

Chorus.

Dame Mary, hush, for well you know
Our song as yet must onward go!

Mary.

Then sing, yet ply a busy wheel!

(To Senta.)

But wherefore, Senta, art thou still?

Chorus.

Hum, hum, hum, good wheel, be whirling,
Gaily, gaily turn thee round!
Spin, spin, spin, the threads be twirling,
Turn, good wheel, with humming sound!
On distant seas my love doth sail,
In southern lands much gold he wins;
Then turn, good wheel, nor tire nor fail;
The gold for her who duly spins. Tra la ra, etc.

Mary

(to Senta).

Thou careless girl! Wilt thou not spin?
Thy lover's gift thou wilt not win.

Chorus.

She has no need to work as we;
Her lover sails not on the sea;
He brings her game; he brings not gold;
One knows the worth of hunters bold;
Ha! Ha! etc.

(Senta sings softly to herself.)

Mary.

You see her still before that face!
Why wilt thou dream away thy girlhood
With gazing at that picture so?

Senta

(without changing her position).

Why hast thou told me of his sorrows?
His hapless fate why did I know?
The wretched man!

Mary.

God help thee, girl!

Chorus.

Ei! ei! what's that she said?
Her sighs are for the ghastly man!

Mary.

I fear that she will lose her head!

Chorus.

'Tis brooding makes her look so wan.

Mary.

No use for me to chide each day!
Come! Senta! wilt thou turn away?

Chorus.

She hears you not! She is in love! Ei! Ei!
No anger pray it move!
Erik has a temper hot,
And, if he's hurt, will bear it not!
Say nought! Lest in a rage he fall
And shoot his rival from the wall. Ha! Ha! etc.

Senta

(starting up angrily).

Be still with all your foolish jesting!
My temper are you bent on testing?

Chorus.

Hum! Hum! etc.

Senta.

Oh! make an end to all this singing!
Your hum, hum, hum quite tires my ear.
If me you would your way be bringing,
Provide some better thing to hear.

Chorus.

Well, sing thyself.

Senta.

Much would I rather
Dame Mary sang to us the ballade.

Mary.

I'd rather not attempt the thing!
The Flying Dutchman, let him be!

Senta.

The song I oft have heard you sing
I'll sing myself. Hark then to me!
A tale of sorrow I select you;
His wretched fate, it must affect you.
Mark ye the words!

Chorus.

Well, let us hear, and we will rest.

Mary.

I'll spin away.

Senta.

Yo-ho-ho! Yo-ho-ho-ho! Yo-ho-ho! Yo-ho!
A ship the restless ocean sweeps;
Blood-red her sails and black her masts;
Her spectral captain never sleeps,
But watchful glances round him casts.
Hui! The wind is shrill! Yo-ho-hey! Yo-ho-hey!
Like an arrow he flies, without aim, without rest, without end.
Yet this spectral man from his life-long curse may deliver,
Find he a maiden, faithful and true, to love him forever.
Ah! mightest thou, spectral seaman, but find her!
Pray ye that Heaven may soon,
At his need, grant this boon.

Against the tempest's utmost wrath
Around the Cape he once would sail.
He curs'd and swore a foolish oath:
"Befall what may, I will prevail!"
Hui! And Satan heard! Yo-ho-hey!
He marked his word. Yo-ho-hey!

And condemned him to sail on the sea without aim, without end.
And yet this wretched man from his curse may deliver,
Would but an angel show him the way his bondage to sever.
Ah! mightest thou, spectral seaman, but find it!
Pray ye that Heaven may soon,
At his need, grant this boon.

Chorus.

Ah! mightest thou, spectral seaman, but find it!
Pray ye to Heaven!

Senta.

He goes on shore when seven years end:
A wife he seeks the land around;
But wheresoe'er his steps he bend,
For him no faithful wife is found.
Hui! Unfurl the sails! Yo-ho-hey!
Hui! The anchor weigh! Yo-ho-hey!
Hui! Faithless love, faithless troth!
To the sea, without aim, without end.

Chorus.

Ah! where is she, to whose loving heart the angel may guide thee?
Where lingers she, thine own unto death, whatever betide thee?

Senta.

I am the one who through her love will save thee!
Oh! may the angel hither guide thee!
Through me may new-found joy betide thee!

II. INTRODUCTION AND PRAYER, ACT III., "TANN-HAEUSER."

O blessed Virgin, hear my prayer!
Thou star of glory, look on me!
Here in the dust I bend before thee,
Now from this earth, oh, set me free!

Let me, a maiden, pure and white enter into thy kingdom bright!
If vain desires and earthly longing have turned my heart from thee away,
The sinful hopes within me thronging before thy blessed feet I lay;
I wrestle with the love I cherish'd until its flame in death hath perish'd.
If of my sin thou wilt not shrive me, yet in this hour, oh, grant thy aid!
Till thy eternal peace thou give me, I vow to live and die a maid.
And on thy bounty I will call, that heavenly grace on him may fall.

Intermission

III. GRAIL SCENE, ACT I., "PARSIFAL."

Gurnemanz.

From bathing comes the king again;
High stands the sun now:
Let me to the holy Feast then conduct thee;
For—an thou'rt pure,
Surely the Grail will feed and refresh thee.

(He has gently laid Parsifal's arm on his own neck, and, supporting his body with his arm, leads him slowly along.)

Parsifal.

What is the Grail?

Gurnemanz.

I may not say:
But if to serve it thou be bidden,
Knowledge of it will not be hidden.—
And lo!—
Methinks I know thee now indeed:
No earthly road to it doth lead,
By no one can it be detected
Who by itself is not elected.

Parsifal.

I scarcely move,—
Yet swiftly seem to run.

Gurnemanz.

My son, thou seest
Here Space and Time are one.

Gradually, while Parsifal and Gurnemanz appear to walk, the scene changes imperceptibly from L. to R. The forest disappears; a door opens in rocky cliffs and conceals the two; they are then seen again in sloping passages which they appear to ascend. Long sustained trombone notes softly swell, approaching peals of bells are heard. At last they arrive at a mighty hall, which loses itself overhead in a high-vaulted dome, down from which alone the light streams in. From the heights above the dome comes the increasing sound of chimes.

Gurnemanz

(turning to Parsifal, who stands spell-bound).

Now give good heed, and let me see,
If thou'rt a Fool and pure,
What wisdom thou presently canst secure.—

At each side in the background a large door opens. From the R. enter slowly the Knights of the Grail in solemn procession, and range themselves, during the following chorus, by degrees at two long covered tables which are placed endways towards the audience, one on each side, leaving the middle of the stage free. Only cups—no dishes—stand on them.

The Knights of the Grail.

The Holy Supper duly
Prepare we day by day,
As on that last time truly
The soul it still may stay.
Who lives to do good deeds
This Meal for ever feeds;
The Cup his hand may lift
And claim the purest gift.

Voices of Younger Men

(coming from the mid-height of the hall).

As anguished and lowly
His life stream's spilling
For sinners He did offer,
For the Saviour holy
With heart free and willing
My blood I now will proffer.
His body, given our sins to shrive,
Through death becomes in us alive.

Boys' voices

(from the summit of the dome).

His love endures,
The dove upsoars,
The Saviour's sacred token.
Take the wine red,
For you 'twas shed;
Let Bread of Life be broken.

Boys

(from the dome).

"Take and drink my blood;
Thus be our love remembered!
Take my body and eat:
Do this and think of me!"

A blinding ray of light shoots down from above upon the cup, which glows with increasing purple lustre. Amfortas, with brightened mien, raises the "Grail" aloft and waves it gently about on all sides. Since the coming of the dusk all have sunk upon their knees, and now cast their eyes reverently towards the "Grail."

Titurel's

(voice)

Celestial rapture!
How light now the looks of the Lord!

Amfortas sets down the "Grail" again, which now, while the deep gloom wanes, grows paler: the boys cover it as before and return it to the shrine. As the original light returns to the hall, the cups on the table are seen to be filled with wine, and by each is a piece of bread. All sit down to the repast, including Gurnemanz, who keeps a place by him for Parsifal, whom he invites with a sign to come and partake. Parsifal, however, remains silent and motionless at the side, as if quite dumbfounded.

(Alternative, during the Supper.)

Boys' voices

(from the height).

Wine and Bread the Grail's Lord changéd
Which at that Last Meal were rangéd,
Through his pity's loving tide
When He shed for you His gore
And His Body crucified.

Youths' voices

(from the middle height).

Blood and Body which he offered
Changed to food for you are proffered
By the Saviour ye revere
In the Wine which now ye pour
And the Bread ye eat of here.

The Knights

(first half).

Take of this Bread,
Change it again,
Your pow'rs of body firing;
Living and dead
Strive amain
To work out the Lord's desiring.

(Second half.)

Take of this Wine,
Change it anew
To life's impetuous torrent;
Gladly combine,
Brothers true,
To fight as duty shall warrant.

(They rise solemnly and all join hands.)

All the Knights.

Blessed Believing!
Blesséd in Loving!

Youths

(from the mid-height).

Blessed in Loving!

Boys

(from the utmost height).

Blessed Believing!

During the repast Amfortas, who has not partaken, has gradually relapsed from his state of exaltation: he bows his head and presses his hand to the wound. The pages approach him; his wound has burst out afresh: they tend him and assist him to his litter; then, while all prepare to break up, they bear off Amfortas and the shrine in the order in which they came. The Knights and Esquires fall in and slowly leave the hall in solemn procession, whilst the daylight gradually wanes. The bells are heard pealing again.

Parsifal, on hearing Amfortas' cry of agony, has clutched his heart and remained in that position for some time; he now stands as if petrified, motionless. When the last knight has left the hall and the doors are again closed, Gurnemanz in ill-humor comes up to Parsifal and shakes him by the arm.

Gurnemanz.

Why standest thou there?
Wist thou what thou saw'st?

(Parsifal shakes his head slightly.)

Gurnemanz.

Thou art then nothing but a Fool!

(He opens a small side door.)

Come away, on thy road be gone
And put my rede to use:
Leave all our swans for the future alone
And seek thyself, gander, a goose.

(He pushes Parsifal out and slams the door angrily on him. As he follows the knights, the curtain closes.)

SYMPHONY HALL

Tuesday Evening, April 24, 1906

Benefit Concert

FOR

Wilhelm Gericke

CONDUCTOR OF THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Tickets, $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00. On sale at Symphony Hall Friday, April 13.

Mail orders, accompanied by checks, addressed to C. A. ELLIS, Symphony Hall, will be accepted, and seats as near as possible to desired location set aside before public sale.

A Wagner Concert

The more signs that we in Boston give of our liking for opera, the sooner and the more surely we shall have the Metropolitan company back again, and last night we were unusually clear and emphatic. There was a "Wagner programme" for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its pension fund. Except the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and the prelude to "Tristan," every number on it was music of the scene—Senta's ballad and her dialogue with the spinning girls in the second act of "The Flying Dutchman," the introduction to the third act of "Tannhäuser" and Elisabeth's prayer before the wayside cross in the autumn twilight; Siegfried's ascent to Brünnhilde's rock, and his coming to Gunther's hall, the approach of Parsifal and Gurnemanz to the castle of the Grail and the eucharist of the knights; and for ending, Isolde's song of love and death. In the fragments from "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhäuser" and "Parsifal," there were singers in evening coats and frocks for the music allotted to the characters of each opera. Elsewhere there was only the orchestra. Throughout it was Wagner "in concert form," with all its drawbacks and disillusion. Yet Symphony Hall was filled almost to the last seat. The audience listened intently eager, and its applause was quick and hearty. If we do these things for a "Wagner concert," would we not do as much and more for Wagner in his full and proper place, the theatre, and for opera in general? Last night we underscored the signs that we have been giving at every opportunity, the season through, of our liking for opera. They are so plain now that even Mr. Conreid might descry them afar off.

Orchestrally, however, it was Wagner such as neither the Metropolitan nor hardly any opera house in the world may give. Mr. Gericke and his men seemed to come to the music as eagerly as did the audience. It is an old story how Wagner gains in tonal beauty, in sheer musical power, in dramatic subtlety, when such a band and such a conductor plays his music. It is good to hear in absolute purity of tone the virginal quality of Senta's music in the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and in such tone to follow the light that pours from the Grail. It is good to hear a Wagnerian climax rise in instrumental as well as in emotional proportion, for the two are more closely united than some of the thrashing "Wagner conductors" guess. It is good as well to hear every upper and under strand in the instrumental webs that he weaves and each in the adroitest euphony with the rest. But there were more than these things in the orchestra's performance last night. They were the perfect means to Wagner's ends. They gave the beauty which conductor and band made instinct with the power. There have been times when Mr. Gericke seemed to take Wagner's sea music in the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" tamely. Last night it pitched and curled. The music of Venus and her train came like fiery beckonings through the fragment from "Tannhäuser." Siegfried mounted to Brünnhilde's rock more vividly through such tones than he does through all the steamy fire and gauzy mists of the stage. It was tonal splendor and not moving scenery that carried Parsifal and Gurnemanz into the hall of the Grail. The orchestra sung the fate of Tristan and Isolde and then made their passion leap and flame against it. For once it was not languorous as it is the fashion of many a conductor to make it in these days of slow pace. It was too hot for that and too heroic. Throughout the concert there was the union of entire surety and proportion of detail, and of the perfection of musical means, with largeness and intensity of feeling. Mr. Gericke united them in his "Wagner concert" last November. He fused and heightened them last night. Not once seemingly did his men fail him. Every impulse of the music touched them as with a spark. At moments we that listened heard the Wagner of our ideals—the Wagner that is not tingling neurotic sensation, but is the power and the beauty of sound made poignant because they are controlled.

H. T. P.

In other places Mr. Wilhelm Gericke is saying farewell. His "farewell appearances" are genuine and his audiences seem to so understand them. Everywhere there is an extra warmth in the applause that greets him, and from every audience he receives a laurel wreath. Then there are other ways in which his admirers show how sorry they are that he is going, and he must, one would think, discover a little sadness of his own. Somehow we have always thought that Boston owned Mr. Gericke, that the other cities he visits could not have and hold him as we did, but they do, apparently, since they are taking these last appearances to heart very much as we shall when our turn comes to say good-by in earnest. Mch. 19, 1906

Mr. Gericke's last evening in New York as leader of the Symphony orchestra called out a generous recognition from the audience and a friendly farewell from Mr. Krehbiel. It was a gracious thing to cover his desk with laurel, while his exquisite sense of euphony and the virtuosity of his musicians were duly honored. New York loves to make drives at Boston, but has always been nice to her own and only orchestra. Herald-Mch. 18, 1906

SYMPHONY

Tickets for Sale in all parts of the Hall, 49 State Street, Room 58. Telephone Main 4235-6.

(A)41:

SYMPHONY HALL

Tuesday Evening, April 24, 1906

Benefit Concert

FOR

Wilhelm Gericke

CONDUCTOR OF THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Tickets, $2.50, $2.00, $1.50, $1.00. On sale at Symphony Hall Friday, April 13.

Mail orders, accompanied by checks, addressed to C. A. ELLIS, Symphony Hall, will be accepted, and seats as near as possible to desired location set aside before public sale.

A Wagner Concert

The more signs that we in Boston give of our liking for opera, the sooner and the more surely we shall have the Metropolitan company back again, and last night we were unusually clear and emphatic. There was a "Wagner programme" for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its pension fund. Except the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and the prelude to "Tristan," every number on it was music of the scene—Senta's ballad and her dialogue with the spinning girls in the second act of "The Flying Dutchman," the introduction to the third act of "Tannhäuser" and Elisabeth's prayer before the wayside cross in the autumn twilight; Siegfried's ascent to Brünnhilde's rock, and his coming to Gunther's hall, the approach of Parsifal and Gurnemanz to the castle of the Grail and the eucharist of the knights; and for ending, Isolde's song of love and death. In the fragments from "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhäuser" and "Parsifal," there were singers in evening coats and frocks for the music allotted to the characters of each opera. Elsewhere there was only the orchestra. Throughout it was Wagner "in concert form," with all its drawbacks and disillusion. Yet Symphony Hall was filled almost to the last seat. The audience listened intently eager, and its applause was quick and hearty. If we do these things for a "Wagner concert," would we not do as much and more for Wagner in his full and proper place, the theatre, and for opera in general? Last night we underscored the signs that we have been giving at every opportunity, the season through, of our liking for opera. They are so plain now that even Mr. Conreld might descry them afar off.

Orchestrally, however, it was Wagner such as neither the Metropolitan nor hardly any opera house in the world may give. Mr. Gericke and his men seemed to come to the music as eagerly as did the audience. It is an old story how Wagner gains in tonal beauty, in sheer musical power, in dramatic subtlety, when such a band and such a conductor plays his music. It is good to hear in absolute purity of tone the virginal quality of Senta's music in the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and in such tone to follow the light that pours from the Grail. It is good to hear a Wagnerian climax rise in instrumental as well as in emotional proportion, for the two are more closely united than some of the thrashing "Wagner conductors" guess. It is good as well to hear every upper and under strand in the instrumental webs that he weaves and each in the adroitest euphony with the rest. But there were more than these things in the orchestra's performance last night. They were the perfect means to Wagner's ends. They gave the beauty which conductor and band made instinct with the power. There have been times when Mr. Gericke seemed to take Wagner's sea music in the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" tamely. Last night it pitched and curled. The music of Venus and her train came like fiery beckonings through the fragment from "Tannhäuser." Siegfried mounted to Brünnhilde's rock more vividly through such tones than he does through all the steamy fire and gauzy mists of the stage. It was tonal splendor and not moving scenery that carried Parsifal and Gurnemanz into the hall of the Grail. The orchestra sung the fate of Tristan and Isolde and then made their passion leap and flame against it. For once it was not languorous as it is the fashion of many a conductor to make it in these days of slow pace. It was too hot for that and too heroic. Throughout the concert there was the union of entire surety and proportion of detail, and of the perfection of musical means, with largeness and intensity of feeling. Mr. Gericke united them in his "Wagner concert" last November. He fused and heightened them last night. Not once seemingly did his men fail him. Every impulse of the music touched them as with a spark. At moments we that listened heard the Wagner of our ideals—the Wagner that is not tingling neurotic sensation, but is the power and the beauty of sound made poignant because they are controlled. H. T. P.

In other places Mr. Wilhelm Gericke is saying farewell. His "farewell appearances" are genuine and his audiences seem to so understand them. Everywhere there is an extra warmth in the applause that greets him, and from every audience he receives a laurel wreath. Then there are other ways in which his admirers show how sorry they are that he is going, and he must, one would think, discover a little sadness of his own. Somehow we have always thought that Boston owned Mr. Gericke, that the other cities he visits could not have and hold him as we did, but they do, apparently, since they are taking these last appearances to heart very much as we shall when our turn comes to say good-by in earnest. Mch. 17, 1906

Mr. Gericke's last evening in New York as leader of the Symphony orchestra called out a generous recognition from the audience and a friendly farewell from Mr. Krehbiel. It was a gracious thing to cover his desk with laurel, while his exquisite sense of euphony and the virtuosoship of his musicians were duly honored. New York loves to make drives at Boston, but has always been nice to her own and only orchestra. Herald Mch. 17, 1906

SYMPHONY

(A)4t:

Tickets for Sale in all parts of the Hall, 40 State Street, Room 53, Telephone Main 4235-5.

THE PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The critic has altered the old Latin proverb to his purpose: "Speak nothing but good of the beneficent concert." Yet even were this saying not in force it would be difficult to say anything adverse regarding a Wagner programme given by our symphony men. They have been bred up to Wagner by each of their conductors, and Mr. Gericke has continued the Wagnerian cult which Henschel, Nikisch and Paur began. There was a time when Wagner was considered difficult, but now he is only a half-way house between Haydn and Strauss, or Mozart and Mahler.

The programme:— Adv. Apr 2 1906

Overture, "The Flying Dutchman."

Spinning Chorus and Ballade from Act II., "The Flying Dutchman."

Introduction and Prayer from Act III., "Tannhauser."

Selections from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods."

Grail Scene from Act I., "Parsifal."

Vorspiel and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde."

Mrs. Mary Hissem De Moss and the choruses of the Thursday Morning Club and the Apollo Club assisted. One can imagine the charm of the "Spinning Chorus" from the "Flying Dutchman" as given by our orchestra and the sweet voices of the Thursday Morning Club and the clear tones of Mrs. Hissem De Moss. Mrs. De Moss was at her best in this and in the prayer from "Tannhauser," in both of which the delicate quality of her voice was especially appropriate.

The Apollo Club were a magnificent chorus for the "Parsifal" selection. There was the greatest enthusiasm over "Parsifal," and Messrs. Daniles and Sargent did excellently in solos. In the "Flying Dutchman" Miss Lilla Ormonde was an excellent foil to Mrs. De Moss. The occasion was a decided success in every way. There was a very large audience present, large in spite of the fact that concert-goers might be jaded from a long season and an important orchestral concert for the benefit of our departing conductor, Mr. Gericke, had been announced for the immediate future. The whole occasion was the most signally successful of any of the pension fund concerts ever given in this city.

The Boston Post

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held last evening at Symphony Hall and proved a pleasing event in many ways. There was a gratifyingly large audience, which meant a goodly addition to the worthy cause, and it was also a farewell to Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, whose association with the orchestra will be severed at the close of the present season. Mr. Gericke will, of course, conduct at the remaining concerts, but last evening's affair was in the line of an adieu between the popular leader and his men.

Again the programme was composed exclusively of Wagnerian selections, and in addition to the orchestra there were Mrs. Hissem de Moss, Lilla Ormond, Sullivan Sargent and John F. Daniels as soloists, and the Thursday Morning and Apollo clubs, all of whom volunteered their services.

The overture and a scene from the second act of "The Flying Dutchman" opened the programme. The latter number included the spinning song and the "Legend," sung by Mrs. de Moss. The introduction and prayer in the third act of "Tannhauser" followed, and there were also selections from "Siegfried," "Götterdämmerung," the Grail scene from the first act of "Parsifal" and the Vorspiel and Liebestod of "Tristan and Isolde."

It was a pleasing programme throughout and one of the most delightful of any given at these concerts. Mr. Gericke received quite an ovation and led his forces with even more than his wonted skill and artistry.

Mrs. de Moss' voice, although of great purity, was scarcely of sufficient volume for the Senta song, but was heard to much better advantage in Elisabeth's prayer from "Tannhauser." The chorus was adequate and the work of the orchestra in the "Parsifal" number a positive delight.

PROGRAMME OF WAGNER OPERA

Mrs. Hissem de Moss Soloist at Symphony Orchestra's
Second Pension Fund Concert Last Night.

BOSTON SINGING CLUBS
ASSIST THE ORCHESTRA

One of Largest Audiences Applauds with Delight Unusual
Treat — Substantial Sum
Added to Fund.

Apr 2, 1906
The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, gave last night in Symphony Hall its second concert this season in aid of its pension fund. The orchestra was assisted by Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss, soprano; Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto; Mr. John F. Daniels, tenor; Mr. Sullivan A. Sargent, bass; the Thursday Morning Club and the Apollo Club. The programme was made up of excerpts from operas by Wagner, and it was as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Spinning Chorus and the ballad from the same opera; introduction to act III. of "Tannhauser" and Elisabeth's Prayer; selections from "Siegfried" and "Dusk of the Gods"; the Grail scene from act I. of "Parsifal," and the prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde."

There was a very large audience, the largest at the Pension Fund concerts with the exception of the one at which Mme. Melba sang. The programme of last night was a strong attraction, for excerpts from Wagner's music dramas are seldom given here in concert form with chorus and orchestra, and as Mr. Conried has passed Boston by this season in his stern displeasure, the citizen and citizenesses welcome operatic music in the paler form; hence the announcement of a performance of "Aida" later this month with the slave girl in her Sunday best and with Amonasro, the wild, barbaric king, in a claw-hammer coat of presumably faultless cut and lining.

Concerts in aid of a charity or a fund are by tradition exempt from discriminative criticism. The rule is wise and kindly. A singer and a player volunteer their services, and it surely is not a fitting occasion if they err musically to point out the precise extent of their wanderings or to comment on their general or special incapacity. Furthermore, a benefit is often a serious injury to the recipient, who is obliged to pay expenses that swell as though with ironical glee, so that the last state of that man is worse than the first.

Fortunately there was no necessity of chorus or orchestra last evening seeking refuge behind the cloak of charity. The singers had been carefully drilled by Mr. Gericke and they sang with care and taste; the orchestra displayed the characteristics that have made it famous and apart from other bands, inimitable euphony, the finest sense of proportion, virtuoso, technic and artistic enthusiasm. The local singers to whom solo parts were allotted contributed to the general success.

Mrs. de Moss sang the Ballad of the "Flying Dutchman" and Elisabeth's Prayer. The Ballad demands a more powerful and dramatic voice if it is to be sung as we are accustomed to hear it from German sopranos, i. e., with intense and constant vigor, and with little or no attention to pure intonation and other fundamental elements of song. Mme. Gadski, as Senta, was a noteworthy exception. Yet it hardly seems possible that Wagner intended this ballad to be sung throughout with a hoot and a whoop, as though the dreamy Senta were a robust member of the shrieking sisterhood. As a matter of fact, Wagner indicated with care the various dynamic expressions. But if Mrs. de Moss' voice is hardly of the right quality for the ballad, it is the voice for Elisabeth's prayer, which she sang with virginal simplicity and pure devotion. Her interpretation of this difficult page, difficult as sustained music, with an accompaniment that seems as though it were deliberately contrived to confuse a soprano's intonation, was a performance of rare beauty.

The audience was highly appreciative of the merits of the concert. It is a pleasure to know that the players will add a substantial sum to the fund that is of vital interest to them, a fund that should appeal to every admirer of their orchestra, for it is of much assistance in maintaining the esprit de corps that is indispensable to such an organization. Mr. Gericke, the orchestra and the singers that generously contributed their services are indeed to be congratulated.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Rarely is a more attractive program of excerpts from Wagner's operas and music dramas arranged than that which will be played by the Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening at the second Pension Fund concert. With the exception of the "Flying Dutchman" overture and the prelude and finale of "Tristan and Isolde" the selections are not often put on concert programs, and as Boston has had very little Wagner this winter since Mr. Conried has passed it by, this concert will be all the more welcome. "The Spinning Chorus," from the second act of "The Flying Dutchman," has been made possible through the generosity of the Thursday Morning Club in volunteering its services for the concert, and the same is true of the Grail scene from the first act of "Parsifal"—the more impressive of the two Grail scenes—for here the Apollo Club has given its services. In conjunction with "The Spinning Chorus" Mrs. Hissem de

236
Moss, who is the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts, will sing Senta's ballade. The introduction to the third act of "Tannhauser," followed by "Elizabeth's Prayer," which Mrs. de Moss will sing, will make another attractive and unusual number, for the introduction, which contains some of Wagner's biggest moments, is seldom found on a concert program. The selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" have been on Symphony programs from time to time.

WAGNERIAN PROGRAM.

George — Apr. 2, 1906
Apollo and Thursday Morning Clubs
Assist in Music Seldom Heard
Outside Grand Opera.

The pension fund concert, which has now come to be an eagerly anticipated feature of Boston's musical season, this time took the form of a Wagnerian festival, and had anyone any vestige of doubt about the vigor or earnestness of the cult here, such questioning must have been definitely silenced in the face of last night's splendid audience.

True, many came partly to testify to the sterling worth of the orchestra and its leader, but there was undoubtedly a generous showing of those who were also out because it was Wagner night. These latter had a superb treat. For breadth and dignity—for exemplification of those qualities which show interpretation and keen, scholarly insight to massive themes often bordering upon mysticism—this concert has not had an equal in recent years. Masterly adequateness was as much as any other one thing the keynote of the event; and it will be remembered prominently among the many commendable things about the second regime of Wilhelm Gericke.

"The best there is!" Boston dearly loves the phrase, applied to any of its artistic possessions, transient or permanent. Herr Conreid may give it the cold shoulder in grand opera for a time, but it has still "the finest" in the realm of orchestral music. How great is the degree of its indebtedness to the 13 years of splendid endeavor on the part of conductor Gericke future annalists will willingly testify. Weingartner of Berlin, Nikisch of Leipzig, Steinbach of Meiningen, Mahler of Vienna or any other talked of eligible for the maestro's place will find an organization as nearly perfect as any; which was far from true when Mr Gericke began with it. This labor, when one pauses to think of it, has been little short of appalling. And through it all there has been the commendable catholicity which not only gave a hearing to every recognized school of composition, but which had the calibre of real genius.

The famous overture to "The Flying Dutchman" opened the program, and hearers were still under the spell of its beauty when the superb "Spinning Chorus" from the second act of the opera was begun. The women of the Thursday Morning club sang it delightfully, but it was particularly noteworthy for the introduction of narrative sentences by "Mary," sung with uncommon clearness and power by Miss Lilla Ormonde. The distinctness and intelligence displayed not only in this number, but in her very brief phrase for contralto in the "Parsifal" selection which followed, was a most commendation. It is not given to every one to make a few short tonal paragraphs so conspicuously successful. Mrs. Hissem de Moss sang with excellent effectiveness the story by "Senta" of a storm at sea and the sailor who was compelled, like "the wandering Jew," to keep on forever. She sang with equal approval the prayer of Elizabeth from the third act of "Tannhauser," her voice, like Miss Ormonde's, being fully equal to the requirements of so great a hall. The climax of the beautiful tone picture of maidenly devotion was distinctly memorable.

The assistance by the Apollo club was, of course, adequate, the attack and maintenance of volume in the "Knights of the Grail" chorus being given with Mollenhauer-like fidelity. The parts for boys' voices were here taken by the female chorus, and in this instance also the effect, with orchestral suggestions of harp and chime, was most effective. The reading given by Mr Gericke and his players to the lovely prelude from "Tristan," first given in Boston by the Thomas orchestra in 1873, was full of poetic and reverent power. The beautiful legend took on new meanings under such conducting, as it always will.

John F. Daniels and Sullivan A. Sargent took the male voice solo parts in the "Parsifal" selection.

The program was the second exclusively Wagnerian effort this season by the symphony orchestra. The audience was large and appreciative, and substantial financial aid to a most deserving cause must have been the result. The benefit concert to Mr Gericke, one of the few remaining opportunities Boston will have for a long while to testify to the public appreciation of his great work in giving the city its present musical status, is announced for Tuesday evening, April 24.

SUNDAY HERALD

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

A Wagner programme played by the Boston Symphony orchestra is always sure to attract a large audience to Symphony Hall, and this in its connection with the second pension fund concert, which will be given on Sunday evening, April 1, will undoubtedly fill the house to overflowing. This will be Mr. Gericke's last pension fund concert. The orchestra will have the assistance of the Thursday Morning and Apollo clubs, and of Mrs. Hissem de Moss, soprano, and Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto. The purely orchestral numbers will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," and the introduction and "Love's Death" from "Tristan and Isolde." Mrs. Hissem de Moss, with the Thursday Morning Club, will sing the spinning chorus and ballade from "The Flying Dutchman" (act 2), and the Apollo Club will sing in the grail scene (act 1) of "Parsifal." The sale of seats will begin at Symphony Hall on Friday, March 23. Mail orders should be addressed to Mr. C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 7, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |                 |  |
|-----------------|--|
| MAX SCHILLINGS. | PRELUDE to Act III., of "The Piper's Holiday."(First time.)  |
| GOLDMARK.       | CONCERTO in A minor for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA,op. 28.I. Allegro moderato.II. Air: Andante.III. Moderato: Allegretto.                              |
| CESAR FRANCK.   | TWO MOVEMENTS from "PSYCHE."III. The Gardens of Cupid. (First time.)IV. Psyche and Cupid.  |
| SCHUMANN.       | SYMPHONY No. 4, in D minor, op. 120.I. Ziemlich langsam. Lebhaft.II. Romanze: ziemlich langsam.III. Scherzo: lebhaft. Trio.IV. Langsam. Lebhaft. |

Soloist:

Mr. JACQUES HOFFMANN.

SPECIAL NOTICE. Because of Good Friday, the next Public Rehearsal will be on Thursday afternoon, April 12.

Moss, who is the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts, will sing Senta's ballade. The introduction to the third act of "Tannhauser," followed by "Elizabeth's Prayer," which Mrs. de Moss will sing, will make another attractive and unusual number, for the introduction, which contains some of Wagner's biggest moments, is seldom found on a concert program. The selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" have been on Symphony programs from time to time.

WAGNERIAN PROGRAM.

George
Apollo and Thursday Morning Clubs
Assist in Music Seldom Heard
Outside Grand Opera.

The pension fund concert, which has now come to be an eagerly anticipated feature of Boston's musical season, this time took the form of a Wagnerian festival, and had anyone any vestige of doubt about the vigor or earnestness of the cult here, such questioning must have been definitely silenced in the face of last night's splendid audience.

True, many came partly to testify to the sterling worth of the orchestra and its leader, but there was undoubtedly a generous showing of those who were also out because it was Wagner night. These latter had a superb treat. For breadth and dignity—for exemplification of those qualities which show interpretation and keen, scholarly insight to massive themes often bordering upon mysticism—this concert has not had an equal in recent years. Masterly adequateness was as much as any other one thing the keynote of the event; and it will be remembered prominently among the many commendable things about the second regime of Wilhelm Gericke.

"The best there is!" Boston dearly loves the phrase, applied to any of its artistic possessions, transient or permanent. Herr Conreid may give it the cold shoulder in grand opera for a time, but it has still "the finest" in the realm of orchestral music. How great is the degree of its indebtedness to the 13 years of splendid endeavor on the part of conductor Gericke future annalists will willingly testify. Weingartner of Berlin, Nikisch of Leipzig, Steinbach of Meiningen, Mahler of Vienna or any other talked of eligible for the maestro's place will find an organization as nearly perfect as any; which was far from true when Mr Gericke began with it. This labor, when one pauses to think of it, has been little short of appalling. And through it all there has been the commendable catholicity which not only gave a hearing to every recognized school of composition, but which had the calibre of real genius.

The famous overture to "The Flying Dutchman" opened the program, and hearers were still under the spell of its beauty when the superb "Spinning Chorus" from the second act of the opera was begun. The women of the Thursday Morning club sang it delightfully, but it was particularly noteworthy for the introduction of narrative sentences by "Mary," sung with uncommon clearness and power by Miss Lilla Ormonde. The distinctness and intelligence displayed not only in this number, but in her very brief phrase for contralto in the "Parsifal" selection which followed were worthy of especial commendation. It is not given to every one to make a few short tonal paragraphs so conspicuously successful. Mrs Hissem De Moss sang with excellent effectiveness the story by "Senta" of a storm at sea and the sailor who was compelled, like "the wandering Jew," to keep on forever. She sang with equal approval the prayer of Elizabeth from the third act of "Tannhauser," her voice, like Miss Ormonde's, being fully equal to the requirements of so great a hall. The climax of the beautiful tone picture of maidenly devotion was distinctly memorable.

The assistance by the Apollo club was, of course, adequate, the attack and maintenance of volume in the "Knights of the Grail" chorus being given with Mollenhauer-like fidelity. The parts for boys' voices were here taken by the female chorus, and in this instance also the effect, with orchestral suggestions of harp and chime, was most effective. The reading given by Mr Gericke and his players to the lovely prelude from "Tristan," first given in Boston by the Thomas orchestra in 1873, was full of poetic and reverent power. The beautiful legend took on new meanings under such conducting, as it always will.

John F. Daniels and Sullivan A. Sargent took the male voice solo parts in the "Parsifal" selection.

The program was the second exclusively Wagnerian effort this season by the symphony orchestra. The audience was large and appreciative, and substantial financial aid to a most deserving cause must have been the result. The benefit concert to Mr Gericke, one of the few remaining opportunities Boston will have for a long while to testify to the public appreciation of his great work in giving the city its present musical status, is announced for Tuesday evening, April 24.

SUNDAY HERALD

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

A Wagner programme played by the Boston Symphony orchestra is always sure to attract a large audience to Symphony Hall, and this in its connection with the second pension fund concert, which will be given on Sunday evening, April 1, will undoubtedly fill the house to overflowing. This will be Mr. Gericke's last pension fund concert. The orchestra will have the assistance of the Thursday Morning and Apollo clubs, and of Mrs. Hissem de Moss, soprano, and Miss Lilla Ormond, contralto. The purely orchestral numbers will be the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," and the introduction and "Love's Death" from "Tristan and Isolde." Mrs. Hissem de Moss, with the Thursday Morning Club, will sing the spinning chorus and ballade from "The Flying Dutchman" (act 2), and the Apollo Club will sing in the grail scene (act 1) of "Parsifal." The sale of seats will begin at Symphony Hall on Friday, March 23. Mail orders should be addressed to Mr. C. A. Ellis, Symphony Hall.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 7, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- |                 |  |
|-----------------|--|
| MAX SCHILLINGS. | PRELUDE to Act III., of "The Piper's Holiday."(First time.)  |
| GOLDMARK.       | CONCERTO in A minor for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA,op. 28.I. Allegro moderato.II. Air: Andante.III. Moderato: Allegretto.                              |
| CESAR FRANCK.   | TWO MOVEMENTS from "PSYCHE."III. The Gardens of Cupid. (First time.)IV. Psyche and Cupid.  |
| SCHUMANN.       | SYMPHONY No. 4, in D minor, op. 120.I. Ziemlich langsam. Lebhaft.II. Romanze: ziemlich langsam.III. Scherzo: lebhaft. Trio.IV. Langsam. Lebhaft. |

Soloist:

Mr. JACQUES HOFFMANN.

SPECIAL NOTICE. Because of Good Friday, the next Public Rehearsal will be on Thursday afternoon, April 12.

Concertos and Other Things at the Symphony Concert Apr. 9, 1906

Goldmark's concerto for violin, which Mr. Hoffmann played at the Symphony concert on Saturday, needs the transfiguring and the animating power of a great violinist. It is monotonous in tonal color; it meanders and meanders and meanders. Not until the final movement does Goldmark once strike fire and then only in rare and fitful flashes. It is such a respectful concerto—respectful to the form, the instrument, and the orchestra. Mr. Hoffmann and Mr. Gericke played it as respectfully. The conductor wove Goldmark's orchestral background with minute and delicate care. There was not a loose or a rough thread in it. Mr. Hoffmann's clear, light, supple tone ran like a brighter strand across the web. At the end everyone concerned had done his full duty. Goldmark had written a concerto for violin as a composer ought to do. Mr. Hoffmann had played it with nice skill and received rewarding applause. Mr. Gericke and the orchestra had been polished discretion themselves, and the conductor loves his Goldmark. Nothing was lacking except the genuinely creative touch in the writing, the playing and the accompaniment. Outside of the classic concertos it seems more and more infrequent. The form is in eclipse. The composers of our own time take their exercise in it—it is a tradition of the art; the virtuosi ply their skill in it—they must be fed if they are not nourished; and sensitive listeners wonder why they are not as much interested as they ought to be. It is the fault of nobody in particular. It is the accident of the hour. Some day there will be composers again to whom the concerto will be a spontaneous and compelling form of expression. They will have something to say in it and say it impressively. They will reanimate the form and fill it freely. The virtuosi, who are as hungry as the rest of us for such concertos, will rise to the composers' hands, and we audiences will have the reward of all our dutiful listening. It is the way of musical forms when they seem dryest. Was there not just a hint and a forerunner of this rejuvenated, emancipated concerto in Mr. Dalcroze's that Marteau played last month?

On this very programme, though in another direction, there was such a sign of the times. Everyone knows the easy fashion of dealing with the less-known or the younger German composers. This one is "imitation Wagner"—longo intervallo. That one is heady with the new and highly fermentive wine of Richard Strauss. Often they have brought the fate upon themselves. The omniscient shook their heads when the introduction to an act of Schillings's opera, "The Pipers' Holiday," stood at the beginning of the concert. How short of new overtures or of anything like them Mr. Gericke must be, they said wisely. And lo! even out of its place in the opera—and it is clearly music of the scenes that have passed and of the scenes that are to come—Schillings's prelude had interest, individuality and imagination. It was eloquent music in itself; with a clew or two from the opera it became pictorial. It strode to climax and the progressions were Schillings's, not Wagner's. Here and there it followed a simple way and walked sure-footedly and unashamed.

Mr. Gericke lavished his finesse and euphony upon Goldmark's concerto. He was as responsive as he was lucid in Schillings's prelude. He touched Schumann's fourth symphony with the re-creating fire that he always brings to that composer's music. Schumann must be the conductor's own romancer. He finds his intent, he grasps it, he proclaims it where Schumann himself, under any other leader, seems to halt or stumble. But poor Franck and the two fragments of his "Psyche" paid the price or bore the penalty for all these excellences. There were signs enough on Friday afternoon that Mr. Gericke was quickening the pace and overaccenting it until the long, gentle, tremulous sweep of the music was in jeopardy. It was as a wave of ecstatic sound that never breaks, but spreads itself wider and deeper with its own ecstasy. By Saturday evening Mr. Gericke had turned it into a choppy and rather strident sea. The tenderness and the tremor of it were gone. In Paris, where there is something like a Franck tradition they do not play it so. They follow the plain intent, as it seems to us, of the score.

H. T. P.

JACQUES HOFFMANN,
VIOLINIST

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Apr. 9, 06

Max Schillings—Prelude to Act III. of "The Piper's Holiday."
Goldmark—A minor Concerto for Violin.
Soloist, Mr. Jacques Hoffmann.
Cesar Franck—Two Movements from "Psyche."
Schumann—Symphony in D minor.

240
It was a modern programme presenting two kinds of modernity. The work by Schillings was of one kind, those by Goldmark and Franck of another. The first point that impressed the auditor in the Piper's Prelude was the powerful orchestration. The world has progressed marvelously in this field in 50 years. A half century ago a Berlioz was a marvel; to-day we have a score of composers who can handle the orchestra as well or better than he did.

But many of these Schillings are bad pennies when it comes to melody. And all of this type of modern composers have a cuttle-fish habit of darkening the musical waters by great complexities and technical difficulties when their ideas run short. How long the brasses can stand this pace we do not know. One would think their lips pretty well blown off by this time.

Like most of the ultra-moderns, Schillings does not know when he has ended, but goes on for some time longer. Everybody knows the type of after-dinner speaker who has no ideas to express. How he rambles on and on in the hope that by some miracle he will stumble upon something by and by! But he never does, and he generally sits down at the weakest point of his speech. Thus it is with many a modern composer. Let no one suppose that we are of "the good-old-times" order of fossils, for we hold many works of Wagner and some of Richard Strauss among the greatest of musical achievements, but we certainly condemn the chromo reproductions of their striving imitators.

Schillings' introduction of the new instrument, the violetta (substituted by viola or cello almost everywhere) reminds us how many attempts have been made to invent an instrument between the viola and the violoncello. Bach invented the Viola Pomposa, which became obsolete; Ritter brought forth the "Ritter Viola," which could not come into use until men became of giant stature, and now Dr. Alfred Stelzner tries his hand at the violetta which will follow its predecessors down the path of obsolescence.

Yet the days of new instruments are not yet past. Besson's Pedal Clarinette may stand, and Massenet once spoke to the present writer of the chances of inventing deeper flutes, particularly a bass flute which should stand with the deeper clarinettes or the bassoon, yet have a totally different tone-color.

Goldmark's violin concerto is not a very grateful work for the soloist and lacks that sensuous glow which pervades much of that composer's music. The strict classical form does not sit easily upon Goldmark and in spite of the fugal touches by which he proves his contrapuntal knowledge there is more of attempt than achievement in this concerto. It ends showily enough with something that suggests Lalo and Boleros, but the work as a whole intimates less of inspiration than of padding.

But Mr. Hoffmann played it in such a renable manner that there was much applause, which we imagine was meant rather for the artist than for the concerto. In the first movement his bowing was broad and his intonation in the difficult high positions remarkably pure. In his cadenza in the finale he gave a splendid exhibition of double-stopping without a suspicion of a flaw or inequality. He was recalled twice with abundant enthusiasm and certainly deserved the tribute.

The two movements from Cesar Franck's "Psyche" were noble music nobly played. Especially was the second, "Psyche and Cupid," a fine example of figure development. Some of Franck's pupils are developing figures with assiduous pedantry, but their teacher was able, like Beethoven, to demonstrate the poetry of such evolutions.

Franck knew what he wanted to do, when he was composing, and also knew how to achieve the end which he had in view. As a consequence he is not rambling and never diffuse. His disciples are generally both; they laboriously thresh out their figures without obtaining much grain. Each of these chickens, hatched out by the eagle, imagined that—

"These growing feathers, plucked from Cesar's wing, will make him fly an ordinary pitch."

Therefore just as Wagner has left a legacy of evil to music, Cesar Franck is responsible for a considerable amount of posthumous boredom.

In spite of the undeniable power of the last movement of this work one must confess that it does not speak the language of burning passion as Wagner could have voiced it. If there had only been a little streak of Bizet in Franck!

Schumann's symphony was by far the greatest music of this concert. Liszt once characterized Schumann as "The greatest music-thinker since Beethoven," but for a long time he stood in advance of his public. Now the public seem to have grown up to him and to appreciate him as never before. It was a great delight to have the symphony given continuously, as the composer desired, and not one of the audience interrupted by any applause at the end of the first three movements.

But at the close there was an enthusiasm refreshing to see. Yet all of the preceding works of the programme had been far greater in orchestration than this symphony. But in sweetness of melody, in poetry of musical thought, they paled before this older work. And how effective the syncopations seemed (Schumann was the master of syncopation) compared with the latter-day rickets! Only the finale seemed to have faded a little, for here the more modern and more sumptuous orchestration would have been an advantage.

But such a symphony may still teach the lesson that beauty of musical thought outweighs the most skillful technique.

Louis C. Elson.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

FRANK — 4/27.06 CESAR FRANCK'S "PSYCHE" AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Intimately Characteristic Music of the Finest Purpose—Mr. de Gogorza's Song Recital—Liszt's "Faust" Symphony for Next Week—Marteau's Recital—Other Concerts to Come—Musical News

"The day when Franck's pure soul, amorous of beauty, sang Psyche, the chosen one of the sensual Eros, it perhaps sang itself," said Mr. Jean Marnold at the dedication of a statue of the composer two years ago in Paris. Yesterday, when Mr. Gericke played two excerpts from that same "Psyche," it seemed the most intimately characteristic and expressive of all Franck's music that has found a place in our Symphony concerts. Originally Franck wrote the tone-poem for orchestra and a choir "of invisible beings" that sing in few words at some turning point in the mystical drama, and it was so performed before his death. Ten years afterwards four fragments of it were republished as an orchestral suite, with the one choral song in them omitted. It begins with "the slumber of Psyche." Then "the Zephyrs bear her to the gardens of Eros." The third movement takes title from those gardens, and the fourth, "Psyche and Eros," hymns the happiness of the lovers. Last December our orchestra, with Mr. d'Indy conducting, played the final fragment for the first time. Yesterday Mr. Gericke repeated it, and played the third excerpt, "The Garden of Eros," as well. The use of a choir makes the whole tone-poem impracticable at our concerts, though music by Franck may reasonably deserve a hearing in its entirety, but it was a pity not to play the four orchestral fragments. Mystery hovers through the prelude of Psyche's sleep—faint, shadowy, evanescent suggestion. The undulating breath of the Zephyrs in the second fragment has very delicate tonal imagination. But the whole suite, and, still more, the whole tone-poem, is long, and the pervading ecstatic mood and the persistently tremulous instrumental coloring become monotonous. To hear the two excerpts of yesterday by themselves is, perhaps, to hear Franck's music most sensitively.

Franck has in no wise sought to translate the classic legend into tones. Some day it may appeal to some composer—perhaps there have been ventures at it already—and we shall hear, or be asked to hear, the jealous rage of Venus, the tortures of Psyche, the passion that wakes in her as she lifts the lamp above the sleeping Eros, and all the rest. Franck has barely caught an idea here and there from the old myth, and labels for the divisions of his tone-poem. The rest, and it is nearly the whole of his music, is the prompting of his own soul. The passion is the passion for beauty, the longing is the pursuit of the ideal, the rapture is the solemn joy and the high ecstasy of its attainment. Thereafter in the omitted parts comes the fading of the vision and its return. For us, who listen to the two excerpts, the "gardens of Eros" are the abode of that ideal beauty, and the love of Psyche and Eros is the delight of it. Throughout, the music is summoning the intangible and spiritual things that no other art may allure so poignantly. It is exquisitely delicate and sensitive music. The melodies rise and fall, enlase and separate in gentle and tremulous undulations. The modulations are of a subtle and almost impalpable fineness. The instrumental coloring shimmers as with a clear remote light.

241

Others have sought to command beauty, to attain it by earnest striving, to seize and hold their ideal. So Schumann seems to be laboring in his symphony that ended the concert. Franck's spirit was too gentle to command the beauty that it sought. He would woo it to him and to his music, as the soul of his Psyche sought the soul of his Eros. His ideal should come for the eager tenderness of his pursuit. He would enter into its house all trembling expectancy, as Psyche comes into the gardens of Eros, and for the moment the brightness should caress him. Then should come the pure ecstasy of attainment, the exquisitely penetrating delight of beauty face to face; of longing, hesitating at the moment when it touches the ideal it seeks, and last the solemn joy of it all.

Of such in Franck's tones is the music that labels and analysts call the happiness of Psyche and Eros. It is the music of dreams and visions of the beauty that hovered before Franck's imagination. He had contemplated it so long, he had pursued it so eagerly and tenderly, that at last he could put the reflection of it into his tones. No wonder that reflection takes musical form in evanescent melodies, subtle cadences and sensitive modulations. To touch it with more than the fingertips were to dull and blur it, till it fade and vanish. And yet there was the glow of it, and the calm rapture of it. They, too, are in Franck's music of this Psyche and Eros, that mask so thinly the quest of ideal beauty. Purer, loftier music it would be hard to imagine. It is the music of disembodied things made poignant, of impalpable things made real. It invokes not the passion of Eros and Psyche, but the spiritual ardor of the ideal. Other composers are making music summon and picture material things or burn hot with specific emotions and sharply outlined moods. There are other arts that serve the first purpose better, and they may share as well in the second. Franck—and that is the deepest source of his power—held music to the immaterial essences and to the spiritual passions that it can fathom and express as can no other art. In none of his music does the bond seem closer or the expression more searching than in these fragments of "Psyche." As Mr. Marnold said, "his spirit sang itself," and yesterday it had the shimmer and the euphony of the string choir of our orchestra and the limpid beauty of tone in our woodwinds for its song. Our band and our conductor can be precision itself when the music demands. In Franck's they melted into his grace. Until Monday the rest of the concert may wait upon the memory of it.

H. T. P.

APRIL 9, 1906.

SYMPHONY GIVES TWO MUSICAL NOVELTIES

Schilling's Prelude and Franck's "Psyche" Played for First Time Here—Hoffmann the Artist in Goldmark's Concerto.

The twenty-first Symphony concert began with a novelty from a man who is just now one of the famed apostles of "new Germany" in music, the prelude to Act III. of Max Schilling's "The Piper's Holiday." It is pleasant and piquant writing, heavily, yet not murkily orchestrated and rather more spontaneous than most of the work from the men who are now trying to uphold and perpetuate Teutonic art. Given some inkling as to the story of the opera, and it is easy to find in this prelude effective tone-pictures of the events that are to come. Melody is not scorned and simple, beautiful harmony is often given to ears that now and then weary of colossal effects and the "big noise." The work was played with extraordinary loveliness in every respect.

Jacques Hoffmann, the well-known teacher and member of the orchestra, was the soloist, choosing Goldmark's violin concerto in A minor, a graceful and poetic composition in the field where good things are none too plenty. Mr. Hoffmann's clear and flawless technique, his refined style and his artistic feeling were admirably adapted to the concerto and his success was undoubted. The player never sacrificed beauty to a striving after large effects, which, after all, are not specially demanded by the work.

Another novelty was furnished in the shape of "The Gardens of Cupid," one of the four movements of Cesar Franck's "Psyche." This is romantic music with the tinge of that asceticism that is never wholly absent from the great Frenchman's style. It glows with subdued color, so to speak, and suggests passion always tempered with nobility. It was played with richness of tone and technical perfection, and yet Mr. Gericke did not seem wholly at home in it, for it did not make quite the impression that had been expected of it. The other excerpt, "Psyche and Cupid," has been heard here before.

After all that had gone before, Schumann's exquisite tonal poem, the Symphony in D minor, seemed more enchanting than ever. Here is, if anywhere in the world, deathless music. The still fresh and lovely melody is as fascinating as ever, the variety of inspiration and form as marvelous and the romantic spirit of it all as compelling as the quality of any symphony of any age or time. The performance, while perhaps lacking a little of the abandon that might have been given to it, was nevertheless a thing of pure delight.

SYMPHONY IN FITCHBURG.

Jacques Hoffman Soloist at Concert of Boston Orchestra Arranged by Smith College Club.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

FITCHBURG, April 5, 1906. In City Hall tonight the Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert under the auspices of the Smith College Club. The young ladies who are graduates of Smith took up this concert as their annual spring event and soon after the announcement the entire seating capacity of the hall was sold—fully 1000 seats. Members of the club acted as ushers.

The programme was: Overture to "Der Freischuetz," Weber; concerto in E minor for violin, op. 64, Goldmark; Theme and variations from suite No. 3 in G minor, Tchaikovsky; symphony No. 5 in C minor, op. 67, Beethoven.

The soloist was Jacques Hoffman, who will play in the rehearsal and concert in Boston Friday and Saturday.

ROOSEVELT FAMILY HEAR BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Washington, March 13.—President and Mrs. Roosevelt and Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth today attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater.

SYMPHONY HEARD IN NEW NUMBERS

A Prelude by Max Schillings and Cesar Franck's "Gardens of Cupid" Heard Here for the First Time.

SCHUMANN SYMPHONY GIVES MUCH PLEASURE

Mr. Jacques Hoffmann, Solo Violinist, Gave a Careful and Polished Performance of Goldmark's Work.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, gave its 21st concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Jacques Hoffmann was the solo violinist. The programme was as follows:

Prelude to act 3 of "The Piper's Holiday" Schillings Concerto for violin.....Goldmark
"Cupid's Gardens" and "Psyche and Cupid," from "Psyche".....Franck
Symphony in D minor.....Schumann

The prelude to act III. of Schillings' opera was performed here for the first time, but the composer's name is not unknown to the Symphony audience. The prelude to act II. of his "Ingwelde" was performed here nearly 10 years ago, and his prologue to Sophocles' "Oedipus Rex" was played at a symphony concert early in the spring of 1902. These pieces did not commend the composer to us. The "Ingwelde" prelude heard without any reference to what had preceded in the opera, heard as purely absolute music, was a fair example of the "Kapellmeister Musik," industriously manufactured by the followers of Wagner. The prologue to Sophocles' masterpiece did not breathe the spirit of the antique. There was neither classic intensity, frozen passion, nor modern tragic fury and despair. Even the introduction of a gong did not save this music.

When Mr. Bispham was engaged to sing at a recent Symphony concert, he wished to recite Ernst von Wildenbruch's ballad, "The Witch's Song," to the accompaniment of Schillings' melodramatic music, but Mr. Gericke made reasonable objection. No doubt he had heard and seen Mr. Bispham reading

"Enoch Arden" to Richard Strauss' music.

The prelude played last night contains thematic material that has been used in the preceding acts and will be used in the third act; but it may be judged fairly as music without any thought or knowledge of the opera itself. Nor did the absence of a violotta probably make a material difference in the general effect of the prelude. The music is entitled "The Minstrel's Joy and Woe." There is an attempt to characterize in tones the career of a mediaeval piper, to sum up his life as in a discriminative funeral oration.

This prelude has more interest and general significance than have the other pieces of the composer that have been played here. The themes have more individuality and substance, the developments are more eloquent, there is a warmer, more poetic expression. The opening section is picturesque with its suggestion of the mediaeval piper; the climax of the middle section is well worked up, and the close is effective by reason of its shifting modes and true simplicity. All in all, this prelude, which was well played, is one of the most favorable examples of the ultra-modern German school that we have heard.

Mr. Henri Marteau, the violinist, a Frenchman by birth and musical education, spoke slightly some weeks ago of the music of his own land. He said in a fine burst that Germany is today the centre of music. "When I go to Paris I do not spend any time at the Opera or at the Opera-Comique or in any music there. I see my friends, I talk of literature or politics. That is all." Claude Debussy, Gabriel Faure, Vincent d'Indy do not exist. Mr. Marteau finds true music only in Germany. Let us leave Richard Strauss out of the question, for the fiercest dispute over his talent or genius is in Germany. There is Reger, Mr. Max Reger, an exceedingly industrious person who counts that day lost on which he has not begun and completed an important work. Mr. Reger who lately announced his intention of rewriting much of Bach's music.

There is von Hausegger; there is young Mr. Boehe who has endeavored to put "the surge and thunder of the Odyssey" into music. There is Klose, of whom we know nothing; there are Siegfried, Wagner, d'Albert, Roessler, Humperdineck, Busoni, a German by adoption, and other earnest men of pith of whom we know too much. Then there is Schillings, who is ranked among the leading German composers of today. Does Mr. Marteau contend seriously that these men, however well trained musicians they may be, are to be compared for a moment with the Frenchmen just named for originality and subtlety of thought, for poetic fancy or high imagination?

It is a pity that Mr. Gericke did not see his way clear to produce Cesar Franck's whole suite taken from his "Psyche" music. "Psyche and Cupid" was first played here at the concert led by Mr. d'Indy. "The Sleep of Psyche" was played last month at a concert of the New England Conservatory. Last night "Psyche and Cupid" was repeated and "The Gardens of Cupid" was played for the first time. The latter has much charm, but its character resembles so closely the movement "Psyche and Cupid" that either one of the other two movements would have formed a more striking contrast. When the whole suite is well serve as a rounded step in the crescendo of passion.

Mr. Gericke took "Psyche and Cupid" at a faster pace than is suggested either by the composer's indication or by the character and treatment of the themes. The reading was injurious to the effect of the music, for there was no longer the long sweep of the phrases constantly rising in majestic intensity, and there was no time for the full expression of the noble sensuousness and ecstatic passion. The nervous, feverish spirit due to the undue speed was not in keeping with the spirit of Franck's lovers, and this movement, one of the most eloquent and at the same time serenely majestic pages in the literature of music, lost sadly in beauty and grandeur.

Mr. Hoffmann played for the first time as a soloist at these concerts. Goldmark's concerto needs an interpreter of strong individuality if the attention of the hearer is to be fastened and riveted. Mr. Hoffmann gave a careful, smooth and polished performance that was highly respectable, but never engrossing, never appealing. He was warmly applauded.

It was a pleasure to hear Schumann's symphony again. It is the one of the four that is most romantic and dramatic. The tender beauty of the romance and the melancholy grace of the trio in the scherzo will not soon fade away. We should have liked more dramatic fervor in the first movement and a little more elasticity in the trio, which is an expression of the thought of days that are no more—an expression the more singular for the music was composed when Schumann was peculiarly happy.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Globe
Apr. 8, 06
Jacques Hoffmann,
Symphony Soloist.

Handel and Haydn Concert—
Mr Gericke's Benefit.

Recitals and Concerts of
the Current Week.

Mr Jacques Hoffman, the soloist at last week's Symphony rehearsal and concert, has been prominent in the musical life of Boston for the past 15 years, having joined the orchestra in 1890. Since 1892 he has been the leader of the orchestra. For his debut as a soloist with the Symphony orchestra he selected Goldmark's A minor concerto for violin and orchestra. The other program numbers were the prelude to the third act of "The Pipers' Holiday," by Max Schillings; two movements from Cesar Franck's "Psyche," and Schumann's fourth symphony. The scheme of the Schillings opera relates to a "joke" by a minstrel who feigns death in order to win the hand of his lady love and to abolish a tax levied by her father on the guild of pipers. The minstrel is supposed to be killed in a storm, but comes to life at the touch of his sweetheart's hand. The ruse is successful and "all ends happily." It is very clever descriptive music, the contrasting episodes in the story giving opportunities for suggestions which make the musical picture easily understood. The opening, which indicates the grief of friends for the death of the minstrel, was played with splendid dignity by the heavier instruments.

The tender motif by the solo violin and violas and the wood-winds in the mournful phrases gave a somber color of great effectiveness, soon relieved, though, by the sprightly measures given the horns and lighter strings. The alternations of joy and grief, doubt and happy anticipations are admirably shown in the instrumentation, and each phase was vividly illustrated under Mr Gericke's guidance.

Mr Hoffman played the difficult Goldmark concerto in a way to win him prompt recognition as a violinist of great technical skill, whose tone, though not very large, was pure, and who impressed an auditor very favorably by reason of the absence of mannerisms and by the serious and conscientious style of his performance. The long first movement, though physically taxing, was admirably played throughout, the several brilliant episodic passages being managed deftly and easily by the soloist. In the canonical form of the second part Mr Hoffman's legato was beautifully sustained, and the unaccompanied cadenza in the closing movement also deserves commendatory mention. His associates provided adequate accompaniment to Mr Hoffman's work, which was received with favor by the audience.

The excerpts from Franck's "Psyche," two dainty little love episodes between Psyche and Cupid, were fantastic bits, charming in orchestral treatment and equally delightful in interpretation. The first one, "Gardens of Cupid," was played for the first time here. The Schillings prelude also was a novelty at these concerts. Schumann's grand symphony, the four movements played without a break, was given with splendid effect.

Next Friday being Good Friday, according to the custom of past years, the public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra will be moved forward one day and given Thursday afternoon, the concert taking place as usual Saturday evening. The season will be commemorated by the performance of the "Good Friday Spell" from the third act of "Parsifal." There will be two soloists, and in one number, the opening one, the orchestra will take no part. Mr Wallace Goodrich, the organist, will play Bach's Toccata in F major. The other soloist will be Mr Ben Davies, who will sing "Through the Woods."

from Weber's "Der Freischütz," and "Onaway! Awake!" from Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha." The Faust symphony by Liszt will close the program.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 14, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BACH.	TOCCATA in F major, for ORGAN.
WEBER.	ARIA, "Through the Forests," from Act I of "Der Freischütz."
WAGNER.	"Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal."
COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.	"Onaway! Awake, Beloved" from "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast."
LISZT.	A FAUST SYMPHONY in C minor.
	I. FAUST: Lento assai: Allegro impetuoso—Allegro agitato ed appassionato assai.
	II. GRETCHEN: Andante soave.
	III. MEPHISTOPHELES: Allegro vivace ironico.

Soloists:

Mr. BEN DAVIES,

Mr. WALLACE GOODRICH.

played "The Gardens of Cupid" may well serve as a decided step in the crescendo of passion.

Mr. Gericke took "Psyche and Cupid" at a faster pace than is suggested either by the composer's indication or by the character and treatment of the themes. The reading was injurious to the effect of the music, for there was no longer the long sweep of the phrases constantly rising in majestic intensity, and there was no time for the full expression of the noble sensuousness and ecstatic passion. The nervous, feverish spirit due to the undue speed was not in keeping with the spirit of Franck's lovers, and this movement, one of the most eloquent and at the same time serenely majestic pages in the literature of music, lost sadly in beauty and grandeur.

Mr. Hoffmann played for the first time as a soloist at these concerts. Goldmark's concerto needs an interpreter of strong individuality if the attention of the hearer is to be fastened and riveted. Mr. Hoffmann gave a careful, smooth and polished performance that was highly respectable, but never engrossing, never appealing. He was warmly applauded.

It was a pleasure to hear Schumann's symphony again. It is the one of the four that is most romantic and dramatic. The tender beauty of the romance and the melancholy grace of the trio in the scherzo will not soon fade away. We should have liked more dramatic fervor in the first movement and a little more elasticity in the trio, which is an expression of the thought of days that are no more—an expression the more singular for the music was composed when Schumann was peculiarly happy.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Jacques Hoffmann,
Symphony Soloist.

Handel and Haydn Concert---
Mr Gericke's Benefit.

Recitals and Concerts of
the Current Week.

Mr Jacques Hoffman, the soloist at last week's Symphony rehearsal and concert, has been prominent in the musical life of Boston for the past 15 years, having joined the orchestra in 1890. Since 1892 he has been the leader of the admirable group of players known as the Hoffman quartet. For his debut as a soloist with the Symphony orchestra he selected Goldmark's A minor concerto for violin and orchestra. The other program numbers were the prelude to the third act of "The Pipers' Holiday," by Max Schillings; two movements from Cesar Franck's "Psyche," and Schumann's fourth symphony. The scheme of the Schillings opera relates to a "joke" by a minstrel who feigns death in order to win the hand of his lady love and to abolish a tax levied by her father on the guild of pipers. The minstrel is supposed to be killed in a storm, but comes to life at the touch of his sweetheart's hand. The ruse is successful and "all ends happily." It is very clever descriptive music, the contrasting episodes in the story giving opportunities for suggestions which make the musical picture easily understood. The opening, which indicates the grief of friends for the death of the minstrel, was played with splendid dignity by the heavier instruments.

The tender motif by the solo violin and violas and the wood-winds in the mournful phrases gave a somber color of great effectiveness, soon relieved, though, by the sprightly measures given the horns and lighter strings. The alternations of joy and grief, doubt and happy anticipations are admirably shown in the instrumentation, and each phase was vividly illustrated under Mr Gericke's guidance.

Mr Hoffman played the difficult Goldmark concerto in a way to win him prompt recognition as a violinist of great technical skill, whose tone, though not very large, was pure, and who impressed an auditor very favorably by reason of the absence of mannerisms and by the serious and conscientious style of his performance. The long first movement, though physically taxing, was admirably played throughout, the several brilliant episodic passages being managed deftly and easily by the soloist. In the canonical form of the second part Mr Hoffman's legato was beautifully sustained, and the unaccompanied cadenza in the closing movement also deserves commendatory mention. His associates provided adequate accompaniment to Mr Hoffman's work, which was received with favor by the audience.

The excerpts from Franck's "Psyche," two dainty little love episodes between Psyche and Cupid, were fantastic bits, charming in orchestral treatment and equally delightful in interpretation. The first one, "Gardens of Cupid," was played for the first time here. The Schillings prelude also was a novelty at these concerts. Schumann's grand symphony, the four movements played without a break, was given with splendid effect.

Next Friday being Good Friday, according to the custom of past years, the public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra will be moved forward one day and given Thursday afternoon, the concert taking place as usual Saturday evening. The season will be commemorated by the performance of the "Good Friday Spell" from the third act of "Parsifal." There will be two soloists, and in one number, the opening one, the orchestra will take no part. Mr Wallace Goodrich, the organist, will play Bach's Toccata in F major. The other soloist will be Mr Ben Davies, who will sing "Through the Woods,"

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 14, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BACH.	TOCCATA in F major, for ORGAN.
WEBER.	ARIA, "Through the Forests," from Act I of "Der Freischütz."
WAGNER.	"Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal."
COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.	"Onaway! Awake, Beloved" from "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast."
LISZT.	A FAUST SYMPHONY in C minor.
	I. FAUST: Lento assai: Allegro impetuoso—Allegro agitato ed appassionato assai.
	II. GRETCHEN: Andante soave.
	III. MEPHISTOPHELES: Allegro vivace ironico.

Soloists:

Mr. BEN DAVIES,

Mr. WALLACE GOODRICH.

from Weber's "Der Freischütz," and "Onaway! Awake," from Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha." The Faust symphony by Liszt will close the program.

BOSTON TRAVELER

ORGAN SOLO GIVEN AT THE SYMPHONY

Wallace Goodrich and Ben Davies
Both on Programme.

A programme more diversified than usual was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its 22d concert, Saturday night. It was: Bach, toccata in F major, for organ; Weber, aria, "Through the Forests," act 1 of "Der Freischütz"; Wagner, "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal"; Coleridge-Taylor, "Onaway! Awake, Beloved," from "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast"; Liszt, Faust symphony in three character pictures. Wallace Goodrich was the organist, and Ben Davies, English tenor, the other soloist.

The organ solo, a novelty this season, was played excellently by Mr. Goodrich. It was one of the most enjoyable numbers on the programme.

The "Parsifal" excerpt, chosen with reference to the season, was assured a hearty reception by reason of its association, aside from its value as beautiful music.

The Liszt symphony, which has been the cause of widely differing surmises as to the composer's meaning, did not gain in clarity.

Mr. Davies, whose voice has been heard at Symphony concerts in Boston before, sang in his best style, that of the traditional English singer, who delights in those pieces that give him opportunity to use an agreeable voice lustily.

ORGAN SOLO WAS SYMPHONY TREAT

Wallace Goodrich's Playing of Bach's Toccata in F Major at 22d Orchestra Concert
Proves a Delight.

"PARSIFAL" EXCERPT
ESPECIALLY APROPOS

Liszt's Faust Symphony Presented with Continuity of Thought, Despite Barren
Stretches and Repetitions.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gerike conductor, gave its 22d concert last night in Symphony Hall. Messrs. Ben Davies, tenor, and Wallace Goodrich, organist, assisted. The programme was as follows:

Toccata in F major for organ.....Bach
Max's aria from "Der Freischuetz".....Weber
"Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal".....Wagner
"Onaway! Awake!".....Coleridge-Taylor
A Faust symphony.....Liszt

It is a good thing to hear occasionally the organ as a solo instrument at these concerts. Organ recitals are considered by many as a bore unless there be music imitative of a thunder storm or some other phenomenon of nature or a transcription of the overture to "William Tell" or the gavotte from "Mignon." A long work for solo organ with orchestral accompaniment is seldom successful as music or as a piece for display. Mr. Widor has taken pains to protest against the well known opinion of Berlioz to this effect, but Berlioz's statement remains true, as do many other statements of the creator of modern orchestration, whose instrumentation is still wonderful and the despair of his would-be imitator, in whatever country they play the part of the sedulous ape. Bach's toccata is good music and at the same time a brilliant virtuoso piece, and it was a pleasure to hear it as it was written and not as a transcription by Esser for the orchestra. Mr. Goodrich played as a musician-virtuoso and greatly to the pleasure of the audience.

The excerpt from "Parsifal" was chosen, of course, with reference to Holy Week, but the beautiful music may be heard gratefully at any time. Some point to this music in answer to the charge that Wagner was a tired man when he sat down to compose "Parsifal"; that the vein of his invention was wellnigh exhausted. They that bring forward this charge smile a superior smile and say: "This Good Friday music that you justly admire was written near Zurich 20 years or more before Wagner began to sketch the third act of 'Parsifal' on the Christmas of 1878." But did Wagner in the fifties sketch the music as it exists today? Is it fully established that he wrote near Zurich, in the cottage put at his disposal by Otto Wesendonck, both the music and the poetry of the scene? The Good Friday music appeals strongly to those who may say with Tschalkowsky: "I cannot understand how any one can listen without laughter, or without being bored, to those endless monologues in which Parsifal or Kundry and the rest bewail their misfortunes. Can we sympathize with them? Can we love or hate them? Certainly not; we remain aloof from their passions, sentiments, triumphs and misfortunes."

But here Kundry has washed the feet of Parsifal, anointed them with precious oil and dried them with the hairs of her head. There is inevitably the thought of the Saviour and the woman that was a sinner; the thought of the supreme tragedy of all the ages. Nor is there any doubt that Wagner whose head in the fifties was full of a music drama in which the Saviour should be loved with an earthly and passionate love by Mary Magdalene, wrote the music of this scene then or afterward as though his Parsifal and Kundry were in very truth those characters.

Liszt's "Faust" Symphony has not been played so frequently at these concerts that the music suffers from familiarity. When the work was first performed in this country, at New York in 1863, it was dismissed with scanty attention by the Tribune reviewer, not because the concert was in war time, for the same reviewer wrote long notices of the first performances in the city of Verdi's "Aroldo" and Gluck's "Orpheus," with Vestvali as the chief singer. No, the reviewer dismissed the "Faust" contemptuously and had something to say about the chirping of birds and the grunting of swine.

But what has not been written about this music? Liszt's stanchest admirers differ as to his intentions. One commentator says that the composer abstained rigorously from any musical allusion to a particular scene or episode of the drama. Another finds several episodes, as though the music were a row of pictures. Another names the motives in the first movement Doubt, Longing, Love, Pride, etc. Still another prefers to believe that Liszt presents his symphony as though it were in a bottle neatly labelled "Extract of 'Faust.'"

Now Liszt himself refused to give even a short motto to any one of the movements; the titles, "Faust," "Gretchen," "Mephistopheles," were enough, he thought, and so they are. His music may be psychological, as some of his partisans insist, but surely it is better that the hearers should be left to their own psychological ingenuity in listening and determining. It is enough to be reminded by the music of Faust's conviction of the emptiness of art, of his doubts and questionings, of the conflict in his breast between rebellious and meditative feelings; of the touching simplicity, purity and passion of Gretchen; and as for Mephis-topholes, he is the mocking spirit that denies, not an amusing pantomime devil, not an affable person who chuckles Martha under the chin and uses the latest electrical device concealed in a flower bed to aid Faust in his awkward task of overcoming Gretchen's innocence.

The question, then, is this: Does the music impress, charm, move, thrill? Even if for the most part it should excite a feeling of repulsion, it would have a positive quality.

Liszt is slowly coming into his own kingdom as an acknowledged ruler. Long overshadowed by Wagner, who owed much to him, musically as in other ways, he was looked on chiefly as a piano virtuoso who had written much for his instrument. As the years go by he is more and more understood as a composer who created forms and moods. There are some who still object to this symphony because, forsooth, there is "little or no development." Thus they prove that they do not see any salvation for Faust, Gretchen and Liszt outside the strict sonata form. They are no doubt estimable persons in family life and social relations; they would serve with dignity as pallbearers, and would no doubt be impressive on a platform seated near the presiding officer and the orator of the evening; but they are unwholesome companions in the orgies of the Muses, nor would any person sensitive to impressions of art seek them out to crush a cup of two with them.

The performance last night had been carefully studied and prepared, and in spite of one or two trifling slips—even trifling slips are rare at these concerts—it was generally effective and often eloquent.

Surely there can be no dispute over the beauty of the "Gretchen" movement. This is, indeed, the music for Gretchen. As Mr. Newman once said, Gounod's music, charming as it is, is not peculiarly characteristic of Faust and Marguerite; it is for any Edwin and Angelina. Marguerite as depicted by Berlioz is more picturesque, more mediaeval than the Gretchen of Liszt, and yet it is hardly fair to compare the vocal-orchestral with the purely orchestral. Liszt never was more emotionally sincere and poignantly emotional than in this movement, and the apparition of Gretchen in the "Mephistopheles" movement is a fine feat of imaginative expression.

Yet it must be confessed that although Mr. Gericke succeeded in giving a convincing continuity of thought to the "Faust" movement, there are exasperating and barren stretches and futile repetitions of ideas. Faust is at times a bore. Probably the philosopher himself was one. The two chief themes are happily imagined, and the Love Theme is a haunting one, but the grandiose motive is inherently cheap and Liszt, when the endeavors to be grandiose, falls easily into circus pomp.

It matters not whether Liszt borrowed his idea of Mephistopheles parodying and mocking the themes of Faust from Berlioz's finale of the Fantastic Symphony. His task was a greater one in strict parody, and he performed it with much cleverness. The final chorus, however, is needed for the full effect. Mephistopheles does not have the least word in this world or the next, and the mystical chorus restores the balance and completes the work in all its fulness. The symphony should be heard at closer intervals of time. Mr. Scheel conducted it here two years ago at a Richard Strauss concert, but he pattered in detail and much of the first movement sounded worse than it really is.

Mr. Ben Davies is well known to the Symphony audience. He sang at one of these concerts for the first time 10 years ago this month. Inasmuch as he sings with unfailing good nature, in a breezy, manly way, with infinite gusto, the people hear him gladly. He reminds us, however, of Charles Incedon as described by Hazlitt: "He is a true old English singer, and there is nobody who goes through a drinking song, a hunting song, or a sailor's song like him. He makes a very loud and agreeable noise without any meaning."

SYMPHONY CONCERTS. Globe

The performance of the "Faust" symphony, Liszt's great work, was the feature of the 23d Symphony program; a performance that was glorious in every way and aroused the audience to such an unusual amount of enthusiasm at the close of the concert that Mr. Gericke was obliged to return to the platform before the plaudits ceased. The program opened with Bach's toccata in F major, for organ, Mr. Wallace Goodrich being the soloist. Mr. Ben Davies sang an aria from "Der Freischütz" and Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast," and the orchestral selections were the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the Liszt symphony, the latter without the solo and choral in the third part. The organ toccata was given admirably by Mr. Goodrich, the skilful use of the pedals probably showing his well-known abilities in a more prominent light than did his straight "finger" manipulation of the key banks.

Mr. Davies sang his two arias most acceptably, although the shades of expression in the "Der Freischütz" selection might have been better observed, his vocalizing running rather too evenly for the contrasts indicated in the score. So far as his tones are to be considered they were as pure and vibrant as ever, and the sentiments of the "Onaway" number enabled him to appear to great advantage. The audience expressed great delight at Mr. Davies' work and recalled him several times.

The orchestra interpreted the "Good Friday" music from "Parsifal" very beautifully, following Mr. Gericke's masterly reading in perfect accord, and with a sympathetic harmony of execution that gave to the composition that suggestion of religious import which makes this scene, when properly done, so impressive. The "Faust" symphony was exquisite in its entirety, for all three movements, "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles," were each characterized so clearly that no one could fail to comprehend the tonal pictures. Every theme was significantly set forth and in the "Mephistopheles" finale the haunting mockery of the instrumentation was something uncanny, as given by the orchestra in one of their greatest interpretations of the season. The men played as if inspired.

This week's program, the last but one of the present season, will have Mme Olga Samaroff for soloist in Grieg's A minor concerto for piano. The other selections will be Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, the symphonic poem by Richard Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

ARTHUR NIKISCH,

Former conductor, who is negotiating for return to Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NIKISCH SEEKING TO RETURN TO THE SYMPHONY

Journal Apr. 10, 1906
Berlin, April 9.—Arthur Nikisch, who has given up his position as conductor at the Leipzig Opera House and intends to settle in the United States, is negotiating with the Symphony Orchestra of Boston.

WAS CONDUCTOR

HERE FIVE YEARS

Arthur Nikisch is one of the best known orchestral conductors living. He was third conductor of the Boston orchestra, Georg Henschel being the first, Wilhelm Gericke second, Nikisch third, from 1891 to 1896 inclusive. Emil Paur fourth, he giving way to Mr. Gericke five years ago.

Since Mr. Gericke's resignation, to take effect the end of the present season was announced, several prominent conductors have been mentioned to succeed him, but nothing official has been said. Mr. Higginson and the others in authority in the orchestra making no comment as the various names were suggested.

Conductorship Gossip

In spite of statements to the contrary in New York and in Berlin no arrangement has been made with Richard Strauss to conduct at a pair of Symphony concerts here next season. Strauss is planning to visit New York next winter to supervise the performance of his operas "Feuersnot" and "Salomé" at the Metropolitan Opera House. He would like to conduct at a few concerts with the chief orchestras of other American cities, but so far as ours is concerned no arrangements have been made with him.

Nor is there any mysterious significance in the announcement yesterday that Weingartner wishes to cancel the contract that would bring him to America next winter to conduct at several concerts of the New York Symphony Orchestra. He complained of nervous fatigue when he was in America in January. It has increased since he returned to Europe. He has been advised, accordingly, to lessen his engagements for next year and so he has asked Mr. Damrosch to release him from his contracts. His action, to the best of any one's knowledge, has no relation to the conductorship here. No more has Nikisch's resignation from the opera house at Leipzig. He, too, had undertaken more than he could do and not overtax himself.

Here is more comment on Steinbach's conducting at the Philharmonic concerts in New York on Friday and Saturday. The Globe of that city says of him: "Although the medium through which Mr. Steinbach worked was not so sensitively responsive to his intentions as might have been desired, he did raise the playing of the orchestra to a higher level of accuracy and finish than is its custom. Brahms's second symphony he took at a moderate pace, not only in the opening 'slow' allegro, but in the two following movements. In all three he discovered a wealth of beautiful cantabile, and secured a balance and precision from the different choirs that helped in its faithful presentation. The finale he led with great spirit. In Elgar's fourteen variations on an original theme he showed a fine sense of their rhythmic variety and orchestral richness that kept them interesting throughout their somewhat excessive length. Beethoven's third 'Leonore' overture came at the end of an extended programme, and for that reason, no doubt, was taken in parts at a dangerously quick pace, but it was read with vigor and incisiveness."

The reviewer of the Evening Post adds: "As a programme maker Mr. Steinbach does not excel; but his conception of the Beethoven 'Leonore' overture was good, and he conducted the Brahms symphony with authority and with a comes like an orchestral slap or an instrumental prick. It is the glory of these "romantics" like Liszt and Berlioz and Wagner, that they saw great visions; that they burned with the intensity of their sight and feeling; and that they tried to put them as hugely and as intensely into tones. No wonder expression sometimes failed them; no wonder they had their corresponding moments when imagination went stale and expression turned hollow. Wagner's invention flagged least often, and his blank moments are fewest. Berlioz stumbled and limped and halted many times. No powers of expression perhaps could match what his superhuman imagination saw and felt. Liszt stands between, and he is nearer to Wagner than he is to Berlioz. Romantic music could hardly be sharper or bitterer in imagination or in expression than it is through the Mephistopheles "picture" in this "Faust" symphony or of a more intense and searching beauty than it attains when it mirrors the heart of Gretchen. It is in the Faust "picture" that the shortcomings of the romantics most appear. Moreover, and everywhere, it is by purely musical means that Liszt gains his imaginative and expressive ends. Perhaps even, the transformations, the contrasts, the interplay of his melodies, and the upbuilding of the Mephistopheles "picture" from the travestied shreds and tatters of them, make the most remarkable imaginative feat of the whole symphony. Here is "programme-music" that commands the mood and the picture and needs no scheduled promptings. H. T. P.

Concerts Next Week

As next Friday is Good Friday, the twenty-second Symphony rehearsal has been shifted to Thursday afternoon, with the concert following, as usual, on Saturday evening. On the programme, too, stands the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal"—music of the coming of spring, if ever there were such, and music of Wagner's prime that he wrote years before the opera in which he finally placed it took shape in his imagination. Thus, perhaps, it makes the most spontaneous and sensuously beautiful pages in it. The singer for the two concerts is Ben Davies, the English tenor, who is paying another visit to America, and his numbers are Max's air, "Through the Forest," from Weber's "Der Freischütz," and "Onaway! Awake," from Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha." Rather exceptionally Mr. Wallace Goodrich is to play on the organ Bach's Toccata in F major, the first composition without orchestra to appear on Mr. Gericke's programmes this season. For a symphony come the three "character pictures" after Goethe—Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles—that Liszt drew in tones. The fourth movement of the "Faust" symphony, as he called the whole, is necessarily omitted, since it requires a male chorus. Mr. Gericke intended to play the symphony last autumn. Then the programme upon which it stood gave place to another in memory of Mrs. Josephine Shaw Lowell.

Next week he is fulfilling his original purpose. The "Faust," and the "Dante" symphony, which is still more seldom played, are the most considerable of Liszt's orchestral compositions. Perhaps it is worth while to quote what Weingartner writes of the one that we are to hear in his book on the symphony since Beethoven:

"The 'Faust Symphony' is not intended to embody musically Goethe's poem, but gives, as its title promises, three character sketches—'Faust,' 'Gretchen' and 'Mephistopheles.' The third movement shows us with what art and imagination Liszt has used and developed the dramatic psychological variation of a theme (the inventor of which I have already designated as Berlioz). Mephistopheles is 'the spirit that evermore denies;' for the principle of his actions is, 'for whatever has come into life deserves to be reduced to naught again.' Hence, Liszt could not give him a theme of his own, but built up the whole movement from caricatures of previous themes, particularly from those belonging to 'Faust.' For this reason ignorant critics have been even more ready to reproach Liszt than they did Berlioz for lack of invention. I ask, if our great masters have built up long movements by manifold variations of themes of a few bars, why should not a composer today do the same, if a perceptible poetical thought is his guiding principle? Is there no invention in these characteristic variations, and, forsooth, invention of the same degree that the old masters possessed? And just the last movement of the 'Faust Symphony' best reveals to us Liszt's deep insight into the true nature of music. When the infernal, diabolical spirit has risen to its most brilliant power, there appears, as if soaring in bright clouds, the main theme of the Gretchen movement in virgin beauty. By this motive the power of the demon is shattered, and it sinks back into nothingness. The poet could let Gretchen perish, and even become a transgressor: the musician, in accordance with the ideal, subtle nature of his art, preserved for her the exalted, heavenly form. Mighty trombone sounds are heard through the discordant hell-music as it dies away: a male chorus softly intones Goethe's sublime words, 'All that is transitory is only illusion;' and in the clearly recognizable notes of the Gretchen theme, continues a tenor voice, 'The Ever-Feminine draweth us on.' One can identify this tenor voice with Goethe's Doctor Marianus, and imagine Gretchen transfigured into Mater Gloriosa. . . . So in great pieces of music golden threads, spun from sunshine, are woven lightly and airily, between the music and the inspiring poetry, making both more beautiful, but confining neither. . . . In both these works [the "Faust" and the "Dante" symphonies] Liszt has given the highest art of which he was capable. They can be compared only with the creations of the great masters. They mark not only the highest point in Liszt's work, but also, with Berlioz's symphonies, are the ripest fruits, thus far, of artistic programme music."

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concert

By annual exception the afternoon concert of the Symphony Orchestra was shifted yesterday from Good Friday to Holy Thursday, and Mr. Gericke, who is rarely heedful of occasions, put "The Good Friday Spell" from Wagner's "Parsifal" on his programme. Perhaps it is music of the pity and the aspiration that make the passion of the music-drama, and to hear it in its place in the play is more to associate it with Parsifal, Kundry and Gurnemanz, standing in reverie on the stage, than with the background of flowering meadow, spring sunshine and moist soft air that scene painter and "light man" are trying to suggest. Heard apart from the theatre and by itself, as it was yesterday, it becomes music of the spring and of a mood that no other composer has put so imaginatively and so persuasively into tones. Through one of Schumann's symphonies that the orchestra played last winter runs the restless elation of a spring time that sweeps, in the composer's fancy, down upon the world. In Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," that Mr. Gericke chose for his first concert, there is the freshness of the springtime and the little pleasures of it. And everyone knows those tumbling, bustling "spring songs" of the minor composers that male choirs shout with swelling shirt-fronts. Wagner's music is subtler and finer than Schumann's or Goldmark's. It is music, if the listener may let fancy run a little, of the creeping of the spring over the meadow grass and the little flowers of the glade where Gurnemanz has hidden himself. It is insinuating music, as of a spring that comes hesitatingly and light-footed. There is the softness of young greens and of misty lights in it, of sunshine that it not too hot, of winds that are not too strong. There is the tenderness of the new leaf in it, and the timid brightness of the new flowers. Wagner has poetized the creeping of the spring in his tones until it spreads softly and clearly over Gurnemanz's meadow, over the mood of the three that stand and look upon and over us that listen and forget the four walls that shut us in. Once and again, yesterday, it was not so easy to forget, for our orchestra has often woven a finer and more transparent web of tone than it did yesterday with Wagner's long-drawn harmonies.

Perhaps, too, the occasion, from another point of view prompted the toccata of Bach for the organ, that began the concert, and that Mr. Goodrich played with lucid, proportioned, and steadily curving and amplifying sonority. Mr. Davies's two airs, however, were neither here nor there. One, Max's long scene from "Der Freischütz," is a well-tried and somewhat war-worn steed of the concert room, and Coleridge-Taylor's "Onaway, Awake" is one of the busiest and serviceable of the younger battle-horses of the tenors. Mr. Davies sang them as he always sings, with entire surety and aplomb, with a voice that keeps all its masculine tenor quality, and in tones that have many a musical trait and that lack chiefly the finer power that summons moods and emotions, that changes with them, and that quickens the listener into response to them. Contrast, for example, the straightforward evenness of Mr. Davies's singing of Max's scene with all the variety of feeling, all the sharply pointed details that Weber has wrought into the orchestral part. The dramatic and musical sensitiveness that calls these into being and makes them keen is precisely the quality that is lacking in Mr. Davies's singing. Better for him the tranquil British swain that sings in Coleridge-Taylor's glorified ballad, if his name is Onaway and he does come out of "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast."

Liszt's "Faust" symphony, or rather the purely orchestral version that omits the "mystical chorus" that gives it completeness, made the rest of the programme, and in a performance that was one of the glories of our musical year, to stand with that of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" or of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca," or Mahler's symphony. The band knew no difficulties, though Liszt has asked all things that would serve his imaginative ends. Everyone of its perfections leapt to Liszt's commanding hand, and seemed to receive from his gesture something of his own intensity of imagination and expression. For the hour that intensity seemed to possess Mr. Gericke himself as well. The power of the music—and it is Liszt at his fullest—caught up conductor, band and audience with it and into it. At the final chord the whole room—and it contained a "rehearsal" audience—seemed to come back suddenly to itself and to recall Mr. Gericke—the rarest of things at the end of a concert—in applause that was as the breaking relief of emotional tension long stretched. The conductor had unrolled the musical structure of the symphony before us—the poignantly significant play and contrasts of themes and development in which Liszt's purely musical imagination runs highest. Mr. Gericke is often clearest when most stirred. So he wrought the warp and woof of the huge tonal tapestry that Liszt has designed for his "three character pictures." The composition was done; coloring and the play of light and shade, the power of line and the poignancy of tint remained. They came at Liszt and Mr. Gericke's bidding with a band of kindred virtuosi to do it. The wistful or woeful beauty of the Gretchen music held the listener breathless. Conductor and men wove into it every long-drawn thread of her passion or her sorrow. The Mephistopheles music was a splitting whirl of tonal mockery and tonal irony. The Faust music was as a shadowy and restless train of tortured, crowding, slipping phantoms. It was not merely the music of Liszt played. It was the visions that he saw and seized in tones. H. T. P.

ORGAN RECITAL IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

Journal

An organ solo, unusual at these concerts, formed a notable part of the twenty-second Symphony offering on Saturday evening. Wallace Goodrich was the performer and Bach's Toccata in F major the thing played. It is good of its kind, full of the regulation Bach cut-and-squared formality and characteristically dry as to melody, but earnest, dignified and well calculated to display an organist's real ability. Mr. Goodrich played it with keen sympathy and a technical skill that was wholly satisfying.

Ben Davies, that stout warhorse of many a musical campaign, was the vocal soloist. Like the laws of the Medes, he seems to change not from year to year. The same robust tenor, with its rather unmusical upper tones, is his, the same honest, manly style of expression, the same practised skill in making his equipment count. He gave the now old-fashioned sounding aria of Max in Weber's "Freischütz" with considerable dramatic effect, and later he sang Coleridge-Taylor's lovely "On-awake! Awake, Beloved" with an approach to sensuous beauty.

After a superb performance of the noble "Parsifal" "Good Friday Spell," the orchestra launched impressively into the long, and it must be admitted, occasionally, tedious "Faust" symphony. Liszt here displays his strength of technique and his bigness of conception, but he also reveals his partial poverty of melodic invention, his inability to hold the supreme attention of the hearer in any long work. His music here flashes brilliantly, then sputters and is nearly extinguished, only to be revived and go through the same process again. As a whole the work is not vitally interesting. It was played with virtuosity by the orchestra, yet it is certain that a man of more fiery temperament than Mr. Gericke would have gotten more out of it.

NIKISCH WANTS $50,000.

Berlin, April 10.—Money is the sole difficulty in the way of the Boston Symphony Orchestra securing the services of Professor Arthur Nikisch as conductor. He demands a salary equal to his possible aggregate earnings in Europe, which he places at $50,000, and the purchase of insurance on his life to the amount of $125,000. It is expected that Mr. Higginson will aid in securing him.

Liszt's "Faust" Again

At the Symphony concerts last week, Liszt's "Faust" music was more impressive on Thursday afternoon than it was on Saturday evening, but Mr. Davies sang better at the second concert than he did at the first. So particular numbers have gone at the pairs of concerts the season through. Rarely does the same music by the same player sound the same at both. But the balance keeps singularly even. One virtuoso is a more interesting pianist on Friday. Another is a better violinist on Saturday. This symphony seems a little more alive in the afternoon, but that tone-poem glows the brighter in the evening. Often neither conductor nor virtuosi are conscious of any difference in their work and the listener of no difference in mood or readiness. Yet the varying impressions remain. Take Mr. Davies's singing, for example. Thursday afternoon he went dutifully through Max's scena from "Der Freischütz." The music, perennially fresh and dramatic as it is even after eighty years, seemed to signify nothing warmly to him, and no more to his audience. He sang it, as we said on Friday, with the even competence of long routine. Saturday evening he was more alive to the musical and emotional variety of the scena, and his tones bent to each change of feeling and took a touch of color from it.

Probably Mr. Davies himself could not tell the reason of the difference. He might give the old explanation that a singer, being a person of nerves, is more "on edge" at the end of the day than he is in the middle of it. Sometimes, though not always, that distinction between the moods of the afternoon and of the evening does hold. But conductors are also nervously sensitive beings, and our orchestra is a nervously responsive body. Yet they played Liszt's "Faust" symphony more eloquently and with more steadily sustained power on Thursday afternoon than they did on Saturday evening. There are moments, for example, in the "character picture" of Faust, wherein Liszt's imagination dulls, or at which he halts to indulge his love for the pomposity of sonorous sound. On Thursday Mr. Gericke and the band were so eloquent that the listeners barely felt these moments. On Saturday—and it was not altogether the effect of repetition—they began to take thought of them. The "Gretchen" music also lacked a little of the piercing, quivering beauty that conductor and band found in it on Thursday, and the tang of Mephistopheles's (and Liszt's) tonal irony and mockery was not quite so sharp.

Yet in any performance—and Mr. Gericke's at both concerts was remarkable—the symphony stands firmly as one of the great things of romantic music. It has some of the obvious shortcomings of such music—its descents, for example, from exalted eloquence to mere rhetorical bigness, its tendency to inflated lengths, and its love of the "effect," for the effect's sake, that sympathetic insight into its content. His tempo for the first movement was slower than Weingartner's, and brought out the songlike qualities effectively. Altogether, Mr. Steinbach deserves high praise for his work at this concert. His interpretations were emotional in the best sense of the much-abused term, giving life to passages in themselves scarcely worth the magnificent Philharmonic machinery employed to present them." At both concerts the audience, which was of fair quality and discrimination, received Steinbach warmly but not enthusiastically. Several Bostonians, among them Major Higginson, heard the conductor.

Mr. Gericke has sent the following letter of thanks to Mr. Harold Randolph and the other gentlemen of Baltimore who gave him a loving cup at his final appearance there, ten days ago, as conductor of our orchestra: "Ever and anon the scenes of last Wednesday come crowding again upon my memory and I am overwhelmed anew with a consciousness of the great honor done me and the utter inadequacy of the effort which I made then to give expression to my appreciation and gratitude. I wish it were in my power to speak my thanks in person to every one of the hundreds who joined themselves together to give me so great a happiness, but that is impossible. May I not, therefore, ask you to put this utterance before the many who could neither hear my voice nor find in my words an echo of the deep sense of obligation which I feel toward the people of Baltimore who have approved my services and those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra so highly. Their overwhelming kindness toward me and their cordial appreciation of the labors of the orchestra have been of incalculable value in the attainment of the artistic results which, more than anything else, were celebrated by their applause. I shall carry the memory of that kindness and consideration with me ever, and it, no less than the beautiful gift, shall tell me as long as I live how greatly I am beholden to the kind, generous, music-loving people of Baltimore."

MR. GERICKE'S RETIREMENT

To Leave Our Orchestra in the Spring

He Declines to Renew His Present Contract

His Work for Thirteen Years in Boston

The Field from Which His Successor May Be Chosen

Trans. Feb. 23, 1906

By his own decision, Mr. Gericke will leave the Symphony Orchestra at the end of the current season. His present contract as conductor expires at the close of the musical year. Major Higginson proposed to him to renew it for the season of 1906-1907 on the existing terms. A few days ago Mr. Gericke declined the proposal, and yesterday he made public his decision. He remains with the orchestra until the end of the present series of concerts on April 28. Soon thereafter he returns to Vienna. For months past there has been much likelihood that Mr. Gericke would leave the orchestra at the end of the musical year, and of late his friends have spoken freely of his return to Europe. So far as Major Higginson and the management of the orchestra are concerned, the course of the negotiations has been that just stated.

HIS WORK IN BOSTON

For thirteen years in all Mr. Gericke will have been the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, and he is leaving it, when his powers have seemed at their highest. He came first to it from the Opera House in Vienna in 1884, and remained with it through the spring of 1889. When he took the band, it was struggling into its place as a permanent orchestra for Boston. When he left it, he had made it the best orchestra in America and one of the notable orchestras of the world. For a while he gradually raised it to what at that time it most needed—technical efficiency. Then he lifted and refined efficiency into virtuosity. To him more than to any other of its conductors the orchestra owes the symmetry, the pliancy, the adroit proportioning and the perfect euphony of its tone. Gradually assembling virtuosos in each group of the orchestra, he made the quality of that tone almost as perfect. Side by side with this work went the training of the orchestra in the classics of music, and no permanent conductor of any orchestra in America has had Mr. Gericke's ability to recreate such music and make it sound almost new. Thus during his first conductorship, he laid the foundations that make the orchestra what it is today and began to build upon them. It was work that required endless labor and discipline in the small things of routine for the sake of the great excellences that were to flow from them. If Mr. Gericke did not spare his men, he spared himself still less.

When Mr. Gericke returned to the orchestra, seven years ago last autumn, he had for a time to retrain it in its virtuosity and in its classic repertory. After he had brought it to his own pitch of excellence he began to make its programmes with a catholicity beyond that of most conductors. Where he had personal predilections, he sunk them in his desire that his audiences should hear whatever new music was of interest, importance or significant individuality. He was the first conductor in America to make known the "new" French composers. He gave Richard Strauss and the innovating Germans down to Mahler, whose symphony he is playing today, due place on his programmes, and he kept them there till their music began to be familiar. He burrowed among the obscure Russians that they might have such hearing as they deserved. He was hospitable to the music of American composers if it had worth, and he would stretch a point in its favor. If his own men showed ability as composers they had a hearing. Yet in no way did he neglect the classics or the unfamiliar music of eminent composers. The programmes of no conductor in America and of few in Europe have matched his in catholicity and balance, in the just mingling of the new that is interesting or important with the old that is enduring.

To the playing of this music Mr. Gericke, especially in the last two or three seasons, brought qualities that had been hitherto unsuspected in him. He had been depreciated unfairly as an orchestral drill-master. Yet from this industry, this passion for exact perfection, came the virtuosity that enabled the orchestra to master the most intricate modern music until technical difficulties vanished and conductor and men could give themselves to the composer's musical design, ideas and emotions. He had been reproached as limited in his best powers to the classics. Now he brought to ultra-modern music the breadth, the warmth and the keenness of imagination that it requires. Recall for such music the performances of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and of the same composer's "Don Juan," of Tschalkowsky's "Francesca," of Chausson's and of Mahler's symphonies during the current season, and they equal in every essential quality, even those of such classics as Schumann's "Spring" symphony or Brahms's second. Now as he is leaving us Mr. Gericke's powers have been broadest, warmest and finest. In greater or less degree, almost every quality that makes an eminent conductor is in him, and the whole on the intellectual, the emotional and the technical sides is very justly balanced. Always he has been all for the music in hand and the playing of it—never for the obtrusion of himself.

THE CHOICE OF A SUCCESSOR

No successor to Mr. Gericke has yet been chosen, and none will be in all probability for some time to come. Conductors (or their friends) have suggested themselves for the post. It is one of the most distinguished, as conductorships go, in the whole musical world. Rumors and gossip have assigned it to many and will assign it to more. For the present, as for some time past, Major Higginson and his advisers have been examining the field thoroughly. There for the present the matter rests. Action could not come until Mr. Gericke had decided whether he would continue. To no one and in no quarter has Major Higginson intimated even the direction of his choice.

The field is not so wide as it seems at first glance. No conductor in America is of sufficient rank for the post. In England there are Richter and Henry Wood. Richter is an elderly man absorbed in his concerts at London and Manchester and in his work with the opera at Covent Garden. Mr. Wood, whose powers are robust in some directions and slender in others, has set himself to the upbuilding of a new orchestra in London. In France Colonne and his orchestra are an established institution of Paris, and Chévard, who inherited Lamoureux's band and wishes to keep his inheritance, is not a conductor of the first rank. There is none such either at the Conservatory or at the State opera houses.

In Germany and Austria, Weingartner, Nikisch, Richard Strauss, Mottl and Mahler are all genuinely eminent conductors. The conditions in tours and in number of concerts that our orchestra requires are not those that Weingartner seeks, if he were disposed to take a permanent post. Nikisch, in recent years, has declined every proposal to visit America for a series of concerts as a "star" conductor. He pays such visits to European cities, but in the main his regular work at Berlin and Leipzig occupies him. With Weingartner, he is now the first conductor in Europe. Richard Strauss is one of the conductors at the Imperial Opera in Berlin, and he goes often to other capitals as a conductor of his own music. Of late there have been reports that he was about to leave the Opera because of differences with the director and even with the emperor himself over the performance of his new music-drama, "Salomé." More than once Mr. Conried has sounded him as to the conductorship at the Metropolitan Opera House, but without result. From his tour a few years ago Strauss at least knows something of American conditions. Mahler's contract with the opera in Vienna expires soon, and there have been reports that he wished to leave the theatre and become the conductor of a concert orchestra. Mottl is under a long contract with the opera at Munich, and his year's experience in New York did not please him.

Among the less distinguished German conductors, Steinbach of Meiningen and Cologne is distinctly the rising man. He has begun to go about Europe as a "star" conductor, and next month he comes to New York. By all accounts he resembles Mr. Gericke in some respects and praise of him has been warmest in "absolute" music and the classics. Fiedler of Hamburg, a younger man, made an individual and favorable impression when he conducted at the Philharmonic concerts in New York not long ago. Kunwald, Pranzner and others of the new generation seem at this distance hardly more than thoroughly competent men without much distinction. There are able conductors of opera in Germany like Muck at Berlin and Schuch at Dresden, but they are not disposed to exchange the theatre for the concert hall. Two other eminent conductors remain outside Germany, Mengelberg at Amsterdam and Safonoff at Moscow. Both have appeared in New York this winter. Mengelberg with much praise in the music of Strauss, which he read with more power than does Strauss himself. Safonoff is all fire and fury in the music of his own countrymen. No conductor indeed plays it with such sympathy and intensity, until it becomes as heady as their own vodka. In the music of other composers, Safonoff is tame in comparison.

A Voice from the Symphony Audiences— Their Due to Mr. Higginson and Mr. Gericke—The Impressions of a Manager— Virtuosi and America—The Lottery of Concerts Trans. Apr. 14, 1906

It is so seldom that any of those who make the audiences week after week, and season after season, at the Symphony concert will testify publicly to their appreciation of Mr. Gericke's work at them, and of Mr. Higginson's generous devotion in maintaining them, that it is good to receive and print a note from one such. Reticence is our New England—even our Bostonian—way; and the approaching change in the conductor, and the fact that the concerts have never been so catholic and so excellent as they have this season, have not unsealed our lips. Our correspondent who has happily broken the habit speaks—or rather writes—for many besides himself:

"On April 24 comes the benefit concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Mr. Gericke. This is an opportunity for us to express anew to Mr. Gericke our appreciation of his careful, artistic and successful services as conductor during the last eight continuous years. Under him the orchestra has improved each year—until today it is one of the most perfect in the world, all parts playing together as one mighty instrument responsive to a single touch. With the orchestra, made up as it is of picked artists many of whom are not to be excelled by individual artists anywhere, Mr. Gericke has developed into a truly notable conductor. It is this which we all recognize—and for which we wish to do him honor.

"It is also fitting for us to recognize the great achievement of Mr. Henry L. Higginson in creating and maintaining this orchestra for more than a quarter of a century. A private citizen, a lover of music and, even more, a lover of his fellowmen, with faith in their ever-increasing power to appreciate beauty and high ideals, he founded the Symphony Orchestra that all might hear the best orchestral music under the best conditions. Freely he has given from his daily labors at his office, his money, his time, his sympathy, his constant care, his skill in selecting men. Few of us realize that otherwise this great orchestra would not be possible. Nor do we realize the immense tact and discernment needed to select and secure the various artists to make up this orchestra, and particularly the conductor; the great sympathy and wisdom needed to explain to the members—of differing nationalities, experiences and talents—how to work harmoniously together; how to adjust themselves to this Western world so different from continental Europe, and how to understand the undemonstrativeness of American audiences.

"We Americans are appreciative, and particularly so of this very Boston Symphony Orchestra, as witness our constant attendance through these twenty-five years, our ever-increasing pride in it, and our feeling that it is ours almost by right. Yet we are singularly reserved in expressing our admiration, both for the orchestra and for Mr. Higginson. At this time, when he is brought face to face with greater responsibility than ever before in maintaining the orchestra and finding an eminently qualified conductor, let us renew our allegiance and, as opportunity serves, express our gratitude to Mr. Higginson."

Once in a very long while, say between seasons or at the end of a prosperous one, the manager of singers and virtuosi—the impresario, as we used to call him—will talk of his work, his "artists" and his public. Mr. Wolfsohn, the ablest and busiest manager of the pianists, the violinists and the concert singers who come to us from Europe or that make their way in their own country, did speak of these things the other day in the New York Sun, and sometimes interestingly.

"I have been asked many times," he said, for example, "if I had any difficulty in getting these world-famed artists to come to America, and I have to laugh whenever I answer. In the experience of a quarter of a century there are only two names that occur to me as belonging to celebrities who even hesitated. Both of these were afraid of the long ocean voyage. One was Joachim and the other Hans Richter. Distances in Europe are short; an artist can travel from one city to another and fulfil his engagements without loss of sleep and without becoming irritated by the thousand and one little things that rasp the nerves here. Considering what they have to endure, even now, and what they used to put up with here twenty years or so ago, it is a marvel that the American dollar has proved so potent.

"Rubinstein was one of the first European celebrities that ever came to this country in my day. Naturally when he returned he was asked that ever original question as to how he had enjoyed his tour, and he replied that the best thing about it was the knowledge that he had made so much money that he would never have to come back. He lived up to the privilege gained. There is no doubt that the pioneers, like Rubinstein, looked on coming to America as a pilgrimage, an exile, something to be endured for the sake of future peace. Many of them, not finding it as bad as it was painted came back, and today the American tour is looked forward to eagerly."

And this again, further on in Mr. Wolfsohn's talk:

"In engaging stars, many things have to be taken into account. An artist's personal appearance goes for a great deal. He must know how to come on a stage, how to leave, for he must appeal. If he sets his audience on edge in the beginning, no matter how well he plays or sings, he will be a failure. I have had that experience over and over. Engaging stars is a gamble. You have absolutely nothing to work on. You cannot depend on press notices, you cannot depend on hearsay, you cannot even depend on the audiences of the past, for they are notoriously fickle. I have made many blunders, not so many now as I used to, but when I was more inexperienced I took greater chances. Besides, the musical taste of the public at large has steadily increased and the difficulty has become proportionately great of making successful tours with any but the best-known talent.

"Nearly all cities of any size have a series of orchestral concerts, and for these season tickets are largely sold. At these concerts the most celebrated singers appear, and when an artist attempts to travel on his own account he has that competition. We have today the best artists and the most appreciative audiences in the world. My own experience has been that we are more critical and just in our criticisms than any other country."

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

According to the regular custom of the Symphony Orchestra, next Friday being Good Friday, the public rehearsal will be given on Thursday afternoon, that concert taking place as usual on Saturday evening. As appropriate to holy week, one of the numbers on the program will be the "Good Friday Spell" from the third act of "Parsifal." There will be two soloists, and in one number, the opening, the orchestra will take no part. This will be Bach's Toccata in F major for the organ, which Wallace Goodrich will play. The other soloist will be Ben Davies, the favorite English tenor, who is now making a tour of this country. Mr. Davies will sing "Through the Woods," from "Der Freischütz," and "Onaway," from Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha." The principal work on the program will be Liszt's great "Faust" symphony, which was scheduled originally to be performed last fall, but was set aside for the time being on account of the program given in memory of Mrs. Josephine Shaw Lowell.

FIRST FAREWELL TO THE GERICKES

Symphony Leader and His Wife, Who Sail May 8,
Given Reception by Thursday Morning Musical Club.

Farewells to Wilhelm Gericke, the Boston Symphony director, and to Mme. Gericke, who sail the 8th of May for Germany, were initiated yesterday afternoon by the Thursday Morning Musical Club with a brilliant reception at the Tuileries.

Receiving with the guests or honor was Miss Frances Thompson French, who has been president of the club since its beginning.

Presiding at the urns were: Mrs. Langdon Frothingham, Mrs. Charles L. Scudder, Miss Alice R. Cole, Mrs. William F. Whitney, Mrs. Nathan Mathews, Miss Katherine Lincoln, Miss Josephine Martin, Miss Edith Jewell, Mrs. S. Henry Hooper, Mrs. Wilbur Quincy, Miss Phillips and Mrs. Albert Thorndike. The ushers were: Arthur Hyde, Clayton Johns, S. Henry Hooper, Albert Thorndike, Courtney Guild, Malcolm Lang, B. L. Whelpley and E. M. Farnsworth.

Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Hale, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. Phoebe Jenks, Mr. and Mrs. Louis C. Elson, Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Heinrich Gebhard, George Burdett, Prof. Elliot Norton, Mrs. Benjamin Pitman, Mrs. W. S. Kennard, Mrs. Alfred Winsor and Mr. and Mrs. Howard Walker.

ulina Sirianni,
intiff's stock of 44 Prince st.,
reibly entered.
D. Benshimol.
"L." For $2000
d by the plain-gan.
ollision between itiff, and a car
ster ave., near lly & Blumen-Beloved."

on.
neister, as he
Hessian retreat
vs. Ara & with a fervor that demonstrated their appreciation of their conductor. The audiences, too, in these latter days take every opportunity to show their affection for Mr. Gericke, and at the end of each orchestral number he was recalled with fervor.

It was a new departure to open a symphony concert with an organ solo, but all the circumstances justified it; the religious instrument fitted well at this religious season; the organ itself is a noble-sounding instrument in Symphony Hall—in spite of one stop that wheezed a little, and Mr. Wallace Goodrich is one of the best Bach players in America. Therefore, this number was thoroughly effective and was greatly applauded, Mr. Goodrich being recalled twice.

It is much to be desired that Boston should cultivate a taste for the organ as a concert instrument. While our public is well educated in the domain of Symphony, String Quartette, Piano, Recital, etc., there is but a slight tendency towards the organ repertoire.

Then came Mr. Davies with a most tuneful Weber selection. We found him rather prosaic in the melodic sections of this "Freischuetz" aria, and we missed the Teutonic sentiment, but the singer was always secure in his intonation, and he made an effective dramatic climax, which, with a Weber aria, atones for almost every shortcoming. Mr. Davies did excellently in Coleridge-Taylor's "Onaway, awake Beloved!" which he gave with commendable enunciation and dramatic effect.

In this matter of pronunciation our singers can learn much from British artists. It is a delight to be able to follow the text of a song without referring to the programme-book—but a delight which we very seldom experience in our concerts. Mr. Davies demi-falsetto in the final cadence was as clear as crystal. He was recalled twice with much enthusiasm.

We were glad to hear this work by the great negro composer given, for once, with perfect orchestral support. The small orchestra of the Cecelia concerts, with its one or two rehearsals, has only given us an outline of the luxuriant effects of the composer. On this occasion the song made its full effect, both vocally and instrumentally. But we were again impressed with the close resemblance of some of the most passionate phrases to Gounod's effects in "Romeo and Juliet."

We have come to expect Bach's "Pastorale" at Christmas, and Wagner's "Good Friday Spell" during Holy Week, in our symphony concerts, and both compositions fit their frames properly. But both also have their intrinsic greatness apart from any especial season. This present number is the finest part of "Parsifal," and has none of that reiteration which is the chief defect of that opera.

The "Knight Parsifal," "Compassion," "Grail" and "Faith" motives, lead up to and culminate in the beautiful "Good Friday" motive, in a manner that places the old composers "Hors Concours" with his modern imitators, whose constant use of "Leit-motiven" is only dull, while not one of them could invent such figures as the ones mentioned above. Yet "Parsifal," as a whole, is not an example of the greatest Wagner. There is much padding, repetition and dullness in the work, and we believe that the near future will find the world confirming this verdict.

The concert ended with a notably brilliant performance of a very difficult work. Never have we heard the Liszt symphony made so clear and intelligible. The Ghost, in "Hamlet," shudderingly exclaims—"Liszt, Liszt, oh Liszt," and the concert auditor can re-echo the cry as regards the prolixity of the tale that is unfolded, but the work is by no means tiresome, as many of the long narratives of Debussy, D'Indy, Mahler & Co. are apt to become. Spite of repetitions and of undue length this symphony is full of ideas. It is not, perhaps, as sustainedly great as "Les Preludes," which we hold to be Liszt's chief orchestral work, but it presents tangible thoughts and much beauty of theme.

It is interesting to see what a quarry later composers have made of this symphony. Wagner's "St. John's Day" figure, which Pognier uses so copiously in the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg," is clearly discernible, and Gounod has helped himself liberally to Gretchen's music. All through the work Liszt shows his power in working up grand climaxes, but in the first movement, which is the military rather than the amative Faust, he does not stop at the best climax, but continues unnecessarily.

The second movement, "Gretchen," is a masterpiece. Beauty of melody, clearness of treatment, poetic inspiration, are in every measure.

But after this sweet movement there was the devil to play. And the orchestra played to excellent purpose, "a la Berlioz." If that eminent Frenchman had not existed it would have been Liszt who would have founded the modern school of orchestral coloring. If he at times resembles Berlioz he at least never copies or plagiarizes. He is not an experimenter, as Berlioz sometimes was, but every new effect is made with a sure hand, from the ingenious parody of the themes of the first movement, to the uncanny fugue which proves Mephistopheles a very good contrapuntist.

The very fact of assigning no definite themes to Satan, but causing him to represent the destructive principle by distorting previous melodies of beauty, is a touch of philosophy which may outrank "Zarathustra" and all of Strauss' musical philosophizing. And the presentation of the "Gretchen" theme, unsullied and beyond the power of Satan's pollutions, and the final transfiguration, were points of ethical power, precluding the necessity of a long explanatory chorus (omitted on this occasion) with which Liszt ends the work and which is but another example of his passing by a climax and ending with an anti-climax.

In summing up we cannot too emphatically state that this was the finest Liszt orchestral performance that we can remember, and we can only pay renewed homage to our great orchestra and its great conductor.

Louis C. Elson.

of them, not finding it as bad as it was painted came back, and today the American tour is looked forward to eagerly."

And this again, further on in Mr. Wolfsohn's talk:

"In engaging stars, many things have to be taken into account. An artist's personal appearance goes for a great deal. He must know how to come on a stage, how to leave, for he must appeal. If he sets his audience on edge in the beginning, no matter how well he plays or sings, he will be a failure. I have had that experience over and over. Engaging stars is a gamble. You have absolutely nothing to work on. You cannot depend on press notices, you cannot depend on hearsay, you cannot even depend on the audiences of the past, for they are notoriously fickle. I have made many blunders, not so many now as I used to, but when I was more inexperienced I took greater chances. Besides, the musical taste of the public at large has steadily increased and the difficulty has become proportionately great of making successful tours with any but the best-known talent.

"Nearly all cities of any size have a series of orchestral concerts, and for these season tickets are largely sold. At these concerts the most celebrated singers appear, and when an artist attempts to travel on his own account he has that competition. We have today the best artists and the most appreciative audiences in the world. My own experience has been that we are more critical and just in our criticisms than any other country."

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY.

According to the regular custom of the Symphony Orchestra, next Friday being Good Friday, the public rehearsal will be given on Thursday afternoon, that concert taking place as usual on Saturday evening. As appropriate to holy week, one of the numbers on the program will be the "Good Friday Spell" from the third act of "Parsifal." There will be two soloists, and in one number, the opening, the orchestra will take no part. This will be Bach's Toccata in F major for the organ, which Wallace Goodrich will play. The other soloist will be Ben Davies, the favorite English tenor, who is now making a tour of the country. Mr. Davies will sing "Through the Woods," from "Der Freischütz" and "Onaway," from Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha." The principal work of the program will be Liszt's "Faust" symphony, which was scheduled originally to be performed last year but was set aside for the time being account of the program given in memory of Mrs. Josephine Shaw Lowell.

FIRST FAREWELL TO THE GERICKES

Symphony Leader and His
Wife, Who Sail May 8,
Given Reception by Thursday Morning Musical Club.

Herald — April 15, 1905
Farewells to Wilhelm Gericke, the Boston Symphony director, and to Mme. Gericke, who sail the 8th of May for Germany, were initiated yesterday afternoon by the Thursday Morning Musical Club with a brilliant reception at the Tuilleries.

Receiving with the guests or honor was Miss Frances Thompson French, who has been president of the club since its beginning.

Presiding at the urns were: Mrs. Langdon Frothingham, Mrs. Charles L. Scudder, Miss Alice R. Cole, Mrs. William F. Whitney, Mrs. Nathan Mathews, Miss Katherine Lincoln, Miss Josephine Martin, Miss Edith Jewell, Mrs. S. Henry Hooper, Mrs. Wilbur Quincy, Miss Phillips and Mrs. Albert Thorndike. The ushers were: Arthur Hyde, Clayton Johns, S. Henry Hooper, Albert Thorndyke, Courtney Guild, Malcolm Lang, B. L. Whelpley and E. M. Farnsworth.

Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Hale, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. Phoebe Jenks, Mr. and Mrs. Louis C. Elson, Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Heinrich Gebhard, George Burdett, Prof. Eliot Norton, Mrs. Benjamin Pitman, Mrs. W. S. Kennard, Mrs. Alfred Winsor and Mr. and Mrs. Howard Walker.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Bach—Toccata in F Major, for Organ.
Mr. Wallace Goodrich.
Weber—Aria, "Through the Forests."
Mr. Ben Davies.
Wagner—Good Friday Spell.
Coleridge-Taylor—"Onaway, Awake Beloved."
Mr. Ben Davies.
Liszt—Faust Symphony.

Adamowski was concert-meister, as he has been since the famous Hessian retreat, and the orchestra played with a fervor that demonstrated their appreciation of their conductor. The audiences, too, in these latter days take every opportunity to show their affection for Mr. Gericke, and at the end of each orchestral number he was recalled with fervor.

It was a new departure to open a symphony concert with an organ solo, but all the circumstances justified it; the religious instrument fitted well at this religious season; the organ itself is a noble-sounding instrument in Symphony Hall—in spite of one stop that wheezed a little, and Mr. Wallace Goodrich is one of the best Bach players in America. Therefore, this number was thoroughly effective and was greatly applauded, Mr. Goodrich being recalled twice.

It is much to be desired that Boston should cultivate a taste for the organ as a concert instrument. While our public is well educated in the domain of Symphony, String Quartette, Piano, Recital, etc., there is but a slight tendency towards the organ repertoire.

Then came Mr. Davies with a most tuneful Weber selection. We found him rather prosaic in the melodic sections of this "Freischuetz" aria, and we missed the Teutonic sentiment, but the singer was always secure in his intonation, and he made an effective dramatic climax, which, with a Weber aria, atones for almost every shortcoming. Mr. Davies did excellently in Coleridge-Taylor's "Onaway, awake Beloved!" which he gave with commendable enunciation and dramatic effect.

In this matter of pronunciation our singers can learn much from British artists. It is a delight to be able to follow the text of a song without referring to the programme-book—but a delight which we very seldom experience in our concerts. Mr. Davies demi-falsetto in the final cadence was as clear as crystal. He was recalled twice with much enthusiasm.

We were glad to hear this work by the great negro composer given, for once, with perfect orchestral support. The small orchestra of the Cecelia concerts, with its one or two rehearsals, has only given us an outline of the luxuriant effects of the composer. On this occasion the song made its full effect, both vocally and instrumentally. But we were again impressed with the close resemblance of some of the most passionate phrases to Gounod's effects in "Romeo and Juliet."

We have come to expect Bach's "Pastorale" at Christmas, and Wagner's "Good Friday Spell" during Holy Week, in our symphony concerts, and both compositions fit their frames properly. But both also have their intrinsic greatness apart from any especial season. This present number is the finest part of "Parsifal," and has none of that reiteration which is the chief defect of that opera.

The "Knight Parsifal," "Compassion," "Grail" and "Faith" motives, lead up to and culminate in the beautiful "Good Friday" motive, in a manner that places the old composers "Hors Concours" with his modern imitators, whose constant use of "Leit-motiven" is only dull, while not one of them could invent such figures as the ones mentioned above. Yet "Parsifal," as a whole, is not an example of the greatest Wagner. There is much padding, repetition and dullness in the work, and we believe that the near future will find the world confirming this verdict.

The concert ended with a notably brilliant performance of a very difficult work. Never have we heard the Liszt symphony made so clear and intelligible. The Ghost, in "Hamlet," shudderingly exclaims—"Liszt, Liszt, oh Liszt," and the concert auditor can re-echo the cry as regards the prolixity of the tale that is unfolded, but the work is by no means tiresome, as many of the long narratives of Debussy, D'Indy, Mahler & Co. are apt to become. Spite of repetitions and of undue length this symphony is full of ideas. It is not, perhaps, as sustainedly great as "Les Preludes," which we hold to be Liszt's chief orchestral work, but it presents tangible thoughts and much beauty of theme.

It is interesting to see what a quarry later composers have made of this symphony. Wagner's "St. John's Day" figure, which Pagner uses so copiously in the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg," is clearly discernible, and Gounod has helped himself liberally to Gretchen's music. All through the work Liszt shows his power in working up grand climaxes, but in the first movement, which is the military rather than the amative Faust, he does not stop at the best climax, but continues unnecessarily.

The second movement, "Gretchen," is a masterpiece. Beauty of melody, clearness of treatment, poetic inspiration, are in every measure.

But after this sweet movement there was the devil to play. And the orchestra played to excellent purpose, "a la Berlioz." If that eminent Frenchman had not existed it would have been Liszt who would have founded the modern school of orchestral coloring. If he at times resembles Berlioz he at least never copies or plagiarizes. He is not an experimenter, as Berlioz sometimes was, but every new effect is made with a sure hand, from the ingenious parody of the themes of the first movement, to the uncanny fugue which proves Mephistopheles a very good contrapuntist.

The very fact of assigning no definite themes to Satan, but causing him to represent the destructive principle by distorting previous melodies of beauty, is a touch of philosophy which may outrank "Zarathustra" and all of Strauss' musical philosophizing. And the presentation of the "Gretchen" theme, unsullied and beyond the power of Satan's pollutions, and the final transfiguration, were points of ethical power, precluding the necessity of a long explanatory chorus (omitted on this occasion) with which Liszt ends the work and which is but another example of his passing by a climax and ending with an anti-climax.

In summing up we cannot too emphatically state that this was the finest Liszt orchestral performance that we can remember, and we can only pay renewed homage to our great orchestra and its great conductor.

Louis C. Elson.

258

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 21, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN.

SYMPHONY in A major, "Italian," op. 90.

- I. Allegro vivace.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Con moto moderato.
- IV. Saltarello: Presto.

GRIEG.

CONCERTO in A minor for PIANOFORTE, op. 16.

- I. Allegro molto moderato.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Allegro moderato molto e marcato.

RICHARD STRAUSS.

TONE POEM, "Death and Transfiguration," op. 24.

WEBER.

OVERTURE, to the Opera "Euryanthe."

Soloist:

Mme. OLGA SAMAROFF.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

259

OLGA SAMAROFF. Pianist.
She will tour the United States next season
(Photo by Burr McIntosh)

MISS SAMAROFF AT THE SYMPHONY

Pianiste, at Orchestra Concert,
Plays with Coolness and
Ease, but None the Less
Irresistibly.

ILLNESS PREVENTS THE TRUMPET SOLO

Strauss' "Death and Trans-
figuration" Substituted—
Mendelssohn's "Italian"
Symphony on Programme.

Herald — Apr. 22, 1906

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, gave its 23d concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mme. Olga Samaroff was the pianist. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in A major, "Italian".....Mendelssohn
Concerto in A minor for piano.....Grieg
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration".....Strauss
Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber

The spirit of the first movement of the "Italian" symphony is stimulating for a time and the finale is a plausibly brilliant piece for a virtuoso orchestra, but the second and third movements are fine examples of Mendelssohn at his worst. How smug this music is, how exasperatingly respectable, how nobbishly genteel! It is like the picture of Mendelssohn that Aubrey Beardsley drew for the last number of the Savoy. Hearing the two middle movements, you can see the irreproachable cravat, the precisely cut quill, the self-complacent air of the last of the great formalists.

There is another Mendelssohn, the composer of the "Hebrides" overture, of the overture to the "Midsummer Night's Dream" and of some of the music in the "Walpurgis Night," but this charming landscapist is not the man of the "Italian" symphony. The latter has the irritating self satisfaction, the mincing neatness of mediocrity. No wonder that he could not understand Hector Berlioz and considered him an extraordinary person. How could the man of polished talent comprehend the flaming genius? You might as well think of E. P. Roe enjoying the society of Henry Fielding. Yet Mr. Gericke and the orchestra gave admirable interpretations of the widely dissimilar symphony of Mendelssohn and the tone-poem of Strauss. "Thus Spake Zarathustra" had been announced for performance, but Mr. Kloeppel, the excellent first trumpeter, is sick and no other trumpeter was willing to play the difficult passage that is famous both for its effect and a stumbling block. Therefore, "Death and Transfiguration" was substituted, although it had already been performed this season. To us it is one of the composer's greatest compositions; it is surely the noblest.

Unlike "Zarathustra," "Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote," it may stand as absolute music; for in "Zarathustra" the composer gives to various sections headings from Nietzsche's book; and the other tone-poems just named are largely dependent on a programme for full appreciation; but in "Death and Transfiguration" the title is enough. Let the commentators make their ingenious discoveries; let Mr. William Mauke note a nice distinction between fever-theme No. 1 and fever-theme No. 2—a typhoid fever chart might possibly be helpful, unless a still more acute glossarist should discover that Strauss' sick man died of cancer of the liver. "Death and Transfiguration"—are not these two words a sufficient clew to even the hearer of slight imagination?

We remember Mr. MacDowell saying after he heard one of Strauss' more radical compositions for the first time: "This is undoubtedly art, and it is great and overwhelming art; but whether it is music, is another question. Perhaps it is a new form of art." He would not have queried today the musical art of "Death and Transfiguration," but an admirer of the modern school might with good reason question the high artistry of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony. Strauss succeeded in his endeavor, but how much of Italy is in Mendelssohn's music? Compare the andante of the symphony with the slow movement "On the Heights" in Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy" and mark the difference in poetic thought and expression.

In the finale Mendelssohn put into music what he had experienced in the Corso in Carnival times. Some young ladies threw confetti at him. A young English woman was equally rude. Mendelssohn wrote that he "became desperate" and he, too, flung confetti. "My blue coat was soon as white as that of a miller." Remember that this was all highly proper. The young ladies were of good families and Mendelssohn had met them at select balls and receptions. His carnival music is most discreetly gay. He brushed his coat before he sat down to compose, brushed it and no doubt sponged it.

How inconsequential such music seems when a composition of true dramatic force, of imaginative power follows it. There are some who object to Strauss' subject. Like the poisoned man in Webster's "White Devil" they wish no one to mention death to them; the terrible word, death. They are reminded of unpleasant things by this music. The grand, consoling ending brings to them no peace. They cannot lift their eyes from the sick bed to see the flight of the delivered soul. But there is nothing mean, nothing fearful in this tone-poem of Strauss. There is the struggle with death; and in this struggle the poorest clown is as heroic a figure as Pope or Emperor. There is no cross or

OLGA SAMAROFF. Pianist.
She will tour the United States next season
(Photo by Burr McIntosh)

MISS SAMAROFF AT THE SYMPHONY

Pianiste, at Orchestra Concert,
Plays with Coolness and
Ease, but None the Less
Irresistibly.

ILLNESS PREVENTS THE TRUMPET SOLO

Strauss' "Death and Trans-
figuration" Substituted—
Mendelssohn's "Italian"
Symphony on Programme.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, gave its 23d concert last night in Symphony Hall. Mme. Olga Samaroff was the pianist. The programme was as follows:
Symphony in A major, "Italian".....Mendelssohn
Concerto in A minor for piano.....Grieg
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration".....Strauss
Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber

The spirit of the first movement of the "Italian" symphony is stimulating for a time and the finale is a plausibly brilliant piece for a virtuoso orchestra, but the second and third movements are fine examples of Mendelssohn at his worst. How smug this music is, how exasperatingly respectable, how nobbishly genteel! It is like the picture of Mendelssohn that Aubrey Beardsley drew for the last number of the Savoy. Hearing the two middle movements, you can see the irreproachable cravat, the precisely cut quill, the self-complacent air of the last of the great formalists.

There is another Mendelssohn, the composer of the "Hebrides" overture, of the overture to the "Midsummer Night's Dream" and of some of the music in the "Walpurgis Night," but this charming landscapist is not the man of the "Italian" symphony. The latter has the irritating self satisfaction, the mincing neatness of mediocrity. No wonder that he could not understand Hector Berlioz and considered him an extraordinary person. How could the man of polished talent comprehend the flaming genius? You might as well think of E. P. Roe enjoying the society of Henry Fielding.

Yet Mr. Gericke and the orchestra gave admirable interpretations of the widely dissimilar symphony of Mendelssohn and the tone-poem of Strauss. "Thus Spake Zarathustra" had been announced for performance, but Mr. Kloeppel, the excellent first trumpeter, is sick and no other trumpeter was willing to play the difficult passage that is famous both for its effect and a stumbling block. Therefore, "Death and Transfiguration" was substituted, although it had already been performed this season. To us it is one of the composer's greatest compositions; it is surely the noblest.

Unlike "Zarathustra," "Heldenleben" and "Don Quixote," it may stand as absolute music; for in "Zarathustra" the composer gives to various sections headings from Nietzsche's book; and the other tone-poems just named are largely dependent on a programme for full appreciation; but in "Death and Transfiguration" the title is enough. Let the commentators make their ingenious discoveries; let Mr. William Mauke note a nice distinction between fever-theme No. 1 and fever-theme No. 2—a typhoid fever chart might possibly be helpful, unless a still more acute glossarist should discover that Strauss' sick man died of cancer of the liver. "Death and Transfiguration"—are not these two words a sufficient clew to even the hearer of slight imagination?

We remember Mr. MacDowell saying after he heard one of Strauss' more radical compositions for the first time: "This is undoubtedly art, and it is great and overwhelming art; but whether it is music, is another question. Perhaps it is a new form of art." He would not have queried today the musical art of "Death and Transfiguration," but an admirer of the modern school might with good reason question the high artistry of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony. Strauss succeeded in his endeavor, but how much of Italy is in Mendelssohn's music? Compare the andante of the symphony with the slow movement "On the Heights" in Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy" and mark the difference in poetic thought and expression.

In the finale Mendelssohn put into music what he had experienced in the Corso in Carnival times. Some young ladies threw confetti at him. A young English woman was equally rude. Mendelssohn wrote that he "became desperate" and he, too, flung confetti. "My blue coat was soon as white as that of a miller." Remember that this was all highly proper. The young ladies were of good families and Mendelssohn had met them at select balls and receptions. His carnival music is most discreetly gay. He brushed his coat before he sat down to compose, brushed it and no doubt sponged it.

How inconsequential such music seems when a composition of true dramatic force, of imaginative power follows it. There are some who object to Strauss' subject. Like the poisoned man in Webster's "White Devil" they wish no one to mention death to them; the terrible word, death. They are reminded of unpleasant things by this music. The grand, consoling ending brings to them no peace. They cannot lift their eyes from the sick bed to see the flight of the delivered soul. But there is nothing mean, nothing fearful in this tone-poem of Strauss. There is the struggle with death; and in this struggle the poorest clown is as heroic a figure as Pope or Emperor. There is no cross or squalid realism. The sick chamber is the world; the fight of the lone and disappointed sufferer assumes epic proportions. Humanity, worn out, defeated, struggles with the last foe, and conquered, rises victor.

With the noble hymn of the transfiguration the concert should have closed. It would have been well for the hearer to go out into the night with such music filling his soul.

Mme. Samaroff played for the first time at these concerts, and gave an engrossing and impressive performance of the concerto by Grieg. There were moments in the first movement when she accentuated too sharply in the reading of a long phrase, accentuated in a temporal rather than rhetorical manner, and thus checked the melodic flow. This trick, for trick it is, with many pianists of the ultra-modern technic, was not so apparent toward the end of the movement, and with the second it disappeared. Mme. Samaroff played with full appreciation of the contrasting, jostling moods of the composer. She was romantic, fiery, brilliant, capricious, poetic. She played with a cool head, without futile motions, without any unnecessary nervous or physical strain; she worked her spell without apparent endeavor, but her spell was irresistible.

OLGA SAMAROFF,
PIANIST.

MORE HONORS FOR MISS SAMAROFF

Young Pianist Very Effective as Soloist at Saturday's Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Journal — Apr. 23, 1906

Mendelssohn's prettily genteel "Italian" symphony, with which Saturday's concert by Mr. Gericke and his men began, is manifestly dying, fading away in a pleasant but no less effectual decline. What once seemed the height of "elan" and captivating beauty is now a rather empty tune that wears its welcome out long before the first movement is ended. There are bits of true and fine writing in the third part, and the saltarello is still clever and entertaining, but as a whole the work has outlived its age and style and will be heard less and less as time goes on. It was played not so perfectly as usual.

Olga Samaroff, the young Texas pianist with a Russian name, was the soloist. She has appeared in Boston several times in smaller concerts and the brilliancy and charm of her playing are well known. She interpreted Grieg's A minor concerto as one would expect—with rare poetic fervor, with elegance of technique and with a fire and abandon, when called for, that made her performance fascinating and immensely effective.

Richard Strauss' great tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," heard at these concerts only a short time ago, lost nothing by repetition. The nobility of its thought and the rich splendor of its expression make it one of the composer's finest and most absolutely sincere pieces of composition—inspiration is the better word. The orchestra gave to it all their power of fine virtuosity and splendor of tone. The "Euryanthe" overture, coming after, sounded unusually weak and ineffective by comparison.

A despatch from Berlin to the New York Sun today says that the negotiations with Nikisch over the conductorship of our orchestra have come to nothing. The more the pity.

Y, APRIL 23, 1906

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Mme. Samaroff at the Symphony Concerts

Not even in her recitals here has Mme. Samaroff shown the fineness of her traits and powers so persuasively as she did in her playing of Grieg's concerto at the Symphony concert of Saturday. It is highly fitful music that springs from contrast to contrast, and stops at no technical difficulties or formal rule and custom in the making of the leap. Throughout, it is the music of individual mood and not of sustained and closely developed ideas, and throughout it utilizes piano and orchestra almost impartially in the expression of the fancy or the emotion that is uppermost, for the moment, in the composer. Yet this very freedom and fitfulness tax the technical resources of the player. She must not—somehow it is oftenest a woman that plays Grieg's concerto—make the music a means to technical display; she must never force it or seem to labor with it. The concerto must come from her hands, mood by mood, as it came from the composer's imagination and invention. It was precisely this impression of unsought and unlabored spontaneity that Mme. Samaroff's playing gave. Her mastery and her artistry served their full purpose in the most persuasive of ways—they hid themselves in expression. The listeners felt not the means but the moods.

It is as easy to chop and force these moods and fancies and make Grieg seem like an emotional jumping-jack, all twitches, as we once heard a cavilling German reviewer call his music. The concerto must have its air of poetic caprice, of swift-coming inventions, of youthful and romantic sensitiveness—Grieg was only twenty-five when he wrote it, and the merest prick of feeling set him to quivering music-making. There must also be the saving touch of soft brilliancy in the performance that shall keep the listener always warm to it. In a word the concerto must sound like a very large, varied and highly romantic impromptu. So Mme. Samaroff and the imagination behind her skill made it sound. She played with steady brilliancy, but not even in the tempting cadenza did she harden it. She kept the large moods of the music running warm and deep. She wove Grieg's lesser fancies as so many lyric interludes. She mused without mawkishness and her sentiment had a northern cleanliness. She answered Grieg's youthful fire with her own, and kept it at a clear and glowing heat. Above all, she threw over the music the romantic glamour that transfigures it, and that hides the thinness and the poverty of idea that even then was beginning to beset Grieg. Sometimes it was Mme. Samaroff, more than the composer himself, that gave his moods and his fancies the fuller and more penetrating utterance.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The 25th season of the Symphony concerts is fast drawing to a close, one more program terminating the present series, and also concluding Mr. Gericke's conductorship of our symphony orchestra. The 23rd program introduced Mme. Olga Samaroff as soloist for the first time at these concerts. She played Grieg's A minor pianoforte concerto. The orchestral selections were Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, "Death and Transfiguration," Richard Strauss, and the overture to Weber's opera, "Euryanthe." Mme. Samaroff is a young pianist who has achieved a favorable reputation in the local musical field within the past year, for she has displayed abilities of a high order at several concerts, and her musical equipment appears to be based upon solid grounds, and not merely something with which to dazzle the auditor by reason of phenomenal technical dexterity. Of the latter she has aplenty and her other attainments are such that she can command respectful consideration in interpretations covering a wide and varied repertory of compositions. Mme. Samaroff is a very attractive artist in her style of work and she acts like a thorough musician to "the finger tips."

In the cantabel passages of the first movement Mme. Samaroff's tones were delightfully melodic, the "conversations" with the different instruments harmonized perfectly in expression and tempos, and the fortissimo measures showed that the pianist was well equipped physically. The florid bits and arpeggios of the second part were as crisp and brilliant as could reasonably be wished for, and all the different themes in the final movement were skillfully contrasted and developed. Mme. Samaroff's reception was very cordial.

The orchestral association in the concerto was thoroughly effective. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony made a delightful introduction to the long but interesting program. The performance calls for no special criticism aside from the fact that the pendulum-like second part went smoothly in its rhythmic swing and the somewhat refined "saltarello" was played with becoming dash and brilliancy. The Strauss tone-poem, which was played here earlier in the season, Mr. Gericke directed with his usual impressive effect and appreciation of the greatness of the composition. Weber's "Euryanthe" overture received just consideration in the hands of the orchestra.

No soloist is scheduled for the last program of the Symphony orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Gericke's last appearance in Boston. All available seats for Saturday evening have long since been sold and the demand for the "rush" seats for Friday afternoon will undoubtedly be much larger than the supply. The program will be as follows: Perloz, overture, "Carneval"; Bach, prelude, Adagio and Gavotte; Tschalkowsky, overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet"; Beethoven, symphony, No. 5, in C minor.

MR. GERICKE'S BENEFIT.

In many respects the most interesting concert of the season will be that given in Symphony hall next Tuesday evening for the benefit of Mr. Gericke, the retiring conductor of the Symphony orchestra. The program is a most interesting one and the soloist will be Mme. Gadski. But in addition to the musical interest will be the sentimental element which enters into it. During his years of service in this city Mr. Gericke has made a wide circle of friends, not limited by any means to those who know him personally.

TIGHT BINDING

The high ideals which have always actuated his work, his painstaking conscientiousness and his willingness ever to labor in the cause of his chosen art have had a profound influence on the musical life not only of Boston, but of the country at large.

The announcement of his retirement has caused lively regret, and this has been displayed in a manner in the response of the public to this concert, which will be a substantial testimonial to his worth as a man and an artist. The program, which is complete save in the question of the first aria which Mme Gadske will sing, will be as follows: Beethoven, overture Leonore, No. III; Cesar Franck, symphony in D minor; aria, to be announced; Goldmark, overture "Sakuntala"; Wagner, finale to "Gotterdammerung," with Mme Gadske as Brunnhilde.

THE POP CONCERTS.

One week more and the regular musical season of 1905-1906 will end, the last Symphony concert coming next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Then come the "pops," which this year will begin Tuesday evening, May 1, and continue for eight weeks. As in past years, the orchestra will consist of 55 musicians, chosen from the ranks of the Symphony orchestra. The labor of conducting will be divided among three men, who have done so much to make the concerts popular. For the first four weeks, the conductor will be Mr. Timothee Adamowski, and the remaining four weeks will be divided between Mr. Max Zach and Mr. Gustav Strube.

There will be the usual "special nights" and some unusual ones. "Tech" night is set for Tuesday evening, June 5. Thursday of the same week, June 7, the evening will be dedicated to the American medical association, which will be in session in Boston at that time. "Graduates" night, the 10th of its kind, will come Monday evening, June 25, and "Harvard night" on the preceding Monday, June 18. The date of "Tufts" night has not yet been finally settled.

One innovation which Mr. Adamowski will introduce will be a "Wagner" night, once a week, when the major portion of the program will be devoted to excerpts from Wagner's works. And he will also give several "one composer" nights, devoted largely to the works of composers of popular music.

The first program Tuesday night, May 1, is as follows: "Rakoczy March," Berlioz; selection, "Rigoletto," Verdi; overture, "Mignon," Thomas; waltz, "Harlequin en Voyage," Zach; intermezzo, "Verilbet," Strube; selection, "Mlle Modiste," Herbert; fantasy from "La Boheme," Puccini; "Italian Caprice," Tschalkowsky; selection, "Carmen," Bizet; "Grubenlichter," waltz, Zeller; "American Fantasy," Herbert; march, "Lorraine," Ganne.

Wednesday will be "Wagner" night, Thursday "Herbert" night, Friday "operatic" night. There will be the usual arrangement of tables and refreshments may be had for the ordering.

MR. GERICKE'S DEPARTURE

HIS WORK, HIS QUALITIES AND HIS ACHIEVEMENTS

The Raising of Our Orchestra to the First Rank and the Means by Which the Conductor Accomplished It—The Range and the Skill of His Programmes—The Singular Blending in Him of Many Qualities and Their Result in His Conducting—The Artistic Honesty and Modesty of the Man

Trans. Apr. 21, 1906
The quality of the orchestra that Mr. Gericke leaves behind him after his three final concerts next week; the quality of the programmes that he has made in all the years of his conducting in Boston; and the quality, in general and in particular instances, of the performance of the music he has chosen make the reward and the memorial of the work that he is now ending. Our Symphony Orchestra was a local band when he became its conductor twenty years ago. In the first term of his service he re-created it. In the second, he has made it the finest orchestra in America, and one of the two or three finest in the world. Its quality has set a standard in our own country. In every musical capital in Europe, it is one of the titles of America to artistic consideration and achievement. And nearly all the traits that have made it such it owes to Mr. Gericke. Search the programmes year after year of the notable orchestras in America—in Chicago, in Philadelphia and in New York. Con those of the eminent European conductors—in the cities of Germany, in Paris, and in London. Not a list shows such catholicity of view, so just a balance between the classic, the unfamiliar, the neglected, and the new, such variety of matter, and uniformity of quality and interest, as have Mr. Gericke's programmes in recent years. The distinctive quality of his performances has been due to the singularly just blending in him of traits that rarely in a conductor are so balanced. He has been capable of tireless labor in preparation. Yet in performance he seemed often to be spontaneously re-creating familiar music. He polished minute details; he adjusted very delicate proportions. Yet to his hearers he gave almost always largeness and wholeness of impression. To classic music he brought in his later years the energy and the suppleness of imagination, and the emotional and the suggestive insight that are the imperative necessities of ultra-modern music. To it, in turn, he gave the clarity, euphony, finesse and purely sensuous beauty that are like necessities to classic. Other eminent conductors excel Mr. Gericke in single commanding qualities. Very few unite so many that contribute to the fullness of the conductor's art.

The distinctive quality of our orchestra is its tone. Transparency, flow and rhythmic vibrancy, euphony and finesse, variety of weight and tint and texture, precision and pliancy, unite in its playing to give that tone a sensuous and expressive beauty as of instrumental song. Unless it were a band of virtuosi, it could not have developed and maintained these excellences; but it was Mr. Gericke that first made it and that has since kept it such a band. Unless it had endured almost tireless labor with an unflagging zeal and patience, it could not have attained these virtues. In Mr. Gericke is the passion for perfection. From the beginning he has imposed it on his men. To the end he has never relaxed it. Virtuosi are only human, and humanly they have sometimes resented his unsparing insistence. But he has long infused something of his own passion into them by sheer dint of authority and example. If they must labor hard, he himself has worked yet harder. Between them conductor and men, at their best, have made the orchestra a complete and perfect medium for the expression of the music they might have in hand. The players in an orchestra are unaware of the whole effect of its playing. They ply their technical skill, their musical intelligence and imagination. The conductor hears all and adjusts all. In Mr. Gericke are the ear, the instinct and the understanding for every trait of tone that distinguishes our orchestra. Long experience and increasingly fine perceptions have strengthened all three. He has the conductor's distinctive and baffling power that imposes his will and his feeling upon the sensitive human instruments before him. Thus he has made the orchestra what in quality it is. He has made it the creator of flawless, beautiful, ordered and moving sound. His is a genius as well as a passion for perfection of expression. He has taught his audiences, almost equally, the worth, pleasure and necessity of it.

There is the music that is deservedly classic, or that bears such a reputation; music that is neglected and unfamiliar; music that is making its way, or that is new and bold; music that entertains or taxes or thrills; music that one or another part of weekly audiences expects to hear in a series of concerts. Programme-making has indeed become one of the most delicate of the conductor's arts. He must keep not one but many balances even, and he must be steadily interesting. Recall Mr. Gericke's lists for any recent season. Note the careful adjustment in them of the classic and the ultra-modern, of the familiar and the unfamiliar, of the music of many sorts, schools and men. The academics and the romantics, the established masters and the most individual innovators, Frenchmen and Russians, Englishmen and Americans, Germans of many kinds, all find a due place. Seldom has Mr. Gericke repeated a classic or pursued a composer to excess. As seldom has he played new music that had not some title to hear.

He has kept his audience in even pace with the new things, men and tendencies of music. Yet he has kept them familiar with the music that makes the standards and the history of the art. Scarcely a conductor devises programmes freer from personal idiosyncrasies and prejudices. Consider single programmes, and there is the same skill of arrangement and adjustment. Very seldom does Mr. Gericke overtax his men or his hearers. Very seldom does he fail to interest them. By the range of his programmes he has made the audiences at our Symphony concerts the most musically intelligent, the most catholic of taste and appreciation, the best informed musically in America. Year after year Mr. Gericke has read new music with his passion of thoroughness. We have heard what he picked from it. We have scarcely thought of all over which he has labored to no purpose, or of the perpetual watch that he has kept for our knowledge and our pleasure.

So Mr. Gericke has trained his orchestra, and so he has chosen the music it plays. To the playing of it, especially in the last two years, he has brought a unique blending of qualities. He has seemed to conceive the duty of a conductor to impart the music that the composer wrote in the mood or the passion and with the intent that it was written. He has not sought to interpret it through himself, but to enter into it and to transmit it. Impersonal conducting if one chooses to call it so; but conducting that has been very individual in its traits. It has been as catholic as its material. Yesterday it was transmitting with equal understanding, sympathy and fulness the Mendelssohn of the Italian symphony and the Richard Strauss of "Death and Transfiguration." In concert after concert it has ranged as widely and completely. To seize and to impart the distinguishing qualities, the peculiar essence, of each symphony, overture, tone-poem, what you will, has been its aim. Every "star" conductor has his "specialties" and tried battle-horses, with which he excels all his rivals. Mr. Gericke has been a conductor without "specialties" and without battle-horses. He has done all things, so to say, more well or less well. He has been the conductor that fifty concerts each season in a single city require. The "star" conductors come and go. Through thirteen musical years, and for six months of each of them, Mr. Gericke has been a fixed and steady "star." It is the human way of audiences to chafe and weary under high-pitched and clamorous individuality. They do not under impersonal work that maintains its even excellence, and rises on due occasion above it. Mr. Gericke has done such work, and the steady interest of his audiences has been the result and the reward of it.

This even excellence has sprung from a highly individual mingling of qualities. Never in recent years has Mr. Gericke played his classics dryly in dutiful routine. Never has he rested content with a technically perfect performance, and no more. He has seemed to come freshly to them, with an impelling energy of insight and of feeling, with an eager responsiveness and a genuine passion to give them the fullest musical and emotional expression. He has never sought to inflate or distort them. His fine discrimination for each thing in its kind has protected him from that. Seemingly his aim has been to rekindle them with the ardor that burns through much of the music of our own generation. So he has recreated them each according to its nature. But with similar discrimination, he has understood that ardor alone will not suffice for more modern music. With all its appeal to passionate, poetic, pictorial and emotional utterance, and all its reliance upon rhythm, the playing of it must have clarity and structural substance, musical contour as well as tonal color, euphony, proportion and finesse, the insinuating beauty as well as the compelling power of sound. As Mr. Gericke has recreated his classics with the ardor he has caught from the moderns, so he has illumined his moderns with the formal perfections that his classics have demanded and cultivated. Thus he has heightened each in its kind. In the discernment that prompted him and in the union of qualities that he achieved lies one of his justest titles to eminence.

One trait in Mr. Gericke has crowned all these—his full, constant and unobtrusive sense of artistic honor. Whatever he has done, he has done to the best of his ability. He has left nothing to chance. He has slighted nothing. There has never been need to make allowance or excuses for him. Whatever his mood, he has subdued it to his task. Whatever the fatigue, he has held himself to his work until it were done. He has talked little, and seldom of ambitions and ideals. He has preferred to pursue them tirelessly. He has kept his artistic standards and held his band and his audiences to them. He has never obtruded himself. His work, to his public, has been the man.

H. T. P.

Trans. Here in Boston Apr. 23, 1906

A few days ago we printed a letter from a correspondent in which he took the audiences at the Symphony concerts gently to task for lack of appreciation of Mr. Higginson's work for the orchestra. Another correspondent, "Kay," now writes us on the same subject, and with a word of plausible explanation. The letter runs: "I would like to state what seems to me the true condition regarding the musical public's appreciation of Mr. Higginson's wonderful and long continued generosity to us. On every hand I hear gratitude expressed and the realization that without Mr. Higginson's help we could not have an orchestra, much less such an orchestra. But nine-tenths of the audiences are women, and women without a leader to show them how to express their gratitude to Mr. Higginson, who is so modest, who keeps so out of reach, when do we have an opportunity to show our feelings towards him. We would one and all have such an opportunity. As it is, I rarely leave Symphony Hall of a Friday afternoon that I do not wonder anew and gratefully at his generosity and wish he could know of our appreciation. I am only one 'weak sister' to speak up, but there are hundreds with the same grateful sentiments."

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

THE FINAL WEEK OF A LONG SEASON

A Note on the Symphony Concert—Mr. Gericke's "Farewells"—Recitals Next Week—The "Pops" Again—Of Singers as They See Themselves

Trans. Apr. 21, 1906
For the day, since Mr. Gericke's final appearances here are so near, the usual review of the Symphony concert of Friday afternoon may properly give place to an article upon the larger aspects of his work with our orchestra and the distinctive qualities of his conducting. Naturally with the public of the Symphony concerts, the conductor and his leave-taking transcend the music on his programmes, the composers that wrote it, and the singers or the virtuosi who may assist in the playing of it. The hour is Mr. Gericke's and of right. Moreover, there was little in the programme of yesterday to invite fresh or minute comment. Of necessity Strauss's "Zarathustra" had been withdrawn, and "Death and Transfiguration," the most familiar of his tone-poems, substituted. For the third time in the current season, conductor and orchestra were playing it and with no whit less of searching and vivid musical detail at the beginning or of large eloquence at the end. Played as it was yesterday, there is no questioning Strauss's music. Conductor and men brought it to full expression and to the particular expression that the composer sought. Their playing of Weber's overture to his "Euryanthe" was as complete, illuminating and re-creating in its kind; and to Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Mr. Gericke brought the animated elegance and the sensitive play of light and lyric fancy of the composer himself. No composer ever wrote, consciously or unconsciously, with so much air of the cultivated gentleman who finds music the readiest means of expression. When he composed the "Italian" symphony, the gentleman was in very high spirits. The new wine of Italy had mounted to his head and was running out of his fingers to his music paper. It has kept the symphony the most alive after these seventy years of all Mendelssohn's music. Yesterday it was almost as heady to hear.

H. T. P.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme, Apr. 23, 1906

Mendelssohn. "Italian" Symphony, A major.
Grieg. Concerto for Piano, A minor.
Soloist. Mme. Olga Samaroff.
Strauss. Tone Poem. "Death and Transfiguration."
Weber. Overture to "Euryanthe."

A good and healthy programme from first to last. "What?" asks the ferocious reader, "is such a subject as 'Death and Transfiguration' a healthy one?" Decidedly so. In its place the Death-feeling is as normal as that of Life, and this work is a triumph over the King of Terrors. "O Death where is thy sting! O Grave where is thy victory!" is not to be considered as a very morbid sentiment, and these words might stand as a motto for this masterpiece.

It is a very different matter with our modern composers who do not deal at all with euthanasia, but desire us to live in a charnel house. They wish us to sleep with corpses and carouse with skeletons. To set something like the following picture is their cheerful idea of the chief function of Music:—

A ghoul sits in the cypress gloom,
Above a dank and mouldy tomb,
Within the cemetery's mazes,
Where vampire bats are thick as daisies.
A dismal pool with fetid breath
Whispers of murder and of death.
Above the pool the screech-owl wings;
In it are slimy, crawling things.
And to the muttering midnight skies
The steaming white miasmas rise.
A weird sound sighs from yonder tree,
On which a horrid fruit I see;
The wind the tightened cords is twanging,
From which three suicides are hanging.

We offer to furnish whole cart-loads of this stuff (which might be called "Maeterlinck made easy") to the modern horror-mongers, should their material run low; but we wish them to understand that Richard Strauss was not of their tribe until this present year and his "Salome."

The performance of the Strauss work was very effective, in spite of the absence of the whilom concert-melster (for Achilles still sulks in his tent), and aroused an enthusiasm that was not quelled until Mr. Gericke had bowed again and again and the orchestra had risen and joined in the salaams. The number was substituted for "Zarathustra," which would have been given but for the illness of the trumpeter, Mr. Kloeppel.

We can scarcely wonder at the illness and growing nervousness of musicians. At present the composers are demanding superhuman things of all of them. Mr. Kloeppel's work in the Mahler symphony, for example, was much more difficult than anything existing in the trumpet repertoire of a generation ago.

Could any of the great tone-soloists of today, who have utterly surpassed Mendelssohn in their scoring, write such a bit of musical sunshine as his "Italian" symphony? Could any of them make such a perfect display of the violas as is given in its second movement? These instruments were gloriously played in the Andante and all the strings were at their very best in the work. There is also a word of praise to be spoken for the horns in the next movement, and for the brilliancy of the Saltarello which ended the work. We wonder whether the giant composers of the present will hold as well 60 years after their death as Mendelssohn has done. The symphony was applauded to the echo. Nevertheless one must not seek in Mendelssohn the modern strength, and one may miss the grander moods once in a while; but one ought not to seek for a frieze ulster when examining a lace mantilla. It was very comfortable music.

Mme. Olga Samaroff made a triumph in Grieg's concerto. We had this composition a year ago, played most prosaically by a celebrated pedagogue; at that time its poetry evaporated. But at this concert all its subtlety and charm was revealed. There was abundant power in the interpretation, but no forcing; beautiful romance, but no mawkishness; and the cadenza of the first movement became a very brilliant display of technique, chiefly in octave and heavy chord work.

The work wears better than one had thought; we now prize it higher at each repeated hearing. Yet we find its chief beauty in the short Adagio. Here we have that brooding melancholy of the North of which Grieg is such a poetic exponent. One can also praise the national flavor which is in the composition; the hearty jump of the Halling, the hop of the Spring-tanz, are in the brisk measures of the finale. Yet it is not a great concerto in the sense that Brahms' two, and Beethoven's last two concertos, are masterpieces; it is not a symphony with an interwoven thread of piano obbligato running through its warp and woof. It is rather an effective piano solo with an orchestral accompaniment and orchestral interludes.

The reminiscence-hunter may find "I dreamt that I dwelt in marble halls" translated into Norwegian, in the finale, and some of the sharp contrasts are overdrawn by the composer, but just these points displayed Mme. Samaroff splendidly. She is evidently a master of the art of contrasts and of working up climaxes. Therefore the performance aroused unbounded enthusiasm. The artist was recalled so many times that we lost the count of her reappearances. She was obliged to come back to the platform some half-dozen times to acknowledge the unceasing applause. And the exquisite performance merited this unusual tribute.

The concert was remarkable for the keen interest displayed by the public from beginning to end. We do not recall an occasion where the "symphony" audience was so constantly enthusiastic and applaudive. But the climax of it all was in the work first described, the great composition of Richard Strauss. We were sorry to hear even the "Euryanthe" overture after this, although it was also excellently performed. It was the theatrical

268
After the poetic, and one did not desire the footlight flavor after that death-bed scene. It was a distinct case of anti-climax.
Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The 25th. season of the Symphony concerts is fast drawing to a close, one more program terminating the present series, and also concluding Mr Gericke's conductorship of our symphony orchestra. The 23rd program introduced Mme Olga Samaroff as soloist for the first time at these concerts. She played Grieg's A minor pianoforte concerto. The orchestral selections were Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, "Death and Transfiguration," Richard Strauss, and the overture to Weber's opera, "Euryanthe." Mme Samaroff is a young pianist who has achieved a favorable reputation in the local musical field within the past year, for she has displayed abilities of a high order at several concerts, and her musical equipment appears to be based upon solid grounds, and not merely something with which to dazzle the auditor by reason of phenomenal technical dexterity. Of the latter she has aplenty and her other attainments are such that she can command respectful consideration in interpretations covering a wide and varied repertory of compositions. Mme Samaroff is a very attractive artist in her style of work and she acts like a thorough musician to "the finger tips."

In the cantabel passages of the first movement Mme Samaroff's tones were delightfully melodic, the "conversations" with the different instruments harmonized perfectly in expression and tempos, and the fortissimo measures showed that the pianist was well equipped physically. The florid bits and arpeggios of the second part were as crisp and brilliant as could reasonably be wished for, and all the different themes in the final movement were skillfully contrasted and developed. Mme Samaroff's reception was very cordial.

The orchestral association in the concerto was thoroughly effective. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony made a delightful introduction to the long but interesting program. The performance calls for no special criticism aside from the fact that the pendulum-like second part went smoothly in its rhythmic swing and the somewhat refined "saltarello" was played with becoming dash and brilliancy. The Strauss tone-poem, which was played here earlier in the season, Mr Gericke directed with his usual impressive effect and appreciation of the greatness of the composition. Weber's "Euryanthe" overture received just consideration in the hands of the orchestra.

No soloist is scheduled for the last program of the Symphony orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr Gericke's last appearance in Boston. All available seats for Saturday evening have long since been sold and the demand for the "rush" seats for Friday afternoon will undoubtedly be much larger than the supply. The program will be as follows: Berlioz, overture, "Carneval"; Bach, prelude, Adagio and Gavotte; Tschalkowsky, overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet"; Beethoven, symphony, No. 5, in C minor. Globe Apr 22 1906

269
It will be interesting to read the parting remarks in the Boston press when Gericke leaves that intellectual city. THE MUSICAL COURIER has always stoutly asserted that Gericke was not the proper man for the place he occupied. Under his moribund guidance the Boston Symphony Orchestra has lost in virility, in authority and in brilliancy. He will not be missed vitally in this country. It now remains to be seen what post of importance Europe will offer Gericke when he gets there—for he has already announced his intention of leaving America, which supplied him for thirteen years with the only real fame he ever achieved, and with the only real salary he was ever paid for conducting. Of course, he got money for conducting somewhere or other in a corner of Germany or Austria, but the pittances paid there to leaders do not pass here as salaries. THE MUSICAL COURIER will report faithfully all the fine offers to be made to Gericke from now on by London, Berlin, Paris, Vienna, Dresden, Prague, Leipsic, Munich, Madrid, St. Petersburg and Leopschütz.

SATURDAY, APRIL 21, 1906

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN.	SYMPHONY No. 4, in A major. (Italian.)
GRIEG.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE.
RICHARD STRAUSS.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "Thus spake Zarathustra."
WEBER.	OVERTURE, to "Euryanthe."

Soloist:

Mme. SAMAROFF.

after the poetic, and one did not desire the footlight flavor after that death-bed scene. It was a distinct case of anticlimax.
Louls C. Elson.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The 25th. season of the Symphony concerts is fast drawing to a close, one more program terminating the present series, and also concluding Mr Gericke's conductorship of our symphony orchestra. The 23rd program introduced Mme Olga Samaroff as soloist for the first time at these concerts. She played Grieg's A minor pianoforte concerto. The orchestral selections were Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, "Death and Transfiguration," Richard Strauss, and the overture to Weber's opera, "Euryanthe." Mme Samaroff is a young pianist who has achieved a favorable reputation in the local musical field within the past year, for she has displayed abilities of a high order at several concerts, and her musical equipment appears to be based upon solid grounds, and not merely something with which to dazzle the auditor by reason of phenomenal technical dexterity. Of the latter she has aplenty and her other attainments are such that she can command respectful consideration in interpretations covering a wide and varied repertory of compositions. Mme Samaroff is a very attractive artist in her style of work and she acts like a thorough musician to "the finger tips."

In the cantabel passages of the first movement Mme Samaroff's tones were delightfully melodic, the "conversations" with the different instruments harmonized perfectly in expression and tempos, and the fortissimo measures showed that the pianist was well equipped physically. The florid bits and arpeggios of the second part were as crisp and brilliant as could reasonably be wished for, and all the different themes in the final movement were skillfully contrasted and developed. Mme Samaroff's reception was very cordial.

The orchestral association in the concerto was thoroughly effective. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony made a delightful introduction to the long but interesting program. The performance calls for no special criticism aside from the fact that the pendulum-like second part went smoothly in its rhythmic swing and the somewhat refined "saltarello" was played with becoming dash and brilliancy. The Strauss tone-poem, which was played here earlier in the season, Mr Gericke directed with his usual impressive effect and appreciation of the greatness of the composition. Weber's "Euryanthe" overture received just consideration in the hands of the orchestra.

No soloist is scheduled for the last program of the Symphony orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr Gericke's last appearance in Boston. All available seats for Saturday evening have long since been sold and the demand for the "rush" seats for Friday afternoon will undoubtedly be much larger than the supply. The program will be as follows: Berlioz, overture, "Carneval"; Bach, prelude, Adagio and Gavotte; Tschalkowsky, overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Julie"; Beethoven, symphony, No. 5, in C minor. Globe Apr 22 1906

It will be interesting to read the parting remarks in the Boston press when Gericke leaves that intellectual city. THE MUSICAL COURIER has always stoutly asserted that Gericke was not the proper man for the place he occupied. Under his moribund guidance the Boston Symphony Orchestra has lost in virility, in authority and in brilliancy. He will not be missed vitally in this country. It now remains to be seen what post of importance Europe will offer Gericke when he gets there—for he has already announced his intention of leaving America, which supplied him for thirteen years with the only real fame he ever achieved, and with the only real salary he was ever paid for conducting. Of course, he got money for conducting somewhere or other in a corner of Germany or Austria, but the pittance paid there to leaders do not pass here as salaries. THE MUSICAL COURIER will report faithfully all the fine offers to be made to Gericke from now on by London, Berlin, Paris, Vienna, Dresden, Prague, Leipsic, Munich, Madrid, St. Petersburg and Leopschütz.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN.	SYMPHONY No. 4, in A major. (Italian.)
GRIEG.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE.
RICHARD STRAUSS.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "Thus spake Zarathustra."
WEBER.	OVERTURE, to "Euryanthe."

Soloist:

Mme. SAMAROFF.

SYMPHONY HALL

Tuesday Evening, April 24, at 8 o'clock

.....A.....

BENEFIT CONCERT

.... FOR ....

WILHELM GERICKE

Programme

BEETHOVEN . . . . . Overture, "Leonore," No. 3

CÉSAR FRANCK . . . . . Symphony in D minor

- I. Lento : Allegro non troppo.
- II. Allegretto.
- III. Allegro non troppo.

WEBER . . . . . Aria, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," from
"Der Freischütz"

GOLDMARK . . . . . Overture, "Sakuntala"

WAGNER . . . . . Closing scene from "Götterdämmerung"

SOLOIST,
Madame GADSKI.

After the symphony there will be an intermission of ten minutes

BIG FAMILY PARTY.

Glbe — Apr 25/06
Magnificent Tribute to
Wilhelm Gericke.

High Enthusiasm at Benefit Concert in Symphony Hall.

To judge by the enthusiasm with which he was greeted, and the reluctance with which the audience finally permitted the occasion to come to an end, last night's benefit concert in Symphony hall to Wilhelm Gericke was in no way intended to speed the parting. It was in a sense a family party; by far the majority of the people present were regular Friday afternoon and Saturday night attendants; everybody knew everybody else. Everybody was there who should have been there, and it was lucky that nobody tried to come who shouldn't have been there, because the hall was full to the last seat as it was.

It was an audience as brilliant as often appears at opera nights, in color; the "dressing" was less showy, but in every way regal and magnificent and handsome—and noticeably white and black.

Mr Gericke was given the customary wreaths of laurel, thick wheels of laurel, four feet or more across, tied with great streamers of red ribbons. There was one at the beginning, and he leaned it against the conductor's stand; there was another at the close of the first number, and he leaned it against the other side of the stand. And when he had to make room for Mme Gadski, he could hardly lift his laurels.

Hearts were very near the surface, unusually so for Boston; there seemed to be a deliberate effort to say in articulate, frantic applause that the people recognized what Mr Gericke's work with the orchestra has meant for music and for music lovers in this country, and a real affection for the man of the music. For after all, it is the conductor's personality and feelings that get most expression in the playing of a great band like this; his is the spirit that speaks, interpreting the thoughts of the masters through his many-voiced instrument.

It was symbolical that Maj Henry L. Higginson should enter almost the instant that the storm of applause grew, when the conductor appeared. Disdaining evening dress, simple, unaffected, seated in an inconspicuous place, and yet the mainspring of the whole situation—hardly anybody saw him; all eyes were on the righthand bank of the violins, round which Mr Gericke was to come. And, when he came, players and hearers received him standing.

Timothee Adamowski left his place at the head of the first violins, and disappeared as the conductor came on. He was back in a moment, tugging the great wreath of laurel. Amid tremendous applause he handed it to Mr Gericke, and the players beat applause with their bows on the backs of their addles. Mr Gericke bowed and shook hands with his concertmeister and the program was begun.

It would have been hard to select a series of works better suited to the occasion, and it would have been almost impossible to get any band to play them as the Symphony men did last night. They seemed inspired.

First was the Beethoven No 3 "Leonore" overture; then the Cesar Franck symphony in D minor, with its screaming unisons, that lift one clean into the exaltation of a dream, the unexpected intimacies and caresses of the melodies in its wonderful second movement, and its moving end—and then, Mme Gadski, singing Weber's best aria, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" from "Der Freischuetz." She was in splendid voice, and delivered the number with all possible feeling and consummate art.

The bracing Goldmark "Sakuntala" overture allowed her breathing space, and then came the music of the closing scene of the "Goetterdaemmerung," with the walls of Valhalla crashing down and Brunnhilde singing in the middle of it. It seems hard to believe, but the scene is more impressive on the concert platform than with the necessarily unimpressive fire scene before one's eyes. It is hard to forget that the fire one sees is safe, though within a theatre where fire is feared if it is big enough to reach to a single chorus girl; forced to visualize the fire and destruction through the music, one gets a far greater blaze.

There were roses for Mme Gadski, and recalls, and more recalls. She prettily insisted that the applause was for Mr Gericke, and he in turn, with perfect gravity and an eloquent gesture, turned all the admiration of the audience over to the orchestra. He made them stand up to acknowledge it; they had risen before, on his entrance and in recognition of the applause which was intended for him.

BOSTON PAYS NOBLE TRIBUTE TO MR. GERICKE

Entire Audience Rises With Symphony Orchestra When He Is Presented Upon Entrance With Huge Wreath.

Journal — Apr. 25, 1906

A crowd of musical enthusiasts filled Symphony Hall last evening. They had come to show their admiration for Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past five years, and for five other years now quite long ago, but who is soon to leave the fine organization of which he has been so great and powerful a part. The occasion was a testimonial to him and for his benefit, and in this practical way the people of this city showed how warm a place the great leader has in their regard, never more warm than at the present moment.

At Mr. Gericke's entrance the orchestra rose and Mr. Adamowski stepped forward with a huge wreath of laurel. Some women in the middle of the hall rose, too, and the infection of enthusiasm spread to the whole audience and it sprang to its feet amid tremendous clapping of hands, while the modest gentleman who was the cause of the remarkable demonstration bowed and smiled—a bit sadly it seemed. Another wreath came from an usher later on, and at the close of the concert the conductor was recalled several times, but was not prevailed upon to speak. It was not his official farewell.

The evening was one to be thoroughly enjoyed, for splendid musical fare was offered. The "Leonore," No. 3 overture, is always sure of its effect, and it was nobly played. Cesar Franck's magnificent D minor symphony has now thoroughly established itself as one of the supremely great works, while Goldmark's fascinating "Sakuntala" overture is never made stale by repetition. All of these things gave great delight.

Mme. Gadski presented her services as soloist, and her singing was a notable part of the fine concert. She was heard in the familiar "Freischuetz" aria and in the colossal last scene of "Gotterdammerung."

GIFTS CROWN MR. GERICKE'S FINALE

Vase, Salver and Check for $1200 Presented the Symphony Conductor at His Last Boston Concert.

IN APPRECIATION OF HIS 13 YEARS' SERVICE

Famous Leader Makes His Formal Farewell at Last Performance of the Sym- phony Season.

Herald — Apr. 29, 1906

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the 24th and final concert of its 25th season last evening in Symphony Hall, and Mr. Wilhelm Gericke then made his last appearance as the conductor of these concerts after 13 years of most honorable service (1884-89; 1898-1906).

The programme was as follows:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival".....Berlioz
Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte...Bach-Bachrich
"Romeo and Juliet," overture fantasia....
Tschalkowsky
Symphony in C minor.....Beethoven

These compositions are well known here and they do not demand on this occasion extended discussion, though an essayist might find pleasure in analyzing the different methods of three great romanticists, Beethoven, Berlioz and Tschalkowsky—for the Beethoven of the fifth symphony is surely a romanticist, even as the term is understood today.

But the feature of last night's concert was one of a peculiarly sentimental interest—the presentation of a vase, salver and a check for $1200 to Mr. Gericke, tokens of appreciation and affection.

The vase and salver are the work of Mr. Arthur J. Stone of Gardner, Mass., of the Society of Arts and Crafts, from drawings by Mr. C. Howard Walker. The vase, which is 10 1/4 inches in height, is of simple form, with a delicate scroll decoration upon the shoulder of the vase, in the centre of which is the small figure of a winged Love conducting with a baton. Around the neck of the vase in fine gold letters is the following inscription: "To Wilhelm Gericke in grateful appreciation from friends and admirers, Boston, April 28, 1906." The salver has as a border a wave pattern of laurel branches with the berries in gold upon the lines of the musical staff.

After the performance of the symphony, Mr. Henry M. Rogers addressed the audience as follows:

"Ladies and Gentlemen—I have been requested to present to Mr. Gericke on the eve of his departure an expression of our grateful appreciation of all that he has done for us and for music in Boston during his residence among us. We have come to the close of the 25th season of the Symphony concerts. For more than one-half of that time Mr. Gericke has striven to make good the ideals of the founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has made this occasion possible. Without further preface, I ask your sympathetic co-operation with me in the presentation of our gift.

Mr. Rogers then read to Mr. Gericke from the scroll designed by Mr. I. M. Gaugengigl which bears the names of the contributors: "We ask your acceptance of our gift as an expression of our gratitude, our esteem, and our affection. In these simple words we would attest our recognition of your measureless service and the attendant brilliant results; of your consistent uplifting and upholding of the ideal; and of your widespread influence for good."

that will gather strength as time goes on. For years you have given entire devotion to the Boston Symphony orchestra; its noble record of achievement is at once the history of its past and the inspiration of its future. You carry with you the affectionate regard and best wishes of this community, and the heartiest 'God speed' that can be uttered."

Mr. Gericke had been deeply moved by the heartiness of the welcome when he came on the stage to conduct the overture by Berlioz. After Mr. Rogers' short address he was evidently overcome by his emotions, but he made a few remarks. He expressed his thanks to the founder and maintainer of the orchestra, to the public, to the critics, and to the players. Recalled again by the audience, which stood and cheered him, he bowed, but could not speak.

Thus ended the most brilliant season in the history of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Vase and Salver Presented as Parting Gifts to Retiring Symphony Conductor

Globe
When Wilhelm Gericke, leader of the Boston symphony orchestra, mounted the conductor's stand to direct last evening's program he saw by the bouquets of red and white roses, tied with red, white and black ribbons—the Austrian colors—which hung from the stand, and the festoon of laurel which bordered the stage, that his last appearance in Boston, barring this evening's benefit for the San Francisco sufferers, was thoughtfully remembered. There was no idea, however, in his mind of what was to follow.

The final number was, like all concluding selections, applauded enthusiastically, and the hand-clapping was continued while Mr. Gericke bowed several times. The demonstration did not cease even when he left the stage, and then it must have been clear to him that it was more than impersonal. Once again did he come forward and bow and then return "off stage."

But the applause had not been interrupted or diminished, and for a third time he stepped to the front. By this time the silver vase and salver which his friends and admirers had prepared for him had been placed in the center of the stage. There, too, stood Henry M. Rogers, who was then ready to make the presentation speech. Not until Mr

VASE, SALVER AND $1200.

Globe Apr. 29, 1906 Gifts to Conductor Gericke, Who Is Leaving Boston.

SILVER VASE AND SALVER PRESENTED TO WILHELM GERICKE, LEADER OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, FROM HIS BOSTON FRIENDS.

Rogers' first word did the audience stop applauding. Mr. Rogers said: "Ladies and Gentlemen—I have been requested to present to Mr. Gericke on the eve of his departure an expression of our grateful appreciation of all that he has done for us and for music in Boston during his residence among us. (Applause.)

"We have come to the close of the 25th season of the Symphony concerts. For more than one-half of that time Mr Gericke has striven to make good the ideals of the founder of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has made this occasion possible. (Applause.)

"Without further preface, I ask your sympathetic cooperation with me in the presentation of our gift."

At this point Mr Rogers read to Mr Gericke from the scroll, designed by Mr Gaugengigl, as follows:

"Mr Gericke—We ask your acceptance of our gift as an expression of our gratitude, our esteem and our affection. In these simple words we would attest our recognition of your measureless service and the attendant brilliant results; of your consistent uplifting and upholding of the ideal and of your widespread influence for good, that will gather strength as time goes on. For years you have given entire devotion to the Boston Symphony orchestra; its noble record of achievement is at once the history of its past and the inspiration of its future.

"You carry with you the affectionate regard and best wishes of this community, and the heartiest God Speed that can be uttered." (Applause.)

When Mr Rogers finished there was a renewal of the applause and it was continued while Mr Rogers walked over to Mr Gericke and shook his hand warmly and patted his shoulder several times. Mr Gericke bowed to Mr Rogers and then hopped upon the conductor's stand in much the same way he does at the beginning of a concert. Turning directly to Mr Rogers, he made an acknowledgment of the gifts. What he said, however, was lost to most of the audience, for as he spoke his head was turned sidewise. He said he fully appreciated the honor and took the opportunity to pay a high tribute to Maj Higginson who, he said, was deserving of greater credit than any one else. In conclusion he thanked his audience and the members of the orchestra and then bowed again.

The gathering of admirers was not satisfied to let it drop at that, but continued their applause until Mr Gericke placed his right hand on his heart and bowed five or six times more.

The vase and salver presented to Mr Gericke are the work of Arthur J. Stone of Gardner, Mass., from drawings by C. Howard Walker.

The vase, which is 10 1/4 inches in height, is of simple form with a delicate scroll decoration upon the shoulder of the vase, in the center of which is the small figure of a winged Love with a baton conducting. Around the neck of the vase in fine gold letters is the following inscription: "To Wilhelm Gericke, in grateful appreciation from friends and admirers. Boston, April 28, 1906." The salver has as a border a wave pattern of laurel branches with the berries in gold upon the lines of the musical staff.

The check, which is made in addition to the silver tribute, amounted to about $1200.

GERICKE TESTIMONIAL.

Gercke — Apr. 22, 1906
Substantial Token of Boston's Esteem
Will be Tendered the Retiring
Leader of the Symphony.

Wilhelm Gericke, who with the end of the last season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, resigned as leader of that renowned organization, is soon to leave this country.

In all Mr Gericke has held the responsible position as leader of this musical organization for 13 years, and in that time has done much to fortify the reputation of Boston as a musical center in this country, in addition to giving enjoyment to the thousands who have heard the concerts given under his direction.

He has endeared himself to every music lover in Boston, and they in their turn now desire to present him some token of the great esteem in which he is held here. A committee of nearly 150 of the leading men and women of Boston have sent out a circular letter asking for subscriptions, not exceeding $2 each, from those who desire to share in this testimonial of esteem and affection.

The letter states that subscriptions may be sent to Henry M. Rogers, 309 Beacon st., who has consented to act as treasurer of the fund. It is intended to have the name of every subscriber appear on a scroll to be presented Mr Gericke.

Those who signed the circular letter are as follows:

Mrs Louis Agassiz	Mr & Mrs L C Elson
Mr & Mrs S R Anthony	Mr & Mrs A Foote
Mr & Mrs T Allen	Prof & Mrs W G Farlow
Mrs Josef Adamowski	Miss Elsie Fay
Mrs T Adamowski	Miss Frances Thomson
Mrs Ole Bull	French
Mr & Mrs Bradlee	Mrs James T Field
Mrs Joseph Bell	Gov & Mrs C Guild Jr
Dr & Mrs H H A Beach	Mrs John L Gardner
Mr W P Blake	Mr & Mrs W Goodrich
Mr A Pierson Beebe	Mr Heinrich Gebhard
Mr & Mrs F E Converse	Mr I M Gaugengigl
Mr & Mrs Ralph Adams Cram	Mr E Howard Gay
Mr & Mrs C P Curtis	Mrs H H Gallison
Mr & Mrs Samuel Carr	Mr & Mrs John C Gray
Mr & Mrs E H Clement	Mr & Mrs G A Goddard
Miss Emma Cary	Mr & Mrs H L Higginson
Mr & Mrs R M Cushing	Mr & Mrs F L Higginson
Mr & Mrs R C Dixey	Mr & Mrs E B Hill
Miss Louisa Dresel	Mr & Mrs S H Hooper
Miss Ellis L Dresel	Mrs Edward C Pickering
Mrs F. Gordon Dexter	Prof J K Paine
Mr & Mrs E Hubbard	Mr & Mrs J Quincy
Mr & Mrs Philip Hale	Mrs William Barton
Mme Hopekirk	Rogers
Miss Hunt	Miss Catherine Russell
Mrs Julia Ward Howe	Mr & Mrs H M Rogers
Mrs George Howe	Mrs M S Russell
Miss Higginson	Prof & Mrs T W Richards
Miss B Higginson	ards
Mrs J H Hecht	Prof & Mrs B L Robinson
Mrs Richard J Hall	Prof & Mrs J H Ropes
Mr Clayton Johns	Mr & Mrs W Sargent
Miss Sarah Orne Jewett	Mrs George R Shaw
Mrs Phoebe A P Jenks	Mr & Mrs O C Stevens
Mrs F W Jones	Mr & Mrs G H Stoddard
Mr & Mrs B J Lang	Mr & Mrs C S Sargent
Miss Margaret Lang	Mrs Glendon Scull
Miss Alice Longfellow	Prof & Mrs C H Toy
Mr & Mrs T Loring	Miss Edith Thayer
Miss M C Loring	Mr & Mrs J G Thorpe
Mr C M Loeffler	Mr & Mrs S L Thorndike
Miss Lena Little	Mr & Mrs A Thorndike
Mr W A Locke
Dr & Mrs S W Langmaid

Dr & Mrs S J Mixer	Miss Mary A Tappan
Mr & Mrs N Matthews	Mr & Mrs F P Vinton
Dr & Mrs H L Morse	Mrs Roger Wolcott
Mr & Mrs Frank Galt Macomber	Mr & Mrs H M Whitney
Miss F P Mason	Dr & Mrs W F Whitney
Mr & Mrs J B Millet	Mr & Mrs O H Walker
Mrs E C Moore	Mr & Mrs A F Wadsworth
Prof C Elliot Norton	Dr & Mrs O F Wadsworth
Mr & Mrs H Parkman	Mr & Mrs S D Warren
Mr & Mrs F E Peabody	Mrs Andrew Weeks
Mr & Mrs W L Parker	Miss Mary May Winthrop
Mrs John C Phillips	Mr William F Winch
Mrs Ellerton Pratt	Miss Mary May Winsor
Pres & Mrs C W Elliot
Dr & Mrs J W Elliot
Mr & Mrs R D Evans

SOCIAL LIFE.

Herald — Apr. 29, 1906

There was a splendid audience at Symphony Hall Tuesday night for Mr. Gericke's benefit, and many in the hall were warm personal friends of the orchestra leader. The great and evidently very genuine demonstration must have been exceedingly gratifying to Mr. Gericke. Musically, the concert was of highest order. Two immense laurel wreaths were handed up to Mr. Gericke during the evening. Mme. Gadschi, the soloist, wore a Paris gown of pale blue, embroidered in silver. In the audience, largely representative of the best social and musical element, were Mr. and Mrs. F. I. Amory, Mrs. Amory wearing black lace; Mrs. John C. Gray, black jetté lace over white; Mrs. Oliver Ames, in white lace; Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Abbott, the latter wearing a gray princess gown with white lace; Mrs. John C. Phillips, in black, and Miss Anna Phillips, pale blue accordion plaited liberty; Mrs. F. S. Watson, pearl-gray voile; Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, with Mr. T. Dennie Boardman, Mrs. Goodrich in black jetté net and lace; Mr. and Mrs. F. S. Converse, the latter all in black; Mrs. Eben D. Jordan, in gray silk; Miss Dorothy Jordan, pale blue chiffon and lace; Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, white Valenciennes lace; Miss Sally Lawrence, pale blue silk; Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Whitney and Miss Laura Whitney, Mrs. Whitney wearing pale blue silk with white lace; Mr. and Mrs. Dudley Fay and Miss Rosamond Fay, Mrs. Fay in green brocade silk and lace; Mr. and Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. Luce in cream lace, and Mrs. Matthew Luce, Sr., in black satin; Mrs. Pierre Severance, in black lace over white, and Miss Emily Severance, in mode volle. Others there were Mrs. Gericke, with her daughter and mother; Mr. Robert M. Cushing, with Mrs. Andreas Andersen and Mr. Grafton Cushing; Mr. Horatio Lamb, Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. Richard C. Dixey, Miss Rosamond Dixey and Miss Mary Tappan, Mr. and Mrs. DeFord Bigelow, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Carr, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Bradlee, Dr. and Mrs. Henry Lee Morse, Mr. B. J. Lang and Miss Rosamond Lang, Mr. and Mrs. W. B. P. Weeks, Miss Dorothy Bolles, Mr. and Mrs. James R. Poor, Mrs. B. P. Cheney and Miss Elizabeth Cheney, the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. William H. Lyon, Dr. Hall Curtis and his daughter, Mrs. Robert Heaton, Mrs. Adamowski, Mr. and Mrs. Boylston Beal, Mr. and Mrs. Francis R. Allen and Miss Dorothy Allen, Mr. and Mrs. F. P. Vinton, Mrs. Charles M. Clapp and Miss Clapp, Miss Fanny French, Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Young, Miss Kate Folsom, Mr. John P. Lyman and Mr. Gaugengigl, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Mrs. Roger Allen and Miss Rosamond Allen, Mrs. S. B. Field, the Misses Mills, Mrs. Arthur Mills and Miss Anna Mills, Miss Annie and Miss Abby Manning, Miss Katrine Coolidge, Miss Dorothy Fay, Mrs. Philip Hale, Miss Marlon Pierce and Mr. Johnson Morton. Last night after the concert, which ended the season and for which there was a tremendous audience, Mr. Henry M. Rogers stepped on the platform and presented Mr. Gericke with a vase valued at $600 or more, made by the Arts and Crafts Society, and a check for a large amount from a number of his personal friends, which act of course brought enthusiasm to boiling point. The benefit, by the way, Tuesday night, made for Mr. Gericke about $3500.

SILVER CUP FOR WILHELM GERICKE

Great Conductor Bids Farewell to Boston and the Symphony
Orchestra.

B Journal — Apr. 30, 1906
The closing of the Symphony season on Saturday evening was an occasion of both interest and regret. It marked the completion of a quarter of a century of these world-renowned concerts, and it was also the official and real farewell of Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor who has been the guiding spirit of the orchestra for more than half that time, and has, more than any other, made it great. The immense audience showed in no uncertain way its appreciation of his work; unusually hearty applause greeted the leader's appearance and this swelled and grew as piece after piece of the noble program was played until, as the last triumphal chords of the immortal "Fifth" symphony died away, it became an overwhelming tumult of hand-clapping and shouts.

A Gift of Silver.

At this point Henry M. Rogers stepped to the front of the stage bearing a beautiful silver cup and salver, the gift of a large number of Symphony-goers. A check for $1200 was concealed somewhere about the vase's classic depths, and there was a parchment scroll reciting the reason for the tribute.

With deep earnestness Mr. Rogers made a little address of presentation, to which Mr. Gericke responded in almost voiceless emotion, thanking his friends, the orchestra and the musical writers. A final burst of applause and there passed from these concerts a great conductor, a man of all-around and satisfying ability, whose equal in respect of evenness and steadily likable qualities it will be hard to find.

Music Secondary.

For once the music was of secondary importance, and yet the brilliant charm of the Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture, the placid beauty of the Bach pieces, the hot and eloquent passion of the Tchaikowsky "Romeo and Juliet" tone-poem and the classic romanticism of the "Fifth" Symphony were each full of enjoyment in turn.

It was a true Gericke program, played, for the most part, with customary elegance and spirit.

—Mr Gericke received a splendid ovation on Tuesday evening at his benefit concert, when a very brilliant audience completely filled Symphony hall. As Mr Gericke appeared upon the stage the orchestra rose and the whole audience followed, applauding for some minutes. Mr Adamowski, who has been taking the place of Mr Hess as concert master, then presented an immense laurel wreath tied with broad red ribbons, the years of their leader's service stamped in gold upon them. Mr Gericke came forward and bowed again and again, and there was no end to the enthusiasm of the audience, which manifested itself after all the selections of the program had been played. After the Leonora overture, a symphony by

Caesar Franck was played and then Mme Gadske, who had kindly proffered her services to Mr Gericke, sang an aria from "Der Freischütz." She was charming in a pale blue satin gown trimmed both skirt and bodice with lace, and wearing one red rose at the front of the corsage. A large bouquet of American beauty roses was handed her over the footlights. After the Sakuntala overture, there came the closing scene from "Götter Dämmerung" played gloriously by the orchestra and sung by Mme Gadske. Both Mr Gericke and Mme Gadske were several times recalled, but the audience were insistent that Mr Gericke should appear alone, which he did amid unbounded applause. A few in the house were Mr and Mrs Leverett Tuckerman, Mrs William P. Fay, Miss Katherine Fay, Dr and Mrs Frank Harrington, Mr and Mrs Richard C. Dixey, Mr and Mrs Elliot Hubbard, Mrs Thomas Allen, Miss Allen in pale gray and gray cloak; Mrs John C. Phillips, Miss Anna Phillips, in pale light blue striped satin, with lace trimmings; Mr and Mrs Frederic S. Converse, the latter in black velvet and lace; Mr and Mrs Henry L. Higginson, the latter in black Spanish lace; Mrs Phoebe Jenks, Mr and Mrs James Lowell Putnam, Mr and Mrs Boylston Beal and Mrs Gordon Dexter formed a party in the balcony; Mrs Dexter in emerald green velvet, Mrs Putnam in pale gray with lace and Mrs Beal in light blue with pink roses; Mr Robert M. Cushing with his daughter, Mrs Edward James, in black crepe de chine with transparent yoke of cluny lace; Mr Grafton Cushing, Mr and Mrs Gordon Abbott, the latter in an exquisite princess gown of gray crepe de chine, the sleeves of heavy lace the same shade; Mrs John L. Gardner, Miss Rosamund Saltonstall, in white valenciennes lace; Miss Barbara Higginson, in white lace with flounces trimmed with pale blue ribbon; Mrs Timothee Adamowski, in pompadour silk muslin with touches of blue at the bodice; Mr and Mrs Winthrop Sargent, Mrs Sargent, in pale gray silk and gray cloak; Mrs Francis Watson, in ecru voile and wearing a superb Persian silk wrap; Mr and Mrs Wallace Goodrich, Mrs Goodrich, in black velvet; Mr T. Dennie Boardman, Mr and Mrs Lang, Mrs Francis H. Peabody, Mr W. P. Blake, Miss Anne Dehon Blake, Mr and Mrs Henry M. Rogers, Mrs Bernard C. Weld, Mrs Seth Sprague, Miss Hooper, Dr Frederic Jack, Dr and Mrs Henry Lee Morse, Mrs George Rice, Mrs Wheatland, Mrs James P. Stearns, Mme Szumowska; Mrs Parkman Blake and Mrs Gericke, with her little daughter and her mother. Globe Apr. 29, 1906

A Letter from Mr. Gericke to His Friends

The following letter from Mr. Gericke, which we owe to the courtesy of Mr. Henry M. Rogers, explains itself and is its own excuse for publication:

Brookline, Mass., April 30, 1906.

My Dear Mr. Rogers—I should like to express my heartfelt appreciation and gratitude through you to all whose names are signed on the scroll that accompanied the beautiful and truly artistic vase presented to me, together with a most generous token of goodwill, and, if I may say it, of affection.

During my life in Boston, I have often been made happy by assurance of private friendships, and I have often been deeply moved by the more than friendly disposition of the Symphony audiences towards me; but I was wholly unprepared for the tribute paid me last week, a tribute of which I wish I could feel I were more worthy.

When I received the gifts in public, my feelings overcame me, and I knew that my few words were an inadequate expression of my thoughts. There were many things I wished to say, but even now I hardly know how to say them. Believe me, I am truly grateful. The knowledge that the musical community and the public at large were so kindly disposed toward me will be a deep and abiding pleasure during my remaining years. Yours faithfully,

Wilhelm Gericke.

GERICKE GRATEFUL.

Former Symphony Conductor Expresses Thanks for Magnificent Scroll and Vase Given Him.

The following letter from Mr. Gericke explains itself and is its own excuse for publication:

Mr. Henry M. Rogers, Boston:

My Dear Mr. Rogers: I should like to express my heartfelt appreciation and gratitude through you to all whose names are signed on the scroll that accompanied the beautiful and truly artistic vase presented to me, together with a most generous token of goodwill, and, if I may say it, of affection.

During my life in Boston, I have often been made happy by assurance of private friendships, and I have often been deeply moved by the more than friendly disposition of the Symphony audiences toward me; but I was wholly unprepared for the tribute paid me last week, a tribute of which I wish I could feel I were more worthy.

When I received the gifts in public, my feelings overcame me, and I knew that my few words were an inadequate expression of my thoughts. There were many things I wished to say, but even now I hardly know how to say them. Believe me, I am truly grateful. The knowledge that the musical community and the public at large were so kindly disposed toward me will be a deep and abiding pleasure during my remaining years. Yours faithfully,

WILHELM GERIQUE.
Brookline, April 30, 1906.

GERICKE RETURNS THANKS FOR GIFTS

Expresses His Deep Gratitude to Symphony-Goers for Their Recent Kindly Remembrance.

B. Journal May 3 1906

Henry M. Rogers, who, in behalf of a large number of Symphony-goers, presented Conductor Gericke with a silver vase and salver last Saturday evening, on the event of his retirement from the orchestra, has received the following:

My Dear Mr. Rogers—I should like to express my heartfelt appreciation and gratitude through you to all whose names are signed on the scroll that accompanied the beautiful and truly artistic vase presented to me, together with a most generous token of goodwill, and, if I may say it, of affection.

During my life in Boston I have often been made happy by assurance of private friendships, and I have often been deeply moved by the more than friendly disposition of the Symphony audiences toward me; but I was wholly unprepared for the tribute paid me last week, a tribute of which I wish I could feel I were more worthy.

When I received the gifts in public my feelings overcame me, and I knew that my few words were an inadequate expression of my thoughts. There were many things I wished to say, but even now I hardly know how to say them. Believe me, I am truly grateful. The knowledge that the musical community and the public at large were so kindly disposed toward me will be a deep and abiding pleasure during my remaining years. Yours faithfully,
WILHELM GERIQUE.

Mr. Gericke left Boston yesterday going to New York whence he sails for Cherbourg on Tuesday. He intends to spend a month in Paris and then to go to Switzerland for the summer. In the autumn he will settle at Vienna. May 7 1906

The board of directors of the Boston symphony orchestra pension fund wishes to acknowledge the gift of $300 made to the fund by Mr Gericke, the retiring conductor of the orchestra.

When William Gericke leaves Boston he will take with him the portrait of his daughter, Maïda Gericke, which has just been finished by Miss Annie B. Shepley, well known as a painter of children.

MAROFF.

280

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1905-06.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

XXIV. CONCERT.

(Last of the Season.)

SATURDAY, APRIL 28, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BERLIOZ.

OVERTURE, "The Roman Carnival." op. 9.

BACH.

PRELUDE, ADAGIO and GAVOTTE, in Rondo form.
(Arranged for Strings by SIGISMUND BACHRICH.)

TSCHAIKOWSKY.

OVERTURE, "Romeo and Juliet," Fantasia after Shakespeare.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro: Trio.
IV. Allegro.

281

282

BADE GERICKE GOOD-BYE IN TRIUMPH.

Bata American 1906
Vase, Salver and Check Presented to Retiring Conductor at Symphony Concert.

FESTAL AUDIENCE
GAVE HIM CHEERS

By Kent Perkins.

Although the final concert of the season in Symphony Hall last night took the form of a farewell to Wilhelm Gericke, the retiring conductor of the orchestra, there was no note of sadness in the great audience that crowded the hall or in the brief ceremony of good-bye that followed the last number on the programme.

There was plenty of regret at parting from the leader who has guided the artistic steps of the organization for more than half of the twenty-five years of its existence, but all sadness was overwhelmed and submerged in the outpouring of ardent esteem and respect that made the evening one of festal triumph rather than of sorrow.

Greeted With Hearty Applause.

The conductor's stand was garbed in wreaths and decorated with ribbons. Mr. Gericke was greeted with a great outburst of applause when he appeared, and for many minutes the insistence of his admirers would not let him begin the concert.

In the presentation of the programme, one of the greatest of the season in the noble elevation of all the numbers, the orchestra caught the spirit of the occasion and worked with a unity and enthusiasm that were inspiring.

The music was as follows: The "Roman Carnival" overture; Bach's Adagio and Gavotte in rondo form, arranged for strings by Bachrich; Tschalkowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture and Beethoven's splendid fifth symphony. At the close of the symphony and after Mr. Gericke had retired amid the applause and cheers, a handsome silver salver and vase were brought forward and placed on a stand beside the conductor's platform. The vase contained a handsome bunch of orchids. Then Henry M. Rogers stepped upon the stage and waited till Mr. Gericke was brought back, evidently a bit dazed by the unusual aspect of affairs on the Symphony platform.

Scroll Went with Gift.

Mr. Rogers, in a few simple but eloquent words, explained that the gift was an expression of grateful appreciation from Mr. Gericke's friends, not forgetting a tribute to Major Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, and read a scroll that was designed by Mr. Gaugengigl and accompanied the gift. The scroll said:

283

Symphony Hall.

Twenty-Sixth Season, 1906-1907.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Opening Concert,

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 13, 1906.

BADE GERICKE GOOD-BYE IN TRIUMPH.

Boston American 7/12/29

Vase, Salver and Check Presented to Retiring Conductor at Symphony Concert.

FESTAL AUDIENCE
GAVE HIM CHEERS

By Kent Perkins.

Although the final concert of the season in Symphony Hall last night took the form of a farewell to Wilhelm Gericke, the retiring conductor of the orchestra, there was no note of sadness in the great audience that crowded the hall or in the brief ceremony of good-bye that followed the last number on the programme.

There was plenty of regret at parting from the leader who has guided the artistic steps of the organization for more than half of the twenty-five years of its existence, but all sadness was overwhelmed and submerged in the outpouring of ardent esteem and respect that made the evening one of festal triumph rather than of sorrow.

Greeted With Hearty Applause.

The conductor's stand was garbed in wreaths and decorated with ribbons. Mr. Gericke was greeted with a great outburst of applause when he appeared, and for many minutes the insistence of his admirers would not let him begin the concert.

In the presentation of the programme, one of the greatest of the season in the noble elevation of all the numbers, the orchestra caught the spirit of the occasion and worked with a unity and enthusiasm that were inspiring.

The music was as follows: The "Roman Carnival" overture; Bach's Adagio and Gavotte in rondo form, arranged for strings by Bachrich; Tschalkowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture and Beethoven's splendid fifth symphony.

At the close of the symphony and after Mr. Gericke had retired amid the applause and cheers, a handsome silver salver and vase were brought forward and placed on a stand beside the conductor's platform. The vase contained a handsome bunch of orchids. Then Henry M. Rogers stepped upon the stage and waited till Mr. Gericke was brought back, evidently a bit dazed by the unusual aspect of affairs on the Symphony platform.

Scroll Went with Gift.

Mr. Rogers, in a few simple but eloquent words, explained that the gift was an expression of grateful appreciation from Mr. Gericke's friends, not forgetting a tribute to Major Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, and read a scroll that was designed by Mr. Gaugengigl and accompanied the gift. The scroll said:

Symphony Hall.

Twenty-Sixth Season, 1906-1907.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Opening Concert,

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 13, 1906.

Closing Concert of the Symphony Season.

"Pops" Begin Tuesday Night--- Frisco Fund Benefits.

Sousa Tonight — Other Events of the Week.

Globe — Apr. 29, 1906

The closing program of the 25th season of the Boston symphony orchestra contained no solo numbers. It was wholly orchestral and comprised the overture to "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; prelude, adagio and gavotte in rondo form, Bach; the overture fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschalkowsky, and Beethoven's Fifth symphony. Since Mr Gericke's resignation as conductor has become known, patrons of the symphonies have begun to express their appreciation of his high abilities by an unusual amount of applause, just as if he was a soloist, and the former lethargy so marked at the rehearsals and concerts has apparently been supplanted, temporarily at least, by real honest and hearty plaudits for conductor and men. Last week the demonstrations were specially enthusiastic, and after nearly every selection Mr Gericke was obliged to bow many responses to applause and also, in the Bach number particularly, the men came in for their share and rose from their seats to make acknowledgments.

And the last program made the performances seem so "homelike," as it were. Just the regular magnificent orchestra and the regular audiences to enjoy the beautiful interpretations. The delicately fantastic "Carnival" by Berlioz went with a swing and verve that fairly set one's feet a-tripping its delightful measures. All the brief responses by the basses and wood winds were played in perfect time, despite the rapidity of the tempos.

The quality of the string contingent of the orchestra was displayed in splendid form in the Bach prelude, adagio and gavotte, which frequently serve as solo pieces for violinists. In the arrangement for string orchestra there is but little change from the original form and so each player practically becomes a soloist. The unanimity of the orchestral work was seemingly perfect and the wonderful smooth and harmonious interpretation made the piece the gem of the interesting program. Mr Gericke insisted that his men deserved the applause, not he, so they stood up once or twice and bowed to the auditors.

The Tschalkowski overture and Beethoven's grand symphony were given with splendid effect, as if Mr Gericke and his associates, being in thorough sympathy with the occasion, determined to make the closing of the regular season under his guidance a memorable event. The enthusiasm which ran through the whole performance culminated in a very pleasing finale, an account of which will be found in another part of the Sunday Globe.

In the regular summary for the season printed in the program it appears that 48 composers were represented on the 24 weekly programs and just 100 different works were played. Beethoven led with eight, Wagner followed with seven to his credit, then came Liszt with six. Bach, Mendelssohn, Mozart, R. Strauss, Tschalkowsky and Weber had four each. Eighteen compositions were performed for the first time in Boston, three symphonies, six symphonic poems, five overtures and preludes, one suite and three concertos.

Twenty-four soloists appeared, pianists and violinists occupying first place, seven each. Mr Vincent d'Indy, the celebrated French composer, conducted two concerts by invitation, and Mr Hess and Mr Strube of the orchestra also led performances at various times.

SYMPHONY CONTRIBUTION.

Boston's Famous Orchestra Raised
$2485.50 for the Aid of the California Sufferers.

Herald — May 1, 1906
The following letter has been sent by F. G. Roby, cashier of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to Kidder, Peabody & Co.:

Dear Sirs: I have the pleasure of sending you a check for $2485.50, which represents the gross receipts from the concert given last evening by the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the benefit of the San Francisco relief fund, to which please apply it. At the same time, we desire to acknowledge the services of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor; of Mme. Olga Samaroff, soloist, and of all the others who have enabled us to turn over the entire receipts of the concert. Inclosed you will find a box office statement showing the receipts in detail. Very truly yours,

CHAS. A. ELLIS, Manager.
FRED R. COMEE, Asst. Manager.

Received and sold 564 at $1.50....	$846.00
Received and sold 772 at $1.00....	772.00
Received and sold 392 at 75c.....	294.00
Received and sold $41 at 50c.....	420.50
And sold 306 admissions at 50c....	153.00

Total.....$2,485.50
F. G. ROBY, Cashier.

Boston, April 30, 1906.

Good-By to Gericke

Journal — May 8, 1906

Today Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, for so many years and for two separate periods conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sets sail for Germany, quite likely to return no more. Mr. Gericke is now in the sixties, and his homeland will strengthen her hold upon him as the years go by. It is worth noting that he is in far better physical condition than when he left Boston before, some fifteen years ago, but for all that, the chances are against his returning to America. We say it with regret, for even if Boston is not disposed to require his services again, there are other orchestras in the country to which he would be of inestimable value. It is, of course, not yet impossible that some one of them will be wise enough to secure him.

Mr. Gericke has been a good citizen and a gentleman of high purposes, as well as a great musician, during his residence in Boston, and all who have come under his influence will wish him long life and much prosperity as he retires from the post he has done so much to adorn.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Globe 30/4/06
Berlioz. "Carnival Romaine," Overture.
Bach. Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte, for String Orchestra.
Tschalkowsky. "Romeo and Juliet," Overture.
Beethoven. Symphony in C minor, No. 5.

The symphonic season is done and already Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Comee and the "Pops" loom upon the horizon. The concert of Saturday was in some degree a landmark, an epoch. It rounded out the quarter-century of orchestral work of the organization, and it ended the term of service of the great conductor, Mr. Gericke. As we intimated, last Wednesday, the real farewell was spoken by the Symphony audience at a Symphony concert, and not at the extraneous "benefit" performance. It was a scene of remarkable enthusiasm from first to last. The applause at the appearance of Mr. Gericke was very prolonged. Every number was punctuated with abnormal fervor on the part of the audience.

In spite of its being wholly an orchestral concert (and the public loves a soloist) every seat was occupied. The programme was typical of Mr. Gericke's moderately conservative taste. Having presented, with the most pains-taking care, many compositions with which he was not in perfect sympathy, the conductor evidently made up the two last programmes to suit himself, and brought in some of those old classics which he loves best. The public seems to begin to share these tastes.

There are signs that the ultra-modern fever has almost run its course and that the "unearthly beauty" of D'Indy, and the "intangible perfume" of Debussy, the eccentricities of Mahler, and the fetid morbidity of the later works of Strauss and Loeffler will soon give way to a healthier atmosphere and more easily discerned charms. Our Boston symphony concert audiences are certainly not below the average in intelligence and quick perception, and they show unmistakably how much they prize the older school above the modern strivings. If only a Genius would now arise whose tendency should be melodic the reaction would be quickly accomplished. The "Roman Carnival" overture was beautifully performed in every part; its tender English horn melody, its chromatic whirlwinds, its wild dance rhythms, were all perfectly caught up.

The Bach selections showed the brilliancy of our string orchestra—if that needed demonstration—and was the most attractive feature of the concert. The melody of that grand Adagio was as serene as an Athenian frieze, and as lofty. Not only was the conductor obliged to bow his acknowledgments of the applause after the Bach work three or four times, but the whole orchestra of strings rose twice in response to the unceasing enthusiasm.

Tschalkowsky's great overture came in excellent contrast, for this composer is most modern in orchestration and in emotional power, yet always coherent and often melodic. There is more made of the Montague-Capulet feuds than of the lovers. In this work, yet an English-horn Romeo and a muted-violin Juliet can be identified. But there was also something like the following:—

Bassoon (tauntingly)—"Do you bite your thumb, at us, sir?"
Clarinet (yelling)—"I do bite my thumb, sir."

Whereupon would follow "alarums and excursions" and a general melee. It is singular that the highest musical expression of Shakespeare's play has been on the instrumental side, for Berlioz's Balcony Scene, from his symphony, and this overture, outweigh all the tenor and soprano warblings that have clustered around the subject.

We somewhat doubt the statement of the symphony programme book that this overture was played by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Listemann in Boston, Nov. 16, 1890.

Beethoven's fifth symphony was nobly played and was a fitting finale of the Gericke regime. In its time this was considered very advanced music. The trombones had never been used in symphony before this, and the figure development of the first movement and the furious work of the contrabasses in the Trio of the Scherzo were far in advance of their epoch. We have never heard the contrabass phrases so clearly given. We fancy that the difficulty of this portion of the work was intended by Beethoven as a reply to Weber who had satirized the difficult contrabass passages which end the fourth symphony.

When the symphony had ended the climax of the remarkable enthusiasm of the evening was reached. Of course this was intended for the conductor personally. In the midst of this tumult Mr. Henry M. Rogers was seen upon the platform with a vase and salver of silver. Mr. Gericke at first was unaware of his presence, but was finally corralled and made to hear his own praises. Mr. Rogers spoke eloquently of his services and of their appreciation by the community, nor did he forget the "Deus ex Machina," the founder of the orchestra, our most public-spirited Bostonian.

There has never been a voice heard in Symphony Hall that was clearer or more easily followed than that of Mr. Rogers. His address was a keen delight to all and was often interrupted by applause.

Mr. Gericke was evidently touched by the heartiness of it all and could scarcely respond in studied phrases, but there was evident sincerity in every word of his thanks to the public, to the donors of the gift (and there was a large check added to the silver ware), to Mr. Higginson, to the orchestra, and to the critics. The audience and the orchestra stood up and cheers and "bravos" filled the hall.

Thus was the "VALE," and now—QUIS VENIT?
Louis C. Elson.

The Last Symphony Concert

Of courtesy and of right there was no "assisting" singer or virtuoso to divide with Mr. Gericke yesterday the honors of his last afternoon concert. Of wisdom he had put familiar compositions on his programme—Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival" (the first and last of the Frenchman's music to be played at the Symphony concerts this season); the little suite for strings that the Viennese pedagogue, Bachrich, arranged from Bach; Tschlakovski's fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," and Beethoven's fifth symphony. Conductor and band have many times glorified Berlioz's overture. The suite has served before as a mirror of the virtues of our string choir, and its playing has reflected as clearly the beauty and the vivacity of Bach's musical line. Each alternate year Mr. Gericke and his men have recreated Beethoven's C-minor symphony. Only for Tchaikovsky's tone-poem—for in spirit, in not in strict form, his "overture-fantasi" is such—was the audience at all unprepared. It could give its mind as freely as it chose to Mr. Gericke and to the leave-taking for which it had come.

Though the elect ladies of the afternoon concerts filled the parquet and the lower balcony, it was really the farewell of the "rush seats." They have been the faithfullest of Mr. Gericke's auditors week upon week and season upon season, and they have proved their faith by their works of patience and endurance, in sunshine and storm, in cold and wind, on the bleak steps of Symphony Hall. The 525 who were eagerest and most forehanded filled the second balcony yesterday. The belated, the careless and the disappointed were many; but for them, as well as for themselves, the 525 broke into very warm applause when Mr. Gericke stepped upon the stage. The parquet answered to the spur, and for the first time in years an afternoon concert did not begin "at 2.30 precisely." Three minutes—and that is long time for clapping—went to applause, and there were four minutes more of it at the end of the concert. To a man—or oftener to a woman—the 525 stood in their places and recalled the conductor time and again. Parquet and lower balcony kept pace with them and even pressed and clustered toward the stage. The white of handkerchiefs twinkled here and there. The men of the orchestra lingered and watched, and before them and before the clapping house stood Mr. Gericke with the familiar gesture half of sincere acknowledgment, half of as sincere deprecation, that he has used so often of late. Again, as on Tuesday, face and bearing spoke more clearly and deeply for him than words. It was a pity, for the moment, that the "rush seats" were not nearer. At least he looked straight toward them. There must have been the telepathy that understands.

Rarely, the season through, has an afternoon concert gone with such fire. Only in Tchaikovsky's fantasy did this ardor cool, and at best the Russian's music in this particular tone-poem is not very heating. Recall the consuming longing, the absorbing sensuous feeling of the lovers' music in his "Francesca da Rimini," and the tremulous background, as of the amorous rustle of the garden, against which it flows. Contrast with it this earlier music of Romeo and Juliet, and their passion with the fluttering chords behind like the murmurs of the Italian night. In "Francesca" Tchaikovsky wrote with inspiration. In "Romeo and Juliet" there is only imagination, and barely enough to lift the music of the warring houses above very energetic commonplace. Tchaikovsky held no compelling pen as he wrote. There is more thought as one listens, of orchestral virtuosity than of Shakespeare's lovers.

Elsewhere the mood of the hour was stimulating conductor, orchestra and audience to reciprocal responsiveness. Berlioz's overture seemed to leap from the band. The romantic energy of the music told as it seldom tells. The dance tune was as "devilishly vivace" as Berlioz himself could have wished. The music seemed to gather ardor and brilliancy as it sprang forward. For once Berlioz was striking home almost with every phrase and every figure, and it is such a performance that his music needs, if it is to touch half the height of his imaginings. Conductor and orchestra must drive it to the hilts. Then, as it did yesterday, it stabs. There was similar quick spirit in the string choir through Bach's suite. The prelude was luminous musical line that seemed by a kind of tonal magic to be ever curving into some new arabesque of beautiful sound. The adagio was as the melting of one of those curves. The gavotte seemed as magical in its rhythm. This eagerness and responsiveness broadened and deepened into a passion of power as conductor and men swept through the fifth symphony. The impact of the opening measures was electrical to the ear and the imagination. Beethoven's music rose and fell, parted and united, whispered or stormed, struggled or spoke full as though it were a sea of impassioned sound. The pellucid flow of the andante, with the reiterated phrase throbbing underneath with insistent grace, was a delight to the ear and the fancy. Never once did the curve waver or harden. The leap from the scherzo to the triumphant finale was a tonal flash and then to the end the great chords smote. Not often has Mr. Gericke given us so mighty a Beethoven, even in this symphony. Throughout his was sustained power of understanding and expression. There were moments when it rose very close to grandeur.

H. T. P.

Here in Boston

On account of the illness of the first trumpeter of the Symphony Orchestra, upon whom much depends in "Zarathustra," Mr. Gericke has been obliged to take Strauss's tone-poem from the programme of the concerts of Friday and Saturday. For it he has substituted the same composer's earlier piece, "Death and Transfiguration," most familiar and best liked of all Strauss's music and eloquently played at a pair of concerts last October. Unfortunately "Zarathustra" must be abandoned for the season, as the programme for the final pair of concerts for Mr. Gericke's last appearances here is to consist of familiar music. It will include Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," and there will be no soloist.

THE END OF THE SEASON

AGLANCE BACKWARD AND A GLIMPSE FORWARD

The Last Symphony Concert—The "Rush Seats" and Mr. Gericke—The Beginning of "The Pops"—A Concert of American Music—The Miracle of a Self-Supporting Orchestra—Musical News

Except for a few belated recitals, our musical year is ending tonight with the final concert of the Symphony Orchestra. It were easy, with patient diligence, to compile the statistics of the season. Our orchestra, for example, has given fifty-two concerts; the Kneisel Quartet, ten; and so forth and so on. This eminent pianist has appeared on such a day, and that distinguished violinist has taken leave on such another. We have heard this new symphony on the fourth day of the third month, and that new piano piece on the eighth day of the fifth month. But it is not by "tabular views" that most of us recall a season. We may have quite forgotten that Mahler's fifth symphony was played here for the first time between a quarter past three and a quarter past four on the afternoon of Friday, Feb. 2, 1906, the weather being clear, but we do recall the deep pleasure of power and beauty, of individuality, mastery and passion that many of us received from it. Most of us would have to consult the tables of the programme book to remember how many compositions by Schubert or Schumann, Mr. Gericke has played since last October, but there is no forgetting his re-creation of two of their symphonies. We may not enumerate the quartets that Mr. Kneisel and his brethren and Mr. Hess and his have played for us, but we do remember the pleasure, each in its kind, that they have given. The eminent singers have come and gone—Sembrich, Eames, Calvé, Gadski, and others less distinguished. The virtuosi have passed with them—Marie Hall, Heermann, Kubelik and Marteau for violinists; Bauer, Pugno, Reisenauer, Miss Aus der Ohe and Mme. Samaroff for pianists. Our choral societies have given their usual concerts. The Sunday Chamber Concerts have taken root. There has been new music that was interesting and impressive, and new music that was barren and disappointing.

In most respects the season has been much as other seasons. Unfortunately the company of the Metropolitan Opera House has paid us no visit, but we at least brought forth a highly creditable opera of our own in Mr. Converse's "Pipe of Desire." By way of especial distinction so eminent a composer as Mr. d'Indy and so remarkable a conductor as Mr. Weingartner have come to us. For the fifth time in the history of our orchestra we are parting with its conductor and with the conductor who beyond any other man has made the band what musically it is. The audiences at many concerts, outside the regular series of the established societies, and sometimes with them have been exceptionally small, and there has been less interest than usual in the visits of the virtuosi. There are such seasons in the life of every musical capital. They come and they go. When the virtuosi and their managers find us so indifferent that they will not come to us, then we shall cry to have them back again. It is the way of human nature.

It is pleasanter, at the end of a season, to look forward to the next, though it be six months away. In the interval a new conductor will be chosen for our orchestra. He may be already distinguished in his art. Or he may be one of the younger men with the promise of such distinction in him, as Mr. Gericke and Mr. Nikisch were when they first came to us. In either alternative, his coming and the qualities he may disclose in his work will make the Symphony concerts, next year, unusually interesting. There is much likelihood, also, that we shall have our fortnight of opera from one or the other rival houses in New York, perhaps from both. Mr. Conried has shown signs of recovery from his plique against Boston. The Western tour of his company this spring hardly prospered. A year hence it is likely to stay nearer home, and in it at last, if it does visit Boston, will be new singers like Miss Farrar, Miss Morena, Mr. Burrian, and Mr. Roussellare whom we can hear with unaccustomed ears. Mr. Hammerstein will hardly confine his company to New York, and in it already are the Italian tenor, Bonci, who stands in European reputation beside Caruso, and Mme. Melba. Sembrich, Eames, Calvé and Schumann-Heink are all returning next winter. The pianists, Rosenthal, now in the full ripeness of his powers, and Lhévinne, the Russian of the fiery tone; the violinists, Ysäye and Hartmann, are coming to America, and there are other virtuosi, doubtless, for whom managers already have plans.

For eminent conductors, Richard Strauss is arranging an American tour, and Safonoff, the Russian, has now higher reputation on this side of the sea than on the other. When Strauss comes, his opera, "Salomé," is likely to be put on the stage of the Metropolitan, and Mr. Copried and Mr. Hammerstein have each discovered Gluck and profess a jealous eagerness to revive his "Armide." Our new conductor will have his new music, if he is to conform to our established standards of catholicity and curiosity. Mr. Hess is already searching new compositions for his quartet to play next year. Mr. Kniesel's zeal for the new and the interesting is as keen. Reger makes his way. There are Frenchmen, like Ravel, who are following in the steps of Debussy, and whose music would be piquant to hear. No choral society in America cultivates the new as does our Cecilia. Again the Handel and Haydn Society will safeguard the classics of such music, and again we may count upon our series of Sunday chamber concerts. Even in April the prospects of next October and the six months beyond are good to contemplate.

Boston, March 30, 1906.

To The Musical Courier:

In accordance with wired instructions, saw Ellis relative to Sun statements. Says positively has made no arrangements to handle Paderewski in this country next season, nor does he believe anything of the kind will be done. Ellis pronounces report in the Sun to be a fake. Regarding Melba, intimates that she may appear in this country next season, although he has made no arrangements to that effect. Ellis says did not see Hammerstein regarding Melba, as intimated by Sun article; in fact, does not know Hammerstein, whom he has never even met.

BENNETT.

Mr. Ellis' denial regarding Melba is confirmed by Mr. Hammerstein himself, who cables to THE MUSICAL COURIER: "Have engaged Melba for next

sonal negotia- continent. "In sphere lacks the ensky!

first discovered by their who turns on the search-llence lies in being able r up, Richard Strauss.

Riverside drive, New ronchet, Paris, has been loc, a valuable collection g to the brothers, Barons

Mr. Aronson believes on should be acquired by am in the United States," odd pages of typewritten the collection makes or- thusiastically. The first asures includes gifts from y personages, and among rings, medals and tobacco ni by Maria Louisa, Arch- Empress of Austria, King

varia, Madame Rothschild, Nicholas I of Russia, Louis

stria, and two lockets with a Louisa and the Duke of Louisa of Austria. There s presented by the munici a, (the ladies of) Dunkirk nias, diplomas and brevet naking him a Command

PLANS AND THEORIES FOR IMPROVEMENT

Gossip About the Next Sym-phony Conductor; the Orpheus Concert, Etc.

DINNERS were given by musicians last week in honor of Mr. Gericke. There was naturally much informal talk along the tables about the present condition of musical affairs in Boston.

Some were inclined to take a gloomy view. "Mr. Gericke is going, and who, pray, will succeed him? The members of the Kniesel quartet are now New Yorkers. Singers, discouraged because they are paid poorly in church and have little opportunity to sing in local choral concerts, one by one go to New York, where they thrive and are apparently happy. There is a deplorable lack of general and intelligent interest in music. Fifteen or even ten years ago young women were in the habit of attending choral concerts and recitals. Concert-going was considered to be a mark of culture. Today the young women of the same class are seldom seen in concert halls and many of them say frankly that music bores them."

It is true that Mr. Gericke is going. It is also true that the superb orchestra remains. There will be a conductor next season, and in all probability he will be an excellent one. There have been many wild statements about Mr. Gericke's successor, statements that were born in the morning and that died at noon. We have all read that Mr. Nikisch, who is today beyond doubt and peradventure the most distinguished conductor in Europe, demanded $50,000 a year and that his life should be insured for a large sum. He may also have asked for a house on the water side of Beacon street and that the Governor and the mayor should be in waiting at the wharf. Mr. Nikisch may or may not have demanded the sum named above.

It has also been stated definitely by some who have "inside information" that a conductor will be chosen for one season, after which Mr. Gustav Mahler of Vienna will rule the orchestral roast. The statement has been made in London journals that Mr. Fritz Steinbach was offered the position. A Berlin correspondent insists that Mr. Oskar Fried of that city has been invited to fill the vacant place. Mr. Fried was not long ago a horn player. We infer from the article of the correspondent that as composer and conductor he still blows his horn. Music affects him as he conducts. Under the influence of it, we read, "He suggests nothing so much as with all rapidity, turning so the rhythmic measures." He would be just the man for Strauss' "Don Quixote." Nor is he wearied by this violent physical exercise, but we are informed by the Musical Leader and Concert-Goer that Mr. Nikisch crumbles into a heap in the artists' room after a performance of Tschalkowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. "That he has followed his hero through joy and sorrow, through mirth and woe until the death-knell sounds and 'Nirwana' receives him, there can be no doubt, and his utter exhaustion would silence at once the doubting Thomases who attribute all of Nikisch's effects to a pose."

Then there is Mr. Mottl. Would he be willing to leave Munich? Would he be willing to prepare conscientiously over a hundred concerts? The story goes that he has long coveted Mr. Mahler's position in Vienna. Mr. Mahler's contract has been renewed. The Pall Mall Gazette of April 18 published this paragraph:

"From 'internal evidence' the state of the Munich opera seems to be in a bad way. Things have been going down hill ever since the change in the management took place, and discontent is rife among artists and audience. It seems primarily to be the old case of 'too many cooks,' but upon one subject all concerned are agreed, namely, that no time should be lost in investing Herr Felix Mottl with the full authority due to his title of 'Generalmusikdirektor,' one of which at present is merely decorative and honorary."

The Herald has not made any positive statement about Mr. Gericke's successor, because there has been no definite information. After all this matter of a successor is one of much greater importance to Maj. Higginson than to the voluble in the street car, and his sagacity gives assurance to the public that the successor will be the best man that can be obtained.

It is true that the Kniesels now live in New York. Their going away was regretted; they are still missed; but their departure did not cause any perturbation in nature. There are Kniesel concerts in Boston. There is the Boston Symphony quartet, which makes steady improvement. There is the Hoffmann quartet, which has a well-pleased and growing audience. The Longy Club gives admirable concerts. No one man, no four men determine the musical life of a city of this size.

Symphony and Union

It ill becomes a member of the City Council of Boston, or anybody else who knows enough about music to make his opinion of any importance, to cast slurs upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra because its members do not happen to belong to any musical union. The magnificent organization which Maj. Higginson has built up through long years of patient toil and by expenditures of money that would have appalled many another rich man, is a monument to the great will be new singers like Miss Farrar, Miss Morena, Mr. Burrian, and Mr. Roussellère whom we can hear with unaccustomed ears. Mr. Hammerstein will hardly confine his company to New York, and in it already are the Italian tenor, Bonci, who stands in European reputation beside Caruso, and Mme. Melba. Sembrich, Eames, Calvé and Schumann-Heink are all returning next winter. The pianists, Rosenthal, now in the full ripeness of his powers, and Lhévinne, the Russian of the fiery tone; the violinists, Ysäye and Hartmann, are coming to America, and there are other virtuosos, doubtless, for whom managers already have plans.

For eminent conductors, Richard Strauss is arranging an American tour, and Safonoff, the Russian, has now higher reputation on this side of the sea than on the other. When Strauss comes, his opera, "Salomé," is likely to be put on the stage of the Metropolitan, and Mr. Conried and Mr. Hammerstein have each discovered Gluck and profess a jealous eagerness to revive his "Armide." Our new conductor will have his new music, if he is to conform to our established standards of catholicity and curiosity. Mr. Hess is already searching new compositions for his quartet to play next year. Mr. Kniesel's zeal for the new and the interesting is as keen. Reger makes his way. There are Frenchmen, like Ravel, who are following in the steps of Debussy, and whose music would be piquant to hear. No choral society in America cultivates the new as does our Cecilia. Again the Handel and Haydn Society will safeguard the classics of such music, and again we may count upon our series of Sunday chamber concerts. Even in April the prospects of next October and the six months beyond are good to contemplate.

Boston, March 30, 1906.

To The Musical Courier:

In accordance with wired instructions, saw Ellis relative to Sun statements. Says positively has made no arrangements to handle Paderewski in this country next season, nor does he believe anything of the kind will be done. Ellis pronounces report in the Sun to be a fake. Regarding Melba, intimates that she may appear in this country next season, although he has made no arrangements to that effect. Ellis says did not see Hammerstein regarding Melba, as intimated by Sun article; in fact, does not know Hammerstein, whom he has never even met.

BENNETT.

Mr. Ellis' denial regarding Melba is confirmed by Mr. Hammerstein himself, who cables to THE MUSICAL COURIER: "Have engaged Melba for next sonal negotia continent. "In sphere lacks the

ensky!

first discovered by their who turns on the search-lence lies in being able r up, Richard Strauss.

Riverside drive, New ronchet, Paris, has been loc, a valuable collection g to the brothers, Barons

Mr. Aronson believes on should be acquired by m in the United States,"

-odd pages of typewritten the collection makes on thusiastically. The first asures includes gifts from y personages, and among rings, medals and tobacco ni by Maria Louisa, Arch Empress of Austria, King varia, Madame Rothschild, Nicholas I of Russia, Louis stria, and two lockets with a Louisa and the Duke of Louisa of Austria. There s presented by the munc a, (the ladies of) Dumbir nias, diplomas and bre making him a Commade making him a Commade

PLANS AND THEORIES FOR IMPROVEMENT

Gossip About the Next Symphony Conductor; the Orpheus Concert, Etc.

INNERS were given by musicians last week in honor of Mr. Gericke. There was naturally much informal talk along the tables about the present condition of musical affairs in Boston. Some were inclined to take a gloomy view. "Mr. Gericke is going, and who, pray, will succeed him? The members of the Kniesel quartet are now New Yorkers. Singers, discouraged because they are paid poorly in church and have little opportunity to sing in local choral concerts, one by one go to New York, where they thrive and are apparently happy. There is a deplorable lack of general and intelligent interest in music. Fifteen or even ten years ago young women were in the habit of attending choral concerts and recitals. Concert-going was considered to be a mark of culture. Today the young women of the same class are seldom seen in concert halls and many of them say frankly that music bores them."

It is true that Mr. Gericke is going. It is also true that the superb orchestra remains. There will be a conductor next season, and in all probability he will be an excellent one. There have been many wild statements about Mr. Gericke's successor, statements that were born in the morning and that died at noon. We have all read that Mr. Nikisch, who is today beyond doubt and peradventure the most distinguished conductor in Europe, demanded $50,000 a year and that his life should be insured for a large sum. He may also have asked for a house on the water side of Beacon street and that the Governor and the mayor should be in waiting at the wharf. Mr. Nikisch may or may not have demanded the sum named above.

It has also been stated definitely by some who have "inside information" that a conductor will be chosen for one season, after which Mr. Gustav Mahler of Vienna will rule the orchestral roast. The statement has been made in London journals that Mr. Fritz Steinbach was offered the position. A Berlin correspondent insists that Mr. Oskar Fried of that city has been invited to fill the vacant place. Mr. Fried was not long ago a horn player. We infer from the article of the correspondent that as composer and conductor he still blows his horn. Music affects him as he conducts. Under the influence of it, we read, "He suggests nothing so much as a windmill rapidly whirling to the rhythmic measures." He would be just the man for Strauss' "Don Quixote." Nor is he wearied by this violent physical exercise, but we are informed by the Musical Leader and Concert-Goer that Mr. Nikisch crumbles into a heap in the artists' room after a performance of Tschalkowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. "That he has followed his hero through joy and sorrow, through mirth and woe until the death-knell sounds and 'Nirwana' receives him, there can be no doubt, and his utter exhaustion would silence at once the doubting Thomases who attribute all of Nikisch's effects to a pose."

Then there is Mr. Mottl. Would he be willing to leave Munich? Would he be willing to prepare conscientiously over a hundred concerts? The story goes that he has long coveted Mr. Mahler's position in Vienna. Mr. Mahler's contract has been renewed. The Pall Mall Gazette of April 18 published this paragraph:

"From 'internal evidence' the state of the Munich opera seems to be in a bad way. Things have been going down hill ever since the change in the management took place, and discontent is rife among artists and audience. It seems primarily to be the old case of 'too many cooks,' but upon one subject all concerned are agreed, namely, that no time should be lost in investing Herr Felix Mottl with the full authority due to his title of 'Generalmusikdirektor,' one of which at present is merely decorative and honorary."

The Herald has not made any positive statement about Mr. Gericke's successor, because there has been no definite information. After all this matter of a successor is one of much greater importance to Maj. Higginson than to the voluble in the street car, and his sagacity gives assurance to the public that the successor will be the best man that can be obtained.

It is true that the Knieisels now live in New York. Their going away was regretted; they are still missed; but their departure did not cause any perturbation in nature. There are Kniesel concerts in Boston. There is the Boston Symphony quartet, which makes steady improvement. There is the Hoffmann quartet, which has a well-pleased and growing audience. The Longy Club gives admirable concerts. No one man, no four men determine the musical life of a city of this size.

Symphony and Union

It ill becomes a member of the City Council of Boston, or anybody else who knows enough about music to make his opinion of any importance, to cast slurs upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra because its members do not happen to belong to any musical union. The magnificent organization which Maj. Higginson has built up through long years of patient toil and by expenditures of money that would have appalled many another rich man, is a monument to the great will be new singers like Miss Morena, Mr. Burrian, and Mr. whom we can hear with un- ears. Mr. Hammerstein will ha his company to New York, and are the Italian tenor, Bonci, w European reputation beside C Mme. Melba. Sembrich, Eames Schumann-Heink are all retu winter. The pianists, Rosent the full ripeness of his powers vinne, the Russian of the fier violinists, Ysaÿe and Hartman ing to America, and there are tuosi, doubtless, for whom m ready have plans.

For eminent conductors, Richa arranging an American tour, at the Russian, has now higher re this side of the sea than on When Strauss comes, his opera is likely to be put on the stage o politan, and Mr. Corried and M stein have each discovered Glu tess a jealous eagerness to revl mide." Our new conductor w new music, if he is to conform tablished standards of catholiel osity. Mr. Hess is already se compositions for his quartet t year. Mr. Kneisel's zeal for t the interesting is as keen. F his way. There are Frenc Ravel, who are following in t Debussy, and whose music woul to hear. No choral society cultivates the new as does Again the Handel and Haydn safeguard the classics of such again we may count upon o Sunday chamber concerts. E the prospects of next October months beyond are good to cor

To The Musical Courier:

In accordance with wire relative to Sun statement made no arrangements to l country next season, nor do the kind will be done. Ellis Sun to be a fake. Regard she may appear in this cour he has made no arrangeme says did not see Hammers intimated by Sun article; Hammerstein, whom he ha season after personal negotiation with her for four weeks."

Mr. Ellis' denial regardi Mr. Hammerstein himsel MUSICAL COURIER: "Have

Hardly had THE MUSICAL COURIER nailed the first Sun story before this far more amazing mess appeared in the same paper, issue of March 31:

TO HAVE GERICKE'S PLACE. 1906 GUSTAV MAHLER, OF VIENNA, MAY CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

According to advices received here yesterday from Vienna, Gustav Mahler, now conductor of the Imperial Opera House in Vienna, is to be the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Mahler will not be at liberty, however, to come here until a year from next October. It has been announced that the orchestra's plans will not be divulged until after the farewell concert of Wilhelm Gericke, on April 26.

It is probable that Fritz Steinbach, in spite of his denial, will come for this interregnum. The possibility that Mr. Gericke may still be engaged for another year is by no means excluded from consideration. If Colonel Higginson will accept his terms Mr. Gericke will be able to remain.

The decision of Felix Weingartner not to return to the New York Symphony Orchestra next winter is closely connected with Gustav Mahler's call to Boston. Mr. Weingartner will, in accordance with present plans, be called to Munich to succeed Felix Mottl at the Prinz Regent Theatre there. Mr. Mottl is expected to be the successor of Mahler in Vienna.

Again THE MUSICAL COURIER wired its Boston man to go to the very highest official source for corroboration or denial. This was the telegraphic answer received:

Boston, April 2, 1906.

To The Musical Courier:

Ellis denies arrangements with Steinbach and Mahler, and styles newspaper stories fakes. Says Gericke leaves close of this season, as already announced. Says as soon as new conductor found, facts will be made public. No contract closed with anybody as yet. Says nobody knows who will be appointed.

BENNETT.

It is a mystery to sensible persons how the music man of the Sun can afford to print such stuff. People used to say, "When you see it in the Sun it's so." Now they say—well, the Sun management deserves everything that is said, for the lack of journalistic and editorial supervision over its music department.

PLANS AND THEORIES FOR IMPROVEMENT Gossip About the Next Symphony Conductor; the Orpheus Concert, Etc.

INNERS were given by musicians last week in honor of Mr. Gericke. There was naturally much informal talk along the tables about the present condition of musical affairs in Boston. Some were inclined to take a gloomy view. "Mr. Gericke is going, and who, pray, will succeed him? The members of the Kneisel quartet are now New Yorkers. Singers, discouraged because they are paid poorly in church and have little opportunity to sing in local choral concerts, one by one go to New York, where they thrive and are apparently happy. There is a deplorable lack of general and intelligent interest in music. Fifteen or even ten years ago young women were in the habit of attending choral concerts and recitals. Concert-going was considered to be a mark of culture. Today the young women of the same class are seldom seen in concert halls and many of them say frankly that music bores them."

It is true that Mr. Gericke is going. It is also true that the superb orchestra remains. There will be a conductor next season, and in all probability he will be an excellent one. There have been many wild statements about Mr. Gericke's successor, statements that were born in the morning and that died at noon. We have all read that Mr. Nikisch, who is today beyond doubt and peradventure the most distinguished conductor in Europe, demanded $50,000 a year and that his life should be insured for a large sum. He may also have asked for a house on the water side of Beacon street and that the Governor and the mayor should be in waiting at the wharf. Mr. Nikisch may or may not have demanded the sum named above.

It has also been stated definitely by some who have "inside information" that a conductor will be chosen for one season, after which Mr. Gustav Mahler of Vienna will rule the orchestral roost. The statement has been made in London journals that Mr. Fritz Steinbach was offered the position. A Berlin correspondent insists that Mr. Oskar Fried of that city has been invited to fill the vacant place. Mr. Fried was not long ago a horn player. We infer from the article of the correspondent that as composer and conductor he still blows his horn. Music affects him as he conducts. Under the influence of it, we read, "He suggests nothing so much as a windmill rapidly whirling in the rhythmic measures." He would be just the man for Strauss' "Don Quixote." Nor is he wearied by this violent physical exercise, but we are informed by the Musical Leader and Concert-Goer that Mr. Nikisch crumbles into a heap in the artists' room after a performance of Tschalkowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. "That he has followed his hero through joy and sorrow, through mirth and woe until the death-knell sounds and 'Nirwana' receives him, there can be no doubt, and his utter exhaustion would silence at once the doubting Thomases who attribute all of Nikisch's effects to a pose."

Then there is Mr. Mottl. Would he be willing to leave Munich? Would he be willing to prepare conscientiously over a hundred concerts? The story goes that he has long coveted Mr. Mahler's position in Vienna. Mr. Mahler's contract has been renewed. The Pall Mall Gazette of April 18 published this paragraph:

"From 'internal evidence' the state of the Munich opera seems to be in a bad way. Things have been going down hill ever since the change in the management took place, and discontent is rife among artists and audience. It seems primarily to be the old case of 'too many cooks,' but upon one subject all concerned are agreed, namely, that no time should be lost in investing Herr Felix Mottl with the full authority due to his title of 'Generalmusikdirektor,' one of which at present is merely decorative and honorary."

The Herald has not made any positive statement about Mr. Gericke's successor, because there has been no definite information. After all this matter of a successor is one of much greater importance to Maj. Higginson than to the voluble in the street car, and his sagacity gives assurance to the public that the successor will be the best man that can be obtained.

It is true that the Kneisels now live in New York. Their going away was regretted; they are still missed; but their departure did not cause any perturbation in nature. There are Kneisel concerts in Boston. There is the Boston Symphony quartet, which makes steady improvement. There is the Hoffmann quartet, which has a well-pleased and growing audience. The Longy Club gives admirable concerts. No one man, no four men determine the musical life of a city of this size.

Symphony and Union

Journal May 23, 1906

It ill becomes a member of the City Council of Boston, or anybody else who knows enough about music to make his opinion of any importance, to cast slurs upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra because its members do not happen to belong to any musical union. The magnificent organization which Maj. Higginson has built up through long years of patient toil and by expenditures of money that would have appalled many another rich man, is a monument to the great policy of "let alone" in art. It is absolutely certain that had Maj. Higginson not enjoyed the most complete freedom to act as he saw fit, regardless of "rules" and "cards" and schedules of prices and what not, the Symphony Orchestra would not today be anything like what it is, if, indeed, it were in existence at all.

290

There is just now some complaint that the Symphony management does not hire "native players of equal ability." Well, we can all be pretty good Americans and at the same time freely admit that the foreigners are vastly better performers than are our own countrymen. There is every reason why they should be. As a rule, they have a deeper musical instinct, and they certainly have the advantage of training in the great orchestras with which Europe is filled. Recruits for the Symphony always come from such organizations. There is no room for the tyro in our orchestra, as anyone at all conversant with music knows well enough. "Native musicians of equal ability" with such men as Longy, Lenon, Ondricek, Roth, Schuecker—to name only a few—would have no trouble at all in making the orchestra whenever a vacancy occurred. Foreigners happen to be the best players in the world; foreigners are therefore engaged.

Bostonians of all sorts and varieties take pride in their Symphony Orchestra. They realize that it is Boston's one great claim to fame in the musical world, and the majority of them would prefer it to continue in its artistic course undisturbed by any conflicts of any sort.

On Gericke's Resignation

July 28, 1906

THE MUSICAL COURIER considers any show of excessive pride an unbecoming and even vulgar exhibition; but this paper also disbelieves in false modesty and self-abnegation in the matter of praise where praise is deserved. Last week it was shown in these columns that THE MUSICAL COURIER secured a "beat" on the entire daily press of New York by announcing, some two months before the news became public, that Safonoff would lead a majority, if not all, of the Philharmonic concerts next season. This week the indisputable superiority of THE MUSICAL COURIER as an authority on the musical doings of everywhere is again shown, and even more strikingly than in the case of Safonoff and the Philharmonic. The daily papers announce in staggering headlines that Wilhelm Gericke has resigned the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect on April 28, the date of the last Boston concert of the organization this spring. Just before the beginning of the present year, and twice after that, in January and early in February, THE MUSICAL COURIER published the direct statement that the present season would be Gericke's last as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and that Col. Higginson was quietly looking around for the German conductor's successor. This announcement was hailed with derision by the daily press of Boston and New York, and denied vehemently by them, by the management of the orchestra, and even by Col. Higginson himself, who was angered at the premature disclosure of his plans, which he had guarded impene-

291
trably as he thought. And now? THE MUSICAL COURIER news bureau is vindicated again, and this paper has proved once more, and most brilliantly on this occasion, that it is the only medium in the world which has its ear to the musical ground at all times, and, like the famous seismic indicator of the Paris Observatory, is able to foretell ructions a long while before they occur and to warn those most concerned to get out from under before the crash comes.

And this is the time and place for another confidence and another warning. Don't believe anything you read for the next month or so in Boston and New York dailies about the question of Gericke's successor. THE MUSICAL COURIER is in a position to say that no one has been definitely selected as yet by Col. Higginson. Vincent d'Indy has as good a chance as anyone else, but beyond discussions on the subject with the owner of the Boston orchestra, nothing final was determined upon by them, and nothing exists in the shape of a contract or any other binding agreement. Col. Higginson has all summer in which to make his choice, but the probabilities are that he will make up his mind late this spring and announce his decision then.

The report that Weingartner would go to Boston is idiotic, for he is under contract to Walter Damrosch for two years more and under the terms of that arrangement would not be permitted to lead any other orchestra than the New York Symphony. Safonoff has just signed with the Philharmonic, and so of course he is not under consideration either for Boston. A Nikisch rumor traveled into town on Sunday and Monday, but the Leipsic leader stated emphatically to a MUSICAL COURIER representative abroad that he was not considering a return to Boston, and would not consider it even if he were approached on the subject by Col. Higginson. Nikisch leads his brilliant series of ten concerts each season in Berlin (the premier symphony concerts of Europe), and makes numerous appearances in other cities with the Berlin Philharmonic and the leading orchestras of Paris, London, and in fact most of the music centers of Europe. In addition to his outside activities, Nikisch is also conductor of the world famous Leipsic Gewandhaus Orchestra, director of the Leipsic Conservatorium, and managing director and occasional conductor at the Leipsic Opera. Aside from the enormous sum which Nikisch earns each year, his prestige is such that no monetary consideration could compensate him for its loss—and with all due respect to the orchestra of Boston, a conductorship there would mean a serious drop in Nikisch's artistic importance compared to his present exalted position. However, Nikisch is the arbiter of policy of "let alone" in art. It is absolutely certain that had Maj. Higginson not enjoyed the most complete freedom to act as he saw fit, regardless of "rules" and "cards" and schedules of prices and what not, the Symphony Orchestra would not today be anything like what it is, if, indeed, it were in existence at all.

There is just now some complaint that the Symphony management does not hire "native players of equal ability." Well, we can all be pretty good Americans and at the same time freely admit that the foreigners are vastly better performers than are our own countrymen. There is every reason why they should be. As a rule, they have a deeper musical instinct, and they certainly have the advantage of training in the great orchestras with which Europe is filled. Recruits for the Symphony always come from such organizations. There is no room for the tyro in our orchestra, as anyone at all conversant with music knows well enough. "Native musicians of equal ability" with such men as Longy, Lenon, Ondricek, Roth, Schuecker—to name only a few—would have no trouble at all in making the orchestra whenever a vacancy occurred. Foreigners happen to be the best players in the world; foreigners are therefore engaged.

Bostonians of all sorts and varieties take pride in their Symphony Orchestra. They realize that it is Boston's one great claim to fame in the musical world, and the majority of them would prefer it to continue in its artistic course undisturbed by any conflicts of any sort.

On Gericke's Resignation

July 28, 1906

THE MUSICAL COURIER considers any show of excessive pride an unbecoming and even vulgar exhibition; but this paper also disbelieves in false modesty and self-abnegation in the matter of praise where praise is deserved. Last week it was shown in these columns that THE MUSICAL COURIER secured a "beat" on the entire daily press of New York by announcing, some two months before the news became public, that Safonoff would lead a majority, if not all, of the Philharmonic concerts next season. This week the indisputable superiority of THE MUSICAL COURIER as an authority on the musical doings of everywhere is again shown, and even more strikingly than in the case of Safonoff and the Philharmonic. The daily papers announce in staggering headlines that Wilhelm Gericke has resigned the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his resignation to take effect on April 28, the date of the last Boston concert of the organization this spring. Just before the beginning of the present year, and twice after that, in January and early in February, THE MUSICAL COURIER published the direct statement that the present season would be Gericke's last as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and that Col. Higginson was quietly looking around for the German conductor's successor. This announcement was hailed with derision by the daily press of Boston and New York, and denied vehemently by them, by the management of the orchestra, and even by Col. Higginson himself, who was angered at the premature disclosure of his plans, which he had guarded impenetrably as he thought. And now? THE MUSICAL COURIER news bureau is vindicated again, and this paper has proved once more, and most brilliantly on this occasion, that it is the only medium in the world which has its ear to the musical ground at all times, and, like the famous seismic indicator of the Paris Observatory, is able to foretell ructions a long while before they occur and to warn those most concerned to get out from under before the crash comes.

And this is the time and place for another confidence and another warning. Don't believe anything you read for the next month or so in Boston and New York dailies about the question of Gericke's successor. THE MUSICAL COURIER is in a position to say that no one has been definitely selected as yet by Col. Higginson. Vincent d'Indy has as good a chance as anyone else, but beyond discussions on the subject with the owner of the Boston orchestra, nothing final was determined upon by them, and nothing exists in the shape of a contract or any other binding agreement. Col. Higginson has all summer in which to make his choice, but the probabilities are that he will make up his mind late this spring and announce his decision then.

The report that Weingartner would go to Boston is idiotic, for he is under contract to Walter Damrosch for two years more and under the terms of that arrangement would not be permitted to lead any other orchestra than the New York Symphony. Safonoff has just signed with the Philharmonic, and so of course he is not under consideration either for Boston. A Nikisch rumor traveled into town on Sunday and Monday, but the Leipsic leader stated emphatically to a MUSICAL COURIER representative abroad that he was not considering a return to Boston, and would not consider it even if he were approached on the subject by Col. Higginson. Nikisch leads his brilliant series of ten concerts each season in Berlin (the premier symphony concerts of Europe), and makes numerous appearances in other cities with the Berlin Philharmonic and the leading orchestras of Paris, London, and in fact most of the music centers of Europe. In addition to his outside activities, Nikisch is also conductor of the world famous Leipsic Gewandhaus Orchestra, director of the Leipsic Conservatorium, and managing director and occasional conductor at the Leipsic Opera. Aside from the enormous sum which Nikisch earns each year, his prestige is such that no monetary consideration could compensate him for its loss—and with all due respect to the orchestra of Boston, a conductorship there would mean a serious drop in Nikisch's artistic importance compared to his present exalted position. However, Nikisch is the arbiter of his own destinies, and it is certain that if Col. Higginson wants him, the golden bait will be such as would tempt any mere mortal most seriously. If Boston were to gain Nikisch after all, then it will have again the greatest conductor who ever presided over its orchestra.

Mahler, Richard Strauss, Muck and Schuch are chiefly operatic leaders, and have no ambition to head a symphony orchestra. Colonne and Chevillard are fixtures in Paris, and would never consent to leave there permanently. The only other man in the French capital who has a chance for Boston is d'Indy. Schalk, of Vienna, was tried at the Metropolitan, and found wanting. Mottl is tied down at the Munich Opera, and, besides, is essentially an operatic conductor. Stavenhagen is looking for a good directorial post, but he is not of the calibre to attract serious attention from Col. Higginson. Panzner, of Bremen, Fiedler, of Hamburg, Kogel, of Frankfurt, Steinbach, of Cologne (who will soon lead a Philharmonic concert in New York), Frischen, of Hannover, and Schnéevoigt, of Munich, are all first class men, and any one of them might be induced to go to Boston. Of the six just mentioned, the most suitable is Frischen or Schnéevoigt, for they are both young men and the very antitheses of Gericke. In England they have Richter, Landon Ronald, Henry Wood and Frederick Cowen. Wood might come into consideration for Boston, as he was anxious to secure the Pittsburg engagement before Paur won it. Of the other young leaders now on the Continent, those worth mention are Pfitzner, H. H. Wetzler, Waghalter, Raabe.

In America there are these candidates to pick from: Walter and Frank Damrosch, Emil Paur, Frank Van der Stucken, Victor Herbert, Frederick Stock, Fritz Scheel, and Dr. Wolle.

All in all, the situation is interesting, and it is as difficult to guess at its solution as it will be for Col. Higginson to choose from out of such a wealth of suitable material as tabulated in this article. The probabilities are that THE MUSICAL COURIER will be enabled to announce the Colonel's choice long before any other newspaper will even know that it has been made.

The situation all over America in regard to the practical operation of permanent orchestras is somewhat desperate, for they are all, nearly all, financially losing propositions, although this had no direct bearing on Mr. Gericke's departure.

In Pittsburg an appalling deficit is announced, and Mr. Wilson, the manager, virtually states that nothing can be done unless the public responds. One lady and friend sustain the Cincinnati orchestra. Here, in New York, it is always and consistently a begging proposition. In Chicago years of growth have made it a possibility, but Mr. Stock does not receive as much salary as the cashier of the bank at the Stock Yards. Philadelphia was in distress last year, and as to other cities they are plainly out of it, because they are not permitted by prevailing conditions to be in it.

The drama is a business proposition; symphony concerts are dependent upon a limited cultured class, but there are not enough of such people living, even in Boston, to maintain symphony concerts regularly unless some show a disposition to pay the deficit, and there are few Higginsons, and even he has been accused of a self-interested motive. If all those Pittsburg billionaires cannot maintain an insignificant orchestra how can the pageant exist in any other American city? And as long as people do not attend these events they are not educational after all.

Mr. Gericke was personally highly appreciated in Boston and elsewhere, but he had no more box office power than Mr. Paur had, and hence it is that the New York Philharmonic Society engages foreign conductors. It is not due to their superior ability as conductors, but to their box office relations supposed or expected.

THE "POP" CONCERTS OPEN.

"In dulci jubilo
Sing we, make merry so!

Latet in poculo,

Drawn from the cask, good measure,

Pro hoc convivio

Nunc, nunc bibito!"

When conductor Adamowski lifted his baton in the "Rakoczy March," last night, he opened the 21st series of Boston's unparalleled "Pop's" and another annual period of peace in which champions of Mahler, D'Indy, and Strauss and devotees of the big "B's" bury the hatchet, filling the cup that cheers.

As usual on the first night, Symphony Hall was filled to the last corner and the atmosphere was rather societified. Active members of the set who toil not, neither do they spin; the ubiquitous collegian and the blushing bud; the clubman, visitors from "beyond," and the nondescripts, occupied the floor, and in the galleries were those who had not learned that "the Muses smell of wine," or had been too tardy in pursuit of table tickets. A display of feminine finery rivalled "Farmer" Doogue's flowers in the Public Gardens, a conglomeration of hues defying the analysis of man. The peace pipe was not smoked in the industrious fashion dear to German hearts, but cigar and cigarette—O Indiana!—furnished material for the fleecy clouds which go so well with a pleasant popping sound. Bock beer or champagne, Burgundy or Pilsner, it is all the same with Bacchus to loose "each weak and faltering knee."

On the programme were:—

Rakoczy March, Berlioz; selection, "Rigoletto," Verdi; overture, "Mignon," A. Thomas; waltz, "Harlequin en Voyage," Zach; intermezzo, "Verliebt," Strube; selection, "Mlle. Modiste," Herbert; fantasy from "Boheme," Puccini; Italian Caprice, Tchaikowsky; selection, "Carmen," Bizet; waltz, "Grubenlichter," Zeller; American Fantasy, Herbert; march, "Lorraine," Ganne.

Mr. Adamowski conducted with his customary suavity and freedom and the orchestra, 55 men from the Symphony band, played with the glad abandon of a boy on a holiday. Needless to sing their praises. For them these "Pop" programmes, popular in a superior sense, are very easy work and it is not boastful to say that their playing is unrivalled at such affairs the world over. Two of them, Mr. Zach and Mr. Strube, were also among the composers last night, Zach with his waltz, "Harlequin en Voyage," and Strube with his intermezzo, "Verliebt." Well made music and excellent numbers for a light programme, they were cordially received. Ziehrer's "Herreinspieler," a waltz with strongly marked rhythm and a very taking melody, was played for the first time. Bizet, Berlioz and Verdi made sure appeal and Victor Herbert's knack of tickling the ear was again manifest. On Thursday he will have the lion's share of the programme. Tonight the first of a series of Wagner programmes will be played. Adv. May 2, 1906 S. C. Williams.

his own destinies, and it is certain that if Col. Higginson wants him, the golden bait will be such as would tempt any mere mortal most seriously. If Boston were to gain Nikisch after all, then it will have again the greatest conductor who ever presided over its orchestra.

Mahler, Richard Strauss, Muck and Schuch are chiefly operatic leaders, and have no ambition to head a symphony orchestra. Colonne and Chevillard are fixtures in Paris, and would never consent to leave there permanently. The only other man in the French capital who has a chance for Boston is d'Indy. Schalk, of Vienna, was tried at the Metropolitan, and found wanting. Mottl is tied down at the Munich Opera, and, besides, is essentially an operatic conductor. Stavenhagen is looking for a good directorial post, but he is not of the calibre to attract serious attention from Col. Higginson. Panzner, of Bremen, Fiedler, of Hamburg, Kogel, of Frankfurt, Steinbach, of Cologne (who will soon lead a Philharmonic concert in New York), Frischen, of Hannover, and Schnéevoigt, of Munich, are all first class men, and any one of them might be induced to go to Boston. Of the six just mentioned, the most suitable is Frischen or Schnéevoigt, for they are both young men and the very antitheses of Gericke. In England they have Richter, Landon Ronald, Henry Wood and Frederick Cowen. Wood might come into consideration for Boston, as he was anxious to secure the Pittsburg engagement before Paur won it. Of the other young leaders now on the Continent, those worth mention are Pfitzner, H. H. Wetzler, Waghalter, Raabe.

In America there are these candidates to pick from: Walter and Frank Damrosch, Emil Paur, Frank Van der Stucken, Victor Herbert, Frederick Stock, Fritz Scheel, and Dr. Wolle.

All in all, the situation is interesting, and it is as difficult to guess at its solution as it will be for Col. Higginson to choose from out of such a wealth of suitable material as tabulated in this article. The probabilities are that THE MUSICAL COURIER will be enabled to announce the Colonel's choice long before any other newspaper will even know that it has been made.

The situation all over America in regard to the practical operation of permanent orchestras is somewhat desperate, for they are all, nearly all, financially losing propositions, although this had no direct bearing on Mr. Gericke's departure.

In Pittsburg an appalling deficit is announced, and Mr. Wilson, the manager, virtually states that nothing can be done unless the public responds. One lady and friend sustain the Cincinnati orchestra. Here, in New York, it is always and consistently a begging proposition. In Chicago years of growth have made it a possibility, but Mr. Stock does not receive as much salary as the cashier of the bank at the Stock Yards. Philadelphia was in distress last year, and as to other cities they are plainly out of it, because they are not permitted by prevailing conditions to be in it.

The drama is a business proposition; symphony concerts are dependent upon a limited cultured class, but there are not enough of such people living, even in Boston, to maintain symphony concerts regularly unless some show a disposition to pay the deficit, and there are few Higginsons, and even he has been accused of a self-interested motive. If all those Pittsburg billionaires cannot maintain an insignificant orchestra how can the pageant exist in any other American city? And as long as people do not attend these events they are not educational after all.

Mr. Gericke was personally highly appreciated in Boston and elsewhere, but he had no more box office power than Mr. Paur had, and hence it is that the New York Philharmonic Society engages foreign conductors. It is not due to their superior ability as conductors, but to their box office relations supposed or expected.

THE "POP" CONCERTS OPEN.

"In dulci jubilo
Sing we, make merry so!
Latet in poculo,

Drawn from the cask, good measure,
Pro hoc convivio
Nunc, nunc bibito!"

When conductor Adamowski lifted his baton in the "Rakoczy March," last night, he opened the 21st series of Boston's unparalleled "Pop's" and another annual period of peace in which champions of Mahler, D'Indy, and Strauss and devotees of the big "B.'s" bury the hatchet, filling the cup that cheers.

As usual on the first night, Symphony Hall was filled to the last corner and the atmosphere was rather societified. Active members of the set who toil not, neither do they spin; the ubiquitous collegian and the blushing bud; the clubman, visitors from "beyond," and the nondescripts, occupied the floor, and in the galleries were those who had not learned that "the Muses smell of wine," or had been too tardy in pursuit of table tickets. A display of feminine finery rivalled "Farmer" Doogue's flowers in the Public Gardens, a conglomeration of hues defying the analysis of man. The peace pipe was not smoked in the industrious fashion dear to German hearts, but cigar and cigarette—O Indiana!—furnished material for the fleecy clouds which go so well with a pleasant popping sound. Bock beer or champagne, Burgundy or Pilsner, it is all the same with Bacchus to loose "each weak and faltering knee."

On the programme were:—

Rakoczy March, Berlioz; selection, "Rigoletto," Verdi; overture, "Mignon," A. Thomas; waltz, "Harlequin en Voyage," Zach; intermezzo, "Verliebt," Strube; selection, "Mlle. Modiste," Herbert; fantasy from "Boheme," Puccini; Italian Caprice, Tschaiakowsky; selection, "Carmen," Bizet; waltz, "Grubenlichter," Zeller; American Fantasy, Herbert; march, "Lorraine," Ganne.

Mr. Adamowski conducted with his customary suavity and freedom and the orchestra, 55 men from the Symphony band, played with the glad abandon of a boy on a holiday. Needless to say their praises. For them these "Pop" programmes, popular in a superior sense, are very easy work and it is not boastful to say that their playing is unrivalled at such affairs the world over. Two of them, Mr. Zach and Mr. Strube, were also among the composers last night, Zach with his waltz, "Harlequin en Voyage," and Strube with his intermezzo, "Verliebt." Well made music and excellent numbers for a light programme, they were cordially received. Ziehrer's "Herreinspaclert," a waltz with strongly marked rhythm and a very taking melody, was played for the first time. Bizet, Berlioz and Verdi made sure appeal and Victor Herbert's knack of tickling the ear was again manifest. On Thursday he will have the lion's share of the programme. Tonight the first of a series of Wagner programmes will be played. Adv. May 2 1906 S. C. Williams.

The "Pops" Begin

Farewell, dignified Symphonies! Welcome, jocund "Pops" The first have gone, the second are with us. The all too brief season, the twenty-first, opened in Symphony Hall last evening, and with more pomp and circumstance than is customary. Time was, in the days of the old Music Hall, with its gloomy walls, its murky lights and its Bohemian atmosphere, when lovers of music of all classes dropped in to hear their favorite airs played to the accompaniment of clinking glasses of light beverages, and the smoke of cigar and pipe. The clinking glasses and Madame Nicotine we still have at Symphony Hall. But the genial unconventionality, the slight regard for dress, are missing. Last evening's gathering was gowned, for the feminine portion, like an Easter parade; the majority of the men were in evening dress. The demeanor of all was more amiable than enthusiastic, and circumspection ruled the place. The applause was hearty, frequently insistent; but if the bald truth were told, were not the ladies more intent on studying the costumes and millinery of their neighbors than on the beauties and the glories of the music?

When Mr. Adamowski stepped briskly to his conductor's stand, the hall was one-third filled. To be sure many loyal patrons of the "Pops" were there; but it was not until half the programme had been played that it became a "full house," in the theatric sense only. This is not the way of "Pop" concerts, for as a rule those who attend at all like to be in at the start and to stay for the finish. It was apparent that dinner parties or other social engagements detained many, which was a pity, for they missed much that was admirably played. Berlioz's impetuous "Rakoczy" march was the first number, and showed instantly and almost conclusively the capital form in which this season's orchestra is playing. The "Rigoletto" excerpt met with perfunctory attention, but the "Mignon" overture brought out real enthusiasm and scored the first encore of the season. Two compositions by Messrs. Zach and Strube, future conductors at these concerts, followed. Mr. Zach's "Harlequin en Voyage" is familiar, but Mr. Strube's dainty, pathetic intermezzo, "Verliebt," exquisitely played won too scant recognition. Why will people wax delirious over the "Carmen" number, which they have heard from time immemorial, and turn a cold shoulder to such a gem as "Verliebt"? Herbert's "Mlle. Modiste" and "American Fantasy," Puccini's fantasy from "Bohème," Tschalkowski's "Italian Caprice," Ziehrer's drum-dominated waltz, "Herrenspaciert," and Ganne's "Lorraine" march, completed the programme. The "first time" number was that of Ziehrer. And here arises a question which may be a matter of personal taste, but which seems worth consideration: Do those—the greater part of them—who attend the "Pops," which supposedly dispense light music, as they do light liquid refreshments, care for as much classical music as figured on last evening's programme? We get such music in the regular Symphony season, but with the coming of summer we lay off heavy, substantial garments, and don so light airy raiment. Why should we not be likewise served in our musical menus?

Here in Boston

The programme for the "Pop" concert tonight—a "Wagner night"—is:

March, "Tannhäuser".....	Wagner
Ballet Music, "Coppélia".....	Delibes
Overture, "Tannhäuser".....	Wagner
Serenade.....	Chabrier
(First time.)
Viola Solo, Mr. Zach.....
Selection, "Aida".....	Verdi
Romanza.....	Wagner
Solo Violin, Mr. Hoffmann.
Ballet Music, "Gloconda".....	Ponchielli
Prelude to "Parsifal".....	Wagner
Selection, "Faust".....	Gounod
Overture, "Rienzi".....	Wagner
Serenade, "Contes d'Hoffmann".....	O. Benbach
Ride of the Valkyries.....	Wagner
March, "Black Bess".....	Strube

Mottl is replacing Nikisch in the gossip of the hour as a "likely" successor to Mr. Gericke as the conductor of our orchestra. At present Mottl is the chief conductor of the opera at Munich, where he has served since he returned from New York after hard experiences during Mr. Conried's first season at the Metropolitan. Before that he had gradually made the little opera at Karlsruhe one of the most interesting in Europe. His experience has lain rather in opera houses than in concert halls, but at Karlsruhe he conducted at an annual series of symphony concerts and as a "star" conductor he has appeared often in European capitals. He has in him much of the blending of the disciplinarian and drillmaster and the conductor of imagination and power that distinguishes Mr. Gericke. He is as catholic, too, in his musical likings.

Summer has officially arrived, for the familiar "Pops" sign is blazing nightly aloft over Symphony hall. And if last night's opening is to be the criterion they are to be dressier for the women-folk, brighter in color, less formal for the mere men, and jollier in the music than ever before.

As a matter of record, it should be stated that after this season the Pops should be considered fullgrown in Boston's esteem, and as such entitled to a vote, for this is their 21st year.

Nothing was changed last night, except for a fresh, shiny coat of varnish on the tables. Timothee Adamowski conducted; he will divide the eight weeks of the season with Max Zach and Gustav Strube.

The music was just the same—even to having one "first time" number—a new waltz by Ziehrer. The program led off with the good old Rakoczy march, just as any popular program should; it followed this with a selection from "Rigoletto," and somewhere in it were a fantasy from "La Bohème," and selections from "Carmen." Nothing was

BOSTON GLOBE—WEDNESDAY, MAY 2, 1906.

MERRY OPENING OF THE POP CONCERTS.

Brilliant Scene in Symphony Hall—Well-Known Bostonians There—Beginning of the 21st Season.

OPENING OF THE POP CONCERTS IN SYMPHONY HALL.

missing but the "Largo," and that is of course reserved for a later concert, with the "Dernier Sommeil." It wouldn't do to put all the gems into one coronet. Even the personality of the audience was not changed in the least. People bowed on all sides to friends; Maj Higginson was there, and Robert Saltonstall, and the Isagis, and the Blakes, and the Motleys, and the Estabrooks, and all the people whom everybody in Boston knows. It wasn't for style, and it wasn't for show—the Pops have long ago found their mission as places where one hears good music without cramping one's knees against the seat in front, and where the men have permission to smoke and to get a drink without sneaking out over other people's discomforts for it; where the music is neither so cheap as to be tiresome, nor so learned as to be forbidding.

The programs were in exactly the well-known form—even the menus stuck to last year's brands, and the waiters had a familiar look.

There was much color and a striking originality in the hats and gowns. The dead whiteness of the shirtwaist audience was noticeably lacking; yet there was neither horse show dressing nor opera gowning. There was much of tint, and a noticeable amount of solid color effects among the tables. One especially striking dress was fastened up the back—it was apparently all in one piece—with large pink bows like a row of buttons, and was gathered every inch from waist to knees. A brilliant greenish-blue straw hat was nothing more nor less than a basket with the handle removed, trimmed with roses and lace.

So far has tradition gone that even the time to get one's drinkables has become fixed. Nobody orders till the second number is well along; then the first tray of draft beer goes across the hall synchronously with the first pop of the more carefully chosen bottle.

Every table was used to its utmost capacity; by the way, there are no tables in the rear balcony again this year.

There was a subdued gayety in the occasion that hinted that the restraints of a town season were now being flung away. Even the orchestra played with more dash than has been sometimes observable in Pop concerts. Altogether, the season of 1906 started off with a snap.

GLASS TINKLES MID POP MUSIC STRAINS

Queenly Women and Escorts
Fill Symphony Hall at First Concert of 21st Year.

ICED LIQUIDS VIE IN COLORS WITH GOWNS

Initial Pop Conducted by Adamowski—Zach and Strube
Will Also Officiate.

B. Herald May 2, 1906

The great sprays of white light bulbs that hang in the lofty ceiling of Symphony Hall like bursting skyrockets looked down upon a strange and yet familiar scene last night, when the orchestra opened the 21st annual series of Pop concerts and gave the 1042d performance. There were at least 1200 people in the hall.

Throughout the stately auditorium were tables at which sat queenly women and fashionable men, who sipped beer and puffed cigarettes, laughed, chatted and listened to the music that floated out above the tinkle of thin glass and the trill of feminine laughter. Waiters in neat aprons flitted to this table or that, listened respectfully, said "Yes, sir," hurried away, and presently returned with tall glasses filled with wondrous-colored iced liquids.

Overhead in the double-tier galleries were the lovers of real music. For them no waiters juggled tinkling tumblers. It was theirs to see and hear.

The concert was conducted by Timothee Adamowski, who gained the sympathy of the audience in the first number and carried out the excellent programme amid progressive enthusiasm. Mr. Adamowski will direct one-third of the concerts this season and will be followed by Messrs Max Zach and Gustav Strube.

Even before the 55 artists beneath the gilded pipe organ had breathed forth the first note of the Rakoczy March jolly couples began to fill the table-strewn hall. It was a light-hearted, holiday host, bent on enjoying one another and the scene as an entity, fully as much as the music.

When Conductor Adamowski, having made his triumphal entry, began waving his arms as if in a vain attempt to hold in check the exquisite sounds from the instruments before him, the hall was one mass of color. In the fashion magazines it might be said that "Alice blues and rose pinks" predominated, or that the chic, slender woman in the wonderful gown was wearing a "Johnny Jones sailor set on a bandeau of tulle with the latest New York fad in peacock feathers"; but in the general beauty of the scene all such ideas were lost.

And while the music of Verdi and Puccini and Herbert rolled forth in such master fashion as is surpassed nowhere in the world, the murmur of gay voices and the tinkle of glasses mingled and the lights gleamed blurry through a haze of smoke.

Some of Boston's best known society folks were sipping beer and eating pretzels. To the student of human nature never were such rare opportunities offered. At one table tucked in among the others and yet with an air of aloofness, sat a man of stone and a woman of marble. They were companions and yet they spoke seldom and laughed never. Neither the gay scene about them nor the charm of the music in its most alluring passages affected them visibly. They sat stiffly with their eyes on the back of the sinuous conductor, through two numbers, and then in the middle of a throbbing tender passage in "Mignon," when even the last tinkle and the softest chatter had bowed to the appeal of the music, the man ostentatiously called a waiter and thereafter he and the woman complacently munched sardine sandwiches.

The programme included the Rakoczy march (Berlioz); selection from "Rigoletto" (Verdi); overture from "Mignon" (A. Thomas); waltz, "Harlequin en Voyage" (Zach); intermezzo from "Verliebt" (Strube); selection, "Mlle. Modiste" (Herbert); fantasy from "Boheme" (Puccini); Italian caprice (Tschaiikowski); selection, "Carmen" (Bizet); waltz, "Herrenschneider" (Ziehrer); American fantasy (Herbert), and March "Lorraine" (Ganno).

The Pops this season will be conducted as in past years, with a change of programme nightly.

SYMPHONY HALL

SUNDAY EVENING, APRIL 29, AT EIGHT

CONCERT

BENEFIT OF THE

San Francisco Fund

By the Members of the

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

SOLOIST

Olga Samaroff

PROGRAMME

ROSSINI	Overture, "William Tell"
BERLIOZ	{ Menuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps } Dance of the Sylphs } from "The Damnation of Faust" Rakoczy March }
LISZT	Concerto for Pianoforte, in E-flat major
HANDEL	Largo
TSCHAIKOWSKY	Variations from Suite No. 3
WAGNER	Overture, "Tannhäuser"

Popular prices, 50 cents to $1.50. Tickets now on sale at Symphony Hall Box Office

GREAT THRONG APPLAUDED

Symphony Concert for Relief Fund.

All Artists Volunteered and
About $2400 Was Raised.

Hall Crowded and Some Were Turned Away.

globe Apr. 30, 1906
The public responded nobly last evening to the San Francisco relief benefit concert given by the members of the Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall.

No such crowd was ever seen at a Symphony concert in the regular season, for the simple reason that the rules ordinarily in force at those concerts would not allow the sale of tickets for standing space, several hundred of which were represented last night by men and women who crowded the standing room till not another could have found entrance edgeways. In fact, applicants for tickets had to be turned away because of the exhaustion of the standing room as well as the seats.

The general relief fund from this concert will benefit to the amount of $2400, for not a single individual, from conductor Gericke to the boy who distributed programs, but gave his services gratuitously, including the 96 players.

It was not at all a typical Symphony audience, although on the floor were many regular patrons; but the real tone was given the event by an element that probably knows very little of Symphony concerts, but may be seen oftener at the downtown Sunday evening concerts. It was a great event for them and there was no question of the enjoyment they got out of it.

The program, which had been announced as a popular one, did not signify ragtime airs, but only high-class works, with a little more of what one might term "melodious swing" to them than the ordinary Symphony selections.

The overture to the opera, "William Tell," made a fine beginning; and the suite from Delibes' ballet, "Sylvia," delighted everybody. But the triumph of the evening was won by Mme Olga Samaroff, the brilliant pianist, who gave her services. Her dainty and rippling execution in Liszt's concerto in E flat earned her six recalls, which the audience manifestly intended should be construed as a wish for an encore. Although the stage was cleared of all the musicians and a portion of the audience had retired to the lobbies to promenade, the artiste was finally obliged to respond with an encore, which was no less rapturously applauded than her first selection.

The other numbers on the program were a largo from Handel, in which the orchestra was assisted by Wallace Goodrich, organist, and by Mrs John Bowers of Portland, Miss Gertrude French of Buxford, Miss Genevieve Harvey of San Francisco and Miss Raymah Dowse of Boston; a selection from Tschalkowsky and Wagner's ever-grand overture from "Tannhauser."

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR THE 'FRISCO FUND

Full Band, With Mr. Gericke at the Desk and Mme. Samaroff Soloist,
Earns $2400 for the San Francisco Sufferers.

An immense audience turned out last night to attend the benefit concert, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the entire proceeds of which are to be turned over to the San Francisco sufferers' fund. The program was of a more popular nature than is usually given by the Boston Symphony, and was well calculated to attract a great throng of music lovers. It was likewise the last appearance of Mr. Gericke at the head of the organization, as he sails for Germany this week.

The soloist was Olga Samaroff, and she was heard in the famous Liszt concerto for pianoforte in E-flat major.

The program opened with the noble but overworked William Tell overture, which the orchestra played with wonderful effectiveness. The beautiful suite from the ballet Sylvia of Delibes followed; then Tschalkowsky's variation from Suite No. 3; then Handel's Largo, and the concert closed with the great overture from Tannhauser, magnificently played. Mme. Samaroff was in splendid form and was recalled again and again after a superb performance of the concerto. The audience was a very enthusiastic one, and at the close of the concert tendered an ovation to Mr. Gericke.

The audience arrived early and the house was all sold out before 7.45. At the box office last night it was said that the Symphony Orchestra would be able to contribute $2400 as a result of the concert.

ANY, APRIL 30, 1906

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Transl.

Symphony Hall: The San Francisco Benefit

Almost every seat in Symphony Hall was occupied last night at the concert of our orchestra for the San Francisco relief fund. Quite every seat had been sold, and Mr. Gericke, Mme. Samaroff, the ninety-six men of the band, doorkeepers, ushers—every one concerned in fact—gave their services. Thus there was not a penny of expense, and today the full receipts of $2485.50 go to the fund. Throughout the concert was brilliant, and some of the numbers were music of a sort in which we rarely hear the Symphony Orchestra. There was a suite of ballet music, for example, Delibes' from "Sylvia," and conductor and band played the slow waltz and the pizzicato fragment with an exquisite softness of tone, a grace of melodic line, and a delicately pointed fineness of rhythm that made ballet airs what, at their best, they really are—the beauty of the dance idealized into tones by a composer who has something of the poet in him. It is easy to wish that there were a little of such ballet music on the regular programmes of the Symphony Orchestra. Our band can idealize it to the very fancies that the listening imagination sees and feels, as it very seldom does before the actual dancers in the theatre. And ballet airs so transfigured are as truly of the art of music as "Thus Spake Zarathustra"—perhaps more truly.

It was keen pleasure also to hear the overture to Rossini's "William Tell" with all the rhythmic vivacity that our orchestra, when it is "on edge," as it was last night, can give to it. In turn, too, our strings, with Mr. Goodrich to aid at the organ, and three additional harps to reinforce Mr. Schuecker's, glorified Handel's "Largo." The broad curve, the unbroken sweep and the mellow and vibrant depth of their tone vitalized the hackneyed music. So Handel might have heard it as he wrote. The public of the Symphony concerts knows the ease of virtuosity with which the band tosses off Tchaikovsky's variations like quick-coming, fiery or gentle fancies, and the rhythmic zest and tonal glow it brings to the dance with which it ends. There was the brilliancy that makes Liszt's first concerto seem like a magnificent improvisation, wherein expression leaps to imagination and each spurs the other in Mme. Samaroff's playing of the music. And it was brilliancy that was warm with changeable feeling and pliant with responsiveness. The lyric passages, alike at the hands of the pianist and the lips of the wood winds, was of remote and wooing beauty, and the little dialogue between the piano and the triangle was fancy tinkling. Nor is there in the sheer intoxication of the concerto any of the deeper things that for the moment lie beyond Mme. Samaroff. Finally, came the overture to "Tannhauser," and in a performance that lifted it to epic dimension and power. In twenty performances in as many opera houses under as many conductors it would hardly touch such a height of tonal splendor and impassioned power. It was good to take final leave of Mr. Gericke so.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR FRISCO FUND

Mme. Samaroff Performs
Liszt Concerto—Idea
Player's Own.

Herald Apr. 30, 1906

The Boston Symphony orchestra, led by Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, gave a concert last night for the benefit of the San Francisco fund. There was a very large audience, as large as the hall could hold. The programme was as follows: Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; suite from Delibes' ballet, "Sylvia"; Liszt's concerto in E flat major, No. 1, for the piano (Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist); Handel's Largo; variations from suite No. 3, Tschalkowsky; overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner.

The idea of giving this concert was wholly spontaneous with the members of the orchestra. They arranged the matter among themselves, and the original intention was that one of their own number should lead, but Mr. Gericke, hearing of the proposed concert, at once volunteered to conduct. Mme. Samaroff, at the end of a long and fatiguing season, was quick to offer her valuable services. The public evidently appreciated the generous and humane spirit of all that took part in adding to the fund on this occasion.

The programme of itself would have drawn many to the hall by reason of its musical interest. The overture to "William Tell" remains a masterpiece; the suite from "Sylvia" is one of the finest examples of ballet music which serves not only in the theatre, but graces a concert hall; Tschalkowsky, the self-torturer, who had doubts about the value of many of his compositions, was pleased with his variations, and with good reason; the overture to "Tannhauser" is always a favorite, and there are hundreds who are delighted by the effective perversion of Handel's simple tune.

Mme. Samaroff had thought of playing Liszt's concerto when she appeared here recently at a Symphony concert, but Mr. Ganz anticipated her. She

300

At the last Cambridge concert and with extraordinary success. Last night she gave a superb performance, superb in dash and brilliance. Nor was this performance merely one of glittering pomp. Romantic tenderness and sentiment were poetically expressed. Passages of bravura were performed with an elegance that was never heartless. The whole interpretation was one of rare beauty and vitality. All in all, it was by far the broadest and most spontaneous performance of Mme. Samaroff this season. Recalled again and again by stormy applause, she at last played an etude by Chopin.

In Handel's Largo the orchestra was assisted by Mr. Wallace Goodrich, organist, and three women harpists in addition to Mr. Schuecker.

The audience was enthusiastic throughout. The net sum to be handed to the relief fund will be nearly $2500.

Mr. Gericke's "Official" Farewell

The interest in the Symphony concert of Saturday evening was personal, rather than musical, and of the familiar music that made the programme enough has already been said in this column. The audience had come with one intent—to express to Mr. Gericke at his last appearance at a regular Symphony concert, the esteem in which it holds his work here, and the memory of it that it will cherish many years. As the conductor who has made our orchestra one of the first bands in the musical world, his reputation, our appreciation, and the endurance of both are as secure as such things can be. But even when we would describe the details of that leave-taking, the Sunday newspapers long since anticipated us. Suffice it to say, that the audience was unusually gay of aspect and expectant of manner; that a green garland decked the front of the stage, and flowers, greenery and ribbons in the Austrian and the American colors the conductor's stand; that the applause throughout the concert was very hearty and that at the end came the little ceremony that crowned the occasion. On a table stood a silver cup, appropriately wrought with a fanciful design suggesting its purpose and duly inscribed. In a few direct and sincere words about Mr. Gericke's work, Mr. Henry M. Rogers gave it to him as the token of the appreciative honor in which his audiences hold him. On an accompanying scroll was further token of that deep and abiding regard. Emotion that ran still deeper made Mr. Gericke's reply almost inaudible. The listener caught the feeling rather than the words he was uttering. But, through them and around them, the work that he has done in the thirteen years of his command of our orchestra was speaking—trumpet-tongued. H. T. P.

301

APRIL 18 1906

WILL MR.

Brown

JOIN US IN A DINNER TO BE GIVEN IN HONOR OF MR. GERICKE ON TUESDAY EVENING, MAY FIRST?

THE COST OF THE DINNER (WITHOUT WINE) WILL BE THREE DOLLARS. THE PLACE
WILL BE DESIGNATED LATER.

IF NO REPLY IS RECEIVED WITHIN TWO DAYS, IT WILL BE UNDERSTOOD THAT THIS INVITATION IS DECLINED.

F. S. CONVERSE
CARL FAELTEN
ARTHUR FOOTE
WALLACE GOODRICH
CLAYTON JOHNS
B. J. LANG
C. M. LOEFFLER

305
played it with the Symphony orchestra at the last Cambridge concert and with extraordinary success. Last night she gave a superb performance, superb in dash and brilliance. Nor was this performance merely one of glittering pomp. Romantic tenderness and sentiment were poetically expressed. Passages of bravura were performed with an elegance that was never heartless. The whole interpretation was one of rare beauty and vitality. All in all, it was by far the broadest and most spontaneous performance of Mme. Samaroff this season. Recalled again and again by stormy applause, she at last played an etude by Chopin.

In Handel's Largo the orchestra was assisted by Mr. Wallace Goodrich, organist, and three women harpists in addition to Mr. Schuecker.

The audience was enthusiastic throughout. The net sum to be handed to the relief fund will be nearly $2500.

Mr. Gericke's "Official" Farewell

The interest in the Symphony concert of Saturday evening was personal, rather than musical, and of the familiar music that made the programme enough has already been said in this column. The audience had come with one intent—to express to Mr. Gericke at his last appearance at a regular Symphony concert, the esteem in which it holds his work here, and the memory of it that it will cherish many years. As the conductor who has made our orchestra one of the first bands in the musical world, his reputation, our appreciation, and the endurance of both are as secure as such things can be. But even when we would describe the details of that leave-taking, the Sunday newspapers long since anticipated us. Suffice it to say, that the audience was unusually gay of aspect and expectant of manner; that a green garland decked the front of the stage, and flowers, greenery and ribbons in the Austrian and the American colors the conductor's stand; that the applause throughout the concert was very hearty and that at the end came the little ceremony that crowned the occasion. On a table stood a silver cup, appropriately wrought with a fanciful design suggesting its purpose and duly inscribed. In a few direct and sincere words about Mr. Gericke's work, Mr. Henry M. Rogers gave it to him as the token of the appreciative honor in which his audiences hold him. On an accompanying scroll was further token of that deep and abiding regard. Emotion that ran still deeper made Mr. Gericke's reply almost inaudible. The listener caught the feeling rather than the words he was uttering. But through them and around them, the work that he has done in the thirteen years of his command of our orchestra was speaking—trumpet-tongued. H. T. P.

APRIL 18 1906

WILL MR.

Brown

JOIN US IN A DINNER TO BE GIVEN IN HONOR OF MR. GERICKE ON TUESDAY EVENING, MAY FIRST?

THE COST OF THE DINNER (WITHOUT WINE) WILL BE THREE DOLLARS. THE PLACE WILL BE DESIGNATED LATER.

IF NO REPLY IS RECEIVED WITHIN TWO DAYS, IT WILL BE UNDERSTOOD THAT THIS INVITATION IS DECLINED.

F. S. CONVERSE
CARL FAELTEN
ARTHUR FOOTE
WALLACE GOODRICH
CLAYTON JOHNS
B. J. LANG
C. M. LOEFFLER

Arthur Nikisch.

It is said that he would not accept the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for less than $50,000 a year and a $125,000 life insurance policy.

WORKS PERFORMED AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS DURING THE SEASON OF 1905-1906.

Works marked with a double asterisk were performed for the first time in Boston.
Works marked with an asterisk were performed for the first time at these concerts.
Works marked with a dagger were performed for the first time anywhere.
Artists marked with an asterisk appeared at these concerts for the first time.
Artists marked with a double asterisk appeared for the first time in Boston.
Artists marked with a dagger are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

	PAGE
BACH, J. S.: Suite in D major, No. 3, for Orchestra. March 31, 1906 . . . . .	1443
Prelude, Adagio, and Gavotte, in Rondo Form (arranged for Strings by Sigismund Bachrich). April 28, 1906 . . . . .	1750
Pastorale from the "Christmas Oratorio," December 23, 1905 . . . . .	628
Toccata in F major, for Organ.* (WALLACE GOODRICH.) April 14, 1906 . . . . .	1595
BACHRICH. See Bach.
BEETHOVEN: Symphony in D major, No. 2, Op. 36. October 14, 1905 . . . . .	48
Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Eroica," Op. 55. October 28, 1905 . . . . .	194
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Op. 67. April 28, 1906 . . . . .	1768
Symphony in F major, "Pastoral," No. 6, Op. 68. December 23, 1905 . . . . .	656
Symphony in F major, No. 8, Op. 93. March 24, 1906 . . . . .	1404
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84. February 3, 1906 . . . . .	999
Concerto in D major, for Violin, Op. 61. (WILLY HESS.†) January 6, 1906 . . . . .	774
Concerto in E-flat major, No. 5, for Pianoforte, Op. 73. (ADELE AUS DER OHE.) January 20, 1906 . . . . .	858
BERLIOZ: Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9. April 28, 1906 . . . . .	1739
BOEHLE: "Ulysses' Departure and Shipwreck," the first of Four Episodes for Orchestra, Op. 6. March 3, 1906 . . . . .	1247
BRAHMS: Symphony in D major, No. 2, Op. 73. January 6, 1906 . . . . .	814
Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98. March 31, 1906 . . . . .	1470
Concerto in D major, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 77. (HUGO HEERMANN.) November 25, 1905 . . . . .	394
BUSONI: Comedy Overture in C major, Op. 38. November 25, 1905 . . . . .	387
"Geharnischte" Suite, Orchestral Suite No. 2, Op. 34 A. March 31, 1906 . . . . .	1463
CHAUSSON: Symphony in B-flat major, Op. 20. January 20, 1906 . . . . .	884
COLERIDGE-TAYLOR: "Onaway! Awake, Beloved," from "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast." (BEN DAVIES.) April 14, 1906 . . . . .	1628
CONVERSE: "La Belle Dame sans Merci" (after the Poem by Keats), Ballade for Baritone Solo and Orchestra, Op. 12. (DAVID BISPHAM. *) March 3, 1906 . . . . .	1241
DEBUSSY: Prelude to Stéphane Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun." March 10, 1906 . . . . .	1308
DUKAS: Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (after a Ballad by Goethe), led by D'INDY. December 2, 1905 . . . . .	510
DVORÁK: Symphonic Poem, "The Wood Dove" (after Erben's Like-named Ballad),  Op. 110. October 14, 1905 . . . . .	27

Arthur Nikisch.

It is said that he would not accept the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for less than $50,000 a year and a $125,000 life insurance policy.

WORKS PERFORMED AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS DURING THE SEASON OF 1905-1906.

Works marked with a double asterisk were performed for the first time in Boston.
Works marked with an asterisk were performed for the first time at these concerts.
Works marked with a dagger were performed for the first time anywhere.
Artists marked with an asterisk appeared at these concerts for the first time.
Artists marked with a double asterisk appeared for the first time in Boston.
Artists marked with a dagger are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

	PAGE
BACH, J. S.: Suite in D major, No. 3, for Orchestra. March 31, 1906 . . . . .	1443
Prelude, Adagio, and Gavotte, in Rondo Form (arranged for Strings by Sigismund Bachrich). April 28, 1906 . . . . .	1750
Pastorale from the "Christmas Oratorio," December 23, 1905 . . . . .	628
Toccata in F major, for Organ.* (WALLACE GOODRICH.) April 14, 1906 . . . . .	1595
BACHRICH. See Bach.
BEETHOVEN: Symphony in D major, No. 2, Op. 36. October 14, 1905 . . . . .	48
Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Eroica," Op. 55. October 28, 1905 . . . . .	194
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Op. 67. April 28, 1906 . . . . .	1768
Symphony in F major, "Pastoral," No. 6, Op. 68. December 23, 1905 . . . . .	656
Symphony in F major, No. 8, Op. 93. March 24, 1906 . . . . .	1404
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84. February 3, 1906 . . . . .	999
Concerto in D major, for Violin, Op. 61. (WILLY HESS.†) January 6, 1906 . . . . .	774
Concerto in E-flat major, No. 5, for Pianoforte, Op. 73. (ADELE AUS DER OHE.) January 20, 1906 . . . . .	858
BERLIOZ: Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9. April 28, 1906 . . . . .	1739
BOEHLE: "Ulysses' Departure and Shipwreck," the first of Four Episodes for Orchestra, Op. 6. March 3, 1906 . . . . .	1247
BRAHMS: Symphony in D major, No. 2, Op. 73. January 6, 1906 . . . . .	814
Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98. March 31, 1906 . . . . .	1470
Concerto in D major, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 77. (HUGO HEERMANN.) November 25, 1905 . . . . .	394
BUSONI: Comedy Overture in C major, Op. 38. November 25, 1905 . . . . .	387
"Geharnischte" Suite, Orchestral Suite No. 2, Op. 34 A. March 31, 1906 . . . . .	1463
CHAUSSON: Symphony in B-flat major, Op. 20. January 20, 1906 . . . . .	884
COLERIDGE-TAYLOR: "Onaway! Awake, Beloved," from "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast." (BEN DAVIES.) April 14, 1906 . . . . .	1628
CONVERSE: "La Belle Dame sans Merci" (after the Poem by Keats), Ballade for Baritone Solo and Orchestra, Op. 12. (DAVID BISPHAM.*) March 3, 1906 . . . . .	1241
DEBUSSY: Prelude to Stéphane Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun." March 10, 1906 . . . . .	1308
DUKAS: Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (after a Ballad by Goethe), led by D'INDY. December 2, 1905 . . . . .	510
DVORÁK: Symphonic Poem, "The Wood Dove" (after Erben's Like-named Ballad), Op. 110. October 14, 1905 . . . . .	27

Overture, "Nature," Op. 91. December 23, 1905 . . . . .	619
Concerto in B minor, for Violoncello, Op. 104. (HEINRICH WARNKE.) October 28, 1905 . . . . .	184
ELGAR: Overture, "In the South," Op. 50. December 30, 1905 . . . . .	737
FAURÉ: "Pelleas and Melisande," Suite from Stage Music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, Op. 80 (led by VINCENT D'INDY). December 2, 1905 . . . . .	485
FRANCK: "Psyche and Cupid," from "Psyche," a Symphonic Poem (led by VINCENT D'INDY), December 2, 1905; (led by W. GERIQUE) April 7, 1906 . . . . .	502, 1542
"The Gardens of Cupid," from "Psyche." April 7, 1906 . . . . .	1542
GLAZOUNOFF: "The Kremlin," Symphonic Picture in Three Parts, Op. 30. January 27, 1906 . . . . .	960
GOLDMARK, CARL: Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13. March 10, 1906 . . . . .	1295
Overture, "In the Spring," in A major, Op. 36. October 14, 1905 . . . . .	7
Concerto in A minor, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 28. (JACQUES HOFFMANN.†) April 7, 1906 . . . . .	1540
GOLDMARK, RUBIN: Overture to "Hiawatha." January 6, 1906 . . . . .	771
GRIEG: Concerto in A minor, for Pianoforte, Op. 16. (OLGA SAMAROFF.†) April 21, 1906 . . . . .	1684
HANDEL: Air, "Oh, had I Jubal's Lyre," from the Oratorio "Joshua." (MARY HISSEM DE MOSS.†) March 31, 1906 . . . . .	1461
HARCOURT, D': Overture to the Opera "Tasso." March 24, 1906 . . . . .	1367
HAYDN: Symphony in D major (B. & H., No. 2). February 10, 1906 . . . . .	1075
Symphony in B-flat major * (B. & H., No. 8). December 16, 1905 . . . . .	543
HUMPERDINCK: Introduction to Act III. of "Kings' Children." December 16, 1905 . . . . .	568
Humoreske, December 16, 1905 . . . . .	578
INDY, D': Symphony on a Mountain Air, for Orchestra and Pianoforte, Op. 25. (HEINRICH GEBHARD, pianist.) Feb- ruary 10, 1906 . . . . .	1118
Symphony in B-flat major, No. 2, Op. 57 (led by VINCENT D'INDY). December 2, 1905 . . . . .	467
Symphonic Variations, "Istar," Op. 42 (led by VINCENT D'INDY). December 2, 1905 . . . . .	494
JACQUES-DALCROZE: Concerto in C minor, for Violin and Orchestar Op. 50. (HENRI MARTEAU.) March 10, 1906 . . . . .	1304
LISZT: A Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures (after Goethe). April 14, 1906 . . . . .	1630
Symphonic Poem, No. 2, "Tasso: Lament and Triumph." December 16, 1905 . . . . .	578
Symphonic Poem, No. 4, "Orpheus." January 20, 1906 . . . . .	873
Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1, for Pianoforte and Orchestra. (RUDOLPH GANZ.†) March 24, 1906 . . . . .	1382
Concerto in A major, No. 2, for Pianoforte. (WALDEMAR LUETSCHG.) October 21, 1905 . . . . .	101
Song, "The Loreley," with Orchestra. (LOUISE HOMER.)

October 14, 1905 . . . . .	18
LOEFFLER: "The Devil's Villanelle," Fantasia for Orchestra and Organ (after Rollinat's Poem), Op. 9. November 25, 1905 . . . . .	396
MACDOWELL: "Lancelot and Elaine," Symphonic Poem (after Tennyson), Op. 25. March 24, 1906 . . . . .	1394
MAHLER: Symphony No. 5. February 3, 1906; February 24, 1906 (by request) . . . . .	1032, 1182
MARSCHNER: "Upon that Day," Aria for Baritone from "Hans Heiling."* (DAVID BISPHAM.†) March 3, 1906 . . . . .	1257
MENDELSSOHN: Symphony in A major, "Italian," No. 4, Op. 90. April 21, 1906 . . . . .	1667
Overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," Op. 27. January 20, 1906 . . . . .	851
Overture to the Legend of "The Fair Melusina," Op. 32. March 3, 1906 . . . . .	1223
Concerto in E minor, for Violin, Op. 64. (MARIE HALL.†) January 27, 1906 . . . . .	942
MOZART: Symphony in G minor (K. 550). November 18, 1905 . . . . .	307
Symphony in C major, "Jupiter" (K. 551). January 27, 1906 . . . . .	927
Scene, "He has gone," and Aria, "For Pity's Sake," from "Così fan tutte." (EMMA EAMES.†) December 30, 1905 . . . . .	700
"The Pangs of Hell," from "The Magic Flute." (MARY HISSEM DE MOSS.†) March 31, 1906 . . . . .	1465
PAINE: Prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes.* November 18, 1905 . . . . .	327
RUBINSTEIN: Concerto in D minor, No. 4, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 70. (ERNEST HUTCHESON.) February 24, 1906 . . . . .	1164
SAINT-SAËNS: Concerto in A minor, No. 1, for Violoncello and Orchestra, Op. 33. (ELSA RUEGGER.) . . . . .	1090
SCHILLINGS: Prelude to Act III. of "The Pipers' Holiday. April 7, 1906 . . . . .	1519
SCHUBERT: Unfinished Symphony in B minor. October 28, 1905 . . . . .	155
Symphony in C major, No. 7. March 10, 1906 . . . . .	1332
"The Almighty," Op. 79, No. 2, Song with Orchestral Ac- companiment. (EMMA EAMES.†) December 30, 1905 . . . . .	729
SCHUMANN: Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38. No- vember 25, 1905 . . . . .	420
Symphony in D minor, No. 4, Op. 120. April 7, 1906 . . . . .	1556
Concerto in A minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 54. (HAROLD BAUER.) February 3, 1906 . . . . .	1020
SINDING: Concerto in A major, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 45 (FELIX WINTERNITZ.) November 18, 1905 . . . . .	324
SMETANA: Overture to the Opera "Libussa." October 21, 1905 . . . . .	79
STRAUSS, R.: "From Italy," Symphonic Fantasia, Op. 16. March 3, 1906 . . . . .	1268

Tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24.	October 21, 1905, April 21, 1906	104, 1704
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.	January 6, 1906	784
STRUBE: Concerto in F-sharp minor, for Violin and Orchestra.† (TIMOTHÉE ADAMOWSKI.†)	December 23, 1905	641
TSCHAIKOWSKY: Symphony in F minor, No. 4, Op. 36.	October 21, 1905	114
"Francesca da Rimini," Orchestral Fantasia after Dante, Op. 32.	December 30, 1905	712
"Romeo and Juliet," Overture-fantasia after Shakespeare.	April 28, 1906	1754
Theme and Variations from Suite No. 3, in G major, Op. 55.	November 18, 1905	342
WAGNER: March of Homage.	November 4, 1905,	231
Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser."	November 4, 1905	236
Elisabeth's Greeting, from "Tannhäuser," Act II. (JOHANNA GADSKI.)	November 4, 1905	229
Prize Song from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." (ELLISON VAN HOOSE.)	November 4, 1905	260
Siegfried's Parting from Brünnhilde, Siegfried's Death and Funeral March, Closing Scene from "Dusk of the Gods." (JOHANNA GADSKI and ELLISON VAN HOOSE.)	November 4, 1905	264
"Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," April 14, 1906		1616
Scene, "Just God!" and Aria, "My Life fades in its Blossom," from "Rienzi," Act III., No. 9. (LOUISE HOMER.)	October 14, 1905	32
WEBBER: Symphony in C minor.	December 30, 1905	695
WEBER: Overture to the Opera, "Der Freischütz."	February 24, 1906	1151
Overture to the Opera "Euryanthe."	April 21, 1906	1714
Concert Piece in F minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 79. (ALFRED REISENAUER.*)	December 16, 1905,	554
Aria, "Through the Forests,"* Act I. of "Der Freischütz." (BEN DAVIES.)	April 14, 1906	1608

SUMMARY.

BACH	4	INDY, D'	3
BEETHOVEN	8	JAQUES-DALCROZE	1
BERLIOZ	1	LISZT	6
BOEHE	1	LOEFFLER	1
BRAHMS	3	MACDOWELL	1
BUSONI	2	MAHLER	2
CHAUSSON	1	MARSCHNER	1
COLERIDGE-TAYLOR	1	MENDELSSOHN	4
CONVERSE	1	MOZART	4
DEBUSSY	1	PAINE	1
DUKAS	1	RUBINSTEIN	1
DVORÁK	3	SAINT-SAËNS	1

ELGAR	1	SCHILLINGS	1
FAURÉ	1	SCHUBERT	3
FRANCK	3	SCHUMANN	3
GLAZOUNOFF	1	SINDING	1
GOLDMARK, CARL	3	SMETANA	1
GOLDMARK, RUBIN	1	STRAUSS, R.	4
GRIEG	1	STRUBE	1
HANDEL	1	TSCHAIKOWSKY	4
HARCOURT, D'	1	WAGNER	7
HAYDN	2	WEBBER	1
HUMPERDINCK	2	WEBER	4

100

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON.

SYMPHONIES.

CHAUSSON: Symphony in B-flat major, Op. 20.	January 20, 1906.
MAHLER: Symphony No. 5.	February 3, 1906, February 24, 1906.
WEBBER: Symphony in C minor.	December 30, 1905

3

SYMPHONIC POEMS, ETC.

BOEHE: "Ulysses' Departure and Shipwreck," first of four Episodes from "The Voyages of Ulysses," Op. 6.	March 3, 1906.
CONVERSE: "La Belle Dame sans Merci" (after the Poem by Keats), Ballade for Baritone Solo (DAVID BISPHAM*) and Orchestra, Op. 12.	March 3, 1906.
DVORÁK: "The Wood Dove," Op. 110.	October 14, 1905.
FRANCK: "Psyche and Cupid" (December 2, 1905), "The Gardens of Cupid" (April 7, 1906), from "Psyche."
GLAZOUNOFF: "The Kremlin," Op. 30.	January 27, 1906

6

OVERTURES AND PRELUDES.

BUSONI: Comedy Overture in C major, Op. 38.	November 25, 1905.
ELGAR: "In the South," Op. 50.	December 30, 1905.
HARCOURT, D': Overture to the Opera "Tasso."	March 24, 1906.
SCHILLINGS: Prelude to Act III. of "The Pipers' Holiday."	April 7, 1906.
SMETANA: Overture to the Opera "Libussa."	October 21, 1905

5

SUITES, VARIATIONS, ETC.

BUSONI: "Geharnischte" Suite, Orchestral Suite No. 2, Op. 34A.
March 31, 1906

1

CONCERTOS.

JAQUES-DALCROZE: Concerto in C minor, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 50. (HENRI MARTEAU.)	March 10, 1906.
SINDING: Concerto in A major, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 45. (FELIX WINTERNITZ.)	November 18, 1905.

308
STRUBE: Concerto in F-sharp minor, for Violin and Orchestra.†
(TIMOTHÉE ADAMOWSKI.†) December 23, 1905 . . . . .

3

THE FOLLOWING ARTISTS HAVE APPEARED THIS SEASON.

PAGE

Mr. TIMOTHÉE ADAMOWSKI,† violinist. December 23, 1905. Strube's Concerto in F-sharp minor † . . . . .	641
Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE, pianist. January 20, 1906. Beet- hoven's Concerto No. 5. (Sketch) . . . . .	856
Mr. HAROLD BAUER, pianist. February 3, 1906. Schumann's Concerto in A minor, Op. 54. (Sketch) . . . . .	1019
Mr. DAVID BISPHAM,* baritone. March 3, 1906. F. S. Con- verse's "Belle Dame sans Merci," and "Upon that Day,"* from "Hans Heiling." (Sketch) . . . . .	1238
Mr. BEN DAVIES, tenor. April 14, 1906. "Through the For- ests,"* Act I. of "Der Freischütz," and "Onaway! Awake, Beloved," from Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast." (Sketch) . . . . .	1606
Mme. EMMA EAMES, soprano. December 30, 1905. Scene, "He is Gone," and "For Pity's Sake,"* from Act II. of "Così fan tutte" and Schubert's "The Almighty," with Orchestra. (Sketch) . . . . .	697
Mme. JOHANNA GADSKI, soprano. November 4, 1905. Elisa- beth's Greeting, from "Tannhäuser," excerpts from "Dusk of the Gods." (Sketch) . . . . .	233
Mr. RUDOLPH GANZ,* pianist. March 24, 1906. Liszt's Con- certo in E-flat major, No. 1. (Sketch) . . . . .	1382
Mr. WALLACE GOODRICH, organist. April 14, 1906. Bach's Toc- cata in F major, for Organ . . . . .	1595
Miss MARIE HALL,* violinist. January 27, 1906. Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor, Op. 64. (Sketch) . . . . .	940
Mr. HUGO HEERMANN, violinist. November 25, 1905. Brahms's Concerto in D major, Op. 77. (Sketch) . . . . .	392
Prof. WILLY HESS,† violinist. January 6, 1906. Beethoven's Concerto in D major, Op. 61 . . . . .	774
Mr. JACQUES HOFFMANN,*† violinist. April 7, 1906. Gold- mark's Concerto in A minor, Op. 28. (Sketch) . . . . .	1539
Mme. LOUISE HOMER, contralto. October 14, 1905. Liszt's "Loreley," with Orchestra; Scene, "Just God," and Aria, "My Life fades in its Blossom," from "Rienzi," Act. III, No. 9. (Sketch) . . . . .	14
Mr. ERNEST HUTCHESON, pianist. February 24, 1906. Rubin- stein's Concerto in D minor, No. 4, Op. 70. (Sketch) . . . . .	1162
Mr. WALDEMAR LUETSCHG, pianist. October 21, 1905. Liszt's Concerto in A major, No. 2. (Sketch) . . . . .	101
Mr. HENRI MARTEAU, violinist. March 10, 1906. Jaques- Dalcroze's Concerto in C minor, Op. 50. (Sketch) . . . . .	1300
Mrs. MARY HISSEM DE MOSS,* soprano. March 31, 1900. "Oh, had I Jubal's Lyre,"* from Handel's "Joshua," and "The Pangs of Hell," from Mozart's "Magic Flute." (Sketch) . . . . .	1460
Mr. ALFRED REISENAUER,* pianist. December 16, 1905. Weber's Concert Piece, Op. 79. (Sketch) . . . . .	552

309
Miss ELSA RUEGGER, 'cellist. February 10, 1906. Saint-Saëns's Concerto in A minor, No. 1, Op. 33. (Sketch) . . . . . 1090
Mme. OLGA SAMAROFF.* April 21, 1906. Grieg's Concerto in A minor, Op. 16. (Sketch) . . . . . 1684

Mr. ELLISON VAN HOOSE, tenor. November 4, 1905. Prize Song from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and excerpts from "Dusk of the Gods." (Sketch) . . . . . 236
Mr. HEINRICH WARNKE,**† 'cellist. October 28, 1905. Dvorák's
Concerto in B minor, Op. 104. (Sketch) . . . . . 182
Mr. FELIX WINTERNITZ, Violinist. November 18, 1905. Sind-ing's Concerto in A major, Op. 45.** (Sketch) . . . . . 322

**

Sopranos: Mme. Eames, Mme. Gadski, Mrs. Hissem de Moss* . . . . . 3
Contralto: Mme. Louise Homer . . . . . 1
Tenors: Mr. Davies, Mr. Van Hoose . . . . . 2
Baritone: Mr. Bispham* . . . . . 1
Pianists: Mme. Samaroff,* Miss Aus der Ohe, Messrs. Bauer, Ganz,* Hutcheson, Luetschg,** Reisenauer* . . . . . 7
Organist: Mr. W. Goodrich . . . . . 1
Violinists: Miss Hall,* Messrs. Adamowski,† Heermann, Hess,† Hoffmann,*† Marteau, Winternitz . . . . . 7
'Cellists: Miss Ruegger, Mr. Warnke**† . . . . . 2

24

**

Incidental Solos: Mr. Gebhard, pianist, in d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air. Sketch of Mr. Gebhard . . . . . 1118

ENTR'ACTES AND EXCURSIONS.

PAGE

APULEIUS: From the Story of Psyche . . . . .	504, 509
BAUGHAN, F. A.: "Programme Music" . . . . .	44
BEETHOVEN: Sayings about Music . . . . .	664
BERGERAT, EMILE: "The Conversion of the Abbé Liszt" (Englished by P. H.) . . . . .	1388
BERLIOZ, HECTOR: "Beethoven's Symphony in C minor" . . . . .	1770
BLACKBURN, V. CENT: "Art and Trade" . . . . .	1265
"Così fan tutte" . . . . .	708
"From Sour came Sweet" . . . . .	1260
"Mozart" . . . . .	944
"Tschaikowsky" . . . . .	726
BRUNEAU, ALFRED: "Debussy" . . . . .	1315
CALVOCOROSI, M. D.: "D'Indy's Symphony in B-flat major" . . . . .	467
CHORLEY, H. F.: "Schumann's Symphony in B-flat major" . . . . .	434
DE QUINCEY, THOMAS: Praise of the Dance . . . . .	349
DUNCAN, EDMONDSTOUNE: "Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony" . . . . .	164
HALE, PHILIP: "Beethoven and Goethe" . . . . .	1008
"Beethoven as a Pianist" . . . . .	866
"Beethoven and Programme Music" . . . . .	661
"Claques, Ancient and Modern" . . . . .	802
"Color Audition and Tonality" . . . . .	1474
"Debussy" . . . . .	1314
"D'Indy, Vincent" (a biographical compilation) . . . . .	478, 593
"Istar: Her Legend" . . . . .	498
"Loeffler's Music in Boston" . . . . .	414
"Maeterlinck: Music for his Plays" . . . . .	491
"Oboe, A Note on the" . . . . .	644
"Oratorio and Gospel Recitations" . . . . .	634
"Pipers, Ancient: Their Condition and Laws" . . . . .	1519, 1530

"Rollinat, Maurice" . . . . .	406
"Rubinstein's Music in Boston" . . . . .	1169
"Schubert" . . . . .	172
"Schubert: First Singers of his Songs" . . . . .	732
"Schumann: Early Years of his Symphony No. 1" . . . . .	430
Schumann: List of Works performed at these Concerts . . . . .	1566
"Smetana's Last Years" . . . . .	96
"Toccata, The" . . . . .	1598
"Tschaikowsky's Love for Mozart" . . . . .	947
HENDERSON, W. J.: Poem on Schubert . . . . .	177
KAUTZ, JOHN: "Schumann and Böttger" . . . . .	424
KREHBIEL, H. E.: "Mozart and Salzburg" . . . . .	954
LUCIAN: Excerpt from "The Lie-fancier" . . . . .	514
MALLARMÉ, STÉPHANE: "L'Après-Midi d'un Faune" . . . . .	1326
MARTEL, TANCREDÉ: "The Psalter" (Englished by P. H.) . . . . .	1097
MUSICIAN, THE (London, 1897): "Rubinstein's Hand" . . . . .	1176
NEWMAN, ERNEST: "Concerning Programme Music" . . . . .	1691
"Intelligence of the Musician" . . . . .	1108
"Music and Applause" . . . . .	795
PARRY, C. H. H.: "Schubert" . . . . .	177
ROWBOTHAM, J. F.: "The Dionysia" . . . . .	330
RUNCIMAN, J. F.: "Haydn" . . . . .	564
"Haydn Again" . . . . .	1093
"Schubert" . . . . .	178
"Tschaikowsky" . . . . .	334
"Weber" . . . . .	878
SCHUMANN, ROBERT: "Schubert's Symphony in C major" . . . . .	1336
SYMONS, ARTHUR: "The Kremlin" . . . . .	962
WAGNER, RICHARD: "Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony" . . . . .	189
WEINGARTNER, FELIX: "The Composer of the Future" . . . . .	1026

INDEX TO SUNDRY REFERENCES AND FOOTNOTES.

- BIOGRAPHICAL (MEN): Albery, 400; Bachmann, 260; Balakireff, 1757-61; Baudelaire (quoted), 1477; N. J. Beethoven, 1404; Belaïeff, 977; Blech, 570; Bleuler and Lehmann (color audition), 1480; Brentano (Loreley), 24; Breton, 1477; Boucher, 558; Brodsky, 324; Bronsart, 101; Burton, 90; Cabanes, 590; Cartellieri, 862; Castel, 1485; Clement, 778; Clementi, 545; P. E. Devrient, 1257; Diderot (quoted), 9; Duncan, 164; Dussek, 545; L. C. Elson, 1454; Erben, 28; Erdmannsdörffer, 344; Ferlendis, 1082; Graupner, 653; Ghil, 1478, 1482; L. Gilman (quoted), 1396; C. G. L. Grimm, 876; Goodson, 316; Gozlan (quoted), 1482; Guiraud, 517; H. W. Harris, 1396, 1400; R. Heller, 814; Herbeck, 155; L. Hoffmann, 1477; F. A. Hoffmeister, 545; Hollmann, 1092; T. Hood (quoted), 1317; the Hüttenbrenners, 155; Huysmans (quoted), 1482; Jaernefelt, 1464; W. L. Johnson, 641; Joseph II. of Austria, 307; Kaim, 484; Kotek, 116; Krehbiel, 653, 786; de Labrelly, 1484; Lambinet, 501; Landor (quoted), 588, 715; Laub, 949; Lauterbach, 1540; Lekeu, 1320; Lhérie, 16; E. Liszt, 1385; Louis, 1248; Love, 653; A. Ludwig (completer of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony), 160; Lumley, 1480; Mälzel, 1408, 1410; Maginn (quoted), 1762; Mallarmé, 1326; Mayseder, 862; H. Melville (quoted), 1480; Ed. Mollenhauer, 1560; Morell, 1461; Morelli, 1082; Moussorgsky, 960; Nachbaur, 269; Naylor, 1454; Niemann in Paris, 238; Palschau, 1752; Pepita, 242; I. J. Pleyel, 545; C. Pleyel, 545; Petri, 387; Pölchau, 1752; da Ponte, 706; Reimann, 1474; de Ribas, 1560; Riemann, 1452; Rimsky-Korsakoff (described by Borodin and Tchaikowsky), 969; A. Ritter, 110, 1270; Rösch, 104; Roncoroni, 591; Rothe, 591; Rovedino, 1082; de Saint-Lambert, 9; Salomon, 548; Scheibe, 1486; J. C. F. Schneider, 860; Stelzner, 1526; Leo Stern, 186; Sibilius, 1464; Siboni, 1409; Schikaneder, 1465; Stigelli, 1615; Sonneck, 653; T. Strong, 1401; C. D. F. Schubart, 1476; Stümer, 1610; Suarez de Mendoza, 1480; Tasso (for his madness see Cabanes, Landor, Roncoroni, and Rothe); Tichatschek, 256; Tolbecque, 1090; Unger, 264; Viotti, 1082; J. M. Vogl, 732; Wartel, 736; Weinmüller, 1409; F. H. Williams, 1478; G. H. Wilson, 1398; Zamminer, 1477.
- BIOGRAPHICAL (WOMEN): Banti, 1077; Bernard, 1160; Bernstein, 568; Campi, 658; Duschek, 658; Gabrielli, 704; Galli-Marié, 718; Hähnel, 1230; de l'Isle, 1620; Kelly, 1160; Kilitzky, 658; Krebs, 1166; Lie-Nissen, 1685; de Luce, 1160; Materna, 264; von Meck, 116; Mehlig-Falk, 102; Menter, 1387;

Milder, 658, 1409; Morichelli, 1078; Obermayer, 1406; Pasta, 40; A. Patti, 1480; Recio, 1746; Schröder-Devrient, 36, 258; Schulze, 558; Sessi sisters, 860; Storace, 545; Tedesco, 240; Topp, 1382; the Virgin Mary's Birthday, 1519; Josepha Weber, 1466.

DANCES: Bourrée, 1450; Chaconne, 1486; Gavotte, 1446; Gigue, 1452; Minuet (its proper tempo), 1412; Passacaglia, 1486; Polonaise, 348; Saltarello, 1676; Siciliano, 630, 1273.

INSTRUMENTS: Cellone, 1526; Cymbals (antique), 1313; Melophone, 430; Nebel, 1098; Oboe d' amore, 630; Oboe in Bach's time, 1460; Oboe (see Hale's "Note on the Oboe"), 644; Psaltery, 1097; Ruthe, 1046; Triangle, 1387; Trumpet in Bach and Handel's time, 1456; Violotta, 1526.

LEGENDS: Belle Dame sans Merci, 1244; Istar, 498; Loreley, 24; Melusina, 1223; Psyche, 504, 509; Ulysses, 1254; Wood-dove (Bohemian), 28.

MUSICAL AND POETIC FORMS: Basso continuo, 630; Cretic, metrical foot, 742; Parties, partheyen, suites, 1443; Toccata, 1598; Villanelle, 402.

SONGS: "A la Villette" (Bruant's), 400; "Ça Ira," 404; "Carmagnole," 404.

THEATRE, OPERA HOUSE, ETC.: Aristophanes' "Birds," Music to, 329; Arthurian legends and music, 1402; Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini," 1739; Blockx' opera, "Thyl Uylenspiegel," and the Belgian Tile, 793; "Dusk of the Gods" casts, 264, 270; Egmont, music suggested by his tragedy, 1018; "Euryanthe" casts, 1714; "Francesca da Rimini" music, 724; "Der Freischütz" casts, 1160, 1616; "Hiawatha" music, 773; Humperdinck's "Kings' Children" casts, 568-70; Libussa as an operatic heroine, 79, 81; Loreley in music, 25 et seq.; "Magic Flute" casts, 1468; Massenet's "Marie Madeleine" as an opera at Rheims, 1620; "Master-singers of Nuremberg" casts, 260, 262; Melusina as a heroine in music, 1236; "Parsifal" casts, 1616; "Pelleas and Melisande" casts, 485; Psyche in music, 1553; "Rienzi" casts, 32, 42; Russian Music Society (St. Petersburg) concerts, 972; Sakuntala in music, 1298; "Tannhäuser" at Paris, 238, at Dresden, 256; Tasso in music, 591, 1380.

CRITICAL AND LITERARY: Beatty-Kingston on Goldmark, 10; Chausson described by Tiersot, 890, by Servièrès, 893, by Gauthier-Villars, 895, by de Bréville, 896; Chausson's symphony analyzed by Risvaëg, 885; Chorley and other Englishmen on Schumann, 434; L. Damrosch's analysis of Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, 1002; de Dubor on Amazons in Bohemia, 82; Dvorák's first appearance in New York, 626; his melodramatic symphonic poems discussed by Hanslick, 30; France (Anatole) on Baudelaire, 408; Henley on romanticism, 580; d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air analyzed by Verlaine, 1122; Mahler on programme books, 1184; Rollinat described by Verlaine, 408, by the de Goncourts, 409; an old English trumpeter characterized by John Earle, 1532.

MISCELLANEOUS: Amazons (in Bohemia), 82; and elsewhere, 90; "To finger" = to touch the keys, 1024; Liszt's hands, 1180; Orpheus' appearance according to Spence, 874; Weber as a pianist, 563.

SUNDRY NOTES.

Concert in memory of Mrs. Charles Russell Lowell, October 28, 1905.

Concert in honor of Mozart's birthday, January 27, 1906.

Notes on Tannhäuser and Venus duet, which was not sung, though announced for November 4, 1905 (see page 246).

Mr. Vincent d'Indy, of Paris, conducted, by invitation, the concerts of December 1, 2, 1905, and those of the following trip.

Mr. Strube led the performance of his violin concerto, December 23, 1905.

ERRATA: Addition to d'Indy's works in Boston (484), 593; correcting date in E. d'Harcourt article (1367), 1569.

CONTINUED ON NEXT REEL